Here 'tis questioned, Shall the heavens be no more after the day of judgement? or shall the heavens corrupt when man is raised from corruption?

The Vulgar Latine reads, Till the heavens be torn or worn out. As if the heavens should be at last like old garments spent and thread-bare with long use and wearing. But the heavens are made of such stuff as will not waste or decay with age or use: when or which way soever they end, they shall end by the will of God (by which they began) not by doing service unto man.

There are divers opinions in the point. First, Some think that all creatures shall be restored to that perfection they had before the fall. Secondly, Others, that the heavens and elements only shall be restored. A third sort say that the heavens and only two of the Elements, the air and the earth shall be restored. A fourth say that the old world shall be totally abolished, and a new one created in the room of it. A fifth opinion affirms that the whole world with all the parts and works thereof, excepting Angels good and bad, the heaven of the blessed and hell, the place of the damned, shall be totally and finally annihilated; as they were once made out of nothing, so they shall turn to nothing and not return again: And these interpret this Scripture, till the heavens be no more, as teaching this utter abolition. To which they add many texts of Scripture, which they conceive speaking the same sense, and countenancing their assertion, Psal. 102. 25, 26. Heb. 1. 10, 11. Isa. 34. 4. Isa. 51. 6. 2 Pet. 3. 10. Rev. 6. 14. In these quoted places we read, that the Elements shall melt with fervent heat, that the heavens shall perish and vanish away as the smoak, that they shall be dissolved and rowled together as a scroll, that they shall fall as a withered leaf or as a dry fig from the tree, that they shall pass, yea, pass away with a great noise: from all which it is collected and concluded that there shall be a total abolition of the visible heavens at the day of the resurrection.

Many arguments are brought to confirm this, chiefly from the uselesness of these creatures in that state: when man man shall have no more need of the heavens, why should the heavens be any more? what shall man do with the Sun, or the stars to enlighten him, with earth or water, with beasts or fouls to feed or serve him, when he shall have a spiritual body, and be raised to a state of incorruption? he shall be lifted above the use of these things, and why should that be, which will be of no use?

Again heaven and earth serve here to shew us the invisible things of God, the footsteps of his eternal power and Godhead are seen in the things which are made. But when man shall see God face to face, when God shall fully manifest himself, what need we any more these glasses? He that hath a good eye cares not for spectacles: man who is the noblest of visible creatures in his present condition, shall be above the use of creatures in that condition. Hence some state the question thus, That when it is said the heavens shall be no more, The meaning is not, that they shall not be at all, but that they shall not be for those ends and uses, to which they now serve and were at first set up.

Vetustas ista in cælis non secundū diminutionē intelligēda est, sed quantum ad usum & ministerium quod: post judicium cessabit. Bold.

Hæc in substantia semper sunt permansura & tantū immutanda in meliorē statū, electorū splendori & gloriæ accommodationem. Merc.

Lastly, Many resolve it thus, that the heavens shall continue according to their substance, not according to their present quality; they shall not be annihilated (say they) but bettered. As if when God brings man to glory in heaven, he will bring the heavens to glory also. And that as the beauty of the creature hath been darkned by the sin of man, so it shall receive greater beauty when the sin of man is done away. The Apostles language enclines to this (Rom. 8. 21.) The creature it self also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. So that till the heavens be no more is according to this position, till the heavens continue no more in their present state, but are brought to one more perfect, where the alteration will be so great, that it may well be said, they shall be no more what they now are. As we say of a man who is much changed either in mind or body, he is not the same man. For (say they) as the vile body of man shall then be fashioned like to the glorious body of Christ, according to the mighty power of God, whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself; So the vilest part of the frame of the world, much more the heavens, shall be put into a more excellent fashion then now they are: The fashion of the world passeth away, but God will put it in a fashion which shall not pass.

I shall not here interpose my own sense in so great a variety of judgement among learned men, especially, because it is all one to the scope of the text I am upon, whether we understand it of a total abolition of these heavens, or of the restitution and renovation of them. For as according to the former interpretation these heavens will be no more at all, so according to the latter, these heavens will be no more as now they are, and so though then they be, they yet may be said to be no more. And until the heavens in one of these senses shall be no more, man lyeth down and riseth no more, yea, as it followeth in the close of the verse,

They shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep.

Death is here compared to sleep, and the resurrection to awaking. The metaphor is very elegant, and it hath been opened at the thirteenth verse of the third chapter, thither I refer the Reader.

Observe First, from the former words, That the most durable creatures are perishing, changeable creatures.

The heavens are an emblem of continuance: and (as hath been shewed) to say such a thing shall be till the heavens be no more, is to say it shall ever be: yet these heavens are in a perishing condition, and shall be, if not totally annihilated, yet so much altered from what they are, as will amount to this, they are no more: all those Scriptures come up to that, if they reach not the other sense, to which they put very hard. What is there of the creature to be trusted? earth is fading, yea, and heaven too: trust not in the heavens, but in the God of heaven, of whom it is said, in him there is no variableness nor shadow of change. God is so far from a real change, that he hath not the least shadow of change. But creatures are so changeable that there is not in them a shadow of unchangeableness; It is no wonder to see the sublunary world change, to see the state of men change, the riches and peace of kingdoms change, the beauty and purity of a Church change, when even the heavens shall change and be no more what they have been; when we are taught that the most durable things perish and change, how changeable are those things which are most subject to perishing?

Secondly, Consider under what notions Job represents death, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep.

Hence Observe, We ought to familiarize death to our selves, to put it under the fairest and easiest apprehensions.

Some translate death into such terrible shapes, and represent it to themselves under such affrighting forms, that they live in bondage through the fear of death all their dayes; do as the spirit of God teacheth you; cloath it with pleasant expressions, call it the undressing and uncloathing of your selves, call it rest, conceive it under the notion of sleep, and then you will not fear but welcome it; Is any man afraid to go to bed? thus we should allay the bitterness, beautifie the deformity, take off the edge, and pull out the sting of death by such sweet and soft thoughts of it, as the spirit of God suggests. Sleep is a short death, and death is but a long sleep. The Babylonians are threatned with death under the name of a long sleep; (Jer. 51. 57.) I will make drunk her Princes and her wise men, her Captains and her Rulers, and her mighty men: and they shall sleep a perpetual sleep and shall not awake. 'Tis a judgement to be cast into a sleep like death, but 'tis a mercy that death is but like a sleep; To sleep a perpetual sleep and not to awake, is to die: but they who are dead shall awake out of sleep. For as death is a sleep, so it is but a sleep: death is not a perpetual sleep, though he who in stead of sleeping, dieth, is said to fall into a perpetual sleep; Death compared with ordinary sleep, is a perpetual sleep, but death in it self considered, or considered rather according to the appointment of God, is not a perpetual sleep. There shall be an awakening and a rising, we shall sleep no more, when the heavens are no more. Job is express for this in the nineteenth chapter, and here he assures us that man shall awake from the grave at last, while he saith it will be long ere he awake. Man hath done his work before he falls into this sleep, but man must awake before he receive either his wages or reward, we must all appear before the judgement-seat of Christ, that every one may receive according to what he hath done in the flesh, whether it be good or evil. They (as was lately toucht) who have done evil shall receive their wages, and they who have done good shall receive a reward; Such as our work was when fell asleep, such will our receit be when we awake. Job was so full of this hope, that he should both awake at that day, and receive a good reward, that he is even in hast to go to bed, and petitions for a grave in the next verse, to which I also hasten.

VERS. 13, 14.

O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me in secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me.

If a man die, shall he live again? All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.

JOB is an earnest and an humble suiter, for that which nature least desires, yea for that which nature abhors. He petitions for the grave and woes death, as if there were some beauty in darkness or loveliness in that king of terrours.

Verse 13. O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me in secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me.

The words fall under various interpretations. Some conceive Job begging to be hid in the day of account, which is a day of wrath to the wicked, and of the Revelation of the righteous judgement of God to all. The Popish writers find here their Limbus patrum, or their imaginary receptacle teptacle of those souls which died in faith, before Christ came in the flesh; this, say they, is the secret place to which Job wishes he might retire; that by a present banishment from the world he might get out of the noise and sence of those evils, with which the scene of his life was fill'd and made uncomfortable.

Secondly, Say others, Job in this prayer for a grave, doth plainly renew that suit which he had made more then once before, to dye: As if he had said, Considering my sad estate, the burden and pressures that lye upon me, death is better to me then life, and the grave more eligible then my bed-chamber; 'twere better for me to be under the earth, or in the earth, free among the dead, then to walk upon the earth, fettered with these afflictions, among the living.

Thirdly, That having said, Man lying down shall not awake till the Heavens be no more; he only subjoyns that death would be welcome to him; nor would he move against it, if after he had passed that darksome valley, he might in some reasonable time return again to the land, and enjoy the light of the living; if a time for such a return might be set, then he could chearfully descend into the grave: but as Job had often argued the impossibility (considering the Decrees of God concerning dying man) of such a return, so I cannot conceive him aiming at the grant of it in this request, and therefore I lay it by, as an unsuteable and improper interpretation.

Fourthly, That which carrieth the sence most clearly is, that Job speaks like a man besieged with trouble, and compassed about with sad distractions: who makes request for this and that, and he knows not what; he looks for something to ease his grief, and therefore wisheth for any thing, whatever comes next to hand, or lyes uppermost in his thoughts, he cares not what it be, so it be not what it is; put me under ground, hide me in the earth, Lord, do what thou wilt with me, so I may be set at liberty, from the bonds and chains of my present pressing miseries, if I could but get release from this prison, send me to the prison of the grave, and I readily submit to thy good pleasure, yea, that would be pleasing unto me: O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave.

The grave hath been opened before, and the manner of this wish about it (Chap. 6. 8.) Who will give, who will bestow the favour of a burial upon me, and put me into the possession of the house of death. He speaks as if his request were not only difficult, but only not impossible: or as if it would be costly to the granter.

Who will hide me in the grave? Hide me as a treasure, so the Original intimates. Treasures are hidden things, as the notation both of the Greek and Latine words teacheth. A treasure is substance or riches laid up for the day following, or for the time to come: O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, yet not as trash, but treasure; not as a rotten careass, but as a precious jewel: The bodies of Believers are treasure as well as their souls; their earthly part is precious as well as their heavenly.

צפן recondere, hinc מצפנים: thesauri a recondendo, sic Συνεωγε à reponendo, quod in diē crastinum, i. e. εἰς ἔπειτον reponerentur. Drus.

The grave may be taken two wayes: First, Strictly and literally, for the place of burial, or for the house of death.

Whence Note, That the grave is a hiding place; the grave is a sure hiding place.

When we are once hidden there, we lye open to no more violence: The grave is a shelter from all storms: We need not fear that it will either rain or blow through that house; that's the reason why they in the Book of the Revelation desired death when the vials of Gods wrath were pouring out upon the earth. Though some have not been free from the rage of men in the grave, yet none have felt it. O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave: I have met with this strain of sorrow before, therefore I do but touch it here.

Sepulchrum est quasi scrinium vel capsa in qua reponitur corpus.

Secondly, As the grave in Scripture is taken for the place of the dead: so for any place where the living are hid, or hide themselves.

A secret place is the grave of a living man.

Qui a communi hominum consortio superari, sive ut imminentia sibi pericula sive debita supplicia declinarent, in cavernis etiam in sepulchris habitare solebant. Bold.

In times of persecution the Saints were forced to bury themselves alive, because the malicious enemy sought their lives, (Heb. 11. 36.) They wandred in desarts, and in mountains, and in dens, and in caves of the earth: Thus the old Believers were buried alive: It is said of Obadiah (1 Kings 18.) That he hid the Lords Prophets by fifty in a cave: These caves were graves of living men. Some understand Job's meaning of such a grave: and that he did not desire death, but the securing of his life, or to be hid alive, not to be hid in death; He would be somewhere in safe custody, out of the reach of those troubles which annoyed him; The next clause doth somewhat favour this sence, O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave.

And keep me secret. These words are but an explication or repetition of the former; Job doubles his request, to shew how strongly his heart was fixt upon it: O that thou wouldest keep me secret. How long?

Until thy wrath be past. That is, the effects of wrath: The letter of the Original is, Thy nostril, because in the nose or nostrils wrath and anger shew themselves; we breathe anger; and the breath of the Lord is nothing else but his wrath, which like a stream of brimstone kindles the fiery Topher, (Isa. 30. 33.) Job desires the Lord to let this breath pass, and then he is willing to appear out of his grave, or to be kept no longer secret: As if he had said, I cannot stand in the open view of thy wrath, or in the face of thy fierce displeasure; Oh that thou wouldest hide me till thy wrath be past. God put Moses in the clift of the rock, and hid him with his hand, while his glory passed by (Exod. 33. 12.) much more have we need to be hid while the wrath of God passeth by, or until his wrath be past.

Nasus, ira, quæ tumente & fumante naso manifestari solet.

שוב Non semper est revertī, redire; sæpe est averti, recedere. Hinc תשובה conversio animi sc. ad Deum, & משובה aversio, recessio. Drus.

Hence Observe, First, God in his actings towards man shews himself like a wrathful man.

The wrath of God is not a passion in him, but an action towards us. He acts as men when they are angry; but he suffers nothing by his anger: He smites and wounds, and pulls down and destroyes like a wrathful, yea, an inraged man; yet he doth this in the exactest frame, and sweetest composure of his spirit: The wrath of God never disjoynts him, never puts him out of order, as the wrath of man doth. The wrath of man is the rage of man; but the wrath of God is the reason of God. His wrath toward all is full of serenity, and it is full of tender mercy to his own.

Secondly, Job fearing the wrath of God resorts to God for shelter and hiding, O that thou wouldest hide me till thy wrath be past. When a man (whom we fear) is angry with us, we run from him, and go to some friend with this request, O that you would hide me till the wrath of this man be over. When Rebeckah understood that her son Esau was wroth with Jacob, and comforted himself purposing to kill him, she adviseth Jacob to flee to his Uncle Laban, and tarry there, till his Brothers wrath should turn away (Gen. 27. 43, 44.) She doth not direct him to go to Esau, and desire protection from him till his own wrath were turned away. Were it not strange if a King being wroth with one of his subjects, he should go to the same King and say, O hide me till thy wrath be past; yet thus Job speaks.

Hence Observe, That our only refuge from the wrath of God, is God himself.

Nothing can hide us from the wrath of God but the mercy of God. As God hides his people from the wrath of men, (Psal. 27. 5.) In the time of trouble he shall hide me in his Pavilion, in the secret of his Tabernacle shall he hide me. And again, In the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast: As (I say) God hides his people from the wrath of men, so also from his own wrath. When a Believer apprehends God angry, he knows not whither to go, but unto God: He appeals from God to God; from an angry God to a pleased God; from the wrath of God to the mercy of God; from God in himself to God in his Son. Carnal men have poor shifts, when God is angry they hide in man: Can the power and mercy of a creature be a covering against the wrath and indignation of the Creator? Yet this is all the covering which a carnal man inquires after. The Kings and Captains (Rev. 6.) call upon the rocks and mountains to hide them; that is, they apply themselves to worldly means, to worldly helps and powers, to these they cry, hide us from the wrath of God; but they know not what this meaneth, to make the love of God a refuge from the anger of God. Such a spirit Christ discovers while he forbids the tears of the daughters of Jerusalem (Luke 23. 30.) Weep not for me, but weep for your selves, and for your children: Why so? Sad dayes are coming, so sad, That they they shall say to the mountains fall on us, and to the hills cover us; not as if they should think the hills would hear or pity them; but because they could find none to do it, and they might as soon make a mountain move to their help, as move men to help them.

Again, Mountains and hills may be taken there for the greatest powers and strengths of men; or for men of great strength and power: In which sence it is said in the second of Isaiah, The day of the Lord shall be against the high mountains: So then, to call to the mountains for covering in a day of trouble, is at best but to expect it at the hand of man. These are miserable shifts. God doth so overrule the world by his providence, that sometimes the earth helps the woman (Rev. 12. 16.) in a day of trouble; but the woman (that is, the true Church) doth not cry to the earth (meer men of the world) for help; God makes the hills and mountains cover his people in a day of his wrath; but they do not go to hills and mountains for covering against his wrath. David puts the question (Psal. 139. 8.) Whither shall I fly from thy presence? He resolves it presently, that neither Heaven, nor hell, nor the uttermost parts of the earth could afford him a corner for security, or a hiding-place from the hand of God: We must look for a protecting hand in God, when we are afraid of his smiting hand; Only divine love hides from divine wrath. This was shadowed in the description of the Ark, in which the Tables of the Law were laid up (Exod. 25.) There the Mercy-seat was put upon the Ark, the Cherubims covering it with their wings, implying that the mercy of God only protects us from his wrath. The wrath of God is caused by sin (which is the transgression of the Law) but to shew that mercy covers from wrath, the Mercy-seat was made to cover the Ark wherein that Law was reserved, which discovers both the sin of man, and the wrath of God against it. The wrath of God had never been revealed against man, if man had not sinned against the Law; yet now God sits between the Cherubims over the Mercy-seat, to cover that Law which through sin causeth wrath: With one hand he gives a Law, and with another hand he hides us from wrath: Out of his hand went a fiery Law, (Deut. 33. 2.) and out of his hand went a shining Gospel, and with that a Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings: When that fire would burn us, this Sun warms us; while the flames of that would consume us, the wings of this overshadowed us, and hid us till the wrath of God be past. Thus our hiding from the wrath of God is in the love of God. Hence also that gracious invitation (Isa. 26. 20.) Come my people, enter into your chambers, until the indignation be overpast: Those chambers into which God invited his people are none other, but himself: When they could not build, or find out chambers to hide themselves while his indignation smoaked, himself will be their chamber. One of the Ancients interprets those chambers to be the grave, into which the Saints should willingly go to hide themselves in the time of Antichrists rage, of which he conceives that to be a prophecy. However, we are sure the name of the Lord is not only a hiding chamber, but a strong tower; the righteous run into it, and are safe. O that thou wouldest hide me until thy wrath be past.

Tertul. lib. de retur. carnis. Bold.

Thirdly, Job perceiving a storm of wrath about him, dares not hide it, but seeks a hiding place.

Hence Observe, Man is not able to bear the wrath of God, or to stand before God when he is angry.

Job was a man of unspotted integrity, perfect, upright, fearing God, eschewing evil, yet he was afraid when God appeared in wrathful dispensations. The wrath of God as threatened in the Word, is slighted by unbelievers; but when it is felt either in the conscience or upon the flesh, the stoutest run and hide: The love of God is undervalued by those who know it not; but a soul that hath once tasted that the Lord is gracious, and lives in the love of God, this soul is swallowed up with love, and values it more then life. 'Tis so with those who know not the wrath of God, their hearts being hardened: They say with Pharaoh, Who is the Lord? But when conscience is awakened, the heart touched, the eye opened, then horror and amazement take hold of them, as pain upon a woman in travel; (Isa. 2. 19.) They shall go into the holes of the rocks, and to the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his Majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. When God comes with terrible shakings, they shall hide themselves, whose terror made others shake. The wrath of a powerful man is dreadful, The wrath of a King (saith Solomon) is as the roaring of a Lyon; What then is the wrath of God? If Rebeckah was so sensible of the wrath of Esau against Jacob, that she durst not venture Jacob into his angry presence: What are they, who make no haste to be hidden from an angry God; or to have the anger of God appeased, and turned away from them?

Fourthly Observe, There may be sensible feelings of the wrath of God, even upon those who are dearest unto God.

It is Job that prayes, Hide me till thy wrath be overpast: There was indeed more fear of wrath among Believers under legal administrations, then after that fuller breaking forth and appearance of the grace of God, bringing salvation under the Gospel: So we may understand that of the Apostle (Rom. 8. 15.) Ye have not received the spirit of bondage to fear again. Paul (according to this interpretation) speaks not of a person, but of the whole state of the Church; giving the sence thus, Ye have not received the spirit of bondage to fear, ye are under the Gospel; the spirit of bondage was that which properly belonged to the times of the Law; when little of Gospel light appeared, fear and terror held the people of God in bondage. But this is the time of grace, the day of love, the day of shedding the love of God abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghost; therefore be of good chear, live like free-men and like sons, not like bond-men or servants.

Ante Christium erat δειλία, δειλία & φόβος Sandys.

Fifthly, He prayes, Hide me till thy wrath be past: Job was sensible of wrath, but he knew assuredly that it was not abiding wrath.

Hence Observe, The wrath of God to his own people, is not an everlasting wrath.

The wrath of God against wicked men is an everlasting wrath, they cannot be hid till the wrath of God be overpast, for it will never pass, (John 3. 36.) He that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth upon him, and shall abide to all eternity. The appearings of wrath are terrible, but who can abide the abidings of wrath? Who may abide the day of his coming? And who shall stand when he appeareth? For he is like a Refiners fire (Mal. 3. 2.) Wicked men cannot abide the coming of Christ, when he is but like refining fire to purge out their dross; How then will they abide the day of his coming, when he is like consuming fire, to devour both them and their dross?

Sixthly, Job was under grievous pains, a cup of sorrow was put to his mouth; yet he moves not so much to have the cup of sorrow pass from him, as to have the wrath of God pass from him.

Hence Observe, A good heart is more sensible of divine displeasure, then of outward pain.

He fears the appearance of wrath more then the feeling of smart. It is a work of grace to be afraid of the anger of God, and it provokes him as much when his wrath, as when his love is slighted. Many tremble at the corrections of God; but there are few who tremble at the anger of God. The holy Prophet (Jer. 10. 24.) seems to invite correction, so he might be free from anger, Correct me, O Lord, but not in thine anger: Let me see thou lovest me, and then smite me if thou wilt: Anger smarts worse then any rod upon the soul of a believer; but 'tis the rod of God, not the wrath of God which makes an unbeliever smart. Let there be no more mighty hail and thunder, take away this death, saith a Pharaoh; Take away thy displeasure, let thy wrath pass, saith a Job, a David; yet at last the wrath of God will be more painful then pain, more deadly then death it self to a Pharaoh, wrath will burn hotter then fire in hell for evermore.

Patet hinc tam acerbum esse omnibus ira Dei sensum, ut nihil sit quod homines non perferre malint. Merl.

Lastly, See Job's temper here; he trembled at the wrath of God, and was afraid: We read him full of faith and confidence, Chap. 13. 16, 18.) I know I shall be justified, and he also shall be my salvation: There he stood in the light of the favour of God; here he is clouded with fear, and compassed about with darkness.

Hence

Hence Observe, That the best of Believers do not always retain the same degree, and evidences of holy faith.

Their estate is always sure; but their estate is not always clear: Their condition is the same; but their apprehensions about it vary: Now they overflow with joy because they see the pleased face of God; soon after they are filled with fear, and would be hidden from his wrath. O that thou wouldest hide me till thy wrath be past; that's his first wish.

That thou wilt appoint me a set time.

This is his second wish.

But for what? or to what purpose would he have a set time? Times relate to things or actions. As to every purpose there is a time set (Eccles. 3. 1.) so, to a set time supposeth a purpose for it: What was Job's purpose for which he thus earnestly desires a time might be set.

We may very clearly refer it to the wish foregoing, O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave: As if he had said, as I beg to go to bed in the grave, so I beg of thee to appoint me a set time when I shall go to that desired and longed for bed of the grave. O that thou wouldest appoint me a time.

The word which we translate set time, signifies properly a Statute, a Law, or Ordinance: There is a double Law, a Law of things, and a Law of times, and the word bears both, therefore we translate well, O that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, or a law concerning the time; but dares Job ask God a set time? God sets us a time, but may we desire God to set us a time? The Jews were reproved for this by Moses (Psal. 78. 47.) They limited the holy One of Israel; they put him to a time, or set him a day, by which if he did not help them, they did not believe he could help them. It is insufferable presumption to set God a time. And it wants not danger to move God to set us a time. All the actings of Job in this state are not warrantable: Many of them are not for our imitation, but caution: Job expresseth a troubled spirit while he prayes for an abatement of his trouble: This prayer was not the breathing of his grace, but the breaking forth of his sorrow: He would be in the grave, he would have a set time, he must have things brought to an issue: In all this we see not a rule for prayer, but an error for passion.

Sciamus hæc perturbatum vi mali, Jobū dicere, nec certè nec quicquam hinc posse colligi, nisi quod levationem mali quoque modo postulat. Merc.

A distressed soul often makes distracted prayers, and desires more that his own will, than that the will of God may be done. The will of God, his word of command, or his word of promise are our rule and warrant what to ask. They ask besides all the rules which God hath set who ask a set time. Hence take two deductions.

Non est quod hæc quis accuratius ad legitimæ orationis leges exigat. Merl.

First, That it is the sole priviledge of God to set and appoint times.

As God hath appointed to men the bounds of their habitation, so also he hath determined the times, (Acts 17.26.) And as he hath set the time of nations and people in general, so of singular persons, My times are in thy hand (saith David, Psal. 31. 15.) That is, thou hast the disposé of them: While he saith my times, he doth not speak himself the Master, but the servant of time. Again, My times are in thy hand; that is, all my times, I reserve none of them in my own hand: My times of trouble, and my times of comfort; my times of joy, and my times of sorrow; my times of honour, and my times of reproach; when I shall fall into affliction, and when I shall be delivered out of affliction; how long I shall live, and when I shall dye; all these times are in thy hand. Nor did David at all desire to have his times, or any part of his times out of Gods hand: And as it is our duty to leave our times in Gods hand; so it is our comfort that they are in so good, in so wise a hand: We should not only be content, but rejoyce that our times are there. Man is not wise enough to use the times which God sets him; much less is he wise enough to set his own times.

Secondly Note, It is our duty to refer all the circumstances of our petitions to the wisdom of God.

We may be suiters to God, but we must not be his counsellers, nor our own carvers when or where, how much or by what means we would have the mercies which we ask for. Job spake well in one respect, though he would have a set time; yet he took not upon him to set the time. It was his failing to desire a set time; but it had been a great sin for him to set the time. Man must expect a law from God; he must not give himself a law; much less may he give the law to God. O that thou wouldest appoint me a set time,

And that thou wouldest remember me.

Et constitue as mihi tempus in qua recorderis mei. Vulg.

This is his third desire; He would be remembered: Some joyn these two latter wishes into one, O that thou wouldest appoint a set time wherein to remember me: But for what, or in what would he be remembred? Either thus, Remember to hide me in the grave at that set time; or Lord when thou hidest me in the grave be pleased to remember me: The grave is a place of forgetfulness; David complains (Psal. 31. 12.) I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind: Job is willing to be among the dead; but not to be forgotten, or out of the mind of God; Let the world forget me, I can bear that; but I cannot bear it that God should forget me: O that thou wouldest remember me. Heman (Psal. 88. 5.) describing his sorrows, saith he, was free among the dead, like as the slain that lye in the grave, whom thou remembrest no more. Dead men are, as if they were, not only out of the memory of men, but of God himself: Job was content to dye out of the world, but not to dye out of the memory of God: He liked a grave of earth; but he liked not the grave of forgetfulness: Set me a time for the grave, and remember to hide me there, or remember me when I am hidden there.

Lastly, This prayer, Remember me, may be understood as a general prayer for good at the hand of God: The remembrance of God intimates all good to man. 'Tis good enough if he remember us for good, as Nehemiah prayed he would: To remember notes chiefly these two things,

First, To value and esteem: Worthless things are not fit for a treasury, much less for our memory: Who would keep a record of that which no man cares to know; nor shall be the wiser if he do know it?

Secondly, It notes care. When we would help a friend or do him a curtesie, we remember him and have him often in our thoughts.

Some restrain Job's request for remembrance to that special act of power and mercy, the raising of his body from the grave. Others confine it to the repairing of his broken family, and the gift of children in stead of those who were slain: As if he deplored the loss of his sons and daughters, and that he was as a tree cut down, which sends out no suckers; or that he was (as that Eunuch saith of himself in the Prophet) a dry tree, which bears neither leaf nor fruit. And therefore prayes, O that thou wouldest remember me in this. The word is often used by God in reference to that special mercy, The giving of children; Rachel was barren a great while, yet at last, (the Text saith) the Lord remembred Rachel (Gen. 30. 22.) Hanna being barren prays in this stile (1 Sam. 1. 11.) O Lord of hosts, if thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thy handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thy handmaid, but wilt give unto thine handmaid a man-child, then, &c. The Hebrew word signifying a man-child (not that used by Hanna) springs from this root, because a man-child preserves the memory of the family; whereas the female, or daughter, looseth her name in marriage. The answer which God gave to Hanna, runs also in the same stile (ver. 16.) And Elkanah knew Hanna his wife, and the Lord remembred her. When the Lord took away Job's children, he took from him his remembrance; or those who would have preserved his name and memory: which Bildad seems to aim at in his description of the judgments of God upon wicked men (Job 18. 17.) His remembrance shall perish in the earth, and he shall have no name in the streets: That is, he shall have no son to bear his name, or to keep his memorial alive, when he is dead.

Aquinas putat divinam recordationem sumi pro resurrectione & vita. Ista phrasis recordari alicujus in sacro codice sæpe usurpatur ab iis qui prolem à Deo postulant, præsertim masculinam. Bold. A זכר quod hic habetur venit, Zachar i. e. masculus quasi patris memoria.

Now whether we understand this passage in general, or restrain it to either of these particulars, we may learn,

That there is nothing more desirable then to be remembred of God; and that to be remembred of God is the accomplishment of all our desires.

We can ask no more of God but to remember us: For as our remembrance of God is the sum of all our duty to him: so Gods remembrance of us is the sum of all his mercies to us. When the Ark had floated and had been tossed many dayes upon the waters of that mighty deluge, the Text saith, God remembred Noah (Gen. 8. 3.) Though our Ark be driven in a tempestuous sea, yet it shall neither sink nor split, while we sail in the thoughts of God. It may be much if some men remember us: When Joseph a prisoner had expounded the Butlers dream to liberty and enlargement, all the fee he asked for his pains was, Remember me when thou comest to Pharaoh: That is, speak a good word for me, do me a curtesie at Court, when thou art restored thither. The ungrateful Butler forgot Joseph, but God did not: And though Pharaoh's Butler did not remember Joseph for interpreting his dream, yet God sent Pharaoh a dream, which at last caused the Butler to remember both his own fault against Pharaoh, and his forgetfulness of Joseph. If God remember us, he will find out some way or other that men shall. And though a friend, who loves us and keeps us in his memory, may not be able to do us good (he may want power though he want no good will) yet the power of God is as strong as his memory, he is able to do us good, and can command all, both persons and things, to work together for our good. 'Tis a mercy, If God think upon us, though it be to afflict us, if he remembers us, though it be with a rod; (even that remembrance is an evidence of his care over us, and love to us.) Then how comfortable is it for him to remember us with a staffe for our support and comfort!

The thief upon the cross gathers all his petitions into this one, Lord, remember me when thou comest to thy Kingdom. If we have but a place in the memory of Christ, we shall not want a place in the Kingdom of Christ. Let us get into the heart of God, and we are sure enough to have all the holy desires of our own hearts: If we once have a place in the heart of God, he will not cast us out of his memory, though he cast us into trouble. He remembers his in prison and in chains, in sick beds, and in the valley of the shadow of death: Though he bury us in the grave, yet he will not bury his thoughts of us. We use to say of men, Out of sight, out of mind; but, as we cannot be hid in any secret place out of the sight of God, so God will never let us fall out of his mind.

From all take this deduction.

If it be such a treasure of love and mercy to have God remember us, what a treasure of wrath and misery is it to be everlastingly forgotten by God!

Wicked men shall never be remembred by God for good; nor shall they ever be forgotten for evil. The memory which God keeps of them, and of what they have done, will torment them as much as their own memory of it will. How glad would they be if God would but forget them! How would they be if they could forget themselves! But as they can remember no good they have done; so they shall not forget the evil they have done: And as God will not remember them for good; so he cannot (because he will not, and he will not because he is just) forget to pour out upon them the utmost and extreamest evils.

Job having presented God with this threefold request; to be hid in the grave, to have a set time appointed him, and to be remembred: He passeth from petitioning to a strange kind of questioning, and from both to the highest and noblest kind of resolving.

Verse 14. If a man dye, shall he live again? All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come.

There is much variety of conjecture about the meaning of these words.

Non est dubitantis de resurrectione mortuorũ ad vitam æternam.

Take this precaution, Job doth not speak here as doubting, whether a man that dyes shall live any more: He is clear for the resurrection of the body unto life, and for the life eternal of whole man after the resurrection. It is usual both in Scripture and common usage to propound that by way of doubt or question, which yet is held as an undoubted position. Job did neither doubt that man shall dye, nor that he shall live again, though he put an if to the one, and a question about the other.

The Chaldee Paraphrast seems to understand him of eternal life, but applyes it to a wicked man: If a man dye: That is, if a wicked man dye, shall he live again? Shall he injoy eternall life? No, though he live eternally, yet he shall not enjoy life one moment. His second life shall be the second death. He shall live as life notes the union of soul and body; but he shall not live as life notes the communion of man with God.

Si mortuus fuerit vir impius, fierine potest ut vivat? Chald.

But though this be true, yet I conceive it quite besides Job's scope. Philippus.

Secondly, Others interpret it of the resurrection in general: And render the question as an admiration: If a man dye, shall he live again! He shall live; and is it not wonderful that he should! The resurrection is a miraculous work; it should raise our thoughts about the power of the everliving God, when we hear his power can raise man from death to everlasting life. Tantum opus admiratur, non negat. Merc.

Yet usually in Scripture when the interrogation is put with a negative particle, the sence is negative, as (Psal. 56. 7.) Shall they escape by iniquity? No, they shall not escape: And when the interrogation is put with a negative particle, the sence is affirmative: As (Jer. 5. 9.) Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord, and shall not my soul be avenged on such a Nation as this? Yes, I will visit for these things, and my soul shall be avenged on such a Nation as this. According to this interpretation, If a man dye, shall he live again? must be rendred by a denial, he shall not live again. Hence In scripturis interrogatio asserens negationi similis est, & negans assertioni.

A third opinion expounds it by a plain negation, If a man dye, shall he live again? No, he shall not; that is, he shall not live in this world, nor return any more to a natural life. And hence

A fourth interprets Job as speaking conditionally, or upon an impossible supposition: As if he had said, I know and am assured, That if a man dyes he cannot live again a life of nature. But if such a thing might be, and God would appoint me a set time when it should be, how willingly would I dye and wait all those dayes of my appointed time (how many soever they should be) till my change come; that is, till God restore me from the state of death and the grave, to such an estate of outward comforts and abundance as I once enjoyed. But I cannot conceive Job so in love with a natural life, as thus to hanker after it by such remote conditions, and groundless wishes; And therefore, Conditionaliter sumi putat Cajetanus.

Fifthly, I incline to those, who expound the question in the first part of the verse, as an absolute negation: If a man dye, he shall live no more; that is, a natural life. And the latter part of the verse, (All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come) as a testimony either of his submission to the will of God for the time of his death, or of his faith, and full assurance of a resurrection to eternal life: As if he had said, Though when I dye I shall not live again in this world, yet I am willing to dye when God will, and I believe I shall live again in the world to come, and do therefore wait in faith till this change shall come. Hence Sixthly, Job is here conceived correcting his former wish, and reprehending himself for it: As if he had said, I indeed desired the Lord to appoint me a set time, when he would restore me; but why do I vex my self and trouble the Lord with vain wishes, as if this were a petition befitting me to ask, or God to grant? Why should I expect that which was never granted to any man, That being dead I might live again? Quasi ipsũ reprehendat, quod talia oret, &c. Sanct.

Lastly, Some give out his meaning thus, If thou wouldest grant me my wish, and hide me in the grave, appointing me a set time, when thou wouldest be pleased to do this for me; then should I think my self happy, because if I were once dead, I know I shall return no more to the miseries of this life, upon which condition I would be glad to wait with patience for the grave, what time soever thou shouldst appoint me, till that my change by death should come: or, being dead and laid in my grave, I would wait thy appointed time for my resurrection unto life.

All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come.

That

That God appoints out the time of man, and that man shall live out and cannot outlive that appointment, was shewed at the fifth verse: I will not here renew that discourse.

כל ימי צבאי אוחל
Cunctis diebus militiæ meæ expectabo. Mon.

The Hebrew is, All the dayes of my warfare. The reason of which hath also been shewed (Chap. 7. 1.) The dayes of man are but travel and warfare, a continual combat with temptations and tryals, as was opened there: The Scripture delights to set forth the sorrows of mans life under those two similitudes of a wayfaring man and a warfaring man. Under both notions, the duty of the Text (waiting) is also shadowed.

To wait hath four things in it.

First, An act of patience; he that waits must be content to stay: He that believes will not make haste; that is, he waits; and he that waits makes haste to believe, or hope, which is the second thing.

Secondly, It hath an act of hope in it; he that waiteth is in expectation to receive: He hopes mercy will come at last: To wait upon God implyes there is somewhat to be had from God. He that hath no hope will never wait.

Thirdly, An act of humility; he that is in a waiting condition is in a low condition: And as his condition is low, so his spirit should be lowly; waiting speaks the duty of a servant.

Fourthly, The waiting here intended carries in it utmost perseverance, All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait. Some wait, but 'tis only for a time: They are short-breath'd, and their patience quickly tires. That wicked King said, This evil is of the Lord, why should I wait upon him any longer? (2 Kings 6. 33.) He that waits indeed, continues waiting, he waits long, and he will wait yet longer. As a good heart will not let God wait long, no nor at all (willingly) for obedience; so he is willing to wait as long as God sees good for deliverance. We must not let God stay long for our work; but we must stay as long as God pleaseth for his work.

Hence Observe, First, It is our duty to wait Gods time fully.

All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait; and this both in regard of personal and of publick desires or needs, (Hab. 2. 2, 3.) The vision is for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak and not lye; that is, it shall not fail: All failing is a kind of lying: He that fails of truth when he speaks, lyes in a word; and he that fails of performing what he speaks, lyes indeed. The vision of God speaks and will not lye; but it speaks not till the end; therefore we must wait till the end: So the Prophet adviseth in the next words, Though it tarry, wait for it, for it will certainly come, and not tarry. It will not tarry beyond the time; but it may tarry to the very end of the time: then wait the longest day, and to the utmost of that day. It is said, that the people of Israel were ashamed, when they saw that Moses staid so long (Exod. 33.) they could wait no longer, they thought he was lost in the Mount: Come, let us make us Gods, to go before us, for as for this Moses we know not what is become of him: They who will not stay for God, make haste to Idols; and they who will not wait in the way of God, run destructive wayes. Samuel directed Saul to go down to Gilgal, and there to stay for him seven dayes (1 Sam. 10. 8.) according to this appointment Saul tarried seven dayes (1 Sam 13. 8.) but Samuel came not, and the people were scattered from him: hereupon Saul calls for the burnt-offering and peace-offerings, and he offered his burnt-offering: And was he not to be excused in this? Had not he waited long enough? Samuel said he could come the seventh day, and Saul waited for him seven dayes: Why then doth Samuel chide with him (at the eleventh verse) saying, What hast thou done? Saul answers, Because thou camest not within the dayes appointed, I forced my self and offered a burnt-offering. But would Samuel break promise? Was there yea and nay with him? How is it then that Saul saith, He came not at the time appointed: Saul staid seven dayes, but he staid not seven dayes quite out; he stayed the seventh day, and a great part of it, and no Samuel came, but Saul would not stay the last hour: Samuel came at the end of the seventh day, and so made his word good; but because Saul waited not to the end of the seventh day, he fell into that great evil. Thou hast done foolishly, saith Samuel, (ver. 13.) and thy Kingdom shall not continue, because thy patience was so short, thy power shall be shortened. Take heed of giving up your hopes: Say not the Lords time is past, he will not come. We know what they do who are obliged to pay money upon bonds, on a certain day. It satisfies not the Law, that they waited at the place appointed, about noon or toward the evening of that day, and the Creditor came not, they must wait till the going down of the Sun, and then make the tender, or else the forfeiture may be taken. Thus we must wait on God to the last day, and every part of the last day, till our changes or our comforts come. If we give over before the Sun go down, we shall go down in darkness. Ye have need of patience (Heb. 10. 36, 37.) that when you have done the will of God, ye may receive the promise: That is, the thing promised. As we need the patience of labourers to do the will of God; so the patience of waiters, to tarry for our answer and reward.

I will wait till my change come.

And one would think Job needed not to wait long for that: for, said he not (chap. 10. 17.) Changes and war are upon me? Job was under perpetual changes, and his were great changes, changes from a prosperous to an afflicted estate, from health to sickness, from honour to disgrace, from riches to poverty, and though his afflictions hung long upon him, yet he had changes of affliction; fresh and fresh evils, changes and war, or changes of war were against him: As he complained (chap. 10. 17.) God brought fresh Armies to charge him every day, and doth he now want a change? And who is there that liveth and doth not change? We change (though not sensibly, yet) in some sence or other every moment. Changes are upon us, changes of time, of place, of condition, and of affection. Man continueth not (saith Job at the beginning of this Chapter) we are only constant in changes: What then is the meaning of this desired change?

Man hath three great changes, and they are all three taken in here; according to a threefold opinion about the interpretation of these words.

First, Some understand the change for which Job waited, to be a change in his outward condition. A change from weakness to strength, from poverty to riches, from sorrow to joy; he waited for deliverances from his present evil, and to be re-established in his former comforts. Though Job needed (if ever man did) such a change as this, yet (I conceive) this was not the change for which he promiseth here to wait. But Donec veniet rerum vicissitudo & status hic meus mutetur in melius. Bold.

Secondly, Till my change come; that is, till death come. Many both of the Rabbins and others go this way, and judge it the most proper interpretation, All the dayes of my appointed time I will wait, till I dye: Or, I will live waiting for a change by death: Death is a great change, the great change, not only of this or that man, but of mankind. Death brings a change to all, to good and bad, to believers, and to Infidels, though the change which it brings to these differing persons be as different as their natures. When the Saints dye, they have a change, and no change: As a Worthy amongst us once said, when he was ready to dye, I shall change my place, but not my company: I shall have a new house, but my old society: The Saints converse with God, they live with God; while they live in the world, they converse with Christ, and have communion with the Spirit; they converse (among men) chiefly with good men on earth, and with all these they shall converse in Heaven; here is no change: Yet the Saints have a great change, and a blessed one when they dye: They change from all outward evils, all their troubles shall be removed; they change also from spiritual evils, all their corruptions shall remove, there shall not be so much as any sin or any remnant of sin remaining in them, when they remove from hence; here is a happy change: yea, they shall have not only no sin in them, but no temptation without them; no Satan to tempt, as well as no corruption to side with temptation: When wicked men dye they have a change too, but it is a miserable change; theirs is a change from evil to worse, from bad to worst of all; they have a change from fading comforts to lasting sorrow; or they have a change from temporary sorrows to everlasting sorrows; Son, remember member (saith Abraham in the parable to Dives) that thou in thy life time hast received thy good things: thou faredst deliciously every day, thou wast cloathed with purple and fine linnen, but see thy change: thou who hadst a table spread and furnished with delicate meats, thou who hadst a cup brim full, yea running over with delicious wines, now thou hast not so much as a drop of water to cool thy tongue. This is the change which wicked men shall have in death, from pleasure to pain, or from short pains to eternal pain, from a few moth-eaten, worm-eaten, dying, decaying delights, to those griefs which cannot die, to those griefs which as a worm shall gnaw upon their souls and consciences worse then death. Some wicked men are as miserable as they are wicked in this world; The wicked travel with pain all their dayes (chap. 15.) yet they shall travel with greater pain when they die: their present sorrows are but the beginning of sorrows: now they do but sip of that cup, which they must drink up dregs and all for ever. Death is a change to all, dying Saints change from bad to good, from good to best: when wicked men die, they change from bad to worse, from worse to worst of all.

Hypothesis Jobi, quod ira Dei abitura, quod annus gratiæ venturus, quod statio ipsius & militia certis diebus definita, quod spes sit, quod decessio ejus ventura præbant argumentū magnū resurrectionis mortuorum. Tota enim disputatio Jobi eo collimat, ut probat in rebus externis non esse signa iræ vel gratiæ, in hac vita non dari id quod fideles sperāt, ideoque nihil ipsis cōvenientius esse, quā anhelare ad mortē. Coc. ἕως ἀλλοίωσιν γένωμαι. 70. donec vertus fiam. Donec veniat sancta nativitas mea. Sym. Renascitur qui resurgit & ingreditur novum vitæ curriculum.

Thirdly, This change is interpreted of the resurrection, Job desires to die presently, and would wait willingly till the resurrection, knowing that then he should be freed from all affliction; One of the ancients renders it, I will wait until my holy birth-day come: The resurrection is a birth-day to the world. The earth and sea shall be in travel and be delivered (he that is raised from death begins a new life) They took dead men into their womb, and shall (by the power of God) return them living. There shall not be one abortive or still-born in that great birth-day. Some expound that regeneration which Christ speaks of (Matth. 19. 28.) of the resurrection, and give the sense only with the alteration of a point, thus, Ye which have followed me, shall in the regeneration (or resurrection) when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Which reading Beza a learned interpreter affirms, that he hath observed in five ancient copies, implying that when the bodies and souls of the Saints shall be married again together, never to be separated by death, that will be as a new birth-day to them all. However 'tis clear beyond dispute that the resurrection day of Christ is called in Scripture both the day of his begetting, and of his brith. For that of (Psal. 2. 7.) Thou art my Son this day have I begotten thee, is interpreted by the Apostle of the resurrection of Christ, Act. 13. where having said (vers. 30.) God hath raised him from the dead, he subjoyns (vers. 32. 33.) And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the Fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again, as it is also written in the second Psalm: Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. And that the resurrection of Christ is his birth as well as his begetting is proved by the same Apostle, who calleth him expresly The first-born from the dead (Col. 1. 18.) Now as the first birth-day of man into the world is a change: So this second birth-day will be a greater change. As the Apostle disputes it all along (1 Cor. 15.) how great a change will that be when mortality shall put on immortality, when corruption shall put on incorruption, when that which is sown a natural body shall be raised a spiritual body; Hence the Apostle concludes at the fifty first verse, We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed: which the Vulgar Latine reads thus, we shall all rise, but we shall not all be changed, and another, as the learned Beza hath observed upon that place: we shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed. For these not observing that the Apostle in this place speaks only of the bodies of the Elect, and knowing that the bodies of the wicked shall not have (though they shall have some change) such a change as is here spoken of, upon these grounds they have thus boldly altered the text, to serve their own sense: whereas both the Syriak and Arabike interpreters keep to the Original Greek, from which we translate, we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. For the Apostle treating of the state of all Saints at the last day, of whom many shall then be found alive, he declares what shall be done to them: They (saith he) shall not sleep, that is, they shall not die, yet they shall be changed; So that, though some of the Saints shall not be raised because they shall not die, yet all at that day shall find a change: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. This is the great change: In the morning of the resurrection we shall all put on fresh suits, fresh suits of flesh and robes of glory upon them, such as shall never change, much less wear out, such as shall be fresh, not only as the garments of the Israelites fourty years in the wilderness, but for ever. After this change we shall hear no more of changing. And that we shall have such a change the Apostle speaks again (Phil. 3. 23.) Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like to his glorious body. The body shall be cast into a more excellent mould, even as a vessel that is broken or out of fashion, is put into the Gold-smiths hand to be changed or new made; yea, there shall be a change at that day not only of the body but of the whole man, the soul shall be changed, not in the substance of it, but in the perfections of it, for then full glory shall be poured into the soul, and it shall have a better estate, though not in the nature of it, yet in the degree of it, then it had before. Then mans glory shall be compleated when soul and body shall meet again, and be re-united: the union of soul and body constitutes man, a soul alone is not man, as a body alone is not; Now in the day of their re-espousals, what gifts will the Lord bestow? what tokens of his royal bounty? Such gifts, such tokens sure, as will convince man that his change is come, and abundantly recompence all his dayes of waiting for it.

Again Observe, That the assured hope of the resurrection to eternal life, will support the soul with patience under all the evils of this life.

Job could willingly undergo any condition, because a change was coming: Though we fight with beasts as long as we live, we have advantage enough in this one truth, the dead shall rise (1 Cor. 15. 31.) what though we endure hardship in this life, we shall arise to a better life. The Authour to the Hebrews (chap. 11. 35.) reports the courage and constancy of the Jewish Martyrs upon this account, They were tortured not accepting deliverance that they might obtain a better resurrection. But are there two sorts or two degrees of resurrection? one good and another better, that he saith, they looked to obtain a better resurrection?

I answer.

He calls that which they expected a better resurrection, not comparatively to another resurrection, but either first, in comparison of that life which they were to lose, if they would keep the faith; or Secondly, in comparison of that life which they might have kept if they would have let go their faith, or submitted to idolatry. And their life in this latter sense may elegantly be called a resurrection, because they being but as dead men in the hands of those tyrants for professing the faith, were offered their lives again, or should have been restored to a free enjoyment of their lives, if they would have renounced or denied the faith. But these noble professors thought the offer of such a life too vile a price to sell their faith for. And therefore they despised that deliverance which was only a resurrection from a threatned death, to a transitory life, in comparison of that true or better resurrection, which would be from an inflicted death to eternal life. Now if the Saints under the old Testament were thus Heroical in sufferings upon the hope of a future resurrection, about which they had no open direct promise, nor any very clear evidence; how much more should we who have the doctrine of the resurrection written as with a beam of the Sun, together with the glory and the happiness which shall follow? assurance of a change to any better state, is apt to raise in man high resolutions in any the worst estate wherein he is. And the hope of mending our condition enables us to bear a bad condition: hope is the support and pillar of the soul, in its heaviest pressures; that which adds infinitely to the punishment of the damned in hell, is, that as they are in an ill condition, so they know their condition will never mend, they cannot say they will wait till their change come; they must suffer, but they cannot hope; Their change shall never come, though they should hope for it, because they have no ground of hope, everlasting wrath is determined upon them. This makes them compleatly miserable.

ble. To be without hope of good, is worse then the enduring of evil: the damned in hell are more pained with thinking that their miserable condition will never change, then they are in bearing their present misery. The Saints in heaven are in a happy estate, and they know it will never change, they joy as much in this assurance, as they do in the sense of their present happiness: they enjoy all their joyes at once, because their joy is one, and shall ever be the same; Their condition is so good that they need not desire a change, and so sure, that they need not fear a change. It is the extremity and the height of a good estate to be beyond the fear, and of an evil estate to be beyond the hope, of change: it is an abatement of our comforts, to enjoy good which may be changed for evil, and an abatement of our sorrows to endure evil which may be changed for good. 'Twas thus with Job, he was in a sorrowful condition, but he believed a change was coming, and therefore he resolved. All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.

VERS. 15, 16, 17.

Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands.
For now thou numberest my steps, dost thou not watch over my sin?
My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sowest up mine iniquity.

IN the close of the fourteenth verse, we heard Job resolving to wait all the dayes of his appointed time, till his change shall come: and according to the various interpretations of that change, opinions vary about the call and answer of this fifteenth verse.

Thou shalt call, and I will answer.

Si me voces moriq; jubeas paratus sum. Rab. Moyses. Quum me vocabis ad migrandum ex hac vita, ego libens tibi respondebo. Merc.

They who interpret that change by death, sence it thus, when-ever thou shalt send out thy writ, or summons to the grave, I shall readily submit unto it and obey: thou shalt call and I will answer, why should I be slow-footed or faint-hearted, when I am called to the grave? seeing I am assured, that I shall not be lost in the grave, no, nor forgotten there: though the grave be the land of forgetfulness, thy affections towards me will preserve thy memory of me; and seeing I live in thy love, I cannot live out of thy thoughts: Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hand.

Hence Observe, That a godly man (in a due frame of spirit) willingly obeys the call of God to die.

The Apostle had not only a willingness, but a forwardness to die, even a zeal or a kind of ambition to die, I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, which is best of all. The Saints receive their call to death as a call to rest: and though the body for a while lie down in the dust, yet they know what is prepared for the soul, and when they two meet together again, both shall be called to an everlasting rest. Some interpret these words, of calling and answering, by the common custome of inviting, and of the readiness of those who are invited, to come unto a feast: How willing are we to feast with our friends? Saints never go to a feast indeed till they have done eating: the hunger of the soul after this feast conquers the fear of death. I grant there is a natural fear of death, and 'tis possible that a believer who (in his own thoughts) hath often acted the dying man, may yet find some regret and unwillingness to die when death comes: the very loosing of the bond, the untying of the marriage knot between soul and body, is unwel-come to nature, while grace bids it wel-come. Paul did not so much desire to be uncloathed as to be cloathed upon: he was willing rather that mortality should be swallowed by eternal life, then that natural life should be swallowed up by mortality. Yet at last faith conquers natural fear, grace laughs while nature mourns, and a believer can with as much chearfulness answer the call of God to die, as the call of a friend to dinner when he is hungry, or to bed when he is weary.

Secondly, They who expound this change for that of the resurrection, give another meaning of this call and answer. As the former take it for a call to the grave, so these for a call from the grave, and his answer to be a willing return from thence: he would not let God call twice, much less demur upon the matter, whether he were best come out of the grave or no. Thou shalt call, and I will answer, here I am, Lord, I come. The Septuagint render I will obey thy call. In that day God will call, yea, he will make the greatest call that ever yet was made. Then our God shall come, and will not keep silence, he shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth that he may judge his people (Psal. 50. 3, 4.) In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed (1 Cor. 15. 52.) And again, The Lord himself will descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, (1 Thes. 4. 16.) he shall descend from heaven with a shout, with a loud exhortation, so loud that all who are in the grave shall hear him: the word in propriety signifies that encouraging voice, which is among marriners, or rowers in a galley, who are called with one consent to buckle to their oars: the Lord shall descend with a shout like that, and rouse the dead at once out of their graves. In the parable of the Virgins 'tis said, at midnight there was a great cry, behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him. (Mat. 25. 6.) This is not the cry of those who are called, (there will be a cry among them) but a cry from heaven calling them to meet the bridegroom. Christ speaks of two sorts of dead men, and of a twofold call to a twofold resurrection, Joh. 5. The hour is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live: These are the dead in sin, who are called to arise in newness of life, or to a new life, the life of grace: Marvel not at this (saith Christ) for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the grave shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation. As a great cry causeth the spiritual resurrection from sin, so the corporal from the dust. Both are effects of the mighty power of God. When Christ raised Lazarus, he spake with a loud voice (John 11. 43.) Lazarus come forth, Lazarus answered this voice and came forth. And as he then, so all mankind shall hear and obey the voice of Christ commanding them to come forth. God calls now, and few will answer or obey: O that my people had hearkned unto my voice, (Psal. 81. 11.) God will at last speak so loud and so effectually, that the deafest Adders shall hear the voice of the charmer, and appear out of their holes; The Lord commands the Prophet (Ezek. 37. 4.) Son of man prophesie upon these dead bones: he means it typically of the Jews in captivity, yet there the resurrection is shadowed: God will prophesie upon our dead bones: And if any ask, Can these bones live? yes, these bones shall live. God will lay sinews upon them, and he will bring up flesh upon them, and cover them with skin, he will put breath into them and they shall live. Now a gracious heart answereth the call of God in the actings of a spiritual life (Psal. 17. 8.) When thou shalt say seek my face, my heart answers, thy face Lord will I seek. Then every man gracious or without grace, good or bad, shall answer the call of God to the receiving of another life: a life to some better then that they once lived, a life most unconceiveably worse then the death from which they are called. Thou shalt call and I will answer, that's a second sense.

Thirdly, That change was interpreted by others for a change in his present state, from sickness to health, from pain to ease, from sorrow unto joy.

Hence ariseth a third interpretation of this call of God and answer of Job, in reference to a judiciary disceptation or debate, which Job had professed himself willing to abide and carry through with God, in case he would be pleased to grant him that desired change: he spake that desire before; And I find one interpreter fixing him in it here. It is manifest (saith he) that Job doth not speak here of the resurrection of his flesh, but of that call and answer for the ending of his present controversie: about which we read his offer (chap. 13. 21.) Withdraw thy hand far from me, let not thy dread make me afraid: then call thou and I will answer, or, let me speak and answer thou me. And so, withdraw thy hand, is as much as this,

Ἐν κελεύσματι, cum hortationis clamore. Keleusma proprie est hortamen quod apud nautas est solenne, quo uno veluti concentu remos ducunt. Bez.

Manifestum est Jobū nō loqui de carnis suæ resurrectione, sed de ea vocatione, et responsione de qua (c. 13. 12.) ut præsentem litē dirimat esse intelligendum. Eold change my state, and then I will answer thy citation or thy call, and give an account of my self, in whatsoever thou shalt demand of me: I have opened his mind in this proposal upon those words of the thirteenth chapter, thither I refer the Reader.

Take only this note from it, That when the body is unburthened of outward afflictions, and the soul eased of inward sorrows, then we have a great advantage both to plead with and pray to God.

How much the inward man is pressed by the outward, and how the spiritual part of the inward man is pressed by those fears that arise from its carnal part, might be shewed from this exposition, but (though it hath a fairness in it, and a learned pen to maintain it, yet) I wave it as not so proper and pertinent as either of the former two, to the scope of this call and answer, which this Scripture leads us to.

Job having promised a readiness in himself to answer the call of God, shews his assurance of Gods readiness to call him, and of his acceptance with him.

Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hand.

It hath been shewed (chap. 10. 3.)
First, That man is the work of Gods hand.
Secondly, In what sense hands are ascribed unto God.
Thirdly, How man is the work of Gods hand.
For the clearing of these particulars in a way of explication, I send the Reader to the chapter and verse fore-cited, and shall deal with this clause only as it stands in connexion here with the call and answer last opened.

Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hand.

Which some conceive to be the very form of words in which Job intended to answer God: Thou wilt call, and thus I will answer: O God, thou hast, or thou wilt, have a desire to the work of thy hand, As if he should say, When thou calleſt me, I know thy call must spring from the good will thou beareſt me, thy affections will come forth to me, when thy voice comes forth; thou wilt therefore speak because thou hast a desire to the work of thy hand; so the words stand in opposition to those (chap. 10. 3.) Is it good that thou shouldeſt despise the work of thy hand? Which some expound as his expostulation with God, upon an apprehension that he slighted him: but now he is confident God hath another opinion of him, and would be so far from despising, that he will have a great desire to him who was the work of his hand.

Secondly, Many of the Hebrew writers expound Job, as if he thought God had a mind or a purpose to destroy the work of his hand: and they read it with an interrogation, Wilt thou desire or be forward to destroy that which thou hast made? Hence also the Septuagint render it as a deprecation, Do not reject or unmake the work of thy hands.

Nũquid perdere desideras? Rab. Lev. Τὰ ἔργα τῶν χειρῶν σου μὴ ἀπορρίψῃς. Ne repellas opera manuũ tuarum. Sept.

Thirdly, The Original word which we translate, Thou wilt have a desire, imports a strong coveting desire, such as is after silver. The same root in the Hebrew signifies silver and to covet, because silver is so much coveted, thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hand. As a covetous worldling hath a great desire after gold or silver, he longs for it, and it pleaseth him when he can get it, so the Lord himself hath a longing, covetous desire after man, who is the work of his hand. The Lord seemed to use Job as if he were but rubbish and dross, no way desireable, yet he believed God would look upon him as a silver vessel, and as a vessel of honour: The Vulgar Latine translates wide from the letter of the Hebrew, but near to this sense; Thou wilt put forth thy right hand to the work of thy hand: this departs from the letter of the words, but the sense is fair to the scope of the words; for it is an argument of love and friendship, to put forth the right hand to a man; if we meet one whom we love and delight in, we cannot pass him, without taking him by the hand; And as it is an argument of love and friendship to allure with the hand, so of charity or pity to reach out the hand: Thou wilt have a desire, may be well expressed thus, thou wilt put forth thy hand to the work of thy hand, and help me up when thou biddest me rise. A true friend reacheth his heart out before he reacheth out his hand. God had cast Job into the mire and ditch (as he spake chap. 9.) yet he believes he would take him by the hand, and lift him not only out of the ditch of affliction, but out of the grave of death. Hence Observe,

First, That God bears much affection to man as he is the work of his hand.

It argued high displeasure when God spake thus against his people, He that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will shew them no pity (Isa. 27. 11.) The meanest creature in the world is the work of Gods hand, and under that notion, the desire of his heart; it is natural to all men to love their own works; and it is the distemper of most men to over-love and dote upon, yea, to be proud of the work of their hand; God hath a desire to, and a liking of all his works, (Gen. 1. 31.) when he had finished that great structure, that noble fabrick of the world, he saw all that he had made, and he saw it with content. God did not make the world, and then take a view of it, all was one act; yea, he saw the idea or platform of it in his own breast from eternity; but the Scripture speaks thus, to shew what price and value he put upon his work. And if the natural frame of man be such as God hath a desire to, and looks upon with delight, as it then came out of his hand in the first creation; what desires hath God to the work of his own spirit in our hearts, which is the second or the new creation? Hath he not a desire to the new creature, who hath a desire to every creature? If he hath a desire to the work of his power in creation, then much more to the work of his spirit in regeneration, which is the most beautiful piece of work which he ever made? Angels are excellent creatures, being confirmed in holiness; the Soul of a believer formed up by grace, is a creature matching Angels. When Stevens face was full of beauty, the Text saith, it did shine as the face of an Angel. If an Angel were corporal, he could not have more lustre and beauty than Stephen's face had. Every Saint hath a heart like the face of an Angel, full of divine beauties and glorious excellencies. To such a work of God, how great a desire hath God? Daniel was called a man of desires by the Angel, (chap. 9. 23.) we translate greatly beloved, but the Chaldee is, Thou art a man of desires: Though every believer cannot be called a man of desires in Daniels height, yet every believer is a man of desires, a man whom God desires. It is an honour to man to be desired among men (and those Princes died in dishonour, of whom the holy Story saith, that they died undesired; but how great an honour is it to that man who lives desired of God, and (whereof Job was assured) to whom God will have a desire as to the work of his hands, when he is dead! Take this Corollary from it.

Conſuevit artifex appetere opus manuũ ſuarum, ejuſq; videndi cupiditate teneri. Drus.

If God hath a desire to the work of his hand, how should they who are the work of his hand have a desire unto him?

What desire should we have to God, who hath wrought us, when we hear that he hath a desire to us, because he hath wrought us? Shall the Potter have a desire to the clay, and shall not that clay (which hath desires) have a desire to the Potter? One of the Ancients speaks passionately to this point; I was made by thee, O Lord, and my heart is restless till it return to thee; the work should have a desire to the hands that made it, and that which hath received a being, to the fountain of its being. Sinful distempers cause us to depart from God, the work hath then no desire to the hand that made it. Holy actings are all from God, and they carry us back to God from whom they are. A holy heart cannot but have a desire to God, the work of whose hands it is.

Thirdly, Job was in a very sad condition, when he spake this, he was pleading with God for a change, a change by death, he will needs die rather than continue such a life; The hand of God had cast him as low as a man could be on this side the grave or hell: and yet he saith, Thou shalt have a desire to the work of thy hand. Hence Observe, Faith can discern some light of favour, some glimmerings of love, through the clouds of darkest dispensations.

It is the holy skill, the art of faith, to make conclusions of life in death, and of light in darkness; This is the right Logick of Faith: Faith can prophesie, and faith is a true Prophet, thou wilt have desire, he speaks of the time to come. The presumption of evil men prophesies sometimes, or dreams rather, that God will have a desire to them; but faith makes sure prophesies, because 'tis bottomed upon the sure word of God; Jobs faith prophesied more than once. He shall be my salvation, (chap.13.) I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I shall see him, &c. (chap.19.) Faith hath a quick eye, and sees good in the end from the beginning. Faith sees the movings of that holy concupiscible appetite in God towards poor sinners, when it feels nothing but the movings of his irascible appetite. While Job perceived wrath, or somewhat in the likeness of wrath, mixt with the dealings of God towards him, he promised himself (and that not coldly but confidently) not only somewhat in the likeness of the favour of God towards him, but his real favour; Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hand.

But had not the Lord a desire to Job before? Was the spring of his affections shut up till that day should come? or was his love to him yet to begin? No, the love of God and his desires had flowed to him from everlasting; as whom he loveth, he loveth to the end, so whom he loves, he loved without beginning: but his love and his desires had been a little while hidden, and (as some rivers) had run under ground. Job saw nothing in his latter dayes, but the actings of his anger, and was sensible only of severity in his proceedings, as the complaint of the next words teacheth us.

Verse 16. For thou numbrest my steps, dost not thou watch over my sin?

conclusio pathetica ex comparatione severitatis judiciorum Dei hoc & sequente versu, cum infirmitate omnium rerum creatarum, ver. 20, 21. nominatim vero hominis usque ad finem, Jun.

In this and the verse following, Job makes a pathetical comparison, between the present seeming rigour of Gods dealing with him, and that sweetness which he hoped to find ere long or at the last: Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hand, but now thou numbrest my steps.

Two things are here to be opened.

First, What he means by his steps.

Secondly, What he means by Gods numbring his steps. Job speaks both by a figure.

By steps we are to understand his actions, all that he did, yea, all that he thought, his inward motions as well as his outward motions. So the Septuagint translates, thou numbrest my meditations, or, the workings of my heart. As the whole course of a man is called his way, so the several actions of that course, are his steps: holy actions are strait steps, and sinful actions are uneven ones, he went on frowardly in the way of his heart, Isa. 57. 17. that is, in the way which his heart most delighted in, that was a crooked way, and such were his steps, such disorderly walkers use not to number their own steps, but God doth.

Gressus (unt affectus & actus quibus animus hominis incedit, bonis quidem ad palmam, malis verò ad pœnam.

Numbring the steps notes an exact account, and an accurate observation of our actions, we say of a man who goeth softly, surely you tell your steps, The Lord is said to number our steps, when he makes a strict inquisition concerning all our transactions, and sets down step by step, every passage of our lives, when he keeps (as it were) a day-book of all we do, and records us to a word or a thought. David speaks of his enemies, (Psal. 56. 6.) they gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps, when they wait for my soul: that is, they mark every thing I do or say: he that would be watcht exactly, were best to have an enemy to watch him: love makes us watchful over one another, Jest we take hurt, but malice makes a man observant enough of another to do him hurt: thus David's enemies were double diligent upon their watches, they mark my steps when they wait for my soul: And again, (Psal. 17. 11.) they compassed us in our steps, they have set their eyes bowing down to the earth. It is an allusion (as I conceive) to hunters, who go poring upon the ground to prick the hare, or to find the print of the hares claw, when the hounds are at a loss, and can make nothing of it by the scent. Thus his enemies cast about to find where he had gone, or what he had been doing, that their blood-hounds might follow the game with a fresh cry. So then, thou numbrest my steps, is no more but this, whatsoever I do or speak, thou art very curious and critical in the observation of it; I will not stay in the inlargement of any points from these words, but referr to (*chap.*10.14.) where Job speaks the same sense, If I sin, then thou markest me, &c.

Singula facta mea recenses & ad amussim metiris. Jun.

Only note in passage.

First, God knows all the motions of our hearts, and the actions of our lives.

He that is unacquainted with our wayes, cannot number our steps: it is best for us to number our own steps, and to take heed to our own wayes, when we hear that God is so exact at it: it would make us cautious what we do, if we knew of a man who took notice of all we did.

Secondly, The person, Job was a holy man, whose steps God numbred, whence we may learn,

That God sees the sin of his own children.

Job was not of opinion that God sees no sin in his children, he knew himself to be a child of God, and he knew his steps were numbred, yea, and his sin watched over, as he speaks in the next clause.

Dost thou not watch over my sin?

Parce peccatis meis, Vulg. Hæc præcatio filo orationis non convenit. Merc.

Some render this as a Prayer, Do not keep my sins, or spare me my sins, that is, do not punish them: but this is inconsistent with the tenour of Jobs discourse, and so I leave it.

The letter of the Hebrew is, Dost thou not keep or observe upon my sin? The sense is the same with what we said last, or we have here but an exposition of it. Some read it without an interrogation, Thou watchest over my sin, in both there is an allusion to a severe creditour, who gives no day, but presently exacts the forfeiture or penalty of his bond. So the Septuagint render, None of my sins pass thee, thou takest notice of all, to punish and bring me to judgment for them. Others translate, Thou dost not wait, or expect at all upon my sin; As if he had said, As soon as ever thou hast seen me commit any sin, thou layest thy arrest and charge upon me, thou dost not give me time, but callest me to a present account.

Verbum שמר pro expectare & differre cum magna parte Hebræorum sumo. Merc.

We may here again note, the inspection or superintendency of God over the wayes of man: he is so perfect a numberer, that he watcheth to number: he that will number how many steps another takes, had need watch him well. Let no man wonder that God numbreth his steps, when he watcheth to number them: and indeed, it is as easie for God to see every sin in us, as to see one sin; there is no difficulty to omniscience, in knowing all things. Let this be also for our caution and admonition: if God watcheth over our sins, how should we watch over our selves? Christ gives this charge, What I say to you, I say to all, watch: we must watch for our own outward safety, though God watcheth to save, his watchfulness is no plea for our carelessness: much more have we need to watch, lest we sin, because God watcheth to observe our sins. His watchfulness should provoke our carefulness. The Lord (as it were) watcheth advantages to bring evil upon them, who are not watchfull against evil; (*Dan.*9.14.) Therefore hath the Lord watched the evil, and brought it upon us: they were not watchful against the evil of sin, therefore the Lord watched to bring upon them the evil of punishment. Have not we cause to watch, lest we transgress, when God watcheth to chasten our transgressions? The Prophet (Jer. 20.10.) complained, All my familiars watched for my halting: God (in a sense) watcheth for our haltings. He doth not watch as wicked men do, with a hope to see us halt, as the Prophet personates his unkind familiars there, saying thus among themselves, or every man in his own heart, Peradventure he will be enticed, and we shall prevail against him, and we shall take our revenge on him. It pleaseth wicked men to see the godly halt or stumble, much more to see them fall: God is infinitely above such thoughts or designs, he watcheth for our haltings to make us know them, not to insult over us for them. He watcheth for our haltings, not hoping to see us halt, but to prevent us from halting, or if we halt, then to preserve us from falling. He at most watcheth for our haltings, to correct us for them, not to take his revenge upon us for them. He watcheth us to make us watchful.

There is a double watchfulness which this should lead us to.

First, A watchfulness in reference to God.

Secondly, A watchfulness in reference to our selves.

We should watch 1. What God doth. 2. What God saith. And we should watch, 1. What we do. 2. What we speak. 3. What we think. Every thought, word, and work must be accounted for, and brought to judgment: and therefore it is as much our wisdome, as it is our duty to watch over them. Thou watchest over my sin (saith Job) And suppose God find his sin, what will he do next? that Job seems to tell us in the next verse. Our sins are but trash, yet Job supposed that God put his into a bagg; they are no treasure, yet Job supposed, God sealed up his sins in a bagg, and lest the seal should not be strong enough, he represents God sowing up this bag-full of sin, such were the apprehensions of this sorrowful man.

Verse 17. My transgressions are sealed up in a bag, and thou sowest up mine iniquity.

There are two expositions of these words.

Elegans Hebraismus pro eo quod est remitaclaudere, ut nullo modo eam videre aut tangere liceat. Sigillare peccata est eorum memoriam penitus delere. Pined.

First, That the sealing of transgressions up in a bag, implies the utter removing of transgression: as if they were sealed up never to be seen or brought forth any more: the word is used (Job 9.7.) he sealed up the stars; that is, he covers them with clouds and darkness, or overcomes them with greater light. The clearness of the day seals up the stars alwayes, and so doth the cloudiness of the night sometimes. Some give this sense of the sealing here, my transgressions are sealed in a bag, that is, they are hid, and shall not be remembred at all for ever. Daniel prophecying of the sufferings of Christ, saith, (*chap.*9.24.) Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and the holy city to finish transgression: The Chaldee word is, to seal up transgression, what that is, the next words shew, and to make an end of sins, to make reconciliation for iniquity, this was done by the death of Christ. The death of Christ was the death of sin, and when reconciliation is made for sin, the end of sin is made. This is a great Gospel truth, when sin is pardoned, it is sealed up so fast, that when it is to be sought for, it shall not be found, and when it is enquired after, it shall not be.

Yet I conceive it sutes not this place, nor answers the subject upon which Job still insists, for he is aggravating the dealings of God with him, as severe, he numbreth my steps; So that to say my transgressions are sealed up, that is, they are pardoned and covered, is an exposition of so great a variation from the scope of Jobs discourse, as cannot be admitted in this place. Therefore to clear his meaning, I shall offer, that sealing is used in three cases.

First, To keep things secret that they may not be seen.

Secondly, To keep things distinct, that they may not be confused.

Thirdly, To keep things safe (as we usually speak) that they may be forth-coming.

Obsignate cellas, referte annulum ad me. Plaut. in Casin. Quæ fuit illa prisci orum vita? qualis innocentia? in qua nihil signabatur, & nunc cibi quoque & potus annulo vindicant à rapina. Plin. Lib. 31. Cap. 1.

When Daniel was cast into the Lions den (that he might be safe; not safe from the Lions, but safe that none should fetch him out from the Lions (that there might be no delusion in the business,) 'Tis said, a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the denn, and the King sealed it with his own signet (chap. 6.17.) Seals were anciently put upon chests of goods, especially of their choicest goods. Pliny gives it as an argument of the integrity of the times before him, that then nothing was sealed up, servants might then (as we speak of those that are very trusty) be trusted with untold gold, but now (saith he) house-keepers secure their very meat and drink with seals, lest their servants should steal, and imbezzle them. In allusion to this or that other service of the seal, Job saith here, my transgression is sealed; as if he had said, my transgression is kept safe, that it may be ready as matter of accusation and charge against me. In pursuance of which sense, some interpret these words, as a metaphor taken from Sollicitors about Law-suits, who carry their papers and bills of inditement sealed up, and put into a bag, which custome is continued at this day. As if Job had said, my inditement, or charge, is sealed up in thy bag, surely thou intendest shortly to proceed to a tryal against me. When God tells the people of Israel, their vine is as the vine of Sodom, &c. he minds them presently, Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up among my treasures? (Deut. 32. 34.) that is, this evil which you have done, the sins which you have committed, like Sodom and Gomorrah, are laid up in store with me, and sealed among my treasures; I have taken sure notice of all, and shall bring all forth in due time: you have scattered your sins and wickednesses abroad, but I have gathered and sealed them up. God treasures up mercy for an obedient people, but he treasures up wrath for the rebellious. Or, if God should not do it, yet such do it for themselves, (Rom. 2.5.) Despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? but after thy hardness and impenitent heart, treasurest up unto thy self wrath against the day of wrath. As impenitence seals our sins upon us, so it treasures and seals up the wrath of God upon us for our sins. The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up, his sin is hid (Hos. 12. 13.) From whom was it hid? Not from the eyes of God, (possibly not from the eyes of the world) but it is bound up and hid, as reserved to a day of reckoning. It is bound up, not let loose by pardoning grace; it is hid, not with a covering of mercy, but with a covering from mercy; it is hid, not for protection, but (as Job thought his sin was sealed) for punishment.

My transgression is sealed up in a bag.

Further, This sealing up in a bag is an elegancy heightning the sense: A man counts or tells over his spending money, but when he seals it up in a bag, it is an argument he means to lay it by as a stock. A stock of money is not scattered about, but put in a bag; and when it is in the bag, it is not only tied, but sealed up. Thus Job seems to conceive, that God had taken a note of all his sins, and laid them up till a fit time, to call him to an account about them, and punish him for them.

And thou sowest up mine iniquity.

Job prosecutes the same metaphor, and hath the same mind in this, as in the former part of the verse.

The words undergo different readings, some thus, thou sowest iniquity to iniquity; the Original signifies to joyn, or, to make an application of one thing to another, like an artificer, who puts piece to piece in any fabrick. In which sense Job saith of his friends, Ye are forgers of lies (chap. 13. 4.) that is, you curiously frame up a lie, or put one lie to another, (Psal. 119.6,9.) The proud have forged a lie against me: so, thou sowest iniquity to iniquity; the iniquity of one year to the iniquity of another; the iniquity of one relation to the iniquity of another; this is a sowing, or joyning of iniquity. Others thus, Thou sowest to mine iniquity, that is, thou sowest the punishment of iniquity to my iniquity, thou addest affliction to my sin: Job thought God heaped all his sins upon him together, and with them the punishment of all his sins. Again, Thou sowest up mine iniquity, is but an explication of, thou hast sealed up my transgressions in a bag; or, the bag of my transgression is not only sealed but sowed. Hence observe,

A gracious heart looks upon his own sinnings as the occasion of his sufferings.

He fears there is somewhat in deck against him. And 'tis a truth, that as God hath a bottle wherein he puts the tears of his afflicted people, so he hath a bag wherein he puts the sins of an offending people. God puts none of the sins of his people in a bag to condemn them, yet he often puts their sin in a bag to chasten them. Hence a godly man is apt to judge all his afflictions as the fruit of his sins: and though it was not so in Jobs case, yet he good man, put all upon his sin. It is good to judge our selves when we are judged) that is chastened) of the Lord.

Fallitur hac in re Jobus, non esse hæ afflictiones pœnæ peccati, sed fidei probationes, quod Dei consilium non satis intelligebat Job. Drus.

Secondly, Though this be a truth in general, yet Job is not to be excused in having such dark thoughts of God, and such black thoughts of himself; That surely God sealed up his iniquities in a bag, and was resolved to afflict him for them. Job mistook his own condition, and the mind of God towards him in some things, as well as his friends did. God had not sealed up his transgressions in a bag, but he had cast them behind his back. God did not afflict him for the punishment of his sin, but for the proof and exercise of his graces, as hath been shewed all along. The holiest man on earth is subject to misconceive the reason why he suffers, as well as the rule of what he should do. Thirdly observe,

That though a gracious heart will not bear the hard censures of others about his sins, yet he is ready enough to censure and accuse himself.

Job did as often confess his iniquity before God, as he had pleaded his innocency before men. He would not have taken it well at the hands of his friends, if they had told him that God had filled a bag with his transgressions, and that God

God had sealed it up against a day of account, yet thus he speaks of himself. As his faith appeared little while he thought that God had sealed up his transgressions; so his humility and self-abasement appeared very great in this acknowledgment of his transgression.

Further, Job imployes three words in these two verses about the same thing, the acknowledgment of his sinfulness; 1. Sin. 2. Transgression. 3. Iniquity. These are taken sometimes promiscuously, as was shewed, (chap. 13. 23.) here we may give them a distinct sense.

The first signifies properly a falling through ignorance or infirmity, a stepping out of the way besides our intention, (possibly) against our full resolution.

The third imports rebellion, and prevarication, when we sin scorning obedience, or judging it a thing below us. One of the Ancients confesses of himself, that when he was (in his youth) admonished by his mother to take heed of sinful wayes, and to walk with God, he was ashamed to follow her counsel. This is rebellion indeed, and the height of of iniquity; it is bad enough to do ill, but it is worse to be ashamed to do good, worst of all to be ashamed to leave off doing evil. Job chargeth himself with sin, transgression, and iniquity, not with all of them in their full extent and aggravations, but with all of them in their kind. Hence observe,

That a godly man is subject to all sins, even the worst of sins.

Not only to sins of infirmity, but of prevarication; not only to sins of ignorance, but to sins against knowledge: he may sin, not only because he cannot discern the rule clearly, but even against a clear rule. There is no sin but a regenerate man may fall into, except that from which no man can be raised, the sin against the Holy Ghost. Now as the best discover somewhat in them productive of the worst sins, so God hath discovered himself ready to pardon the worst of sins: if we commit transgression, iniquity and sin, he proclaims himself, the God pardoning iniquity, transgression and sin; yea, his nature is infinitely more ready to pardon, than our nature is to sin. We should fear to commit the least sin, even a sin of infirmity, but we need not fear whether God will pardon (for he certainly will) more than sins of infirmity, even the greatest sins. And though now not only our iniquities and sins, but even our least transgressions, or steppings aside, are sealed, and sowed up in a bag; yet Believers shall shortly see all their sins, bag and all, thrown into the bottom of the Sea, and sinking, like a talent of lead, or a weighty mill-stone, in those mighty waters of free grace and undeserved mercies.

VERS. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22.

And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place.
The waters wear the stones, thou washest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth, and thou destroyest the hope of man.
Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth, thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away.
His sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not, and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them.
But his flesh upon him shall have pain, and his soul within him shall mourn.

Mirum est audire Jobum in mediis ærumnis Philosophantem. Olymp.

IN this context Job gives us a proof that he had not lost his Philosophy, much less his grace, in a sick bed. An Interpreter breaks out into admiration, that a man distressed with so many troubles, smitten with so many sores, grieved with so many pains, could intend his thoughts so much about the secrets of nature, and the providential transmutations of the creature; that he, who had been confined so long to a chamber, could travell thus in his thoughts, for illustrations of his own case, over mountains and rocks, among stones and trees, through the winds and waters.

The 18th and 19th verses are a collection of comparisons for this purpose.

The words are plain, but there is much variety of judgment about their scope, and Jobs intendment in them.

Some conceive, that under these similitudes he bewails lastingness and long continuance of his sorrows, or rather, that he lasted and continued so long in his sorrows: As if he had said, The strongest pieces of the lower world are eaten out by time, or forced into a decay by outward violence: mountains and rocks cannot stand their ground when the earth shakes: The hardest stones cannot ever contend with the smallest droppings, nor can the deepest roots hold their possession against an overflowing deluge: all these are subject unto change, when thus assaulted: how is it then that I subsist under so many sorrows, and yet bear such burdens of affliction, who am neither mountain, nor rock, nor stone, nor tree? how is it that I am not wasted, and removed by the tempest of thine anger, and quite washed away with these inundations of thy displeasure? Surely, if I had been a mountain, I might have been pulled down before this time; had I been a rock, these strokes and diggings might have undermin'd me; had I been a stone, these continual droppings might have worn me out; and how green and flourishing soever I had been, these flouds might long since, not only have discoloured, but drowned all my beauty. Thus he argues from the greater to the less, if such robustuous creatures fall and fail by these accidents, whence was it that he who was but weakness had held out so long? how was it that he (almost a dead man at first) did yet live in the midst of so many deaths? Hence,

Secondly, Others conceive, that Job under these similitudes renews his old suit to die; as if he had said, There is nothing so firm, nothing so strongly setled, but must yield at last unto corruption, and change its state: therefore let my change come. Let me be removed, for rocks must remove; let me be consumed, for mountains must consume: Stones wear, and trees are washed away, let me be worn and wash'd one of the world, let me pass away, and die.

Thirdly, That Job doth here move the Lord to pity him, and hasten his release, suspecting that at the last he might break out into some impatiency, or discover uncomely passions: As if he had said, Lord, mountains cannot stand alwayes, and rocks will fail at last; how much sooner may my patience? My strength is not the strength of stones, (as he spake, chap. 6. 12.)

Has similitudines eodem spectare puto quo præcedentes de aquis è mari abeuntibus, &c, ad ostendendam sc. mortem hominis irreparabilem. Merc.

Fourthly, All these similitudes are conceived to aim at the same point, which Job had been upon a little before; namely, to shew that a man dying shall return no more to his former state, as was there opened. Death giveth us such a wound as shall never be healed here, it is an irreparable loss of our worldly comforts: This he shadows out by mountains, rocks, stones, trees, and fruits of the earth, which are changed and consumed, as if they had never been. Thus in general; I shall now open the distinct parts of these comparisons.

Verse 18. Surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place.

Rab. Kimchi exponit נופל, non cadens, sed altus, editus, ut נפלים gigantes, q.d. Mons editus & giganteus decidet. Lib. Rad.

Here are two similitudes; Some read, Surely the high mountain, or highest mountain, cometh to nought, for the Hebrew word here used signifies not only to fall, but to be very high and great, so high and great, that a man beholding it, or looking down from it, is giddy, and falls for fear. Hence Giants (Gen. 6.) are called Nephilim, which properly signifies Fallers; not because they fall, but because they make others fall: yea, they being so high, or men of such stupendious limbs and stature, others seeing them, tremble, and fall before them: So here, for the mountain falling, we may read, the high and huge mountain, the gigantick mountain, the mountain above ordinary mountains, as much as the giant is above the ordinary pitch of men; As if Job had said, the highest mountain comes to nought, he speaks not of annihilation, but alteration, they moulder and break, they are not what once they were.

The word which we translate cometh to nought, signifies properly ro wither as a leaf, or to fall as a withered leaf: when the sap or moisture of the tree goes down to the root, then the leaves fall off. Thus (saith Job) the great mountains, the huge giantly mountains come to nought; they wither, they fall off like the leaves in Autumn: the Prophet Isaiah prayeth (chap. 64. 1.) O that thou wouldest bow the heavens, and come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence: by mountains he means the greatest worldly powers, not natural, but metaphorical mountains; yet yet it is a truth in the letter, for if the Lord do but bow the heavens, and shew his power; if he bow the heavens, and comes down in the greatness of his strength, then the hardest mountains, like the liquid waters, shall flow down at his presence.

And the rock is removed out of his place.

A rock is harder than a mountain; a mountain is earth heaped together, but a rock is earth hardned together: but though it be not only a mountain, but a rock, yea, though it be a mountain of rocks, remove it shall.

עתק consenuit παλαιοῦσθαι, veterascit. Sept

The word signifies properly, to wax old, because things that wax old are removing and passing away; Hence the same word signifies to wax old, and to be removed; that's the Apostle's description of a thing that waxeth old, (Heb. 8.13.) that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to vanish away; he speaks to a spiritual point, yet from a maxim in nature. So here, the rock is removed out of his place, is the same with, the rock waxeth old; because that which waxeth old is ready to be removed out of his place. From these two similitudes, Observe,

First, There is no creature so strong or firm, but is subject unto change.

The mountains and the rocks change ordinarily by the power of time, how much more when God contends with them by an extraordinary power? The Prophet Nahum speaks this in highest Rhetorick (chap. 1.4,5,6.) he rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry. (If any thing keep water, it is the sea, which is the greatest vessel prepared on purpose by God to keep the waters; yet God can lade the Ocean with the hollow of his hand, and dry, not only a pond or a river, but the Sea; He rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry;) Bashan languisheth and Carmel, and the flower of Lebanon languisheth, the mountains quake at him, the hills melt, and the earth is burnt at his presence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein, then who can stand before his indignation, and who can abide the fierceness of his anger? his fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him. This piece of Nahum's prophecy is a clear commentary upon the Text of Job: what can be said more, and nothing less deserves to be said, either of the instability of the strongest creatures, or of the omnipotency of the God of strength. He tosseth the hills like tennis-balls, and cracks the rocks like a nut-shell; before him the hills melt, and the foundations of the earth are discovered. The creature will change by reason of its own weakness, though God should not exert or put forth his power against it. Every mixt body hath the seed of corruption in it, and therefore must corrupt naturally, though God should not destroy it providentially or judiciarily: Now if these creatures are changeable in themselves, surely when God changeth them they shall be changed: all creature strength must yield to his strength, whose weakness is stronger than all creatures; If God send out a commission against a mountain, it falls, and must come down; if he bids a rock remove, the rock shall be removed; if God say to the wind, blow away that mountain, or to a tempest, blow down that rock, it shall be done; stormy winds and tempests go presently upon his errand, and fulfill his word. Faith is said to remove mountains, but it is only upon this account, because it engageth the power of God, who alone can do it.

Secondly, Observe, (which is also applicable to the other similitudes;)

That the strongest creatures read man a lecture of his weakness.

When Job would shew man his frailty, he sends him to the mountains and rocks, which are the most durable among earthly substances: the weakest creature is an embleme of mans weakness, and the strongest teacheth him, there is no trusting to his strength. As Solomon sends the sluggard to the pismire, saying, consider her wayes and be wise; so we may say to the strong man, to the confident man, to the proud man, to all who think they shall never be removed; go to the mountains, repair to the rocks, and be wise; go to the stones which wear away with water drops, go to the trees which are rooted up by a deluge of waters: go to these, and learn the vanity and mutability of your best estate. We may learn of that which cannot speak; things insensible may reason the matter with us: they have a voice, though not a tongue, to tell us what we are; For as the invisible things of God, to wit, his eternal power and Godhead, are seen in the things which are made; so the invisible things of man, even his temporal weakness and frailty, are seen in the things which decay since their making. The power of God is invisible, and so is much of the weakness of man. The constitution of the creature makes the former visible, and the corruption of it makes the latter visible. Every thing that man sees remembers him what he is, and what he must shortly be. And because abundance of caution in this point is no burthen, Job gives further caution: And as I have opened the former, so I shall now these latter instances, by which he confirms this truth.

Verse 19. The waters wear the stones, thou washest away the things that grow out of the dust of the earth, and thou destroyest the hope of man.

In this verse we have two similitudes more, together with the application of all the four, in those words, Thou destroyest the hope of man, in conjunction with the twentieth verse, Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth, &c.

Gutta cavat lapidem. Ovid. lib. 4. de Ponto.

The waters wear the stones.] Waters are soft and liquid, yet they make impression upon that which is hard, and almost impenetrable: it is a Proverbial speech, water by continual running, or often dropping hollows and dents a stone. This similitude intimates, that though Jobs afflictions had been small or light, whereas indeed they were great and heavy, though they had been but as little drops whereas indeed they were a mighty deluge, yet their long continuance and frequent repetition, would utterly weaken and wear him out at last: dropping will consume a stone.

What single force doth not, many doublings of it will. Many lighter blows will kill as well as one great wound. A man may be whipt as well as club'd to death. He that goes but a little way in an hour goes a great way if he continue going many hours. A Student in any profession may have got so little learning by one dayes study, that he cannot perceive he hath got any, yet continuing to study he may attain the highest degree of learning. A believer findes little or no growth in grace or in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by some one exercise either in prayer or hearing the word, yet by a constant attendance upon the Lord in these duties, he grows to a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. Smallest sins lived in (which some do not so much as suspect to be dangerous) destroy the soul, as well as that (whatsoever it is) which is called by this name, a sin unto death (1 John 5.16.) The greatest number is made up of conjoyned unities. Here a little and there a little, comes to much. The mightiest oak is hewed down, and the strongest wall is undermined by many stroaks of the axe and mattock. A ship may be swallowed up with a multitude of little sands as well as broken upon a rock: you may make a burden of many feathers as well as of one mass of lead. A multitude in any kind whether of actions things or persons, though inconsiderable apart, yet put together or following each other close, will carry all before them, and overcome all difficulties. The waters wear the stones.

Thou washest away the things that grow out of the earth.

Thou washest] Who is that? the antecedent is God himself. Thou (O Lord) washest away the things, &c. Here Job expresseth the supream efficient of all those alterations in the creature, who it is that pulls down the mountains, that removes the rocks, all these changes are wrought by the power of God, thou washest away the things that grow out of the earth, or, thou bringest a deluge upon them. God brought once an universal deluge, which washed away not only all that grew out of the earth, but all that lived upon the face of the earth. God hath given mankind his covenant, and set his bow in the cloud as a sign of it, that all flesh shall not be cut off any more by the waters of a flood, neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth, (Gen. 9.11.) yet God hath often since brought floods upon particular places and countreys, which have destroyed and washed washed away that which grows upon the face of the earth, as herbs, grass and trees.

The word strictly taken signifies only those things which grow naturally out of the earth without the labour of man, without plowing, digging, or sowing. So we find the things that grow out of the earth distinguished (1 King. 19.23.) This shall be a sign to thee, thou shalt eat this year such things as grow of themselves, and the second year that which groweth of the same, and the third year ye shall plant and sow: The Levitical Law mindes us also of this distinction, (Lev. 25. 5.) that which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap. As the Jews were forbidden to sow their field in the year of Jubile, so also to reap that (as a peculiar crop to any one of them) which grew up without their sowing. The standing corn (if it stand too long) sheds some grains, which spring up without plowing or sowing: This is said to grow of its own accord; yet (I conceive) we need not take it here in such a restrained sense, but in general, for all or every thing that groweth out of the dust of the earth, whether by or without the labour of the husbandman: Thou washest away the things that grow out of the dust of the earth. Hence observe,

First, The same thing may be both a blessing and an affliction.

Things grow out of the dust of the earth, by water flowing out of the earth, or by the rain falling upon the earth from heaven; and yet the falling of the rain, and the flowing of the water, may destroy the things that grow out of the dust of the earth: if the rain fall not on the dust of the earth, nothing will grow. God threatens to make the rain of the land powder and dust (Deut. 28. 24.) that is, to send so much drought, that the dust shall rise from the earth up into the air, and fall down upon the earth instead of rain. Now when the rain is dust, nothing will spring out of the dust of the earth. The earth is barren; the earth opens its mouth, and gapes to heaven for rain (as a thirsty man) to make it fruitful: yet, this water, this rain, which sometimes is a great blessing to the earth, and causeth it to bring forth fruit abundantly, even this destroyes the fruit of the earth: too much of any thing in nature is hurtful: there may be too much of nature, but there cannot be too much of grace; some things are so good, that we cannot have too great a quantity of them. The dews and drops of heaven upon the soul in greatest abundance, will not destroy the things that grow in or out of our souls, but make them grow more. Our sin and the wrath of God turn our greatest worldly comforts into curses; but that is alwayes a blessing to us which cures us of our sin, and the more we have of it, the more blessings we alwayes have.

Secondly, Observe, The Lord who makes things to grow out of the earth, makes them wither.

He who giveth us the fruit of the ground, takes the fruit of the ground away: Mercies and Judgments come from the very same hand, and both from the hand of God; The Lord saith to the fields, encrease and multiply: His word, yea, his steps drop fatness. Where God walketh in mercy, every step he sets is a drop of fatness, and where he walks in anger, every step he sets is a drop of leanness; He that makes the fields flourish, makes them droop; he washeth away the things that grow out of the dust of the earth.

Thou destroyest the hope of man.

As if he had said, Thou who causest the mountains to fall, and rocks to consume; thou who causest stones to wear, and washest away the things that grow out of the earth, thou, even thou, destroyest the hope of man: that is, in destroying these things, thou destroyest the hope of man; or, as thou destroyest these strong, durable, and beautiful creatures, so the hope of man set upon any creature. The Hebrew particle (Vau) is often put as a note of likeness; And thou destroyest, is, so thou destroyest the hope of man.

But shall the hope of man be destroyed? What hope, and whose hope shall be destroyed? There is a hope of man, stronger than the mountains, and more durable than rocks or stones. Though these consume and come to nought, yet that shall not. The hope of the Saints endures for ever, and they shall never be ashamed of their hope: their hope is an Anchor, (so the Apostle calls it, Heb. 6.) sure and stedfast: and as the hope of the Saints is a sure anchor, so it is fastned by such a cable as will never crack, let the winds blow, and the waves rise as high as they will. The word of promise is the cable which holdeth this anchor, that word of promise is stronger than a threefold cord, and cannot at all be broken.

Again, as this anchor is strongly fastned above, so it is let down upon, and is fastned in a rock beneath. That anchor of hope will never drag which falls into Christ, the clifts of that rock hold it, and will not let it go. It is impossible to destroy such a hope as this: The hope of Saints shall indeed be destroyed, or perfected rather, by enjoyment; but it shall not be destroyed by disappointment. When we enjoy all things, what need we hope for any thing? Hope is swallowed up in fruition. Saints never lose their hope, till they have found all that they hoped for: If in this life only we had hope in Christ, we were of all men most miserable, 1 Cor. 15.19. We shall not hope any longer than we live here, but we have a hope of good beyond this life: our hope lasteth no longer than our lives, but the things we hope for, last longer than the mountains, yea, longer (as old Jacob speaks in his benediction upon Joseph) than the everlasting hills: our hope will last, that is, we have hope of that which will last as long as everlastingness.

Seeing then the hope of Saints is no perishing hope, whose hope doth Job mean, when he saith, Thou destroyest the hope of man?

He means the hope of vain men, or the vain hope of good men. God destroyeth all the hopes of vain men, and all the vain hopes of any man, such hopes as those proud men had after the floud shall be destroyed; who said, Go to, let us build us a city and tower whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the earth. (Gen. 11. 4.) God scatters their hopes, who by worldly power or policy, hope to secure themselves against scattering: a hope to get our selves a name, and so to fasten our selves upon earthly foundations, as never to be removed, shall surely be removed. The Psalmist discovered, that the inward thoughts of covetous men are, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations, (Psal. 49. 11.) this is their thought and hope: God destroyeth such hopes often, letting their houses fall to the ground, before themselves fall into the grave: or if their outward glory out-live them, yet their posterity shall out-live their glory; their sons shall either wantonly scatter what they have miserably gathered, and at last be eaten up with wants, or the wrath of God will scatter what the father gathered, and the son hath mind enough to keep. And as God destroyes the hope of covetous men, that their riches shall abide, so the hope of voluptuous men, that their pleasures shall be renewed: such a hope the Prophet Isaiah describes the idle, idoll shepherds full of; (Isa. 56.12.) when they say, Come ye, and I will fetch wine, and we will fill our selves with strong drink, and to morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant. The hoped for cup shall be pulled from their mouths, who do not drink for thirst, but thirst for a drinking.

Further, God destroyeth all their hopes, who hope in the arm of flesh. The Jews thought Egypt help enough against all enemies, even while they neglected to keep God their friend. But see how the Prophet reproves them, or befools them for it: Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way? As if he had said, When one worldly means fails thee, thy resort is to another: if Assyria help thee not, thou art confident that Egypt will, but thou shalt be ashamed of Egypt, as thou wast ashamed of Assyria. That is, these hopes shall fail thee, and thy expectations, they shall be frustrate in the one as well as in the other. For God hath rejected thy confidences, and thou shalt not prosper in them, (Jer. 2. 36,37.) Thus God destroyeth the hope of vain men, and not only so, but

He destroyeth also the vain hopes of good men ('tis possible for such to have vain hopes) hopes of long life, of prosperous dayes, of riches, and of great things for themselves: They sometimes project as vainly as the world, and joyn with those in action, from whom they are separated by profession. The Lord in mercy blasteth these hopes of good men, that they may be taught to fix their hopes on better things. He shews how weak and withering the creature ture is, though in their hands, that their hearts may be wholly set on him. We enjoy God most, when we hope least in man; and God doth therefore destroy the vain hopes of some men, that they may enjoy himself more. As all the hope of hypocrites shall be destroyed, so shall some hopes of those who are sincere.

Thou destroyest the hope of man; that is, in destroying those things upon which man hopes; thou destroyest the hope of man: the act or habit of hope is often put for the object of it. Man hopes in mountains material and metaphorical; he trusts in the rocks and stones of the earth? or in the things that grow out of the earth; riches and plenty. All these things are destroyable, and when these are destroyed, the hope of most men is destroyed: if the matter upon which our hopes are fixed be perishing, our hopes shall perish: We cannot raise a safe or a firm building upon a rotten or unsound foundation. Earthly things, the mountains of the earth cannot make a pillar to prop up the hope of man, when God will pull it down.

I have from former passages in this book, shewed, how great a possession hope is; and that even the light of Nature in some, hath preferred it before all their possessions. I have also shewed, that it is the last piece which man quits the possession of in his greatest extremities, and that when that's gone, all is gone. Man hath nothing more to be destroyed, when once his hope is destroyed: if our hope be prevailed over, we are prevailed over for ever: Jobs discourse leads us to this conclusion in the next verse.

Verse 20. Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth, thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away.

This verse explains the application of the similitude, when the Lord destroyeth the hope of man, he prevaileth against him for ever.

Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth.

תתקפהו prevalebis ei, Mont. fortior eo fuisti, Pagn.

Thou prevailest] The word is, thou waxest strong upon him, or, thou art stronger than he: all prevailing proceeds from greater strength, either of body or mind: equality makes no conquest. And though (as Hannah sings 1 Sam. 1, 9,) by strength shall no man prevail; yet the strength of God will prevail. The reason why no man prevails by strength is, because God alone hath more strength than all men put together, and because he hath, therefore he can prevail by his own strength over man, and that for ever.

Thou prevailest for ever against him] The word which we translate for ever, signifies also in the verb to prevail, to triumph, or to overcome; thou waxest strong over him triumphingly and victoriously; or, thou triumphest over him, and thou shalt always triumph over him. A triumph is the signal of perfect victory, and where victory is perfect, it is victory for ever: God prevails so over man, that he may triumph, and therefore he is rightly said to prevail triumphantly, or to prevail for ever.

Thou prevailest for ever; which may be understood two wayes.

First, That man is so prevailed upon, that he cannot repair himself again. If God break down, man cannot build up, and if he wound, man cannot heal: both breach and wound must continue for ever, unless the same hand that made them make them up again.

Secondly, That, how often soever God taketh man in hand, he is sure to carry the day against him; he prevaileth for ever. God is always armed with sufficient strength to subdue all strength unto himself. Nor can we surprize God, or come upon him, before he hath drawn out his strength, and made it ready. He must be a perpetual Victor or Triumpher who hath always strength enough to get the victory, and whose strength is always ready enough to go to battel. There was never any man always a conquerour, but God is. Men have been mighty conquerors, and have had conquerour justly affixed to their titles. Yet not one of these was always a conquerour, the best of men have been sometimes worsted, or could not prevail; Only God prevaileth ever. If he undertake a work or a design, whether for or against man, he will be sure to have his ends: for nothing can stand in his way. All that is in the way is of his own setting, and he is wiser than to set any thing in his way, which shall hinder him in the bringing about his own ends. What strength soever the creature hath, it hath from God, and surely he hath not given out more than he keeps to himself. He will not be mastered with his own gifts, nor make derivative power too strong for original power. Indeed all the power which God gives is weakness, and the wisdome folly, compared with that he keeps: and what is weakness to omnipotency? what is folly to wisdome? what is mortal and changeable, to eternal and unchangeable, that it should hinder its prevailing?

The vulgar reads differently, referring this act of prevailing, not to the strength of God prevailing over man, but to the bounty of God giving man strength to prevail: Thou hast strengthened him for a little while, that he might pass away for ever. As if God exalted man only to cast him down with a more fearful ruine: or, as if Job had said, Thou didst heretofore strengthen me, but now thou abatest my strength; I was once set up, but now thou tramplest me under foot. 'Tis, I grant, the design of God against his enemies, to advance them on purpose that he may overthrow them with greater advantage. Thus the Lord said of Pharaoh, for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee (Rom. 9. 17.) But God deals not thus with his own servants; for though he gives them strength, and then tries them, yet he never gives them strength that he may (with a greater reputation to his own strength) triumph over them. And therefore I lay this translation aside, and embrace our own, as cleareſt to the intendment of these similitudes: Thou prevailest for ever against him.

And he passeth.] That is, he dieth; so the word is used (chap. 10. 21.) death is our passage out of the world; we come in, and we pass out: man must pass when God giveth him a pass to travel out of the land of the living.

Thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away.

This change of his countenance is taken three wayes.

First, Some understand it of the habit of a dying or dead man: Death brings a change upon the whole man; especially upon the face or countenance: both the beauty and the feature of the face change at the appearance of death: fairness is then turned into paleness, sweetness into swarthiness. The nostrils are sharp, the eyes hollow, the ears are shrunk, and the jaws fallen: the dead man looks not like himself, not like the man he was, when he was healthy and alive. Physicians give us the description of that change, and teach us to spell the letters, and read the characters of death printed upon the face. Death sends its image as a harbinger to take up every room of our bodies, before it self comes to lodge in our bodies. Standers by may see death in their sick friends, long before their sick friends feel it. Hence observe, Nitidum & vividum vultum cum lurido & pallente commutat. Mere. In morte tota facies redditur sibi contraria. Acutus enim fit nasus, oculi cavi, tempora collapsa, aures contractæ, &c. ut docet Hipp. lib. prænot.

Death defaceth the beauty, and doth blast the comliness of man.

How much soever any glory in the beams of beauty now, sickness will shortly eclipse and death will totally darken it. Spiritual beauty will never change, but for the better: the countenance of the soul adorned with grace, changeth into glory, when a believer dies: Soul-beauty will be more beautiful, and attain its full perfection, when bodily beauty is none at all, but is turned into corruption: when the frame of nature is ruined in us, the frame of grace shall be compleated in us; And we shall be all glorious within, when there is no glory left without. Thou changest his countenance.

--Nulla non dies formosi spolium corporis abstulit. Sen. in Hypol.

Secondly, This change of the countenance is expounded not for that instantaneous change which death brings into the body, or not for that only, but for that continual change which man is subject to in his body while he lives: the countenance is put for the whole outward man. Death is our most remarkable change, but it is not at all our change: Every day carries away some spoils of beauty and strength from the strongest and most beautiful body. No day looketh upon us, or we upon it, with the same face.

Mihi frigeſte ſenſus, melius omnino hanc faciem interpretari poſſumus generalem ſuarum rerum ſtatum Bold.

Thirdly, Others take the countenance more largely, not for the face or whole body onely, but for the whole state of a man: it is usual to apply the word face or countenance to all changes: we say, there is a new face of things, or of affairs, affairs, when affairs whether personal or publick are much changed. As if he had said, Thou changest his whole state, and sendest him away: because all changes appear in the face, therefore in whatsoever our change is, 'tis said our face is changed.

Man hath one face in riches, another in poverty; one in honour, another in disgrace: The copy of a mans countenance changeth, not only as his body, but as his condition and relations change. You may see how it is with us in our faces; for, as our conditional countenance changeth, so doth our personal. 'Twas shewed at the second verse of this Chapter, that man continueth not in any condition alwayes the same; his natural, his civil, his spiritual estate, are liable unto changes: what they are, I refer the Reader back to the verse mentioned; Thou changest his countenance, Ablegas eum hinc non rediturum, velut extrudis & amandas eum ex hoc seculo prorsus.

And sendest him away. He said before, He passeth away; here he varies the phrase, Thou sendest him away, that is, he dieth, there's the end of all. Man hath many changes while he lives, and shortly he must change from life to death: the manner of expressing it is considerable.

Thou sendest him away. Man dieth by dispatch from God; God sends him a writ to die. Thou sendest him away. Death is mans dismission out of the world. The word imports a special direction. When Adam had sinned, the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken (Gen. 3. 23.) He bid Adam be gone out of the Garden, and he bids the sons of Adam be gone out of the world. Old Simeon said, Now let thy servant depart in peace; give me my dismission or my writ of ease. God sends wicked men away whether they will or no: Saints would be sent away and depart with leave. Wicked men are put out of the world, as the Leprous person was put out of the Camp of Israel, lest he should infect others. Godly men are sent out of the world, when they have done the errand they came about, for the good of others.

Verse 21. His sons come to honour, and he knows it not; they are brought low, and he perceiveth it not.

Cum multi fuerint filii ejus nescit sin autem pauci fuerint ignorat Sept.

His sons come to honour. Some refer it to number; his sons are multiplied: others, to riches; his sons get wealth; we, to greatness; his sons come to honour. Some are born to honour, and others come to it; some receive it from their parents, others get it by their atchievments; it runs to some in their blood, others rise to it by their virtue and worth, by their parts and abilities: 'Tis better to get honour, then to have honour, and to make our selves honourable, then to be made honourable. It is easie to inherit honour, but it is hard to attain honour. His sons come to honour;

And he knoweth it not. An act of knowledge is often put for an act of the affection: We are said not only not to know that which we are ignorant of, but that which we are regardless of, so here, he knows not when his sons come to honour, that is, he is not affected with it: Usually a parent knows nothing more then the preferment of his children, and he seldom studies any point more. Job describes a father ignorant or insensible of his sons preferment. And as he knows not the good which his sons come to, so not the evil which comes upon his sons, as he tells us in the next words.

And they are brought low, or diminished. They are diminished in number, but few are left; or they are made low and poor in state, there is but little left to them.

And he perceiveth it not. That is, He is not grieved at it. But who is this insensible ignorant father? or what is it that renders him thus ignorant and insensible of all the providences of God, whether good or bad, to his own bowels?

Some expound both clauses of a dead father; Thou sendest him away, he dies, and then his sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not, &c. A dead man hath no knowledge at all of what is done among the living: They that are out of the world, perceive not what is done in the world; no, not with those that are neareſt and deareſt to them, their own sons; and as they have no knowledge of, so no affections to the world; the dead neither rejoyce with, nor mourn over those that live. Solomon's description of an Atheist, and of his false conceits about death, may (though not in his sence) be applied for the illustrationn of this truth (Eccles. 9. 5, 6,) The living know they shall die. Atheists speak thus, not from a certainty of knowledge causing them to prepare for death, but from a careleſness mixed with their knowledge, causing them to slight death; they know they must die, and therefore care not though they die. Death (say they) befals all, and therefore should not trouble any. This is all the care they take about death, when they profess their knowledge of death. The living know they shall die, but the dead know not any thing. The Atheist speaks it downright, as if when a man dies, there were an end of him. He knows no more, that is (in their divinity) he is no more. But though the dead in Christ know many things, they know their own happiness and eternal life, and though the dead who die out of Christ, know many things, they know their own torment and misery, they know also the falseness of this opinion, that the dead know nothing; yet there is a truth in what they say, though not in what they mean: For the dead know not any thing of this present life, or of the things done here on earth. They know not any thing of these things, as knowing is taken for apprehending; and they know nothing of them, as knowing is taken for grieving at, or rejoycing in them; so the Preacher speaks at ver. 6. in the language of his Atheist still: Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy is now perished, and they have no more portion for ever in all that is done under the Sun. They therefore have no love nor hatred, nor envy about those things that are doing under the Sun, because they have no portion in all that is done under the Sun. When man dies, he hath a portion, but it doth not lie under the Sun. Wicked men have their portion with hypocrites and unbelievers: The godly have a portion with Christ and all the Saints in glory; as for earthly things, they are none of their portion, and therefore none of their care, and they have as little affection about them as they have use of them, their sons come to honour, and they rejoyce not; their sons are made low, and they grieve not. The Prophet Isaiah prayes earnestly (chap. 63. 16.) Look down (O Lord) from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory, where is thy zeal and thy strength, the sounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies towards me? Are they restrained? Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not; that is, as some expound the place to the point in hand; though Abraham and Israel our forefathers are so far from being able to relieve and deliver us out of our troubles, that they are utterly unacquainted with them; yet we are assured thou knowest what our troubles are, and art able to relieve us. Though Abraham and Israel our deceased forefathers have no zeal, nor any sounding of bowels, that is, pity and compassion towards us their bowels, though they are not grieved because we are made low, yet Lord, thou livest for ever, and so do thy zeal and compassions to thy people; therefore look down from heaven and help us. There is another exposition of the Prophet, which gives the sence as a prevention of an objection against the former petition; why should you expect to be heard though you are the children of Abraham and Israel, when your walk is so unanswerable to that of Abraham and Israel, that if they were alive again here upon the earth, they would not own or acknowledge you as their children? To this the Prophet is conceived to answer, let it be granted or confessed that we are a people so degenerate, that even our forefathers, if they were sent among us from the dead, would not own us for their children, let it be granted that we are unworthy in our selves to be counted Abraham's children; yet through thy free grace, we may be numbred among thy children. Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us. Thy love changes not, though the love of men doth; thou wilt not cast us off, though Abraham do: This is a very spiritual interpretation, nor is it inconsistent with the former; we may joyn both together thus, If Abraham were alive, he (possibly) would neither own nor help us, we are so sinful; but Abraham is dead, and doth not so much as know that we want help; therefore Lord, look down from heaven, and help us thy self; Abraham's bowels are not moved towards his sons, O let not thine be restrained!

Let this admonish parents who take inordinate and immoderate care, by right or wrong to advance their chilchildren: Some live miſerably, that their children may flouriſh; yea, not a few have deſtroyed their own ſouls, that their children might be great and rich when they are dead; what a pitiful deſign is this! Thou ſhalt not rejoyce in the grave that thy ſon is rich, neither ſhalt thou grieve for thy ſon that he is poor, when thou ceaſeſt to be among men; for as thy knowledge is periſhed, ſo thy love, thy envy, thy ſorrow are periſhed as to the creature here below. A ſons preferment is nothing to the deceaſed father; therefore let not fathers venture their Conſciences, and hazard their ſouls to prefer their children: be not anxiouſly afraid, that when you are dead, your children may be poor, this trouble will never come near your heart when you are dead. God promiſed Joſiah (2 Kings 22. 20.) I will gather thee unto thy Fathers, and thou ſhalt be gathered into thy grave in peace, and thine eyes ſhall not ſee all (that is, not any of) the evil which I will bring upon this place: As if he had ſaid, I am reſolved as I have decreed, to bring evil upon this place; but it ſhall be no grief to thee; for thou ſhalt firſt be taken out of this place. And when the Prophet Iſaiah brought Hezekiah a ſad meſſage, Behold the dayes come that all that is in thy houſe, and all that thy fathers have laid up in ſtore until this day, ſhall be carried to Babylon; and of thy ſons that ſhall iſſue from thee, which thou ſhalt beget, ſhall they take away, and they ſhall be Eunuchs in the palace of the King of Babylon (Iſa. 39. 6, 7.) Then ſaid Hezekiah to Iſaiah, good is the word of the Lord which thou haſt ſpoken; he ſaid moreover, for there ſhall be peace and truth in my dayes: He ſpeaks not ſlightingly of the evil to come; Hezekiah was far from the ſpirit of that Roman Emperor who ſaid, When I am once dead, let heaven and earth mingle, what care I what becomes of the world when I am once out of it: Hezekiah was not a man of this temper; yet it was ſome abatement of thoſe evils to him, that they ſhould not come till he was paſt feeling them, or being ſenſible of them. The reaſon which the Prophet gives, why God takes good men out of the world ſometimes, is, becauſe he knows a ſtorm is coming, and he would not have them overtaken with it, and therefore he houſes them before it come (Iſa. 57. 1, 2.) The righteous periſheth, and no man layeth it to heart; and merciful men are taken away, none conſidering that the righteous is taken away from the evil to come. The evil to come is no hurt to them when they are gone. This is Gods deſign, though few conſider it: And as they who are taken away, have no feeling of the evils to come, ſo no fellow-feeling; there is no ſympathy in heaven: Saints are not troubled there at the troubles of any here on earth. It is a grace while we are here troubled at the troubles of others; and it is our priviledge, that in heaven we ſhall not. The Author to the Hebrews exhorts us, to remember thoſe that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them that ſuffer adverſity, as being our ſelves in the body (Heb. 13. 2.) 'Tis our being in the body which makes it either a duty or poſſibility for us to partake in the ſufferings of other men.

Me mortuo miſceatur igne terra. Calig.

We may hence confute the Popiſh Doctrine and Practice of praying to Saints departed. When they are ſent away, they know neither our ſpiritual nor our temporal eſtate, why then ſhould we pray to them about either? The Saints cannot ſee from heaven to earth, nor can they hear from heaven to earth; 'tis God, whoſe name is the God hearing prayers, and therefore to him ſhall all fleſh come; if all fleſh are obliged to come to him, where is our warrant to come to Saints departed? And if we do, where is our hope to receive their help, when they are ignorant that we want help? Though we are made low, they perceive it not.

A ſecond interpretation tells us, that Job ſpeaks not here of a man in the ſtate of death, but of a man about to die, or upon his death-bed: ſuch a mans ſons come to honour, and he knoweth it not; and then we muſt expound knowing in the ſecond ſence, for regarding or being affected with what we know. Great perſonal afflictions make us forget all worldly relations, together with the comforts and ſorrows which attend them. A ſick man, eſpecially a dying man, takes no pleaſure in his life, and is uſually ſo buſied with his own pains, that he takes little or no notice of the pain or pleaſure of others. A man in ſuch a condition, can hardly be perſwaded to take in ſpiritual comforts, or to refreſh his ſoul with a taſte of that ſweet wine, with a morſel of that marrow and fatneſs which the promiſes of eternal life preſent unto him, much leſs can he delight himſelf in ſenſitive, leaſt of all, in ſenſual objects. Come, and tell him his ſons are advanced, and his eſtate thrives, he regards it not; alas (ſaith he) I am going out of the world, what's all this to me? Mr. Broughton's tranſlation anſwers this ſence with much clearneſs: Only his fleſh is grieved for it ſelf, and his ſoul will mourn for himſelf; as if he had ſaid, his own grief will ſpend out all his poſſibilities of grieving, he will have none in ſtore to beſtow elſewhere: Our ſons are our own fleſh and blood, and if any thing would affect a man, it would be to hear of his ſons; and if any thing concerning his ſons would affect him, to hear of their welfare or affliction, would. How do parents rejoyce when their ſons come to honour? how are they afflicted, when their ſons are made low? As our ſons are our own, ſo we reckon upon their good or evil, upon all the occaſions of their joy or ſorrow, as our own. Our children are our ſelves multiplied, and (in a ſence) immortaliz'd; and love to our children, is but one degree in nature removed from that of our ſelves: Yet a time is coming, when our ſons and our daughters, about whom we have had ſo many joyes and ſorrows, for whom we have laid out ſo many thoughts and cares, even theſe ſhall not have either our joy or ſorrow, our thought or care. It was an argument of the wonderful love of Chriſt, as ſome of the Ancients obſerve upon this place, that when he was nail'd to the Croſs, ready to die; he (as it were) forgot his own ſorrows and grievous ſufferings, and remembred his relations (John. 19. 25.) He ſaid to his Mother, Woman, behold thy ſon; and to the Diſciple, behold thy mother. Now was Simeon's propheſie fulfilled upon the bleſſed Virgin, Yea, a ſword ſhall pierce through thy own ſoul alſo, Luke 2. 35. And therefore Chriſt applies theſe comfortable words, as a ſalve to her wounds, even while his own were bleeding unto death: Woman, behold thy ſon; Diſciple, behold thy mother. He calls her woman, and not mother, not as unwilling to own her for his mother; but either as fearing that ſuch an owning her, might have created her further trouble; or, as ſhewing that being ready to die, and return to his father in heaven, he was above earthly relations, and knew none after the fleſh, no not his own mother. And yet though he was not only above, but leaving his mother, he leaves her to the care of his beloved Diſciple. And that remembrance which Chriſt at his death expreſſed to his mother, in committing her to a diſciple, the ſame he had expreſſed a little before to all his Diſciples; yea, and to all believers, both in committing them to his father when he was gone, and by telling them that he was but gone (as a harbinger) to take up lodgings, and prepare a place for them; aſſuring them alſo, that in his abſence he would ſend the Spirit, who ſhould (with advantage to them) make up the want of his bodily preſence. And laſtly, that himſelf intended to return to them again; he would now ſend one to them, but hereafter he would not ſend a meſſenger for them, but come himſelf, that where he ſhould be, there they might be alſo. Was not the love of Chriſt to his children, ſtronger then death, when he thus remembred and took care of them, both in the approaches and agonies of death? Earthly parents may neglect both the wo and welfare of their children, but Chriſt will not; ſurely he will not do it now, when his fleſh upon him is cloathed with glory, and his ſoul within him is filled with joy; for he did not when his fleſh upon him was full of pain, and his ſoul within him did mourn; which is the reaſon or excuſe rather which Job gives in the next verſe, why earthly fathers do not ſometimes know their own ſons either in honour or diſgrace.

Verſe 22. But his fleſh upon him ſhall have pain, and his ſoul within him ſhall mourn.

They who expound the former verſe of man in the ſtate of death, give the ſame expoſition of this, his fleſh upon him ſhall have pain, and his ſoul within him ſhall mourn, when he is dead. But hath a dead man pain? or can he mourn? Death is a total privation of all ſenſitive powers, there's no feeling in the grave. The meaning is this, he is afflicted while he lives at the thought of what he ſhall be when he is dead; he grieves that worms ſhould eat him, and that his fleſh ſhould corrupt and rot in the earth. What Job ſpeaks (chap. 21. 23.) in direct oppoſition to this point, is yet a clear proof of this interpretation: He ſhall be brought to the grave, and remain in the tomb, the clods of the valley ſhall be ſweet to him: Now in the ſame ſence that the clods of the valley are sweet to some dead men, they may be said to be painful unto others. Some are very desirous to die; to such the clods of the valley are sweet, that is, it pleaseth them as much to lie in the grave, as to go to a perfumed bed, or to rest upon a bed of Roses: Others are very unwilling to die, to such the grave is a prison of darkness and astonishment. Their living flesh hath pain upon them, while they consider that their dead flesh must consume. Or pain and mourning are here ascribed to dead men, as speech and joy are often in Scripture ascribed to Trees and Stones, and Corn-fields (liveless, insensible or irrational creatures personating or taking upon them those actions which are proper unto man) by the Figure Prosopopeia.

Secondly, The Text may be rendred out of the Hebrew thus, While his flesh is upon him, he shall have pain; and while his soul is within him, he shall mourn; that is, he shall be in pain and misery as long as he lives, especially while he lives (as a sick man doth) upon the borders and confines of death. The life of man, while he lives in health, is painful; but when upon sick and dying, he is fuller of pain. Then his flesh he is him hath pain, and his soul within mourns; he hath sorrow without, and sorrow within; which comprehends all sorts of sorrow: when the flesh is pained, and the soul mourns, what can be added to that pain and mourning? If the spirit be whole, it will sustain the infirmities of the body; if the body be whole, it will somewhat allay the infirmities of the mind; but when the flesh is in pain, and the soul mourns, natural misery is compleat; for then all man is in misery. Flesh and spirit, body and soul, are all of man. And in all this Job doth not speak his speculation, but his experience; he felt what he said, and endured himself what he delivered unto others.

A verme super eo dolebit. Targ.

I might here draw out observations about the troubles of mans life, and the quickness of his sorrows in the approaches of death: but these points have occurred before, and therefore I shall not renew any discourse upon them in this place.

Thus I have (through the continued help of Christ) finished the Commentary of this fourteenth Chapter, and of Job's whole Answer to the Charge of Zophar, the last of his three Friends; and so of the whole first Charge of his three Friends, and of his Answers to all three. It seems they were all unsatisfied in his Answers, as much as they were about his person; and therefore they begin in order as they began. Eliphaz leads the Battel a second time, and that more fiercely then before; he falls upon Job, not so much with stronger arguments, as with harder words; rather reproving, then arguing with him, and reproving him with much heat, if not with some bitterness of spirit; as will appear (if the hand of God shall lead us yet further) in publishing the explication of that his second congress.

AN

WITH

Practical Obſervations

UPON THE

FIFTEENTH, SIXTEENTH

AND SEVENTEENTH CHAPTERS

Of the Book of JOB.

TO THE

CHRISTIAN READER:

To those especially of this CITY, who have been the MOVERS, and continue the PROMOTERS of this WORK.

SOLOMON, who made many Books, tells us (towards the end of one of them, Eccl. 12. 12.) That, of making many Books there is no end; and, that much study is a wearineſs to the fleſh. But, while Solomon ſpeaks thus, doth he not at once blot thoſe many Books which himſelf had written, and diſcourage others from writing any more? Though ſtudy be a wearineſs to the fleſh, yet ('tis granted) that's no ſufficient reaſon why we ſhould deſiſt (the fleſh muſt be wearied and hard wrought, 'tis good it ſhould be ſo) but there's no colour of reaſon, why we ſhould begin that, which either cannot be finiſhed and brought to an end, or which is to no end, when 'tis brought to an end and finiſhed. How then ſaith Solomon, that of making many Books there is no end? His ſcope clears this ſcruple; for, having read his Son a Lecture upon the vanity of the Creature, and having given him many excellent advices, for the due ſteering of his courſe through this world, he applies all in the former part of this Verſe. And further, by theſe, my Son, be admoniſhed. Let what is now written take upon thy heart, and be accepted with thee. For (verſ. 10.) The Preacher ſought to find out acceptable words, and that which was written was upright, even words of truth. Again (verſ. 11.) The Words of the wiſe are as Goads and Nayles faſtned by the Maſters of Aſſemblies, which are given from one ſhepherd: Therefore, let theſe words, like goads, put thee on, and like nayles, faſten thee to the obedience of my counſels. By theſe, my ſon, be admoniſhed: As if he had ſaid, Let not this Book, which diſcovers the vanity of all worldly things, be accounted vain: If this Book prevail not with thee, if it maſter not thy judgment, and mannage not thy affections, 'tis to no end for me to make many Books; ſeeing this is cloathed with as much compleatneſs of rule to direct, as a Book of this Argument, can be; and is ſtampt with as much ſtrength of authority to command, as any Book, of any Argument, can be: And further, why ſhouldeſt thou my ſon, put me to the making of many Books? What if I could make many with as much eaſe to my own ſpirit, as I have made this one, which was given me in immediately by the Spirit; yet thou canſt not ſtudy (or, as we put in the Margin, read) many Books without wearineſs to the fleſh.

So then, though Solomon might have had juſt ground to put the affectation both of writing and reading many Books, upon the file of his obſerved vanities; yet he doth not diſoblige from the ſtudy of neceſſary and ſerious Books; nor at all condemn thoſe many Monuments of profitable Learning, which induſtrious Pens have in any Age bequeathed to Poſterity. He indeed (which is yet but a ſecond deſign, if it be at all the deſign of that place) takes us off from vain ſtudies, and cenſures thoſe Books (be they few as well as many) which have no tendency to make any man, either the wiſer, or the better by reading them. Nor can thoſe Books, how many ſoever they are, be (to their diſparagement) called Many, which center in, and promote (what is but one in every kind) any kind of truth, chiefly that which we call divine or holy Truth. Any one uſeleſs, or erroneous Book is too many: Many uſeful and Orthodox Books are but One. The five Books of Moſes are but One Law. The four Books of the Birth, Life and Death of our bleſſed Redeemer Jeſus Chriſt, are but One Gospel: All the Books of both Testaments are but One Book. Upon which account, we may also say, that, all those many and many Books which faithfully interpret that one Book, are but one Book. And though of making many such Books, there should (as I conceive there will) be no end till this World ends, as End is taken for ceasing to make them; yet of making many such Books, there is an end; yea, many noble ends, as End is taken for the good or benefit which comes by making them. The making of such Books is good, and a benefit to the Reader, as communicating to him those manifestations of the Spirit which are given to every man (to whom they are given) to profit withal: The word (τὸ συμφέρον) there used by the Apostle, signifies such a profit as streameth out to community. The making of such Books is also good, and a benefit to the Maker, as being an improvement of his Time and Talents, to his own peace and his Masters glory. 'Tis reward beyond all the world can give, for any Work, that God hath glory, and man peace, in doing it. As this small piece of work is directed to these last mentioned ends, and (as it ought) principally to the first of them; so, that it may reach the former, by adding a Mite or two to the Treasury of the Readers knowledge in the best things, and by being his encouragement to walk in the best wayes, is the Hope and Prayer, and the reaching of it, will be indeed a very rich reward and payment of

Servant in this Work of the Lord,

AN

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Obſervations UPON THE FIFTEENTH, SIXTEENTH, AND SEVENTEENTH CHAPTERS Of the Book of JOB.

CHAP. XV. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Then anſwered Eliphaz the Temanite, and ſaid,

Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge? And fill his belly with the East-wind?

Should he reaſon with unprofitable talk? Or with ſpeeches wherewith he can do no good?

Yea, thou caſteſt off fear, and reſtraineſt prayer before God.

For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou chuſeſt the tongue of the crafty.

Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I: Yea, thine own lips teſtifie againſt thee.

WE are come to the ſecond Section of this great diſpute, between Job and his three Friends: they have all ſpoken one turn, and now they return to ſpeak: Eliphaz, who led the firſt charge, leads the ſecond, and that with a very violent march, againſt this ſorrowful man. Yet we are not to conceive Eliphaz upon any deſign to revile his perſon, or to vex his ſpirit: That were moſt unſuteable in any Friend, much more (ſuch we ſuppoſe Eliphaz to have been) in a godly friend: Charity ſuggeſts a fairer interpretation of this procedure, that he ſpake thus harſhly, and dealt thus roughly, being moved by ſome unwary paſſages in Job's diſcourſe, not well underſtood or miſapplyed. At which ſtone how many ſtumble at this day! Firſt, Miſconceiving, and then cenſuring their Brethren; being firſt offended without any juſt cauſe given, and then giving juſt cauſe of offence. Had we once learned to expound each others actions, ſpeeches, and opinions, by the rules of Charity, we ſhould not ſo often, no nor at all break the Laws of Love. We ſhall make a good improvement of this failing in Job's Friend, if it may be our warning (in dealing) to deal better with our Friends.

Non malidicendi ſtudio ferebatur, quod à bono viro prorſus alienum eſſet. Pined.

There are three parts in this ſpeech; in the firſt Eliphaz appears by way of reproof, and reprehenſion, which extends it ſelf from the beginning of the Chapter, to the end of the thirteenth Verſe; and he reproves Job upon five points of error, or misbehaviour, of all which he conceived him guilty.

First, He reproves him of folly, or for speaking that which was unworthy a wise man, in the second and third Verses, Should a wise man utter vain knowledge? &c.

Secondly, He reproves him of prophaneness, or for doing that which was unworthy a godly man, at the fourth Verse, Yea, thou castest off fear, and restrainest prayer before God. The sum of both is, Thou speakest unwisely, and thou actest wickedly: Which he takes for so plain a charge, that he makes him his own Accuser, as if there needed no evidence but his Conscience, though he had (as Eliphaz misjudged) daubed up the matter with fair words, and colourable pretences (ver. 5.6.) Thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity: Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I: yea, thine own lips testifie against thee.

Thirdly, He reproves him of pride, and arrogance, of self-conceit, and overweening his own parts, and positions (ver. 7.8,9,10.) Art thou the first man that was born, or wast thou made before the hills, &c. As if he had said, Thou carryest it, as if thou hadst engrossed all wisdom, as if thou hadst more knowledge and understanding, more learning and experience, then any man; yea, then all men living.

Fourthly, He reproves him, for slighting and undervaluing the counsels and the comforts tendered to him by his Friends, at Vers. 11. Are the consolations of God small with thee?

Fifthly, He reproves him for his confident sticking, or adhering to his own principles, at the twelve and thirteen Verses, Why doth thy heart carry thee away, &c. Thus he repoves his morals in the first part of his discourse,

In the second, he confutes his Doctrinals, or that which he supposed Job had asserted; sc. His own purity and perfections (Vers. 14, 15, 16.) What is man that he should be clean? Behold he putteth no trust in his Saints, &c.

Eliphaz asseruisset tantum malos hic à Domino affligi, idem ille nunc sed apertius ostendit. Merc.

In the third place, he labours to maintain his own Assertion, that God doth afflict none but wicked men, Who ever perished being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off? Chap. 4.7. This he doth by the authority of the Learned, and from the experiences of the Ancient, ver. 7. to the end of the Chapter: I will shew thee, hear me, and that which I have seen I will declare; which wise men have told from their Fathers, and have not hid it, &c. These are the parts, and this is the resolution of the whole Chapter.

Verse. 1. Then answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said.

ὑπολαβὼν excipiens. Sept. Quilibet pro suis sociis velut in solidum respondet, ut nunc patet. Sopharis enim defensionem contra Jobum manifeste assumit Eliphaz. Bold.

Then; That is, when Job had made an end of answering Zophar, then Eliphaz answered or replyed upon Job. That's properly a replication, which takes off the answer given to a former Argument; and in this Eliphaz also makes a defence for his Brethren, Zophar and Bildad. These three stood to one another, as much as any one of them did for himself; as if they had all entred Bond, and given security for reciprocal assistance. Thus the dispute grows hot, but still 'tis orderly, according to that Apostolical Canon, (1 Cor. 14.29.) Let the Prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge. Eliphaz is now up, let us consider what he saith.

Verse 2. Should a wise man utter vain knowledge?

The Question denyes; he should not: No man should; least of all he.

The Wise man is here opposed to the crafty man, at the fifth Verse. There is a wide difference between wisdom and craft, between prudence and cunning: A crafty man knoweth what is good, but he commonly doth what is evil; he is able to see the right, but if it be not for his turn, he turns from it, and cares not to do wrong. A wise man is he that knoweth how to distinguish between good and evil, and ever aims to act what is good; his understanding is well enlightned, and his conscience binds him to follow the light of his understanding; as he can see what is just and right, so he cannot but embrace and do it. A wise man, in Scripture-language, is a holy man, and a fool is a wicked man; holiness is the best wisdom, and wickedness is the worst of folly. Eliphaz seems to admit Job's challenge of being a wise man, that he might check him with more advantage for speaking so unlike one: As if he had said, Should a moral wise man, much more a spiritual wise man; should he that is, or pretends to be thus wise (as thou dost, should he) utter vain knowledge?

Job at the twelfth Chapter of this Book, ver. 2,3,4. objected ignorance, or but popular knowledge to his Friends; I have understanding as well as you; I am not inferiour to you; who knoweth not such things as these? As if he had said, You think your selves among knowing men, the highest in knowledge; but who knoweth not such things as these? Eliphaz turns it here upon Job, by the way of recrimination or counter-charge, he brings in a cross Bill: Should a wise man utter vain knowledge? Thou dost arrogate to thy self the reputation of a wise man; but art thou wise, who speakest at such a rate of folly? The image of thy mind is stampt upon thy words, it may be seen as well as heard what thou art, by what thou speakest.

רעת רוח Scientiam venti vel ventosam, i. e. vanam. Numquid sapiens respondebit scientiam venti, vel scientiam ventosam. Merc. Numquid sapiens respondebit quasi in ventum loquens. Vulg.

Vain knowledge. The letter of the Hebrew is, Knowledge of wind, or windy knowledge: The Metaphor is elegant; vain knowledge is justly called windy knowledge: Vain knowledge makes a great bluster, and noise, like the wind, but it passeth away, and though we cannot tell whither it goes, yet we may easily tell whence it comes, even from the fancy, and out of the mouth of a foolish man. It was usual of old, to call that which is vain, windy; those despisers of holy Counsels, and Divine Alarms, given by the Prophets, said, The Prophets shall become wind, and the word is not in them, Jer. 5.13, That is, both the Doctrine and the threats which these Propphets utter, are vain and ineffectual; they will do us neither good nor evil; no mans finger shall ake, though their tongues ake with talking.

The Prophet Hosea at once reproves and terrifies the Jews in this language, They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind (Hos. 8.7.) To sow the wind, is to do a vain thing; our actions are as seed; such as we sow, such shall we reap; they sowed sin, and they reaped trouble. Themselves sowed the wind by what they did; and they thought the Prophets sowed the wind in what they spake: And indeed the words of the Prophets were wind, as the peoples works were, in referenee to the issue; those produced a whirlwind to scatter their contemners, as these did to scatter their actors. The old Satyrist calls vain words, bubly toyes, because such words are like a bubble, full of wind (possibly full of wit) but empty of wisdom and good instruction.

Bullatas nugas utpote similes bullis vento plenis, Pers. Sat. 5.

Should a wise man utter vain knowledge? The Scripture calls that vain:

First, Which is unprofitable, these mutually expound each other, Eccles. 1.2, 3.) Vanity of vanity, saith the Preacher, &c. What profit hath a man of all the labour which he taketh under the Sun. There's most vanity, where there is least profit; and where there is no profit at all, there is nothing at all but vanity. Turn not aside from following the Lord (saith Samuel) for then should you go after vain things which cannot profit. 1 Sam. 12.20,21.

Secondly, The Scripture calls that and those vain, which hath or have no solidity in them; vanity hath so little weight in it, that when the Spirit would express men who have no weight in them, he saith, They are lighter then vanity, Psal. 62.9.

Thirdly, The Scripture calls that vain which is alwayes moving, varying, and unsetled; (Psal. 144.4.) Man is like to vanity, his dayes are as a shadow that passeth away: He is therefore like to vanity, because he is so like a shadow, continually passing, but never continuing.

Fourthly, The Scripture often calls that vain which is sinful in practice, or unsound and erroneous in opinion; I hate vain inventions (saith David) but thy Law do I love. Whatsoever opposes either truth of Doctrine, or purity of Worship, is a vain invention of man, and opposite to the Law of God; he utters vain knowledge, who utters false Principles which subvert the Faith, or superstitious forms which endanger the life and power of godliness. Eliphaz supposed, that somewhat of vanity in all these notions, was rallyed together into the discourse of Job, that it was light and frothy, that it was erroneous and full of incongruity, especially (which carries all these in it) that it was worthless and unprofitable to the receiver, as he expresseth in the third Verse, Should he reason with unprofitable talk?

Should a wise man utter vain knowledge?

Hence

Hence Observe, There is a vanity in some kind of knowledge, and folly in that which not a few call wisdom.

It hath been the business of some mens knowledge, to find out a vanity in all sorts of knowledge. Eliphaz spake well for the matter, though ill to the man. Job did not utter vain knowledge; but, we know, too many do. The old Gentiles waxed vain in their imaginations, their very reasonings were vain; so the Original word tells us: It was not their fancy, but their understanding which was vain. The Apostle cautions the Colossians, Let no man spoil you through Philosophy and vain deceit (Col. 2. 8.) Philosophy in it self is an excellent knowledge, yet it may be vainly taught, and so deceive us, as to spoil us: I may say also, let no man spoil you through Divinity and vain deceit. Divinity, which is in it self the most excellent knowledge, the knowledge of God, may be vainly taught, and so deceive us, as to spoil us: That knowledge which is best in it self, is vainest to us, when it is unduly or falsly uttered.

ἐν τοῖς διαλογισμοῖς αὐτῶν, vani facti sunt in ratiocinationibus suis. Baz.

Secondly, Observe, It is most uncomely for those, who either have, or would have the reputation of wisdom, to speak vainly.

Should a wise man utter vain knowledge? 'Tis no wonder to hear a vain man speak vainly, and for a fool to utter folly. Do men gather Grapes of Thorns, or Figs of Thistles? The vile person will speak villany, and his heart will work iniquity, to practice hypocrisie, and to utter error against the Lord (Isa. 32. 6.) If a fool, a vain man, or a vile person, speak thus, he speaks like himself; but if a wise, or a good man speak thus, he speaks so unlike himself, that the Chaldee Paraphrase puts not only an undecency, but an impossibility upon it, Can a wise man utter vain knowledge? It is impossible. Men act according to their principles; Every thing is in working, as it is in being: If there be wisdom in the heart, it will be heard at the tongue: A wholsome Fountain will send out wholsome waters: He that is born of God (saith the Apostle John, 1 Epist. 3. 9.) cannot sin; though he hath not a natural impossibility to sin, yet he hath a moral impossibility to sin, because the seed of God remaineth in him, the frame and bent of his heart is set another way: Now, as there is a moral impossibility, that a godly man should commit sin, so that a wise man should speak sin, or utter vain knowledge. A wise man speaks, as well as acts, by measure; he weighs what he saith, as much as what he doth; the tongue of the wise is as a Tree of life: Grace in the heart blossoms at the lips, in savory words, which minister grace unto the hearers. Should a wise man utter vain knowledge?

And fill his belly with the East-wind?

A belly full of windy meat is bad enough; a belly full of wind is far worse: But what is here meant by the belly? what by the East-wind?

Venter pro corde, cor pro intellectu & mente accipitur in Scriptura.

The belly is put for the heart and affections, together with all the intellectual powers of the mind, John 7. 38. Out of his belly (that is, out of his whole soul) shall flow Rivers of living water. This water is the holy Spirit; the holy Spirit is sometimes compared also to the wind. A wise man should desire that his heart may be filled, with the sweet gales and holy breathings of the Spirit of God, by heavenly inspirations: And shall he fill his heart with the East-wind of earthly passions?

The word which we translate East-wind, signifies only the East; Should he fill his belly with the East; we rightly add the East-wind: He compares Job's passions unto the wind, and unto the East-wind: To the wind, because of the vanity of them; to the East-wind, because of the hurtfulness of them. For, as by wind in the former clause he means worthless things, so by East-wind in this he means dangerous things. There are two Reasons why he expresses such inward motions by the East-wind.

Poetæ Eurum Appellant truculentum, rapidum, animosum, tumidum & indomitum. Ardore. Sub calidi & æstuantis aeris similitudine sermones ejus exasperatos & excandescentia plenos describit.

First, The East-wind is a vehement and strong wind; we read Exod. 14. 21. that when God divided the Red Sea, to make a passage for his people, he caused an East-wind to blow all night, and divided the Sea with the force of it. Poets describe the East-wind to be fierce, heady, turbulent, and impetuous; that's one ground of it.

Secondly, The East-wind is observed by Naturalists to be a hot and fiery wind: Hence the Vulgar translates, Thou fillest thy belly with heat: The East-wind parcheth and blasteth Corn and Fruits. Pharaoh beheld in his Dream seven Ears withered, thin, and blasted with the East-wind (Gen. 41. 23.) So then, under this notion of the East-wind, Eliphaz closely censures Job: First, That his thoughts were violent, and impetuous: Secondly, That they were angry, fiery and furious; as if coals were kindled in his bosom, and a flame ready to blaze at his lips: As if like Paul, while Saul (Acts 9. 1.) he breathed out threatnings and slaughter, or was inwardly heated with resolutions of revenge. The Prophet Jeremy saith, The Word of God was as a fire in his bosome, and he could not refrain: Many a mans breast is like a heated Oven, he is ready to consume all with the breath of it.

Jobo attribuit vanitatem in sententia, tempestatem in affectu, imbecillitatem in argumento, superfluitatem in verbis. Coc.

But why doth Eliphaz charge Job with such unruly perturbations? Some assign the reason from those words, Chap. 14. v. 14. where he desires that God would even hide him in the grave; he was so vext and troubled at the state wherein he lived, that he preferred death before it, and thought a not being in the world, better then a being in his condition. But we may rather leave the reason more at large, to all that vehemency of spirit, with which Job had prosecuted and pleaded his sorrowful case.

From the scope of Eliphaz in this part of his reproof, we may observe:

First, That violent passions are the disguise of a wise man.

We cannot see who he is, while he acts unlike himself: Anger lodgeth in the bosom of fools; and when it doth but intrude into the bosom of a wise man, he (for the time) looks like a fool.

Secondly, Passions in the mind are like a tempest in the air they disturb others much, but our selves more.

Many a man (like a Ship at Sea) hath been overset and sunk with the violent gusts and whirl-winds of his own spirit.

Observe thirdly, He that fills his own mind with passionate thoughts, will soon fill the ears of others with unprofitable words.

This is clear from that which goeth before, He utters vain knowledge; and it is clearer from that which follows after; when a mans thoughts are like a wind, his words (which are the first born of his thoughts) must needs be windy. A passionate man speaks all in passion, and sometimes cannot speak at all for passion; his extream desire to say much stops him from saying any thing: But whatsoever he saith, is the copy of his present self, fierce and boysterous. The image and superscription of our hearts is stamped upon our words. Some can speak better then they are; but usually men speak according to what they are, and then especially when they are (which passionate men for the most part are) not themselves. Thus it follows in the next Verse.

Verse 3. Should he reason with unprofitable talk?

Eliphaz speaks all Interrogatories; and these speak him in anger, if not in some distemper. Should he do this? and should he do that? do shew that either another hath very much done, what he should not; or that he who reproves him hath not such a spirit of meekness, as a reprover should, Gal. 6. 1.

The words shew the effect of what he taxed him with before: As if he had said, Would you know what to expect from a passionate man, from a man whose belly is filled with the East-wind? You shall have him shortly filling your eares with an East-wind, even reasoning with unprofitable words: And (as the next clause gives it, which is only an exposition of this) With speeches wherewith he can do no good: Some words are great doers, they do much hurt, or they do much good; and those words usually do some hurt, which can do no good; yea, that which is weak and unable to do good, may be strong and powerful to do evil. However, not to do good is to do evil, because it is every mans duty, whatsoever he doth, to be doing good: Here Eliphaz reproves Job's words as evil, while he only saith, they do no good. And yet he saith somewhat more then that, for he saith, They can do no good: It is ill not to do good actually; but not to have a possibility of doing good is far worse, When the Apostle would say his worst of the best of mans sinful flesh, he doth not only say, It is not subject to the Law of God, but adds, Neither indeed can be (Romans 8. 7.) So here, Words wherewith a man can do no good; How bad are they?

Hence Observe, First, That which can do no good should not be spoken.

Cui bono

Before we speak a word, we should ask this question, To what purpose, to what profit is it? Shall he that hears it be made more knowing, or more holy by it?

Observe Secondly, Unprofitable talk is sinful; and speeches which do no good, are evil.

Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment, Matth. 12. 37. And though a man be very busie, and take much pains in speaking, yet if his words be unprofitable, and his speeches such as can do no good, they will come under account as idle. Now, if unprofitable talk be sinful, and speeches that can do no good; then what is prophane talk, and speeches which do hurt, (infection gets quickly in at the ear) defiling the mind and corrupting the manners of those that hear them. The Apostle gives us the rule of speaking, both in the negative and in the affirmative (Ephes. 4. 29.) Let no corrupt communications proceed out of your mouths, but that which is good to the use of edifying, which may administer grace to the hearer. Again, (Coloss. 4. 6.) Let your speeches be alwayes with grace; that is, such as testifieth that there is grace in your heart, never speak a word but such as may stand with grace; yea, speak such words as may be a witness of grace, wrought in your selves, and a means of working grace in others. Let your words be seasoned with salt; the salt of our words is holiness and truth; prudence also is the salt of words; good words, and true, spoken unseasonably, may do hurt: Prudence teaches us the time when, and the manner how to answer every man.

Thirdly, Observe, It is matter of just reproof against every man, to be unprofitable, and to do no good:

Every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewen down and cast into the fire (Matth. 3. 10.) Some conceive that the word Belial comes from Beli, which in Hebrew signifies Not, and the word Jagnal, which here in the Text signifies to do good: Because a Beliast, or a Son of Belial is such a one as neither doth good to himself nor to any other. The unprofitable Servant who hid, and did not improve his Talent, shall be condemned: And he who uses his talent unprofitably and vainly, shall not escape: Should he reason with unprofitable talk?

Belial ex בלי non & יעל quod in hiphil significat prodesse, ut denotet inutilem, qui nec sibi, nec aliis prodest.

Thus far we have seen Eliphaz reproving Job of folly in speaking unlike, and below a wise man; he proceeds to reprove him for acting unlike, and below a godly man: This he sets home with a particle of aggravation.

Verse 4. Yea, thou castest off fear, and restrainest Prayer before God.

As if he had said, besides, or above all this, that thou hast uttered vain knowledge, words that cannot profit, thou hast also cast off the fear of God, &c. The word which we translate to cast off, signifies to make void, to scatter, to dissolve, to break in pieces; to make as nothing, or to make nothing of. It is often used in Scripture, for breaking the Commandments of God, implying such a breach as makes the Commandments void, which is the proper character of an evil heart; A godly man may sin against the Commandments, but a wicked man would sin away the Commandments; he would repeal the Law of God, and enact his own lusts: Such is the force of the word here, Thou castest off fear.

There is a natural fear, and a spiritual fear; we are not to understand this Text of a natural fear (which is a trouble of spirit, arising upon the apprehension of some approaching evil) but of a spiritual: Fear is here put alone, but we are to take it with its best adjunct, The fear of God; for as the word sometimes is put alone, to signifie the word of God, as if there were no word but his; and as the word Commandments is put alone, to note the Commandments of God, as if no Commandments deserved the name, but only the Commandments of God; so fear is put alone, by way of excellency, for the fear of God; as importing, that his fear is excellent, and no fear to be desired but his. This Divine fear comes under a double notion:

First, It is taken for the holy awe or reverence we bear to God in our spirits, which is the worship of the first Commandment, and the sanctifying of God in our hearts.

Secondly, For the outward acts of Religion, which is the worship of the second Commandment, Their fear is taught by the precepts of men (Isa. 29. 13.) that is, their outward worship and Religion, is such as men have invented, not such as God hath appointed: Some take it here in the first sence only, Thou castest off fear; that is, thou castest off that awe, reverence, and regard thou owest to the Name of God; others understand it in the second, Thou castest off fear; that is, the outward worship and service of God: but I conceive we have that expressed in the next clause, And restrainest prayer before God; there he taxeth him with neglect of outward worship, and here with neglect of inward, Thou castest off fear; fear is as the bridle of the soul; fear holds us in compass, it is the bank to the Sea; fear keeps in the overflowing of sin, Thou castest off fear.

Timor hoc loco pro reverentia & tremore, potius quam pro religione & cultu, licet utrumque cohæreat. Pined.

But what cause had Job given Eliphaz to charge him with casting off the fear of the Lord; we find Eliphaz touching upon this point before, and upbraiding Job, (Chap. 4. 6.) Is this thy fear? Is this thy confidence? As if he had said, Is all thy profession come to this? Here he chargeth him expresly, Thou hast cast off fear: Job had not given him any just cause to speak or think thus hardly of him; but Eliphaz might possibly ground this accusation upon those words (Chap. 9. v. 23.) This is one thing, therefore I said it, he destroyeth the perfect and the wicked, &c. Which Eliphaz did interpret as a casting off the fear of God; hath he awful and reverent thoughts of God, who affirmeth, that God laugheth at the afflictions and tryals of his people? Again, Chap. 12. 6. The Tabernacles of Robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure, into whose hands God bringeth abundantly: Hath not this man cast off all fear of God, who dares say, the wicked prosper, and are secure? Is God become a friend to those that profess themselves enemies to him? Others refer the ground of this to Chap. 13. 21, 22. where he seems to speak boldly, and as some have taxed him, impudently, Do not two things to me, withdraw thy hand from me, &c. Then call thou, and I will answer; or let me speak, and answer thou me: Hence Eliphaz concludes, surely, the man hath cast off the fear of God; he speaks to God as if he were Gods fellow, Speak thou, and I will answer; or let me speak, and answer thou me: Are these words becoming the great God of Heaven and Earth? Art not thou grown over bold with God? Dost thou speak as becomes the distance, that is between the Creator and the Creature? The Greek translates to this sence, Thou speakest to God without any modesty; thou hast put on a brazen face, and hardened thy heart against the fear of the Almighty. These shews of a ground Eliphaz might take, but Job had given him no real ground to pronounce this heavy censure, Thou castest off fear: But passing by the rigid Hypothesis of Eliphaz, we may from his words, as they are a Thesis, observe, Nullo pudore loquutus es coram Deo. Symmach.

That to cast off the fear of God is highest wickedness.

To cast off the fear of God is the beginning of wickedness; as to entertain The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom: The word here used, signifieth not only the beginning but the top, the chief, the head and highest perfection of a thing: The fear of God is both first and last, the beginning and end of holiness. To fear God, and keep his Commandments, is all man in goodness; to cast of the fear of God, is all man in sinfulness: The beginning and end of wickedness: It is ill not to have the fear of God; but it is far worse to cast off the fear of God: It is ill not to chuse the fear of God (Prov. 1. 29.) but to reject the fear of the Lord, that is desperate; if once fear be cast off, all wickedness is let in; at the same door, at which the fear of

of the Lord goes out, any sin may enter: As Abraham, said, The fear of God is not in this place, and they will kill me for my wives sake: They have no impediment of lust to cast off, who have once cast off the fear of God. And as they who cast off this fear are ready to do or say any thing that is good; as they have no restraint upon them from iniquity, so they can easily restrain themselves from duty: The next words shew this.

Thou restrainest power before him.] Prayer is a principal part of the outward worship of God, and is both here and elsewhere put for the whole outward worship of God.

The word signifies also, meditation, musing, or thinking: So some render here, Thou takest off conference with God; thou wast wont to keep continual correspondence with Heaven, and maintain a sweet humble familiarity with God by holy meditation, but now thou art like a stranger, and comest not at him. But whether we translate the word by Prayer, or Meditation, the sence is the same; for praying is speaking to God; yea, an arguing and pleading with God: And so 'tis used in the titles of Psal. 102. & 142. The word which we render to restrain, signifies two things: First, To withdraw or stop: Secondly, To lessen and diminish, Jer. 48. 37. Every beard clipt or diminished: We may take it in both sences here, as reproving Job either for a total forbearance, and throwing up the duty of Prayer, or for shortning and abating it: Yet there is an opinion that Job is not here charged for lessening or abating, but for lengthening and increasing Prayer; Thou castest off fear, and multipliest Prayer: The Hebrew word notes the cutting or dividing of a thing into small pieces or portions; which is indeed to multiply it, and to make it, though not more in bulk, yet more in number, Job 36. 27. Thou makest small the drops of rain; that is, thou multipliest the drops of rain: So here, thou makest small thy Prayers, as so many drops of rain, thou hast never done dropping Prayers; thou dost mince thy supplications, or cut them out into many small shreads, as if thou didst hope to be heard for thy much speaking: Such were the silly devotions of the old superstitious Gentiles, which the hypocritical Pharisees imitated, and were therefore reproved by Christ, under the name of vain repetitions (Matth. 6. 7.) Of which fault a learned Interpreter, judges Eliphaz, reproving Job in this place. But I rather keep to our own Translation, Thou restrainest Prayer.

Here again it may be questioned, What cause had Eliphaz to charge Job with restraining prayer? The Jewish Writers say, it was because he denyed Providence, and so by consequence Prayer; for if God do not order the affairs of the world, the afflictions and deliverances of his people, why should we pray to him about them? Others refer it not to his denial of Providence, but to that which Eliphaz supposed a fundamental error against the Doctrine of Providence, That God destroyeth the righteous and the wicked; that he laughs at the tryal of the innocent. Now will any innocent man pray to God in his affliction, when he is told that God laughs at his affliction? Will any righteous man call upon God for help, when he is taught that God destroyeth the righteous? Who would serve a Master who gives such wages, and payes those that honour him with disgrace, yea, with destruction? So that Job is charged with restraining Prayer, according to this answer to the question, not because he totally forbore prayer himself, or perswaded others to forbear it; but because Job's assertions were such as might yield those consequences, and cause many to suspend Prayer, or give over calling upon the Name of God in the day of trouble. We may be charged to say or do that, which flows from what we do or say, though we neither say nor do the thing it self.

Many are guilty of those errors consequentially, which yet they never affirmed thetically or directly. We may be so far from asserting, that we may professedly abhor an opinion which yet lyeth secretly under some of our assertions. We say justly, That the Pope is Antichrist, and that pure Popery is Antichristianism; yet the Pope doth not deny Christ, for the Pope thinks himself Christs Vicar upon earth, and therefore must needs acknowledge him to be come in the flesh; yet by consequence, the Pope is an opposer both of the Person and Offices of Christ, and Popish doctrine fights against the Truth of Christ. As prophane men Profess they know God, yet in their works they deny him (Tit. 1. 16.) So many erroneous persons profess they love and honour those holy truths and spiritual duties, which by consequences they indeed deny, as Eliphaz (though unduly) supposed Job had done the duty of Prayer. Thou restrainest prayer before God.

Taking the words abstractly, they yield us this useful Observation,

That it is an Argument of an evil heart, to shorten, or restrain, to lessen, or to give off Prayer in times of trouble.

That King spake to the height of prophaneness, when he said (2 Kings 6.) This evil is of the Lord, and why should I wait on the Lord any longer? When we have done waiting, we have done praying. No man will ask for that which he doth not expect to receive. How long soever affliction lasteth, so long prayer-season lasteth: If the Winter day of our trouble be a Summer day in length, if it be continued many dayes, yea, many months, and years, prayer should continue (Psal. 50. 15.) Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will hear, and thou shalt glorifie me: Let the day of trouble be short or long, God looks to hear of us all that day. Is any afflicted, let him pray, saith the Apostle James; it is a duty to pray, when we are not afflicted, when we prosper in the world: But is any man afflicted, then is a special season for prayer. A sincere heart prayes alwayes, or continues in prayer; an hypocrite never loves to pray, and at two seasons he will restrain, or lay aside prayer: First, When he is got out, or thinks he hath prayed himself out of affliction. Prosperity and worldly fulness stop the mouth of prayer; and he hath no more to say to God, when he hath received much from God. Secondly, A hypocrite restrains prayer, when he perceives he hath got nothing by prayer; he sees he cannot, or fears he shall not get out of trouble, and therefore he will pray no more in trouble; his spirit fails, because his afflictions hold out. Upon which soever of these two grounds the hypocrite restrains prayer, he shews the wickedness of his heart. If from the former, he shews, that he bears no true love to God; if from the latter, he shews, that he hath no true faith in God, or dares not trust him. Further, to cast off prayer, is to cast off God; and he that lives without prayer in the world, lives without God in the world: Hence the Heathen who know not God, and the Families that call not upon his Name, are joyned together, or rather are the same (Jer. 10. 25.) Further, to restrain prayer, is worse then not to pray: The latter notes only a neglect of the duty; the former a distast of the duty. To give over an holy exercise is more dangerous then not to begin or take it up. The one is the prophane mans sin, the other is the hypocrites. Thou restrainest prayer: And he that doth not utter prayer with his mouth, will soon utter wickedness with his mouth, as it follows.

Verse 5. For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou chusest the tongue of the crafty.

Here Eliphaz explains, and proves what he said before, that Job had cast off the fear of God, and restrained prayer: As if he had said, If thou hadst kept in holy fear, that would have kept in thine iniquity: Hadst thou not restrained prayer, that would have restrained and bridled down thy sin; but thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and that sheweth that prayer is restrained, and that fear is cast off: Here is a demonstration of it; If you should come to a Princes Court, and see a great croud about the door, you would say, the Porter is there, he stops and examines them; if at another time you see all going in as fast as they please, you will say, the Porter is out of the way. Thus while the fear of the Lord stands like a Porter at the door of the soul, we keep our thoughts and actions in compass; we examine what goes in, and what comes out: but when once that's gone, order is gone. Any thing may be done by him, who fears not, who prayes not. Thou hast cast off fear, and restrained prayer, for thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, out it comes as fast as it can: I need not tell thee wherein thou hast offended, thy mouth pours it out.

Hence Note, That the evil which is in the heart will out at the mouth, unless prayer and the fear of God restrain it.

As the good that is in the heart will come out of the mouth, especially when prayer unlocks the mouth. David prayes, Lord open thou my lips, and then he undertakes for his mouth, that it shall shew forth the praise of God. (Psal. 51. 1.) My heart is inditing a good matter (the heart doth this in prayer or meditation) What follows? My tongue is as the Pen of a ready Writer: Heavenly thoughts in the heart shoot out at the tongue in heavenly words. When the heart is devising of a good matter, the tongue will be swift to speak, and set all to a good tune. Thus also while the heart is inditing an evil matter, the tongue runs to evil: Such a man needs not learn from others, he hath a root of bitterness in himself: Hence our Saviour concludes (Mat. 12. 37.) By thy words thou shalt be condemned, and by thy words thou shalt be justified: Why shall we be condemned by our words? The Prophet complains of those who made a man an offender for a word; I answer, our words shew what we are, they declare our hearts; as a man may be discovered of what Country he is, when he speaks, so of what spirit he is. The tongue is the scholar of the heart, and speaks what that dictates: A man is justly condemned by evil words, because they testifie that he is evil. Thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity.

Qualis vir talis oratio, Mens mala linguam movet & vos fingit ad improbos sensus neque aliud os loquitur quã quod interior suggerit atque imperat sensus.

Observe Secondly, There are some iniquities which are more properly ours then some others are.

Thine iniquity: Job had (as Eliphaz seems to suggest) a kind of peculiarity in it. As God owns some people in a special manner; though all the people of the earth be his, yet they are his beloved people: So man owns some sin in a special manner; though a corrupt heart hath a relation to all the sins in the world, yet some one is his beloved sin; and may be called by way of eminency, his iniquity. 'Tis his, as his Houses and Lands, as the Money in his Purse, and the Garments on his back are his.

Thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity. There are some sins in a mans heart, which possibly he may never utter all his dayes; but he must be talking of, or acting his beloved one. Hence David speaks it, as a high work of grace in him (Psal. 18. 23.) I have kept my self from mine iniquity. Even a godly man, who disowns every sin, hath some one sin more his own then others. This finds him work (not to do it) but to keep himself from doing it.

And thou chusest the tongue of the crafty.] As if he had said, Thou wast wont to speak prayer, now thou speakest pollicy, thou dealest cunningly and deceitfully with us, not plainly and clearly. Why, what had Job spoken or done, that should gain him the disreputation of a crafty man: Some conceive Eliphaz hinting at those words (Chap. 6. 24.) Teach me, and I will hold my tongue, &c. Thou speakest as if thou wert willing to be taught, shew me my error, and I will turn from it; yet this is from craft, not from conscience. For though thou seemest to be willing to receive instruction, yet thou keepest close to thy opinion, and wilt not part from it. We shall sometimes hear a man speaking very ingenuously, convince me that I am in an error, and I will relinquish it; and yet he resolves to hold his own. To desire instruction is grown into a complement, but 'tis by the tongue of the crafty: The instrument is here put for the effect, the tongue for speech, as Isa. 50. 4. Thou hast given me the tongue of the learned; what to do? that I may know to speak a word in season.

Again, the word (Crafty) is taken in a good sence by some Interpreters: So the tongue of the crafty is the tongue of the wise; as if he had said, Thou seemest to speak very wisely, soberly and holily: Others render it thus, Thou shouldest have chosen the tongue of the wise; that is, thou shouldst have spoken more reverently and discreetly, whereas thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity; but rather the crafty, is the subtil man. As if he had said, Thou lovest to play the Sophister, to put fair colours on a bad matter, and wilt not let things appear as indeed they are. Be wise as Serpents, is Christs advice; but he adds, Be innocent as Doves: Serpentine wisdom must be mixed with Dove-like innocence; the craftiness of the Serpent alone, belongs only to the seed of the Serpent.

Lastly, Whereas he saith, Thou chusest the tongue of the crafty; he heightens his accusation, and would represent this good man to the eye of the world in a blacker hue. To chuse, notes a mixt act both of the understanding, will, and affections; and it seems here to be opposed to that wicked act (but not in the wickedness of it) wherewith he bespattered Job in the former Verse, Thou castest off fear. To cast off, or reprobate, is contrary to electing, or chusing, and so is the fear of God to craft. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom; a good understanding have all they that do thereafter; but craft is only the corruption of wisdom, and they have no good understanding who do thereafter. Now, when Divine fear and humane craft stand in competition, for a man to give his vote for craft, and to refuse, at least to let pass the fear of the Lord, this is one of the highest growths of sinful corruption. He that doth thus, needs neither Judge nor Witness against him, he is both himself: So Eliphaz resolves it in the next Verse.

Verse 6. Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I; thine own lips testifie against thee.

This Verse hath nothing in it that needs a Comment. The intendment of it may be thus given, It is as clear as the light, that thou castest off fear, and restrainest prayer before God; for as much as thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou hast chosen the tongue of the crafty; these things are so plain that I need not prove them, thine own mouth shall condemn thee, and not I. As the Judge said at Christs tryal, What need we any Witnesses, ye have heard his blasphemy, Matth. 26. 65. Witnesses of old were wont to put their hand upon the head of the Offender, and say, It is thy own wickedness which condemns thee, and not we; much more doth their own wickedness condem them, who may justly be condemned without witness.

Testes olim manus super caput rei imponentes dicere solebant, Malitia tua te adduxit ad mortem, non nos. Lyran.

Hence Observe, That self-condemnation is the strongest condemnation.

Luke 19. 22. Christ tells the unprofitable Servant, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked Servant. The obstinate Heretick is condemned of himself, Titus 3. 14. Not that the Heretick doth condemn himself, formally, he doth not say, I am in an error; you can hardly bring an Heretick to that; and when you do, he ceaseth to be an Heretick. It is his stiffness in opinion, which fastens the reproach of Heresie upon him; but he is said to condemn himself, because holding such an erroneous opinion, he doth virtually condemn himself, and plainly declares, that he is fallen from the truth, or hath alwayes opposed it.

The Prophet, (Isa. 44. 9.) saith of Image-makers, They are all of them vanity, their delectable things shall not profit them, and they are all their own witnesses; they see not, nor know, that they may be ashamed: Images shew what both they and their worshippers are; though no man should speak a word against them, they having tongues and cannot speak, speak enough against themselves; their silence, or dumbness rather, proclaims aloud to all the world, that they are vain and dunghil Deities; they can do neither good nor evil, to shew themselves Gods; and they who worship them do not so much as shew themselves men, Isa. 46. 8. In all this they are their own witnesses. They cannot but see their own blindness and folly, who speak to that which cannot hear, and lift up their eyes to that which cannot see: Every sinner hath reason to condemn himself with his own mouth, and why an Idolater doth it not, no reason can be given, but that which was toucht even now from the Prophet, he wants his reason, and is therefore in a holy scorn advised, to shew himself a man. While we acquit our selves with our own mouths, and bear witness to our selves, our witness is of no validity, nor are we at all acquitted; but while we condemn our selves with our own mouths, and bear witness against our selves, our witness is strong, and we are abundantly condemned.

VERS.

VERS. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Art thou the first man that was born, or wast thou made before the Hills?
Hast thou heard the secret of God? and doest thou restrain wisdom to thy self?
What knowest thou that we know not? what understandest thou that is not in us?
With us are both the gray-headed, and very aged men, much elder then thy Father.
Are the consolations of God small with thee? is there any secret thing with thee?

THe first part of this Chapter, is reprehensory. In the former context two points of reproof were opened: First, Jobs supposed folly in the second and third Verses: Secondly, his wickedness, in the fourth, both which were aggravated in the fifth and sixth.

In this Context Eliphaz gives him a third and a fourth reproof; a third, for the high conceit he had of himself, and a fourth, for the low conceit he had of the comforts of God, tendered to him by his Friends; he reproves him for the high conceit he had of himself, in two things: First, as if Job had thought his experience greater then any mans, Art thou the first man that was born? &c. Vers. 7. Secondly, as if he had thought himself immediately inspired, Hast thou heard the secret of God, &c. Vers. 8.

This he illustrates by a twofold opposition in the ninth and tenth Verses; First, by the opposition of himself and his Friends in point of knowledge and understanding unto Job: As if he had said, Thou lookest upon us as underlings, as men unworthy to carry thy Books after thee, or to be named the same day, but what knowest thou, that we know not? What understandest thou, which is not in us? Vers. 9. Thou art not so weighty, but we hope we may very well ballance thee, and say (without pride or partiality) that our parts are as good as thine. Secondly, by the opposition of their party to him and his, Vers. 10. With us are both the gray-headed, and very aged men, much elder then thy Father: As if he had said, Our party equalls thine, as well as our parts; Hast thou aged men on thy side? so have we; Hast thou the authority of gray-hairs to back thy opinion? So have we. Hast thou thy Fathers Copy to shew for these thy Tenets? So have we. We are able to make as great a boast of Antiquity as thou thy self canst: Do not think that we have received our Learning from some new fangled Sect, or from upstart Opinionists of yesterdayes edition: No, be it known unto thee, With us are both the gray-headed, and very aged men, &c.

As thus he reproves Jobs high thoughts of himself, so in the fourth place, The low thoughts which he had of them, and the pains they had taken with him, Vers. 11. Are the consolations of God small with thee? &c.

Vers. 7. Art thou the first man that was born.

Or, as some read it, Art thou born before the first man? This is a high strain of Rhetorick, it is impossible to be before the first; for as there is nothing less then what is least, so nothing was before the first; but as we say, Such a man will see the last man born, when we see him resolved to stay the longest upon a business, or desirous to live very long: So we may say, Such a man was born before the first, or surely he is the first man that was born, whom we see highly conceited of his own antiquity: And indeed when Eliphaz asks the question, Art thou the first man that was born? His meaning is to taxe Job for a Puny, or a young man, yet arrogating to himself the glory of longest experience; as if he had said, Thou hast told us that we are but of yesterday, and objectest novelty against us, to derogate from our authority, yet surely thou art none of the eldest, thou art not older then Adam (I believe) thou wast not before the first man, that ever was, no nor the first man: It is usual in many Languages, to compare those who are lowest in any degree to the highest, and the meanest to the greatest, Ironically, or in a way of scorn; thus 'tis said to a Coward, or a white liver'd-fellow, Thou art no Achilles; to a Dwarf or one of a low stature, Thou art no Goliah; to one of weak parts, surely, Thou art no Solomon, no Aristotle; so of one that is but young, Surely thou art not Nestor, thou art not Adam, the first man that ever was.

Job gave Eliphaz and his Friends some colour to twit him thus, while he said (Chap. 13. 5.) O that you would altogether hold your peace, and it should be your wisdoms. This was as if he had said, You are but ignorant, and the more you speak the more you discover your ignorance; And again, Chap. 12. 12. With the ancient is wisdom, and with length of dayes is understanding; where he secretly upbraided them as Juniors, and that therefore little or no heed was to be taken to what they spake; now saith Eliphaz, Art thou the first man born? that is, Art thou the wisest man living? He who thinks himself the first man, takes himself for a very wise man, even as wise as Adam, who was not only the Father, but the Teacher, and Instructer, of his posterity: In which sense the Jews said to Christ, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham, Joh. 8. 57. Thou speakest as if thou wert an old man; we know thy age, thou art but a young man, yet thou speakest at the rate of thousands, as if thou wert as old as Abraham, or the ancient of dayes among men, Art thou the first man? Or,

Wast thou made before the hills?

Some conceive, that by the Hills he means the Angels, but that Exposition smells too much of the Allegory: Take the Hills litterally, for the uppermost parts or bosses of the earth; the Original is, Wast thou formed or made before the face of the hills? which is an Hebraism. Some interpret the Hills by a Synecdoche, for the whole earth, then the sense is, Wast thou formed before the earth? The first man was formed out of the earth, & art thou older then the earth? So that here Eliphaz puts him off by a challenge of greater antiquity then in the former part of the Verse, Wast thou the first man that was born, or wast thou made before the earth? the earth is elder then man, both had not the same birth-day.

Philippus sequutus Augustinū, contendit hoc loco angelos colliū nomine intelligi. Ad facies colliū. Heb. Num formatus es ante mundū conditū; nam colles una cū terra formati fuerūt aliquot diebus ante hominē. Drus.

Again, as the Hills are a part of the earth, so they may be said to be born the first of any part of the earth: For the earth was covered with water, it was a great deep, till a word of command came from God, that the waters should retire to certain Channels, and receptacles which his wisdom had assigned them; now when the waters were thus gathered and put into those vast Vessels, then the Hills, and Mountains, which are the highest parts of the earth appeared first, and so the Mountains are elder in regard of view, then the Plains and Valleys of the earth. That is said to be first which appeareth first: So then, whether we take hills by a Synecdoche, for the whole earth, or plainly for a part of the earth, both reach at highest antiquity. There is an opinion (I confess) which if true, takes away the ground of this notion, That hills and mountains grew up, or were as so many excrescencies of the earth, since it was created, and that they grow daily (as Naturalists express it) by Juxtaposition. But I fully adhere to their judgement (under which this notion stands safe) that the earth was distinguisht into hills, plains, and valleys, by the same immediate power which created it, though I easily grant that many hills have been accidentally caused, and cast up since, especially in the deluge. And this doth more advance the wisdom of God in the frame of this mighty mass, which hath in it greater ornament, and yields greater delight by this variety, then if it had been smoothed all over into Plains and Levels.

Quod prius conspicuum est antiquius esse videtur.

Further, to clear the Text, consider, that it is usual in Scripture, when a thing of great antiquity is spoken of, to compare it to the Hills, Prov. 8. 23, 24, 25. Wisdom (which is Christ) speaks thus, I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, ere the earth was, when there were no depths I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water, before the mountains were setled; before the Hills was I brought forth; while as yet he had not made the earth, nor the fields, nor the highest part of the dust of the World. Where note also by the way a full confirmation of the opinion even now asserted, that God made the Hills immediately, which are here also called The highest part of the dust of the earth. Again (Psal. 90. 2.) O Lord thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations; which he explains in the next words, Before the mountains were brought forth from everlasting

As if he had said, Possibly thou wilt wave or not stand to this plea of thy great antiquity. What is it then that swells thee into such proud and daring thoughts of thy infallible knowledge? Is it because

Thou hast heard the secret of God.] The Hebrew word signifies either counsel, or any thing that is secret and mysterious; some render it, Hast thou heard things unspeakable: when the Apostle was caught up to Heaven (2 Cor. 12.) He heard words unspeakable which it is not lawful for a man to utter: Hast thou heard unutterable secrets? A second translates, Hast thou heard the mysteries of God? A third, Hast thou had discourse with God? or hast thou heard God discourse about the great things of wisdom? The Septuagint, Hast thou heard the constitutions of Heaven, or knowest thou in what manner God hath setled all the affairs of mankind, natural, civil, and spiritual? Art thou of privy counsel to the King of Heaven? or art thou a member of the Celestial conclave? Thus he reproves him for arrogating to himself such knowledge, as is not attainable, but by special inspiration, or revelation from God himself. The Prophet puts the question (Jer. 23. 18.) Who hath stood in the counsel of the Lord, and hath perceived and heard his word? Who hath marked his word and heard it? So the Apostle (Rom. 11. 34.) Who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his Counsellor? God is able to make known the whole mystery of his will in a moment to the meanest soul, he can let in floods upon the understanding without our study; he can make a fool wise, and drawing back the curtain of ignorance, irradiate the darkest mind with the clearest light of all things knowable: But hast thou heard such secrets?

συνταγμα κυριε ὁ ἠκουας. Constitutionē domini audivisti & consiliario te usus est Deus. Sept. Eadem vox quæ est secretū, est etiam consiliū aut concilium, quod in conciliis arcana tractantur, & consilia non nisi secretò iniri debēt. Fined.

There are two sorts of Divine secrets:

First, Secrets of Providence:

Secondly, Secrets of Doctrine.

The former are of such things as God will do; the latter, such as Man is either to do or believe: God reveals both to his people. The ordinary way for us is by the Word written, the extraordinary by a word spoken: Thus God opened his secrets to the ancient Prophets and Apostles. The Prophet Amos (Chap. 3. 7.) speaks of the secrets of providence, Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his secrets to his Servants the Prophets: And the Lord himself saith of Abraham, Shall I hide from Abraham the things that I am about to do: Now as there is a revealing of Providence, or of the works of God, so there is a revealing of Doctrines and of the holy Truths of God. This he promiseth (Joel 2. 28.) I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, and your Sons and your Daughters shall prophesie, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions: Young men, cannot claim to be the first men, they were not before the Hills, yet to them the visions of Heaven are promised: Yet we must not neglect that command of our attendance upon the teachings of the Word, because we have received a promise of the teachings of the Spirit. The Spirit usually teacheth by the Word, never against it; and it is a temping of God, while he gives us means, to linger after immediate Revelations: yea, when the Lord reveales himself immediately, he uses to do it without mans fore-thought or expectations. The Prophets did not set themselves to receive Revelations from God, but his Spirit came upon them with mighty power and irresistible evidence. And though God doth reveal some of his secrets, yet he hath secrets which he will not reveal: The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him (Psal. 24. 14.) And his secret is with the righteous (Prov. 3. 32.) This secret is either the good will and favour of God, of which the World knows nothing, or the good Word and Faith of God of which the World knows as little: Both these sorts of Divine secrets are with the righteous, and men fearing God; but the secrets of his Counsel are reserved in his own breast. He reveals to his people the secrets of his bounty, and of their duty, what he will do for them, and what they must do for him; but many things which himself will do shall never be revealed by the doing of them; Hast thou heard the secrets of God:

And doest thou restrain wisdom to thy self?

חגרע אליך Detrahis ad te; quod sensu in idē recidit cum eo quod est tibi ascribis fraudando alios, negatam aliis sapientiam tibi assumpsisti ex divino arcano. Sapientia ultra te Jues terminos nō porrigat? Tygur.

That is, Doest thou think there is no wisdom besides thine? art thou at the very border and utmost limit of knowledge and understanding? is all beyond thee ignorance and folly? Hast thou got and engrossed all the learning from others, and reserved it to thy self alone as thy peculiar, with which none must intermeddle without a license obtained from thee? hast thou the monopoly of wisdom? or is all but enough for thee? Shall none of thy neighbours share with thee? This is either a charge of greater arrogancy then the former, Doest thou restrain wisdom to thy self? or at least a charge of greatest uncharitableness; goodness is diffusive, and so is wisdom, and it is the duty of good men to diffuse wisdom. When they have heard the secrets of God, they must communicate them to others, not restrain all to themselves. But I conceive Eliphaz intends only the former charge.

Hence Observe, It is the highest strain of pride for a man to restrain wisdom to himself;

Or, to think himself so wise, that all must address to him for wisdom: God hath not given all wisdom to any one man, or sort of men, though he hath trusted some with more Talents of it then he hath done others. The Priests lips of old under the Law, and so the lips of Ministers under the Gospel, should preserve knowledge; and the people should seek both Law and Gospel at their mouth (Mal. 2. 7.) Yet neither might the Priests then, nor may Ministers now, restrain wisdom to themselves. The rule of the Apostle is, Be not wise above what is written; that is above holy Writ, or above what is written from the immediate dictates of the Spirit of God. They are (as we say) fools in Print, who say they are wise above what is thus written; but we may be wise above what is spoken or written by any man, for no man ought to restrain all wisdom to himself; to do so is the top-stair of Antichristian pride. The Pope restrains wisdom to himself, he boasts that he hath the secrets of God, and that all must come to him if they will have them unlockt and opened: His sentences from the Chair are Oracles, and there he is infallible; all are obliged to receive what he saith, because he saith it: no man must scruple, much less oppose or contradict it. Thus to impose upon men is to set our selves in the place of the God of Heaven; yea, to arrogate to our selves that we are Gods on earth. So the Apostle hath characteriz'd that man of sin (2 Thes. 2. 4.) He opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped (that is, above all civil powers or Magistracy) So that he as God sitteth in the Temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. And as he out of all measure wickedly, so many others in a very great measure have shewed themselves as God, while they have taken upon them (as we speak proverbially) To give the Law, yea, to give the Gospel to other mens consciences, or to bind up all mens tongues and judgements unto the rule of their apprehensions. When the Apostle had called God to record, that he alwayes purposed to be bold and plain with the Corinthians, he presently subjoyns this corrective (2 Cor. 1. 24.) Not that we have Dominion over your Faith, but are helpers of your joy: As if he had said, Do not think that I take upon me as a Lord over your consciences, to charge any command or observations of my own upon them: No, I am but as a servant of God to instruct you in his counsels, and to comfort you with his promises.

The Grecians, who were men of great knowledge and learning, a very witty and Philosophical people, called all other Nations Barbarians: Such pride appears among some (in (in name) Chriſtians, they ſpeak and act as if all knowledge and truth were centred in them, or as if all were in the dark who ſee not by their light. Knowledge is apt to puff up; how are they puffed up, who think they know all? though indeed they who think they know any thing, know nothing as they ought to know, 1 Cor. 8. 2. God reveals that to Babes and Sucklings, which he hides from ſuch wiſe and prudent ones, who reſtrain all wiſdom to themſelves. God in judgement reſtrains wiſdom from them, who in pride reſtrain it to themſelves; and as God takes all wiſdom from them, who in another ſenſe reſtrain wiſdom to themſelves, that is, who will not uſe it becauſe they have but one Talent of it, or but a little; ſo he will give them no wiſdom at all, who think they are poſſeſſors, or Lord-Treaſurers of all the Talents of it, as if all wiſdom were laid up in them. The Babes and Sucklings, ſuch as are low, humble, and meek, are the objects of this bounty; as for the proud, God beholdeth them afar off: and they can never get neer wiſdom who are far from the God of wiſdom. While ſuch vainly reſtrain wiſdom to themſelves, the hand of God is juſtly reſtrained from beſtowing it upon them.

Eliphaz having thus reproved Job for entitling himſelf to ſo rich a ſtock of knowledge, either brought in by his own long experience, or from the ſpecial inſpirations and teachings of God; proceeds to challenge to himſelf and his Friends a knowledge equal at leaſt to what he really had, in the ninth and tenth Verſes.

Verſ. 9. What knoweſt thou that we know not, what underſtandeſt thou that is not in us?

He retorts what Job ſaid, Chap. 12. 3. I have underſtanding as well as you, I am not inferiour to you. Here Eliphaz tells him, we have underſtanding as well as you: Hath God revealed all knowledge to thee? ſurely we know as much as thou.

Dic age quæ ſunt tuæ partes.

What knoweſt thou which we know not?] The words are plain, and need no explication; they ſound as if he had ſaid, Come ſhew thy ſkill, and open thy hidden treaſures: thou haſt ſhewed nothing yet, but what is common to us and others; thou ſeemeſt to ſpeak of myſteries, of things that are unknown, and ſecret to this day, but ſurely thou haſt not traded much in theſe; For, What knoweſt thou that we know not? thou haſt not yet produced any ſuch piece of knowledge; if ſuch precious matter be in thee, wrap it not up in the napkin of ſilence any longer, bring it forth, that we alſo may know it.

Qui velit ingenio cedere rarus erit.

Hence obſerve, First, Man is apt to ſtand upon terms of compariſon with man; he cannot bear it that another ſhould be thought or think himſelf wiſer or more knowing then he.

Some are not troubled becauſe they know little, but becauſe they are eſteemed leſs knowing then others, What knoweſt thou that we know not?

Secondly Obſerve, Though ſome men are of higher parts, and better natural abilities then others, yet what one man knoweth, others may.

No man can boaſt himſelf beyond the line and degree of man. For as the heart of man anſwers the heart of man in ſinfulneſs, ſo in a poſſibility of goodneſs. One man may be as holy as another, as wiſe and knowing as another; only God is more holy, wiſe, and knowing then any man can be; he knoweth many things which no man knoweth nor can know. But though it be a ſtrain of pride, for one man to ſay to another, What knoweſt thou that I know not? Yet it is a truth that one man may know as much as another: and though ſome men know that which another man (in regard of ſome perſonal impediments) neither doth nor can know, yet the humane nature in every perſon is capable of the ſame, both kind and degree of knowledge.

Thirdly, Eliphaz is about to reprove the pride of Job, as he conceives, and he doth it (as was but now toucht) in ſuch a manner as ſpeaks his own pride, What knoweſt thou that we know not, is the language of a high mind: I am as good and as wiſe as thou: though it may be ſo, yet it is uncomely to ſay ſo.

Hence Obſerve, Some in reproving other men's faults, run into the very ſame faults themſelves.

The reproof of a fault may not only be faulty, but the fault which is reproved. A man may reprove pride with much pride, and leſſer vanities with abundance of vanity. All that good men ſpeak for good, doth not begin at a principle of goodneſs; their own corruption may riſe up againſt the corruption of others, and ſin is often heard chiding vice. How many are there who check paſſion, with paſſion, and are very angry in diſlike of anger; you ſhall have ſome men ſpeak againſt bitterneſs of ſpirit with a bitter ſpirit, and while they are taxing their Brethren with making breaches or with an unwillingneſs to peace, diſcover much unpeaceableneſs, yea an unwillingneſs to have thoſe breaches healed.

Diogenes was obſerved to trample upon the pride of Plato with greater pride; and he who to rebuke pride in Apparrel, wore himſelf an unhandſome and torn Coat, was rightly told that his pride was ſeen through the holes of his Coat. There may be as much oſtentation in wearing ſordid, as there is in wearing the gayeſt Cloathes. It was a ſhame for Heathens to declare their own folly, while they declaimed againſt the folly of their neighbours; how ſcandalous then is this in Chriſtians?

Verſ. 10. With us are the gray-headed, and very aged men, much elder then thy Father.

This Verſe is the proof of the former; ſome think the compariſon lyes between Jobs Friends and himſelf. We are thy Seniors, yet thou ſpeakeſt as if thou wert the oldeſt man amongſt us: Here are two terms in the Text, which ſeem to diſtinguiſh old age.

First, Gray-headed.

Secondly, Very aged, much elder then thy Father.

Among the Jews, a man was counted old at threeſcore, which they called, The firſt old age: At ſeventy he was expreſſed by the word which we tranſlate Gray-headed, and that was his title till he arrived at Fourſcore; from that to the end of life, the whole ſtate was called, Decrepid old Age; and they who reached thoſe years, were expreſſed by the word which we render Very aged men, or as we ſay, men having one foot in the Grave; for he that was an hundred years old, was not numbred among the living, but among the dead. The Chalde Paraphraſt applys the diſtinction thus; With us is Eliphaz, who is gray-headed, and Bildad who is decrepid, and Zophar who is older then thy Father. Hierom gives Eliphaz the precedency in age, affirming that he was the eldeſt Son of Eſau, and that at the time of this diſpute, he was no leſs then a hundred and fifty years old, Jobs Father ninety, and Job himſelf ſeventy. But I ſtay not upon theſe conjectures.

Prima ſenectus זקנה dicitur, unde זקן ſenex: media ſenectus שיבה dicitur & incipit ab anno 70. & durat uſq; ad 80. annum; ad quā qui pervenit poſtea ישיש decrepitus dicitur, quod eſt ultima ſenectutis vocabulum, quæ durat uſque ad vitæ finē vel uſq; ad annum 100. Nam filius centū annorū habetur pro mortuo. Druſ.

The ſcope of Eliphaz in theſe words may be reduced to this account: As if he had ſaid, We need not depend on thy Authority or antiquity; For with us, that is, on our ſide, or of our party and opinion, there are men gray-headed, yea very aged, much elder, not only then thy ſelf, but, then thy Father. Therefore do not thou charge us with novelty, know, that we have received our Doctrine from venerable Anceſtors; if thou haſt learned theſe things of thy Father, and drunk in thy opinion from the Aged, ſo have we: Nor do we eſteem the Tenets of our fore-fathers meerly by the number of days which they lived, but by the wiſdom and and piety with which they were enriched.

Etiā Eliphaz qui, canus eſt, & Bildad qui decrepitus eſt inter nos, & Sophar qui major eſt patre tuo diebus. Targ.

It is obſervable in Scripture, that Teman (from whence Eliphaz came) was a famous School of Learning (Jer. 49. 7.) Thus ſaith the Lord of Hoſts, is wiſdom no more in Teman? He ſpeaks of it, as of a known place for knowledge and wiſdom; What? Is wiſdom no more in Teman? As if we in England ſhould ſay, Is there no more learning at Oxford or Cambridge? are the lights extinguiſht, and the fountains dry? Thus Eliphaz aſſerts that his abettors and inſtructers in the opinion he maintained, were both old, and learned old men.

From this conteſt about Antiquity and ancient men ſo often renewed and ſo much urged between Job and his Friends, We may Obſerve,

First, That they who have moſt years upon their backs, are, or may be ſuppoſed to have moſt knowledge and wiſdom in their heads and hearts.

Secondly,

Secondly, They who have Antiquity on their side, are apt to conclude that they have Truth on their side.

That which is indeed most ancient is most true; yet there are very many very ancient untruths: It is no new thing to see a gray-headed errour, and a false Doctrine much older then our Fathers.

But I shall not prosecute either of these points, having met with matter of this strain before, Chap. 8. verse 8, 9. 10. Chap. 12. verse 12. to which places I refer the Reader.

Eliphaz having finished his third reproof of Job for his arrogancy, and the high conceit he had of himself, proceeds to a fourth, and that is (as hath been said) for the low conceit which he had of the comforts tendered him in the Name of God.

Vers. 11. Are the consolations of God small with thee, or is there any secret thing with thee?

Num parum à te consolationes Dei. Heb. Supplendum est verbum reputantur. Numquid grande est ut consoletur te Deus? Vulg. q.d. facile est Deo ut te ad statum prosperitatis reducat. Aquin. Existimásne tuis ærumnis non posse Deum parè consolationẽ afferre. An minores sunt consolationes dei, quàm ut te consolari possint? Vatab. Pauca præ iis quæ peccasti accepisti vulnera. Sept. An consolationes Dei tã contẽptibiles judicas, ut projiciat eas ante blasphematores.

These words undergo much variety of interpretation; the Vulgar Latine, neer which some others translate, gives a fair sense, but at too great a distance from the letter of the Original; thus, Is it a great thing that God should comfort thee? As if he had said, Art thou so low that all the consolations of God are not able to raise thee up? Is it a work too big for God himself to comfort thee? Cannot he change thy outward and inward sorrows into joys? Will not the consolations of one that is infinite serve thy turn? Hath not he balm enough in store to heal thy wounds, nor treasure enough in stock to repair thy losses? 'Tis no hard thing with God to comfort the most disconsolate soul that ever was; he that made light to shine out of darkness, can give us light in our thickest darkness: This is a truth, but for the reason above, I stay not upon it.

The Septuagint translation is far wider then the former, Thou hast received but few wounds, in comparison of the sins that thou hast committed; which is a Paraphrase, not a translation, and such a Paraphrase as seems to lie quite without the compass of the text: The meaning and intendment of it may be given thus; as if he had said, Thou complainest that thou art greatly afflicted, that thy sorrows are innumerable, but if thou considerest thy great and many sins, thy sufferings are few, yea, thy sufferings may rather be called consolations, and thy losses gains: Are the consolations of God small to thee, seeing thou hast sinned so much? When God lays but a little affliction upon sinful man, he may be said, to give a great deal of mercy.

A third gives this sense, Are the consolations of God small to thee? That is, Doest thou esteem the consolations of God so cheap, that he will give them to such a one as thou? or that he will lavish them out upon the wicked, and cast these Pearls to Swine, to such as are blasphemers and contemners of God?

But why doth Eliphaz call these the consolations of God? Did God administer them to Job with his own hand, or did he speak to Job from Heaven? Some conceive that though he and his Friends spake them, yet Eliphaz calls them the consolations of God, by an Hebraism, because he judged them great consolations. Thus in Scripture, The Mountain of God, and the River of God, are put for a great Mountain, and a great River; so here. As if he had said, Thou hast received many great consolations from us thy Friends, and doest thou account them small? But I rather take the sense plainly, that he calls them so, because God is the author and giver, the fountain and original from whom all consolations spring and flow.

Suas & sociorũ consolationes, vocat Dei cõsolationes nõ sine arrogãtia & fastu. Drus.

The Consolations of God are two-fold:

First, Arising from good things already exhibited to us.

Secondly, From good things promised to us.

The Consolations of God in this place, are good things promised, or offered: Promises are Divine conveyances of Consolation. The Friends of Job had made him many promises, that he repenting, God would make his latter end better then his begining, &c. Hence Eliphaz tells him that he had slighted the consolations of God. Any man who reads his story may wonder why he should: Surely Job was not in case to refuse comfort, considering how he was stript of all comfort. The full soul indeed loatheth the honey Comb, but to the hungry soul, every bitter thing is sweet; that is, those things which dainty palates distast, he eats very savourly. Job was kept short and low enough, he had nothing of consolation left, either without or within; he was poor and sore without, he was full of horrour, and terrour within: the arrows of the Almighty had even drunk up his spirit, and laid all his comforts wast, and doth he yet neglect or undervalue comforts? 'Tis true, he had real consolations, as appears by that profession of his assurance of Gods favour towards him, I know that I shall be justified; yet he had no sensible consolations; his frequent complaints shew he had not. So then, the consolations of God (for esteeming which little he is reproved) were the promises of consolation made to him in the name of God by the Ministry of his Friends. Are the consolations of God small unto thee?

Hence Observe, First, That consolation is the gift, and proper work of God.

Thou (saith David, Psal. 71. 21.) Shalt encrease my greatness and comfort me on every side: The Lord shall comfort Sion, he will comfort all her wast places (Isa. 51. 3.) And again, As one whom his Mother comforteth, so will I comfort you, and you shall be comforted in Jerusalem. God comforts as a Mother, tenderly, and he comforts as a Father, yea as a Master, effectually; I will comfort you, and ye shall be comforted. As the corrections of God are effectual, and prosper in the work for which they are sent, so also are his consolations. Ephraim said (Jer. 31. 18.) Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised. So every soul, whom God comforts, shall say, Thou hast comforted me, and I was comforted. This the Apostle speaks out to the praise of God (2 Cor. 1. 3, 4.) Blessed be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ the Father of mercies, and the God of all consolations; all consolation belongs to God; he hath all comfort in his own power, and dispose; there is not any creature in the World can give out the least dram of comfort to us without the commission or leave of God; it is possible for one man to give another man riches, but he cannot give him comfort; man may give honour to man, but he cannot give him comfort. A man may have a pleasant dwelling, a loving Wife, sweet Children, and yet none of these a comfort to him.

The consolation of all our possessions and relations is from God: Whosoever would have comfort, must trade to Heaven for it: that's a commodity can be found upon no earthly coast; you may fetch in wealth from many coasts of the earth, but you cannot fetch in comfort, till you address your selves to the God of Heaven. We can procure our own sorrow quickly, but God only makes us to rejoyce; our relief from outward affliction or inward grief is the gift of God. He only can comfort us in outward afflictions who can command the creature, and he only can comfort us against our inward griefs, who can convince the conscience. None can do either of these but God; therefore consolations are from God. Luther spake true, It is easier to make a World then to comfort the conscience; the Hebrew phrase to comfort, used in divers places of the Old Testament, is, To speak to the heart: Now God only can speak to the heart; man can speak to the ear, he can speak words, but he can go no further, Therefore the act and art of comforting belongs properly to God; Christ is the true Noah: Lamech saith of Noah, Gen. 5. 29. This man shall comfort us, concerning our work and the toil of our hands; it was not in Noah to comfort, but as God made him a comfort: and he was said to comfort as a type of Christ; Christ is true comfort, He is comfort cloathed in our flesh, he is (as it were) comfort incarnate: Noah sent a Dove out of his Ark, which returned with an Olive-branch, Jesus Christ sends the holy Ghost who is called the Comforter with the Olive-branch of true peace to our wearied souls; and to shew that it is now the highest act of Christs love and care as mediator, to give comfort: he promised to send the holy Ghost, when himself was taking his leave of the Church, in regard of any visible abode or bodily presence: being ready to ascend and step into Heaven, he said, I will send the comforter. When God rained fire and brimstone from Heaven upon Sodom and Gomorrah, it is said by some of the Ancients, that he sent a Hell out of Heaven: But when he powers the holy Spirit from Heaven upon his Sion, we may say he sends a heaven out of heaven. Heaven above is nothing else but holy comfort, and the comforts of the holy Spirit are the only Heaven below.

How highly then ought we to esteem, how carefully to maintain communion with God, who hath all comfort, seeing comfort is more to us then all we have. If we have comfort, let our estate be what it will we are well enough; comfort is as the spring of our year, as the light of our day, as the Sun in our Firmament, as the life of our lives. Have we not reason then to draw, yea, to press neerer unto God, who hath all comfort in his hand, and without whom the best things cannot comfort us? Nor our riches, nor our relations, nor Wife, nor Children, nor health, nor beauty, nor credit nor honour, none of these can comfort us without God, and if God please he can make any thing comfort us; he can make a crust of dry bread a feast of fat things, a cup of cold water, a banquet of Wine to us. And as he can make our comforts crosses, so our cross a comfort, as David speaks (Psal. 23. 4.) Thy rod and thy staff comfort me, not only the supporting staff, but the correcting rod shall comfort, if God command it to be a comforter: Who would not maintain communion with this God who can make a comfort of any thing, who can answer every cross with a comfort; If we have a thousand crosses, God hath ten thousand comforts; he can multiply comforts faster then the World can multiply crosses.

Again, if God be the God of all consolation, then go to God for consolation; as the Angel said to the women when they came to the Sepulcher enquiring for Christ, Why seek ye the living among the dead, he is risen, he is not here: So I may say, Why seek ye living comforts among dead or dying creatures? Seek then there no longer. Job complains in this Book, When I said my bed shall comfort me, then thou scarest me with dreams; (Chap. 7.) Job went to a wrong place, when he went to his bed for comfort; most souls miss of comfort, because they go to a wrong place for it: one goes to his bed, another to his friend for comfort, a third to his wife and Children, these, saith he, shall comfort me; alas, why seek ye the living among the dead, none of these can comfort, though these may be means of comfort. Who or whatsoever is the instrument, God is the author of all our comfort; whatsoever hand brings it, God sends it; God (saith Paul) who comforteth those who are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus (2 Cor. 7. 6.) Titus was a good man and brought good tydings, yet Paul doth not say that the coming of Titus did comfort them; but, saith Paul, God comforted us by the coming of Titus; 'Tis not your friend who comforts you, but God who comforts you by the coming of such a friend, when you are in sorrow; by sending in such relief, when you are poor, by sending such medicines, when you ar sick, such salves when you are sore, such counsel when you are in doubt and know not what to do.

Once more, It is happy for Saints that consolation is in the hand of God; if it were in the hand of the creature, sure they should have but little of it, but it is in the hand of God. There are these four considerations which may comfort Saints, that comfort is in the hand of God.

First, Considering his nature, he is willing and ready to do good; he is full of compassion, and to shew mercy pleaseth him more then it relieveth us.

Secondly, Considering his relation to his people: he is a Father. Will a Father let a Child lie comfortless, when he can help him? he is our Husband, he is our Friend, all relations provoke God to give out comfort to the Saints.

Thirdly, Considering his Omniscience and Omnipresence; he knows where the shoe wrings, he knows what comfort we want; a friend (possibly) hath the comfort in his hand, which we need, & he may be willing to give it out unto us, but he knows not wherein we are pinched; God tells Moses, I have seen, I have seen the afflictions of my people in Egypt. And as he knows how it is with us, so we are ever within his reach, he can lay his hand upon every joynt where we are pained, and put a Plaister upon every wound: here is our happiness. Christ would take off his people from extraordinary cares about the things of the World, by this argument, Your Father knows that ye have need of these things, Matth. 6. 32. Your Father who carry's the purse knows your want.

Fourthly, Consider his Omnipotence, he is able to comfort; he can command, yea create comforts; he can bring his comforts through an army of sorrows to a poor soul: yea he can lead comfort through an Army of Devils and temptations, to a poor soul; he is Almighty, there is nothing too hard for him to do, nor is he hard to be entreated to do that which gives ease unto his people.

Secondly, Observe, Consolations rightly administred by men, are the consolations of God.

While man speaks, God commands; Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, speak comfortably to Jerusalem, tell her that her warefar is accomplished, and her sin pardoned (Isa. 40. 1.) As all the counsels, reproofs, and Doctrines which the Ministers of Christ dispense according to the form of wholesome words delivered either in the Law or Gospel, are the counsels, instructions, reproofs and Doctrines of God, so also are their consolations. And that's the reason why God takes it so ill at the hands of men, when his Messengers, who bring either instruction, or consolation, are refused: because himself is refused when they are, and his consolations are disesteemed when theirs are.

Thirdly, Observe, To account the consolations of God small, is a very great sin.

Moses rebukes rebellious Korah and his confederates, for undervaluing the priviledge which they (as Levites) had to be neer God in holy Services (Numb. 16. 9.) Seemeth it a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel, hath separated you from the Congregation of Israel, to bring you neer to himself to do the service of the Tabernacle? &c. If it were their sin to count it a small thing to be called neer to God in holy administrations, how great a sin is it in any man to count it a small thing, that God draws neer to him with heavenly consolations? Though the consolations of God to us be small comparatively to what some others have, yet we must not account any consolation of God, and that upon two grounds:

First, because of our own unworthiness; the least consolations are great, considering how little we are, as Jacob speaks, (Gen. 32. 10.) I am not worthy the least of all thy mercies: He thought little mercies too big for him, because he was little in his own eyes. They who have great, yea any thoughts of their own merits, lessen the mercies of God; but he who sees he deserves nothing but ill, sees abundance of mercy in the smallest good.

Secondly, Smallest consolations are very great, because they proceed from a great God. As no sin is small, though comparatively to another sin it may be small, because it is committed against the great God: so no consolation is small, because it comes from the great God. God puts an impress of his own greatness upon the least things that are done or given by him; though he give but a peny, yet it hath the image and superscription of him, our infinite and eternal Cæsar: therefore see you slight it not. As a good heart is careful to perform the least duty, and to avoid the least sin, or as a good heart calls no duty little, which God enjoyns, nor sin little which God forbids: so a good heart is thankfull for the least mercy, and calls no consolation small, which God, the great God sends.

Fourthly, Observe, That great afflictions take away the sense of tendered mercies.

Consolations for the matter were offered unto Job, but his palate was so distempered with the gall and wormwood of his afflictions, that he could not taste them. Phineas his Wife regarded not the joyful news, that she had brought forth a Man Child, while she was overwhelmed with sorrow, that the Ark of God was taken. While the Israelites were under hard Task-masters in Egypt, they could not attend to the voice of Moses and Aaron, who told them of deliverance; their troubles and burdens wert so heavy, that they looked upon Moses as a trouble, or as a burden, when he came to mediate their release. And as the Idolatrous Israelites who sacrificed their Children to Moloch, beat up Drums, and used loud-sounding-Instruments, to drown the cry of the poor Children, that they might not be heard; so some afflictions cry so loud, and many cry so loud in their afflictions, that they drown the sweet melody and musick of those consolations that are sounded in their ears. Great complaints render great consolations small: Job was not without some blame in this, for though his patience was great, yet had it been greater, he might have missed this reproof from his Friends; Are the consolations of God small to thee?

And is there any secret thing with thée?

Et verbum latens tecū. Heb.

The meaning appears thus, Are the consolations of God, which we have offered, small unto thee, because thou hast some secret hidden thing in thy breast? This secret thing is opened three wayes.

Estne apud te divinum aliquid reconditum in mente tua, præ quo nostras consolationes Divinas contemnis? Merc.

First, In reference to comfort: As if he had said, Hast thou some secret comfort besides what we have offered? Hast thou consolations of thy own, which cause thee to neglect the consolations of God? As in the Gospel, when the Disciples prayed Christ to eat, he told them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of (John 4. 31, 32.) Christ had secret bread, his work was his food, My meat is to do the will of him that sent me: So here, What? hast thou meat which we know not of? Some hidden Manna beyond what we have told thee of, that thou carest not for our provisions?

Ista quas ab ipso Deo acceptas affirmamus consolationes leviores sunt quam ut eas probare possis: nimirum quod apud te quidpiam magis reconditū delitescat. Bez. Aut aliquid abscondit eas apud te. Jun.

Secondly, others give the meaning thus, Hast thou some secret conceit of thy own wisdom, above ours? Or is there some unknown worth in thee, that exempts thee from this general rule, or way of comfort? Dost thou so abound in thy own sence, that thou hast no need of our Notions? Is all we speak below thee?

Thirdly, They are supposed to aim at some secret sin or guilt, which hindred and unfitted Job to take in their Cordials and Consolations, till it were purged out, or vomited up by sound repentance.

So one renders the Text, Doth any thing hide them with thee? The word signifies to hide and cover (2 Sam. 19. 4.) David covered his face: So here, Doth somewhat hide, wrap up, and cover these consolations that thou canst not receive them? Or what vails the eye of thy mind, that thou canst not behold what we hold out to thee, or not find out the meaning of it? If our Gospel be hid (saith the Apostle) it is hid to those that are lost, in whom the God of this world hath blinded the eyes of them, &c. (2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.) Thus Eliphaz seems to bespeak Job. If the consolations of God be small to thee, doth not some cloud hide them from thee? Doth not prejudice against us, or some close sin in thy self interrupt thy sight?

i. e. Ira perstringit oculos animi tui, ut illas non percipias, quas res involucris sectas. Jun.

This is hinted by the old Latine Translator, who saith, Thy evil words (or the evil matter that is in thee) hinder this.

Verba tua prava hoc prohibent. Vulg.

One of the Rabbins glosseth it thus, and the Original reaches it, Some lye, some inchantment, or witchery hath seized upon thee, though thou pretendest truth. The Apostle speaks to this sence (Gal. 3. 1.) O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that you should not receive the truth: Witchery or Inchantment gives a secret wound. Is there any secret thing with thee? Hast thou any secret comfort for thy self, any secret conceit of thy self, any secret sin in thy bosom hindering the effectual working, or due prizing of those Cordials which we have given thee?

Apud te potius est incantatio & mendacium etsi præ te veritatem feras. Rab. Abr.

The first of these secrets things never stands in the way of receiving consolation; he that hath hidden comfort in him, will not refuse spoken comforts; nor do I think that Eliphaz aimed at that, unless in scorn, as some resolve it; but rather at one of, or both the latter, though mistaken in both. Yet his suspition gives us a ground for these two Observations.

> First, That a man who is full of his own wisdom, is not fit to receive instruction, counsel, or consolation from others; that which is within hinders that which comes from without.

Malo in bonum sumi, licet hoc in eum Eliphaz dicat, eum ridens. Merc.

When a man thinks himself wiser then his teachers, he will not be taught, nor learn wisdom by them. Some might have known much, if they had not presumed they knew enough. There is no greater impediment of knowledge, then an opinion of it.

> Secondly, Observe, A sin kept close, or secret within us, hinders the effect and working of the word.

Intus existens prohibet alienum.

Though comforts and counsels are given, they will not operate, where secret corruption lyes at heart; the filthiness and corruption of the stomach hinders digestion, till it be purged out: Physitians remove ill humours before they prescribe Cordials, else they do but nourish the disease. 'Tis so in Spirituals; the Apostle Peter gives the rule (1 Epist. 2. 1.) Wherefore laying aside all guile, hypocrisie, and envy, and evil speaking, as new born Babes desire the sincere milk of the Word, that ye may grow thereby. As if he had said, Till you cast out these, you will never thrive under the Word: If a man be to sow Seed in his Garden, he will pull up the Weeds, and throw away the Stones, else the Seed will not spring up to perfection. The Prophet tells the Jews (Jer. 5. 25.) Your sins hinder good things from you: As sin hinders good from coming to us, so it hinders the Word from working good in us. Though the proper business of the Word be to cast out, or pull up this secret sin, yet there is a great stop given it while any secret sin is nourished, or not cast out. That's the reason why so many precious promises take not upon the heart, some sin, some corruption obstructs their operation, and (like the thief in the Candle) wasteth away their strength and light.

As the Lord said to Joshua, when the people of Israel fled before the men of Ai, There is some accursed thing among you, therefore they cannot stand before their enemies. So I may say, when any stand up against the Word of God, or resist the consolations which are offered them, sure there is some accursed thing, some hidden Wedge of stoln Gold, or some Babylonish Garment treasured in, or wrapt about your hearts, and therefore ye can neither see nor submit to the counsels of God for your good.

This is a useful truth for us, though an undue charge on Job; and yet his Friend proceeds (if a higher charge can be) to charge him higher, as will appear in the two Verses following.

FEliphaz insists still upon that unpleasant subject of reproof, the fifth ground whereof here proposed, is Job's over-confident sticking to his own principles, or his overweening his own opinion. This reproof is couched in the twelfth and thirteenth Verses.

Verse 12. Why doth thy heart carry thée away?

He speaks by way of Question, or as some expound him, by way of admiration: As if he had said, It is strange, even a wonder to me, that thy heart thus carryes thee away: The word which we translate, to carry away, signifies to take up, or barely to take, and lay hold upon; Why doth thy heart? The heart is the whole inward man; here more specially, the affections; Why do thy affections master thy judgment? Why are thy passions too hard for thy reason? Others give the sence thus, How can thy heart hold thee? As if Job had grown too big for himself; as if he had been so proud and arrogant, so transported with self-conceit, that he could not contain himself, and keep his bounds, or as if he had not stowage enough for his own thoughts. A third thus (which comes near the same sence) What doth thy heart attribute or ascribe to thee? Sure thy heart doth give thee some great titles, such as these, Job the wise, Job the holy, the just, the sincere; thy heart sets thee out sure, and gilds thee over with attributes beyond thy deserving.

Master Broughton, following one of the Rabbins, presents us with a different translation from either of these, What Doctrine can thy heart give thee? Or, What can thy heart teach thee? The word which we render to take, to carry, or hold up a thing, signifies also to learn or teach Doctrine; but rather to learn then to teach, as Grammarians tell us, which somewhat abates the clearness of that version; yet the Chalde Paraphrase follows the same sence, What hath thy own thought taught thee? What learnest thou there? As if Eliphaz had said, Thou hast an evil heart, and surely an ill Master will teach but ill Doctrine; when the heart is inditing of a good matter (Psal. 45.) then we may learn good good lessons from the heart; and then we speak most effectually to the hearts of others, when we speak from our own hearts, they having first been spoken to by the Spirit of God. But a corrupt heart can teach no better then it hath, and that is corrupt Doctrines. These are truths, yet too much strained for upon this Text; and therefore I pass from them, and abide by the ordinary signification of the word as we read it, Why doth thy heart take thee up, or carry thee away? As if he had said, Thy heart hath seized upon thee, and arrested thee, thou art led away prisoner, or captive by the violence and impetuousness of thy own spirit.

The word is applyed (Ezek. 23. 14.) to the motion of the Spirit of God, sent unto Ezekiel to instruct him; The Spirit lifted me up, or caught me away; that which the good Spirit did unto Ezekiel (not only upon his spirit, but upon his body, for he was corporally carryed away from the place where he was) that the heart of Job (as Eliphaz conceived) did unto him, it lifted him up, and carryed him away. There is a kind of violence in the allurements and inticings of the heart. As a man is said to be carryed away by the ill counsels of others, so also by his own.

In the former sence the word is used, Prov. 6.25. where Solomon adviseing to take heed of the Harlot, saith he, Keep thee from the evil woman, from the flattery of the tongue of a strange woman; lust not after her in thy heart, neither let her take thee with her eye-lids: There he makes use of this word, let her not take thee, or let her not carry thee away upon her eye-lids, let not her wanton eye flatter thee to the sin of wantonness and uncleanness. As the eye of a whorish woman, so the whorish heart of a man, often takes and carryeth him away.

Hence Observe, The heart hath power over, and is too hard for the whole man.

Passions hurry our hearts, and our hearts hurry us; and who can tell whither his heart will carry him, or where it will set him down, when once it hath taken him up. This is certain, it will carry every man beyond the bounds of his duty, both to God and man: Take it more distinctly in these three particulars.

First, The heart quickly carryeth us beyond the bounds of grace.

Secondly, The heart often carryeth us beyond the bounds of reason; When passion works much, reason works not all.

Thirdly, It may carry us beyond the bounds of honesty, yea, of modesty: 'Tis very dangerous to commit our selves to the conduct of passion; that (unless kept under good command) will soon run us beyond the line both of Modesty and of Honesty, of Reason, and of Grace. He that is carryed away thus far must make a long journey of repentance, before he can return and come back, either to God, or to himself. Some have been carried visibly away by the Devil, by an evil spirit without them (if God give commission, or permission, the Devil can easily do it) very many are carryed away by the evil spirit within them. An evil heart is as bad as the Devil; the evil spirit without, and the evil spirit within, carry us both the same way, and that is quite out of the way.

Consider further how the heart carryeth us away, even from spiritual duties and holy services; and this is not only the case of carnal men (who are given up to their hearts lusts) but of the Saints; their hearts are continually lifting at them, and sometimes they are carryed quite away from Prayer, and from hearing the Word: The heart lifts the man up, and steals him out of the Congregation, while his body remains there; the body sits still, but the mind which is the man, is gone, either about worldly business and designs, or about worldly pleasures and delights. He stirs not a foot, nor moves a finger, and yet he is carryed all the world over: He visits both the Indies, yet steps not over his own threshold. Thus the heart being carryed away, carryeth the man away. And that's the reason why God calls so earnestly, My Son give me thy heart; for where our hearts go, we go, or we are carryed with them; Keep thy heart with all diligence (Prov. 4. 24.) Or, With all keeping, or above all keeping; it must have double keeping, double guards, keep, keep, watch, watch, thy heart will be gone else, and thou wilt go with it; if thou look not to thy heart, thy heart will quickly withdraw it self, and draw thee along also: Why doth thy heart carry thee away? is a deserved check upon every man, when his heart doth so; and Let not thy heart carry thee away, is a necessary caution for every man, lest his heart should do so. Job's heart was too busie with him, though not so busie as Eliphaz judged, when he thus checkt him, with, Why doth thy heart carry thee away?

And what doth thine eye wink at?

But is it a fault to wink with the eye? It is said (John 13. 24.) that Peter beckened to, or winked at John. (the Greek word signifieth an inviting gesture by the whole head, or by the eye) he winkt at him, I say, To ask Christ who it was of whom he spake: There was no fault in that, but Eliphaz finds fault with this: What was the supposed fault? There is a twofold faulty winking.

First, When we wink at faults, our own faults, or the faults of other men, to bear with, or approve them.

Secondly, When we wink at the vertues and good deeds of others to slight and undervalue them; possibly Eliphaz taxeth Job for both these, as if he winked at his own faults, or would not see them, and that he winked at their faithful dealings, as slighting, or not regarding them: Yet further and more distinctly.

The word which we translate to wink, is found only in this Text all the Bible over. It properly signifies to insinuate by the eye, to speak or make significant tokens by the eye; there is a language of the eye, as well as of the tongue; here Job's eye gave some ill language to the eye or apprehension of Eliphaz. There are various opinions about it.

First, Some interpret it as a note of opposition against, or of dissatisfaction with the counsels which his Friends gave him, as was lately hinted. Shutting of the eye, imports shutting of the mind, or a refusal of what is spoken. When God judicially closed the eyes of the Jews, saying to the Prophet (Isa. 6. 10.) Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; this shewed the shutting of their minds against the truth: So also doth a voluntary or an affected shutting of the eye in some men, though in others it is an act of stronger attention, or intention of their spirits to what is spoken, which some take to be the English of Job's winking, as we shall see a little after.

Secondly, This winking with the eye, is expounded by others, though not as an opposition against what he heard, yet as the gesture of a negligent and careless hearer. They who speak, take it ill to have either ill looks, or not to be looked upon by their hearers. The attentiveness of the ear may be much discerned by the eye: One of the old moral Philosophers, in his discourse about hearing, numbers winking among the vices and offensive behaviours of a Hearer. When the Lord Christ preached (Luke 4. 20.) It is said, That the eyes of all that were in the Synagogue were fastned on him. A fastened eye is the note of a fixed heart, as a wandring eye is of a wandring heart. They fastened their eyes upon him; as if they meant to hear with their eyes, as well as with their ears. A winking eye is a moveable and an unsettled eye, and therefore may well be the discoverer of an unsetled Spirit.

Thirdly, This winking with the eye is also a sign of disdain and scorn. As if Eliphaz had said, The pride of thy heart sparkles at thine eye; while we are counselling and comforting thee, thou art scorning us. The Ancients were very critical about the eye, much of a man may be seen at his eye. As a man sees, so he is seen by his own eyes. The frame of the heart appears much in the eye; a joyful or a sorrowful frame of heart, an humble or a proud frame of heart, a contented, or discontented, an amicable, or a scornful frame of heart appears at the eye. As the ear and nostrils of the Horse discover him most, according to the rules of Naturalists, so the eye of man is the greatest discoverer of man, whether we consider the constitution or the actions of it. And that this action of winking is an argument of a scornful spirit, or the action of a scorner, appears from David's petition, or deprecation (Psal. 35. 19.) Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoyce over me, neither let them wink with the eye, that hate me without a cause: It may seem to be a strange piece of prayer; Why would not David have his enemy wink? What was that to him? The meaning is this, Let not mine enemies have any occasion to scorn and deride me, to boast and insult over me.

There are two sins which are very visible in the eye: The first is wantonness, (Isa. 3. 16.) Because the Daughters of Sion are haughty, and walk with stretched forth necks, and wanton eyes: The Hebrew is, Deceiving with their eye: And the Apostle Peter in his second Epistle, Chap. 2. 14. gives this character of some, They have eyes full of adultery; you may perceive the filthiness and uncleanness of their hearts staring out of their eyes. The second sin which is so visible in the eye, is Pride; Solomon speaks of a proud look (Prov. 6. 17.) Six things the Lord hateth; yea, seven are an abomination to him: And the first of the seven is, A proud look: The Hebrew is, Haughty eyes: Pride and haughtiness are seated, yea, conspicuously enthroned in the eye.

Ad simulatam quandâ innocentiæ significationem & sanctitatis speciem, quod hypocrisin redolet referri potest.

Fourthly, These words, Why winkest thou with thine eye? are expounded as a repoof of hypocrisie and seeming holiness: As if Eliphaz had said, Thou lookest very demurely, and innocently, as if (according to our old Proverb) Butter would not melt in thy mouth; or as if thou wert speaking familiarly to God. For as lifting up the eyes, or looking to Heaven, is a gesture of holy worship. (John 17. 1.) Then Jesus lift up his eyes to Heaven: So also is winking with the eye. It is very usual with many to shut or wink with their eyes in prayer, that so their spirits may be more composed, and freer from distraction. 'Tis not unlikely that Eliphaz observed Job winking with his eyes, as if he had set himself to seek God; this provoked him, What? such a one as thou, a hypocrite, a wicked man, what thou go to God? Wilt thou wink with thy eyes, as if thou wert wrapt up in some Divine meditation; whereas we have ground rather to conclude, that thou art devising mischief: There are two Texts in the Proverbs, which give some light to this Interpretation, Prov. 6. 13. He winketh with his eye, he speaketh with his feet, teacheth with his fingers, frowardness is in his heart, he deviseth mischief continually: Solomon puts a winking eye and a froward mischief-devising heart together: As if he had said, A wicked man (for of him he speaks in the former Verse) winks with the eye, as if he had some high rapture, whereas his mind is set upon mischief, and pursuing the worst of evils. Again, Prov. 10. 10. He that winketh with his eye causeth sorrow: But how doth a man that winketh with the eye cause sorrow? What dependence is there between these two, sorrow, and winking, that the one should cause the other? These words, He that winketh with his eye, are the description of a deceitful man; such a one may cause sorrow enough, both to himself and others. Solomon intends, not a simple, but a subtil sly winking with the eye; and so the Syriack readeth it: He who winketh with his eye deceitfully, causeth sorrow: Deceit makes the deceived sorrowful, and it will make the deceiver sorrowful; he must either be sorrowful to repentance, or feel the sorrow of punishment.

Quid collimant oculi tui. Jun. Metaphora à jaculatoribus sumpta. Id.

Fifthly, This winking with the eye, is conceived to be a Metaphor taken from those who shoot with Guns or Bows: Gunners and Archers wink when they shoot, that they may take aim the better: The contracting of the sight, strengthens it. So here, What dost thou wink at? That is, What dost thou aim at? The eye of a mans mind aims at some mark in meditation; and hence it is usual for a man in vehement meditation, to wink with his eye: As if Eliphaz had said, Surely thou hast some great design, some grand plot in thy brain, thou pretendest to some deep wisdom, or unheard of policies; thou hast set up some fair mark before thy fancy, and thou wilt be sure to hit it; What is it that thou aimest at? We find the phrase used in this sence, Prov. 16. 30. He shutteth his eye to devise froward things, moving his lips he bringeth evil to pass: He shutteth his eyes, as if he would make his thoughts more steddy and fixt, to hit or reach that froward device which he is casting about how he may effect. And as a wicked man shuts his eyes to devise froward, that is, sinful things; so a good man shuts his eyes (lest variety of objects should divert or call off his mind) when he is devising and studying what is best both for himself and others. The rendring of the Vulgar Latine, though it be far from the letter of the Original, and is rather a Paraphrase than a Translation, yet it reacheth this sense fully; Wherefore doth thy heart carry thee away, and why liftest thou up thine eyes, as if thou wert thinking of some great matter? Or, As if the affairs of Kingdomes and States depended upon thy care, or were committed to thy trust.

Et quasi magna cogitans attonitos habes oculos. Vulg. Oculos in cœlo defigere solent cogitabundi & quibus gravis inest solicitudo. Sanct.

All these interpretations are serviceable to the Text before us; and though we cannot positively and particularly resolve which of them was here intended by Eliphaz, yet considering that his scope was to reprove Job, we may take in the sense of them all, and conclude, that he censured Job in this one word, of all those miscarriages of the heart, which may be signified at the eye; as appears by the inference which he makes in the next Verse: For having said, What doth thy eye wink at? He presently subjoynes:

Verse 13. That thou turnest thy spirit against God, and lettest such words go out of thy mouth?

So that this Verse is an explication of the former, and gives us more clearly what Eliphaz meant by the carrying away of the heart, and the winking of the eye: His heart is carried out of all bounds, who turneth his spirit against God: His eye winks sinfully, whose mouth presently upon it speaks unduely. Thou winkest with thy eye, thou art very thoughtfull, and what the fruit or birth of thy thoughts is, we may discern by thy speech, while thou lettest such words go out of thy mouth.

Explicationem continet præcedentis versiculi. Bold.

Thou turnest thy spirit against God.] As if he had said, Instead of humbling thy self under the punishment of thy sin, thou with an incensed mind contestest against God himself: and though while he saith against God, he doth not mean God directly, but God in his judgments and counsells, in his Word, or in his Works; yet this is a very high charge, one of the highest that is in the whole Book, but very unjust. Indeed Job used some passionate speeches to his Friends; and these Eliphaz judgeth to proceed from an opposition against God. Thou turnest thy Spirit against God.

There is a twofold turning the spirit against God:

First, Natural, Rom. 8. 7. Enmity is the turning of the spirit. The wisdome or lust of the flesh is enmity against God.

Secondly, Improved, when we heighten this opposition in our practice, and are enemies to God in our minds; or Gods hearty enemies by wicked works, Col. 1. 21.

Quod rediri fecerit ad Deum spiritum tuum. Heb. Quia respondit ad Deum spiritus tuus. Mont. Perire facit verbum qui respondet Drus.

The Hebrew is, Thou makest thy spirit to return to God, which is expounded two wayes; First, thou makest thy spirit to turn upon, or against God: Secondly, thy spirit answers or replieth upon God; both meet in one meaning; for though there may be a turning away of the spirit without answering, yet (in one sense) all answers are the turning of our spirit: if any man ask a question, the answer is the return of his mind who makes the answer; so some render, Why doth thy spirit return answer to God; as if he rebuked him for his boldness in replying. Thy spirit returns upon God, if he speak one word, thou wilt have two; in that sense the word is used, Titus 2. 9. where the Apostle giving rules (among other relations) to Servants, charges them; Servants be obedient to your own Masters, and please them well in all things, not answering again. But, is it a fault for a Servant when asked a question, to make an answer? No, it were a fault not to answer. The meaning is, that a Servant being reproved for a fault, must not answer; that is, his spirit must not rise, and return against his Master; or if a Servant be directed to do any warrantable work, he must not answer again; that is, he must not contradict or murmur at the orders which he hath received, but address himself to the fulfilling of them; this is the answering again, reproved as a fault in Servants, which is rather gainsaying than answering, as we put in the margent of our Bibles: in which sense, answering is taken here, according to this interpretation. Thy spirit answers God, or turns against him. We may clear it also by that of the Apostle (Rom. 9. 20.) Where, having shewed the absolute sovereignty of God in his decrees and purposes, by the example of Jacob and Esau, as also by that of Pharaoh, He concludes, Vers. 18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardneth: Saint Paul

Paul fore-saw that this Doctrine would raise a great deal of dust, and cause many to turn their spirits against God, which he thus represents (*Vers.*19.) Thou wilt say unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? for who hath resisted his will? Nay, but O man, who art thou that replyest against God? What? wilt thou chop Logick with God himself? Wilt thou (as the Margent saith) answer again, or dispute with God? Hold thy peace, quiet thy self, What's the matter, that thou turnest thy spirit against God?

Spiritus pro arrogantia. Latine dicitur magnos gerere animos qui superbia tumet. Merc. Quid tumet adversus Deum spiritus tuus? Vulg. Quid torva convertis in cœlum Lumina? quid in Deum refundis stomachum & evocas conceptam iram. Pined. Animum indignatione accensum. Jun. Omnem spiritum suum depromit stultus, i.e. iram. Aben Ezra. Rege animum. i. e. iram. Horat.

Spirit is here put for the will, thoughts, and counsels of man, cloathed and elated with arrogancy, stoutness, and pride: In all Languages, Spirit imports that which is high. And to say, such a one is a man of spirit, notes not only the activeness of that man, but often his pride and haughtiness.

Besides, Spirit is sometimes put for indignation, for fury, and wrath; in all which acceptions, the word may be rendred here, Thou turnest thy spirit; that is, thy anger and wrath, thy fury and indignation against God. So the word is used, *Isa.*25.4. When the spirit, or blast of the terrible ones, is as a storm against the Wall; that is, while the fury of the terrible ones is in its highest march and motion, God promiseth to be a strength to the poor, a strength and a refuge to the needy in his distress: So Prov. 29.11. A fool uttereth all his mind, or all his spirit; that is, all his anger, he lets it out, and discovers himself presently; but a wise man (if there be cause of anger) keepeth it in till afterwards; that is, till a fit season. He hath a retentive faculty which the Fool hath not. Now in which sense soever of these explained, we understand Spirit in the present Text, the charge is as high as it can go upon any man, when 'tis said, He turneth his Spirit against God. Hence Observe:

> To turn the spirit against God, is the very spirit of ungodliness; there is no greater wickedness than this.

A godly man may do an act which is against God, but his spirit cannot act against God; that's the character of the wicked. A godly man delights in the Law of God, according to the inward man, whilst the outward man sins against the Law of God; an ungodly man turns his inward man against the Law of God, while his outward man pretends obedience to it; and as it is an act of highest disobedience, so of the proudest pride to turn the spirit against God. The Vulgar Latine translates it well, Why doth thy spirit swell against God? Thou hast an impostumation in thy spirit against God; yea, it is not only an act of the proudest pride, but of the maddest madness, to turn the spirit against God; so the Septuagint gives it, Thou hast caused thy fury or thy madness to break forth before God; he that acts against God, is a mad-man indeed, Will ye provoke the Lord? are you stronger than he? Is the Apostles chiding question to such mad-men; Are you so mad after your lusts? hath sin made you so foolish? Have you lost both grace and reason at once? that you dare thus provoke the Lord, and challenge the Almighty? God resisteth the proud, and the proud assault him; Grace turns the spirit to God, repentance is the return of our spirits to God; then what is the turning of our spirits against God, but a clear demonstration of a totally impenitent and graceless spirit?

Furorem erupisti ante dominum. Sept.

Again, when Eliphaz saith, Job turned his Spirit against God, he doth not mean it of a direct or professed opposition against God, as if Job had openly defied him, and blasphemed his Name; but his meaning is, that Job shewing so much impatience and unsatisfiedness of spirit, under the dealings of God with him, did not submit to God as he ought. Eliphaz (I conceive) did not so much as suspect that Job turned his spirit immediately; or, as we say, point blank against God himself, but only against his dispensations. Hence observe:

> That while we speak, or our hearts rise up against the dealings of God with our selves or others, we may be said to turn our spirits against God himself.

Many who think they have not neglected Christ, will be found to have neglected him, because they have neglected those by whom, or that wherein Christ is offered. The Evangelist brings in Christ speaking thus (*Matth.*25.) I was hungry and ye fed me not, thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; they to whom he speaks, wonder at this; Lord, (say they) when saw we thee hungry, and gave thee no meat, or thirsty, and gave thee no drink? surely, we have not been guilty of such a wickedness: Yea, saith Christ, In as much as ye did it not to one of these, ye did it not to me; when ye refused to feed these, ye refused to feed me; I was in these, and these were in me. Now in the same manner, many will say, when we charge them with turning their spirits against God, with fighting against, and opposing God: Who? we oppose God? we never opposed God as we know of; yea, peradventure, they will say, we have honoured God; and do you charge us that we have turned our spirit against God? To many such God will say, Inasmuch as ye opposed my word, and murmured against my works; inasmuch as ye were angry with my dispensations, and discontented with what I have done; ye have turned your spirit against me. We may become guilty of this sin before we think of it; for as there is a direct and literal contending with God, so an equivalent, or constructive contending with him. As some men commit plain, open Treason against a State, but others commit only constructive Treason: 'Tis so here; the God of heaven knows when spirits turn against him directly, and when by consequence; and he will take vengeance, not only of direct and avowed, but also of consequential and constructive Treason against his Sovereignty, unless the offender repent, and be humbled before him. He will judge thousands at the last day, for opposing him, who, it may be, in some things have pleaded for him; yea, who have in some things not only acted, but suffered for him; though usually, when the spirit of any man turneth against God, that mans works and words turn against him too: So Eliphaz further taxeth Job in the latter clause of the Verse.

And lettest such words go out of thy mouth.] As if he had said, Such stuff as thou hast in thy heart, even such flows out of thy mouth; the word Such is added by most Translators; the Hebrew is, And lettest words go out of thy mouth; It is no fault to let words go out of the mouth: 'tis no sin to speak, but to speak such or such words, may be very sinful; and therefore we, and others, for explication sake, make this supplement, Such words; But what words were they? Eliphaz doth not quote any passages in his speech, but leaves them, as we and others translate, under a term of general distaste, Such words; as if they were not worth the naming; or as if no epithite could be found worthless enough to name them by. For as when Ezra would describe a deliverance, in the reality of it, beyond words, he doth not tell us what it was, but saith only, Seeing our God hath given us such deliverance as this. (*Ez.*9.13.) So when Eliphaz would describe words in the vanity or sinfulness of them, below words, he doth not tell us what they were, but saith onely, Such words as these; yet possibly the words he means were these, Why hast thou set me as a mark, so that I am a burden to my self (Chap.7.20.) or these (Chap. 9.30.) If I wash me with Snow-water, and make my hands never so clear, yet thou wilt plunge me in the ditch; or these, (Chap.13.26.) Thou writest bitter things against me, and thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth: These, or such as these, were the words which Eliphaz leaves under this note of disdain, Such words. Yet these Eliphaz should have mollified with a charitable construction, and not have sharpned his own tongue against them, much less should he have interpreted them, as the turning of Jobs spirit against God himself. For as some draw near to God with their lips, and give him smooth words, while their hearts are far from him, and their spirits turned against him; So others may seem to depart from God with their lips, and give him harsh language, while their hearts are near, and their spirits cleave unto him.

I shall further give you a four-fold character of these words, futable to the misprision which Eliphaz and his Friends had of him all along. Such words, or words so apprehended, must needs sound harshly in their ears, and in the ears of any man fearing God.

First, Proud words of himself, insisting upon his own righteousness, as they conceived, for in the next words Eliphaz saith, What is man that he should be clean? they thought Job spake much to paint and bedeck himself with his own goodness and innocency.

Secondly, Blasphemous words of God, though not directly, yet by consequence, against his works and dealings.

Thirdly, Reproachful, scornful words against them, as if they were neither able, nor worthy to be his counsel; You are the men, and wisdome shall dye with you.

Fourthly, False words upon the whole matter in controversie, maintaining (as Eliphaz judged) contrary to the truth; that he was not punished for his sin. Words under this fourfold notion are reproveable and sinful enough; such Eliphaz esteemed the words of Job to be, proud, blasphemous, reproachful, false; Why lettest thou such words as these go out of thy mouth? Hence Observe:

First, Passion within will vent it self by words without.

When the heart is carried away, and the spirit turned against God, no marvel if the tongue be carried away, and the words of such a man be turned both against God, his truth, or people.

Secondly, Note: Our words are suitable to our spirits.

Some can dissemble much, and speak golden words, while themselvs are dross; but ordinarily, our words are such as we are: The vile person will speak villany, (Isa. 32.6.) A man that is all for the world, speaks worldly (1 John 4. 5.) They are of the world, therefore speak they of the world. Every man is of the world so, as that he is a part of the world; but some are so of the world, that the world is all them; they who are thus of the world, must needs speak of the world, if they speak any thing, for they have nothing else to speak of. Thus a covetous man speaks covetously, and a proud man proudly (Jerem. 43.2.) Some told the Prophet to his face, Thou speakest falsly, the Lord our God hath not sent thee to say, Go not into Egypt to sojourn there; These were proud words indeed, but who spake them? The Text tells us, Then spake Azariah the Son of Hoshaniah, and all the proud men: The proud men spake proudly; so on the contrary, a sober man will speak soberly, an humble man humbly; The poor speak supplications, saith Solomon; rich men speak their commands, poor men speak their wishes and desires.

Thirdly, Observe: He that dares to speak evil, is arrived at a great height of evil.

Eliphaz puts this as an effect of a heart turned against God; Such words as these, shew that thou art not onely a sinful man, but impudent in sinning. For though an evil heart is worse than an evil tongue, and an ill thought than an evil word; yet when ill words spring from ill thoughts, and are as branches growing from the root of an evil heart, this shews a man heightned in sin; Sin hath got the mastery of the heart, when it freely vents it self at the tongue. Some keep their sins down by hypocrisie, and some by common modesty; they are either so cunning that they will not, or so bashful that they dare not speak out the filth that lies within. But they are beyond, not only modesty, but hypocrisie, whose tongues can speak all the evil that is in their heart; though the sin of the heart be worse than the sin of the tongue; yet when tongue sins are steep'd in the puddle of a corrupt heart, they are most unsavoury: David sinned, when he said, in his haste, all men are lyars: How greatly then do they sin, who tell lyes at their leisure, and speak evil with deliberation. That which is said in haste, is said by the tongue alone, without the privity of the heart, but the heart is alwayes privy to that which is said at leisure. The Prophet taxeth those, the shew of whose countenance did testifie against them (Isa. 3.9) They fall justly under as severe a censure, the sound of whose tongues doth testifie against them, for they also (as it follows in the Prophet) declare their sin as Sodom, they hid it not. Further, this also argues the evil of evil speaking, because it wrongs others, and infects the Auditors: the vanity or errour of the mind spoken out, is contagious; better keep it in, than speak it out, but both are naught: 'tis onely good, when we purge it out. Though it be some allay and lessening, yet it is no excuse for sin, that we keep it in; God hates it, let it lye as close as it will; and though a sin kept close doth not hurt others; yet it is not onely hurtful, but deadly to its keeper. They onely are out of danger, who, as they do not let evil go out of the door of their mouths, so not lodge in the chambers of their heart.

Thus I have opened the charge contained in this part of the Chapter; in all which, Eliphaz hath reproved the speech of Job, as vain, empty, proud, passionate, and erroneous.

He now proceeds to shew him (as he supposed) the errour of his opinion, and to confute it.

VERS. 14, 15, 16.

What is man that he should be clean? and he that is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?
Behold, he putteth not his trust in Saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight:
How much more abominable and filthy is man, which drinketh iniquity like water?

ELiphaz hath done reproving Job for his unprofitable words, and uncomely carriage; he now proceeds to convince him of his supposed errour in judgment, and unsound opinion; namely, That he boasted himself free from errour in practice, and sound at heart: This he looked upon as the Bulwark in which Job defended himself, and against this he now raises his battery to beat it down. And this takes up the second part of the Chapter, which I called Confutation.

Jam rem aggreditur & Jobi præcipuum firmamentum quo ille nitebatur evertit, quod ille se innocentem & justum diceret. Qua fronte inquit audes id dicere. Merc.

Verse 14. What is man that he should be clean?

As if he had said, Though I should grant that thou art not conscious to thy self of any crime or wickedness acted, for which thou art thus afflicted; yet this is enough to prove thee a sinner, that thou art a man, and that thou art unrighteous, because thou art born of a woman; What is man that he should be clean, and he that is born of woman that he should be righteous?

What is man?] He speaks contemptuously, What is man? As Hiram said of the Cities which Solomon assigned him, What Cities are these which thou hast given me, my brother? And he called them the land of Cabul, that is, displeasing, or dirty (1 Kings 9.13.) Thus Eliphaz speaks of man, as if he were displeased with the sight of him, or remembred onely the dust and clay out of which he was made, What is man (my friend Job) that he should be clean?

Job had spoken the same language before (Chap. 7. 17.) What is man that thou art thus mindful of him, &c. He also empties man of all worth, which should attract the least respect from God upon him: What is man? puts a five fold slight upon man.

First, In his nature.
Secondly, In his birth.
Thirdly, In the matter out of which he was made.
Fourthly, In reference to his present condition.
Fifthly, and chiefly, In reference to his corruption, or sinful depravation, What is man that he should be clean?

But had Job any where asserted himself clean? Did he not assert his own uncleanness, while he proclaimed that Negative Question (Chap. 14. *v.*4.) Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one. Why then doth Eliphaz charge Job with this boast of cleanness, who never thought himself clean, as his discourse every where demonstrates, but under two notions: First, as righteous by another, or through Faith in the Messias: Secondly, as not scandalous to others by any notorious crime, or conscious to himself of any close hypocrisie; in any other sense than this Job never asserted himself clean, and in this he was, yea, every believer is clean. Yet Eliphaz fastens it upon him, as if he had trim'd up himself with his own ornaments, or had advanced the Doctrine of Self-perfection.

Hence observe in general; That, When persons are ingaged in a dispute, specially in a difficult controversie, they seldome understand, but seldomer report the truth of each others position.

Some of Calvins adversaries called his Doctrine by the odious names of Turcism and Judaism: And the Papists call us Solifidians, as if we denied all good works, because we affirm, that a man is justified (though not by that Faith which is alone) yet by Faith alone without works. Job indeed had spoken much to vindicate himself, but he spake much more to abase, and lay himself low in the sight of God; and therefore Eliphaz might have made a fairer collection for him than this, that he affirmed himself clean.

What

What is man, &c. The Hebrew is, Miſerable man. Miſerable is his name, and miſery is with him, frail is his name, and frailty is with him. Hence Mr. Broughton tranſlates, What is woful man, to be cleared?

אנש Nomen humanæ fragilitati ſignificandæ appoſitum.

What is man that he ſhould be clean?] The words contain a great and neceſſary truth, but becauſe we met with it Chap. 14. 4. where the point was opened, and the impoſſibility of ſelf-cleanneſs cleared from thoſe words: Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? (which queſtion anſwers for Job, that he was poſitive for the univerſal pollution of the nature of man) I ſhall not therefore ſtay upon it; take onely this brief hint. Here is a ſtrong proof of original ſin, we are clean, but not of our ſelves; we are clean, under a four-fold notion.

Firſt, Clean, meritoriouſly, by Chriſt.

Secondly, Clean efficaciouſly, by the ſpirit uniting us to Chriſt, and ſanctifying our hearts.

Thirdly, Clean inſtrumentally, by the Word, which diſcovers Chriſt the fountain to us, and ſo purifies us (John 15. 4.) You are clean through the word which I have ſpoken unto you.

Fourthly, We are clean impulſively and attractively, by faith, (Acts 15. 8.) He made no difference, purifying their hearts by Faith; thus many are clean, and but thus there is no man clean; What is man that he ſhould be clean?

And he that is born of a woman that he ſhould be righteous?

יצדק & יובה Quando conjunguntur diſtinguenda ſunt, illud latius patet; hoc dicitur cum reus à judice abſolutus dimittitur. Illo autem non tantum innocentia ſed & dignitas notatur. Coc.

Both parts of the Verſe import the ſame thing. Clean and righteous are near of one ſignification, yet in this place we may diſtinguiſh them; To be clean, refers to the purity of mans nature; to be righteous, or to be juſtified (for ſo the word may be tranſlated) refers to the integrity of his life; from both it follows, Man cannot merit, for he is not clean: he cannot anſwer God, for he is not righteous. As if Eliphaz had ſaid, What is man that he ſhould either have any cleanneſs in himſelf, or that he ſhould be reputed and looked upon as righteous by others, (Both which he intends as applicable to Job.) If God ſhould ſearch thy nature, what art thou that thou ſhouldeſt be clean? If God ſhould ſearch thy life, what art thou that thou ſhouldeſt be righteous? The point of mans utter inability to ſtand before God in himſelf for juſtification, hath been met with, more than once before, and therefore I will not ſtay upon that neither, only conſider the form of expreſſion, or the periphraſis of Man.

Emphaticè mulieris meminit. Ut Cap. 14. 1. Merc.

He that is born of a woman.] In the firſt clauſe he ſaith, What is man, in this latter, What is he that is born of a woman: He ſpeaks of man in both, yet with an additional emphaſis, to mind us of our birth and original, as was ſhewed upon thoſe words (Chap. 14. 1.) Man that is born of a woman is of few dayes, and full of trouble: where the Reader may find what that teacheth, even an aggravation of mans ſinfulneſs, in that he is born of a woman, who ſinned firſt, or was, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks (1 Tim. 2. 14.) Firſt in the Tranſgreſſion. How prone is man to ſin, being born of a woman, who was ſo prone to ſin, that ſhe was the firſt ſinner? What is he that is born of a woman that he ſhould be righteous? The whole race of mankind hath yielded but one exception to this general Rule, and that was in the perſon of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: He indeed was born of a woman, and yet righteous, becauſe his Mothers conception was of the Holy Ghoſt (Matt. 1. 20.) and by the power of the moſt High over-ſhadowing her, Luke 1. 35. But we may ſay of all men, except him, (who was alſo infinitely more than man, even God-man) What is he that is born of a woman, that he ſhould be righteous?

Secondly, Eliphaz proceeds (though the point be clear in it ſelf) to give a proof of it, which he urgeth from the greater to the leſs.

Verſ. 15. Behold he putteth no truſt in his Saints, and the heavens are not clean in his ſight: How much more abominable and filthy is man, &c.

The Argument riſes thus:

If they who are the pureſt, the holieſt creatures, are not able to ſtand before God in their own purity, how ſhall he who hath no purity, no holineſs at all in him?

But the Heavens, yea, the Angels in Heaven, who are the pureſt, the holieſt creatures, are yet unclean in the ſight of God:

Therefore man who is abominable and filthy, drinking iniquity like water, cannot be clean in his ſight.

Behold, he puts no truſt in his Saints] Eliphaz urged this argument, (for the ſubſtance of it Chap. 4. 18.) here he repeats and re-inforceth it.

Behold, is uſually a note of attention, here it is more, a note of admiration; as if he had ſaid, Would you think it, that God puts no truſt in his Saints? yet he doth not: or is not this a wonder, that God puts no truſt in his Saints? whom will he truſt, if not his Saints?

The word which we tranſlate, to put truſt, ſignifies properly to believe, he doth not believe in his Saints, or not give credit to them; he doth not (as our word hath been) confide in them; a perſon is confided or truſted in, either becauſe of his faithfulneſs, or becauſe of his ſtrength and ſtability; the word which we render here to truſt, ſignifies ſometimes ſtrength or firmneſs, as alſo a Pillar, which is not onely firm, but upholds and confirms the Building, or that which leans upon it. The ſame word doth elegantly ſignifie both to truſt, and to be firm, becauſe every thing (that is truſted) is truſted upon ſuppoſall, either of a natural, or moral firmneſs. Hence the Vulgar tranſlates, immutable; Behold, among the Saints there is not one immutable, or unchangeable: And another of the Ancients, There is no faithfulneſs in his Saints; that is, firmneſs, or unchangeableneſs of nature is not to be found in them.

There are three different uſes of the word.

Firſt, To truſt.

Secondly, To truſt in.

Thirdly, To truſt upon. So the Tranſlation varies here.

For, firſt, ſome read, He doth not truſt his Saints.

Secondly, others, He doth not truſt in his Saints.

A third, He doth not truſt upon his Saints.

Thus, ſome put a difference between believing God, and believing in God, and believing upon God; though we find them uſed promiſcuouſly in Scripture. It is ſaid by Moſes (Gen. 15. 6.) Abraham believed in the Lord, and it was accounted to him for righteouſneſs; but the Apoſtle (Rom. 4. 3.) ſaith plainly, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteouſneſs: So that there is not any material difference between thoſe two expreſſions; yet ordinarily to truſt in or upon, is taken in a higher conſtruction than barely to truſt: Behold he putteth no truſt in his Saints.

Here it is queſtioned, who are meant by Saints; there are three opinions about it. The word Saint in general ſignifies a perſon ſeparated, or one ſet apart from others; Holineſs is our ſeparation from the world unto God: holy perſons are ſeparated perſons; that's their ſtate. But more diſtinctly, who are theſe holy perſons, theſe Saints? The Greek Interpreters reſtrain the Text to the old Patriarchs, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, as alſo Moſes and Aaron, with whom God at ſometimes was angry, or found fault with ſome of their actings: Secondly, others, by the Saints underſtand the confirmed Angels, who are called Saints by way of excellency; becauſe among all creatures they are (in one ſenſe) the moſt holy, as having ever been without the leaſt ſpot or taint of ſin, whether in their natures, or in their lives; and having ever continued as the Houſhold ſervants of God, obſervant of, and obedient to all his commands.

But we may rather take it in general, both for the holieſt of men, and for the holy Angels: Behold he puts no truſt in his Saints; no, not in thoſe who are moſt holy.

Hence Obſerve: There is no created holineſs ſure, ſtable, and perfect in it ſelf:

The glorious Angels which are, and ever ſhall be Saints in Heaven, and the Saints in Heaven who are like Angels, ſtand not in that holy and happy eſtate, by their own ſufficiency, but by the decree and grace of God. Thoſe Angels which fell at firſt were holy, and they who now ſtand, might have fallen notwithſtanding their created holineſs, if God had not ſuperadded confirming grace, which eſtabliſheth them for ever. Yet this is not all, that the Angels are imperfect, becauſe they might fall if not ſupported; there is ſomewhat more in it; for though the Angels are perfectly righteous in reference to the Law, (for the whole bent of their hearts is to God, and they love God with all their hearts, which is the fulfilling of the Law:) So that the obedience of the Angels in heaven is made the copy and pattern of our obedience here on earth, as Christ hath taught us to pray; though (I say) the Angels are thus perfectly righteous in reference to the Law) yet there is a higher righteousness and holiness in God. There's but the holiness of obeying a Law, God hath the holiness of being a Law: They have a holiness without spot, yet it is but a finite, a created holiness; now what comparison is there between finite and infinite, created, and uncreated; therefore, though there be no blemish in the obedience of Angels, none in their nature, none in their lives, yet God puts no trust in them, he cannot lay the weight of his confidence upon them, because they are creatures.

The next clause doubles this point.

And the heavens are not clean in his sight.] There is a difference among Interpreters, what these heavens are; The Chaldee Paraphrast, and some of the Ancients, understand the Angels, as in the former part of the verse, and they say, the Angels are called the Heavens under a two-fold consideration:

First, Because Angels are like the Heavens, in their spirituality and incorruptibility, in their order and subordination among themselves; as also in their power over sublunary or earthly bodies.

Secondly, By a Synechdoche, because the Angels have their habitation in Heaven, that's their dwelling-place; so Master Broughton translates, Nor they of heaven be clean in his eyes; that is, the Inhabitants of Heaven are not clean in his eyes. The Heathen Poet calls those whom he supposed dwellers in Heaven, by the Name of Heaven; describing a pleasant River, he calls it, A River pleasant to Heaven; that is, to those who are in Heaven.

Cæruleus Tibris cœlo gratissimus amnis. i. e. diis vel cœlicolis. Virg. l. 8.

Others, by Heaven, understand the Saints in Heaven, not the Angels; and that also upon a two-fold reason.

Sancti in quibus tanquam in cœlis habitare dicitur Deus, cœli dicuntur, quæ allegoria frequentissima est inter antiquos patres. Pined.

First, Because God is said to dwell in the Saints, they are his habitation; and wheresoever God dwells, he makes a Heaven.

Secondly, Because the Saints, not only those in Heaven, but they on earth, have their conversation in heaven; (Phil. 3. 20.) As carnal and earthly minded men are called Earth, because their hearts and conversations are fixed to the earth; so spiritual and heavenly-minded men may be called Heaven, because their hearts and conversations are fixed in Heaven.

Thirdly, We may rather understand it in a proper sense; the heavens, that is, The heavenly bodies are not clear in thy sight; the heavens are the most excellent, and purest part of the Creation: And therefore this interpretation, or rather plain construction of the words, suits the scope of Eliphaz fully, who, as he spake before of the Angels, who are the purest of all rational creatures; so here of the heavens, which are the purest of all inanimate creatures; yet these are not pure in the sight of God, therefore no man is. The heavens have a kind of uncleanness in them: the Moon hath her spots, yea, the Moon is but a spot, if Philosophers may be credited, who tell us that all the Stars, (in their sense the Moon is a Star) are but as the spots of Heaven. A Star (as they define) being the thicker and grosser part of its Orb: The Heavens themselves are so fine and liquid, so thin and fluid, that they cannot hold the light; therefore the Lord made those Celestial bodies, the Sun, Moon, and Stars, more compact and gross, that so they might both receive, and retain the light, as also transmit and give it out to the World here below. These are spots in the heavens; and though they appear as the glory or Beauty-spots of Heaven to our sight, and are so indeed, yet these are not clean in the sight of God.

Cœli qui maxime sunt lucidi suas habent maculas, partesque crassiores magisque opacas & materiales, in re igitur perfectissima vidit Deus maculas. Pined.

Again, the heavens are furthest removed from all earthly dregs and dross, so that they are clean, not only in regard of their nature and constitution, but also in regard of their site and position; being placed so far from the sink of the World, the earth, they never received any stain or defilement from it; yet these heavens are not clean in his sight. God doth not make that which is clean, not clean, by his seeing it; but his sight is infinitely above all the cleanness which he sees. That may be clean, considered simply or in it self, which before God, or to the eye of God, is as an unclean thing.

In conspectu ejus. Aliud est purum esse simpliciter, & aliud purum esse coram Deo; ut justus, & justus coram Deo differunt. Luc. 1. 6. Drus.

Hence Note: God is so clear sighted, that the cleanest creatures are unclean in his sight.

The very cleanness of the creature, is uncleanness before him, much more, compared to him. For if one creature may be so clean, that another creature which is clean may be said to have no cleanness in comparison of it; then surely God is so clean, that the cleanest creatures have indeed no cleanness in comparison of his. The Stars are very beautiful bodies, and full of light, yet the Sun hath so much light, that it darkens all the Stars, and causeth them to disappear, when it appeareth: Now if the Stars have no light in the sight of the Sun, what light hath the Sun in the sight of God? he that puts all the perfections that the creature hath into the creature, hath infinitely more perfection in himself. Those excellencies which are divided and scattered all the Creation over, are not onely contracted and united in God, but unconceivably exceeded by him.

Job having thus laid down the former part of his argument, applies it,

Verse 16. How much more abominable and filthy is man, who drinketh iniquity like water?

Concerning the Saints, he said onely, God puts no trust in them, and concerning the Heavens, They are not clean in his sight: But now that he speaks of man, he doth not say, God puts no trust in him, or he is not clean in his sight; but he layes load upon him, He is abominable and filthy: and as if that were not enough, he aggravates it with, How much more abominable, &c. If he put no trust in glorified Saints, in whom yet there is no iniquity, then no marvel, if man be called abominable, who drinketh iniquity like water.

The whole Verse is a description of mans sinfulness: First, of the sinfulness of his nature, in those words, He is abominable and filthy: Secondly, of the sinfulness of his life, He drinketh iniquity like water.

How much more] Some read, Much less: So Master Broughton, Much less the unclean and loathsome. The Original may bear either (as also a third reading, Surely then) without any impeachment to the scope of the place, The heavens are not clean in his sight: Much less is abominable and filthy man clean in his sight. Again, The heavens are not clean in his sight; how much more abominable and filthy is man in his sight? We may take it also as a direct inference without any comparison, either from the greater or the less. The heavens are not clean in his sight; Surely then, man is abominable and filthy.

The word which we translate abominable, notes that which is most abhorring to the nature of man; that which is not onely so nauseous that the stomach cannot digest it, but so base, that the mind is burdened to think of it; yea, the word imports that which is rejected by all the senses, abominably rejected; that which the eye cannot endure to look upon, that which the ear cannot endure to hear of, that which is a stink in the nostrils, and which the hand will not touch; such an abominable thing the word bears, and such is man; God loaths him, and is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, much more a lump of iniquity; he is as a stink in the nostrils of God, nor will he touch him (for any thing in him) unless with a hand of justice, to destroy him.

Further, some explain abominable by that of the Apostle (1 Cor. 16. 26.) If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maranatha: that is, let all abominate, and cast him out of their society: When the Lord would shew the worst thought that he had of the best services of the Jews, he tells them, Incense is an abomination to me; and when the Psalmist would convince us how the people of Israel had defiled themselves with their own works, and polluted the Land with blood; he gives it in the word of the Text, Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people, insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance (Psal. 106. v. 40.) His Inheritance was so abominable to him, that he would not touch it, nor take it into his own hands; but as it follows in the Psalm, He gave them into the hand of the heathen. Hence Observe;

Hoc videtur dictum per antithesin, propter Sanctorum & cœlorum pulchritudinem, quorum species, mundities, lux, ordo, concentus mirabilis, conspectus multo jucundissimus.

Sinful man is loathsome, and abominable unto God. How much more abominable is man?

This

This is not to be understood of some particular man, or of some sort of men, who are more vile than others; but take the best of men, the most accomplisht and compleat in the whole course of nature, these are abominable; they are deprived of the Image of God, they are stampt with the Image of Satan, they are not only unable to do that which is good, but they are totally averse from it, yea, enemies to it; Is not all this enough to render man abominable in the sight of God? And so abominable is man, that he doth not onely displease the eye of God, but the very eyes of those who have received the grace of God. A godly man turns away from the wicked, as the wicked man doth from the godly; (*Prov.*29.27.) An unjust man is an abomination to the just; and he that is upright in his way, is an abomination to the wicked. The distaste is mutual; 'tis called enmity (*Gen.*3.15.) here abomination. The wicked man saith (as the Devil to Christ) What have I to do with thee, thou Son of David? The godly man saith, What have I to do with thee, thou son of Belial? 'Tis the sin of the wicked man to abhor the righteous, for he abhors him for his righteousness: 'Tis the duty of a godly man to abhor the wicked, and he abhors him only for his wickedness. To do so is a piece of his character, Who shall dwell in the mountain of God? He is a man, in whose eye a vile (that is, a wicked) person is abhorred, Psal. 15.4. Much less can he look pleasedly or pleasantly upon a wicked man; his heart riseth against him, not out of pride, or high thoughts of himself, or from the lowness of his condition, if he be poor, but from the odiousness of his disposition, and his opposition to goodness. Such a man is vile in his esteem, how honourable soever he is in the eye of the world.

Again (which shews yet further, that a man in nature is abominable) when any man repents and turns to the Lord, he is an abomination to himself; he is abominable to God, and good men, before he repents; and upon the same account, he is abominable to himself when he repents. For as God and good men before, so he then sees his own vileness and deformity, then he smells the filthiness of his own corrupt heart: This the Prophet assures us (Ezek. 36.31.) where the Lord promiseth to pour out the spirit of repentance upon his people, To take away the heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh: and then, They shall loath themselves for all their abominations, as not being able to endure the stench of their own corruptions: When Job at the sight of God, saw himself more clearly, then he cries out, Wherefore I abhor my self, and repent in dust and ashes: If a good man, seeing himself, is an abomination to himself, how much more is sinful man abominable in the sight of God?

And (which aggravates the point to the highest) Not only is a man repenting abominable to himself, but even a wicked man, upon a clear discovery of himself to himself, becomes an abomination to himself, though he be far from repentance. That's the reason why a wicked man cannot abide to search his own heart, or return into his own bosome. (Isa. 46. 8.) Remember this, shew your selves men, bring it again to mind; The Hebrew is, Bring it to your hearts: They who love their sin, love not to look to their sinful hearts: they dare not turn their eye inward or upward: not upward, because there is so much holiness in God: not inward, because there is so much filthiness in themselves. Hence the Lord threatens, (Na. 3.5, 6,) because they would not look on their own filthiness, that he would shew their filthiness to all the World, He would shew the Nations their Nakedness, and the Kingdomes their shame: And howsoever a natural man hides his abomination from his eye now, or will not see it, yet all shall be laid open to him in the day of Judgment, which will be as a day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God: So a day of the revelation of the unrighteousness of man: And then he shall (though too late) abhor himself for ever. There hath been a dispute whether the sins of Believers shall be opened at that day, but there is no question but the sins of unbelievers shall, and that not onely to shame them, but to punish and torment them; yea, possibly, the sight of sin will be a greater torment to them then all their other torments, and to be led about (as the Prophet was in reference to others) from one unclean room of their hearts to another, there to behold all the abominations of their hearts, will be the very pit of Hell. O how abominable and, as it follows in the Text, Filthy is man.] The word is derived from a root that signifies corrupt, rotten, putrified, the scum of a Pot, the rust of metals, the dung, or excrement of man and beasts; there are not words filthy enough to express the filthiness of man. The word is found but three times (as some observe) in the Scripture in this construction, and in all of them it is applyed to shew the abominable wickedness of man; the first place is this of Job; it is found also, Psal. 14. 3. Psal. 53. 3. Which Psalms are most pregnant descriptions of the corrupt state of man; as if this were a word pickt out on purpose, as a glass to shew man his face and natural complexion in.

There is a second translation of the word which gives more light to this, How much more abominable and unprofitable is man? One word signifies filthy and unprofitable, because that which is corrupt and filthy, is also unprofitable, and unfit for use. It is an extream debasement unto man, that he is unprofitable, so filthy that he is good for nothing: The Apostle puts these together, (Tit. 1. 16.) Abominable, disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate; that is, unfit for every good work: We may say of man (in this sence) as the Prophet (Ezek. 15. 3.) doth of the Vine, Son of man, what is the Vine-tree more then another tree? Excellent to yield Wine: But in the third Verse we have another answer, Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work, or will men make a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon? Will you build a house of Vine Timber, or will you so much as make a Pin of it? The Vine is not fit to make a Pin of; thus we may say of a carnal man, he is unprofitable; will the Lord use him in any work? No, he is reprobate to every good work: Will he serve the Lords turn, so much as to make a Pin of? That is, Is he profitable for the least service? No, he is not. He is also like the Corn growing upon the house top, whereof The Reaper filleth not his hand, nor he that binds up the Sheaves his bosom. The reason why man appears thus filthy, is, because he deals so much with filth; and he is thus unfit to do any good, because he is continually doing evil, as it follows in the last clause of this Verse.

Inutilis. Fulg. Quæ putrida sunt inutilia sunt.

Qui sibi nequam est, cui usui bonus est?

Which drinketh iniquity like water.] Will you know what declares man abominable and filthy in the sight of God? It is not his poverty, his sickness, his rags, or any external defilement, nothing but sin makes him so: He drinks in iniquity like water; this makes him as filthy as the dirt and mire he treads upon, or as the vomit and dung which he casteth out.

Hence Note in general.

Sin, and sin only, makes man abominable and filthy in the sight of God.

Nothing can defile the soul but sin; though a man be cloathed with filthy garments, though his skin be over-run with filthy sores, though he lye in a stinking Channel, yet the Lord will not say, he is abominable, or filthy, in these respects; for even in such a state, or at such a time, Christ may have taken him in his arms, and kissed him with the kisses of his lips. But though he go cloathed in Scarlet, though he lye in a bed of Ivory, and is perfumed with all the Spices of Arabia, yet sin makes him filthy and abominable in the eye of the Lord.

Secondly Observe, The multiplied acts of sin are an evidence that man is habitually sinful, or that he is abominable and filty.

He that doth righteousness is righteous; and he that doth unrighteousness is unrighteous. If man were not filthy, he could not drink iniquity; that is, feed upon, and delight in sin, which is but filthiness.

This expression of mans sinfulness is further considerable; he doth not only commit iniquity, but he drinks iniquity; and he doth not sip at it, but he drinks it like water. Elihu speaks thus (Job 34. 7.) What man is like Job, who drinketh up scorning like water; And so doth Solomon (Prov. 26. 6.) He that sends a message by the hand of a fool, cutteth off the feet, and drinketh dammage; that is, he shall have dammage enough, a full draught of it, his belly full of it, by sending such an empty-headed messenger upon his errand. So to drink iniquity, and to drink it like water, is to do abundance of iniquity. I shall give seven Observations, which will discover the intendment of this manner of speaking, and draw out the meaning of He drinks iniquity like water,

First thus, Man naturally hath a strong appetite or desire to sin.

Mans natural desire is to nothing else but sin. Drinking implyes appetite; a man doth not drink (ordinarily) till he is thirsty: And though Drunkards have sometimes no thirst, yet they have alwayes a strong desire to drink. Sinful man is a thirst for, and desires the drafts of sin (Ephes. 4. 19.) He commits iniquity with greediness; which is a Metaphor taken from eating and drinking: And because man hath not a greater desire after any thing then to drink, therefore it is grown to a Proverb among us, when we would shew our willingness to do a thing, we say, We will do it as willingly, as to drink when we are a thirst. Such is the bent of man to sin, that he hath no more reluctance to commit it, then the thirsty man hath to drink: He thirsteth after it as vehemently, as David did after God (Psal. 42. 2.) My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; as the Hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. Or again, the heart of man thirsteth after the waters of iniquity, as David thirsted after the waters of the Well of Bethlem; Who will give me to drink of the waters of the Well of Bethlem? At which word, some of his mighty men brake through the whole Host of the Enemy, to fetch that water. When man thirsts for this water of iniquity, his own heart, or hand, will break through all oppositions, through Law, through Conscience, through Counsel, through an Host of threatnings armed against him, through judgment inflicted on him, he will break through all these, that he may have a draught of his beloved iniquity-water.

Secondly, To drink, notes a strong desire, so pleasure and content; and where there is a great deal of desire, there is also much content, and pleasure in drinking.

Hence Observe, That it is a very pleasant thing to a carnal man to sin, he drinks iniquity, not only like water, but in this sence, like the sweetest wine; a draught of sin is the only merry-go-down to a carnal man.

A Drunkard likes his drink well, but he likes his drunkenness better: His liquor is sweet to him, but O how sweet is the satisfying of his lust! When he hath his desire he is pleased; when he is frustrated of his desire he is sullen, and like Ahab, when he could not obtain Naboth's Vineyard, he is displeased, and refuses, (as he did) to eat bread, because he cannot have this water of iniquity to drink.

Thirdly, Consider the easiness of it, to drink is no hard labour; hence we speak proverbially, I can do such a thing as easily as I can drink; there are no bones in drink: Good liquor (we say also) needs no chewing: Besides, it is easie to drink, because it is natural to drink; Children have no Tutors to teach them to drink. Again, to drink water is easie, because we may get it easily; water is not kept under Lock and Key, but in the common Storehouses or Cellars of Nature.

Hence Note, A natural man sins with ease.

q. d. Facillime laxatis conscientiæ habenis in omnia omnis generis scelera se dat præcipitem. Bold.

It is no pain to him to sin: Sin is not easie in the effects, so it leaves us in Little-ease, pain and sorrow enough are the fruits of it; but it is easie in the act of it; it is to a wicked heart, as easie as to drink water, which is every way easie.

For first, Sin is a common thing, every where to be had; sin may be found (like water) in every Ditch; sin also is like those waters which flow naturally, you need not pump for it, or fetch it up with Buckets.

Secondly, No man needs be taught to sin, Children learn that lesson (and till the Spirit of God teach them, they cannot unlearn it) without a School-master.

Quasi per in curiam & otium, quasi nihil agens.

Thirdly, Most sins in the act of them, have little labour or difficulty in them (Psal. 50. 20.) Thou fattest and spakest against thy Mothers Son. A man may both speak and do evil, while he sits still and doth nothing; an idle posture may serve the turn for such work as that.

Fourthly, Water is but small drink; water hath little pleasure in it, and less strength in it. And therefore when Christ would shew that the lowest curtesie or charity done to one of his, shall be highly esteemed by him, he saith, Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones, a cup of cold water only, in the name of a Disciple, he shall not loose his reward, Matth. 10. 42.

Hence Observe, Man will sin upon very easie terms, and smallest considerations.

Though there be little got by it, though he get but a draught of water by it; though his sin bring him in scarce any thing of advantage, yet sin he will; the act of sinning pleaseth some, more then the consequence or gain of sin. The care not much whether it is water or wine which they drink, so it be iniquity which they drink. As the Saints, in a height of holiness, will do good, though they do themselves little good, or get no outward advantage by it: They resolve to do good for good sake; the duty abstractly considered, or the act it self, is the thing that pleaseth them; so to a natural man, the very committing of sin satisfieth him more then the outward income or revenue of his sin: He doth evil for evil sake, and serves his lust for love, not for wages.

Eo improbitatis evadit impius, ut vel solo peccati & impietatis nomine, nulla præterea mercede proposita, peccato inserviat.

Fifthly, Drinking is a frequent act; a temperate man drinks every day, and often every day; healthy men eat often, and most men drink oftener then they eat: So that to drink iniquity hints also the frequency of committing iniquity.

Hence Observe, A carnal heart sins often.

He sins, and sins, he cannot but sin, it is a continual, yea, a continued act; he hath never done; he is like the Drunkard that must alwayes be tipling. Or like the covetous man, who is alwayes having, and the more he hath, the more he desires to have. Covetousness is a dry drunkenness; and drunkenness is a wet covetousness; both return often upon the same acts; and so doth every sinner naturally. He cannot cease from sin, as the Apostle Peter speaks, Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart is only evil, and that continually. The cup of iniquity is never from his mouth.

Inveteratũ ac inseparabilem peccandi habitum & consuetudinem denotat.

Sixthly, To drink iniquity like water, notes not only the frequency of sinning, but the abundance of sinning; they take great draughts of sin, who drink iniquity like water: Such as are accustomed to drink water (in many places it is the common drink) such, I say, drink more then men usually do of wine, or strong drink: First, Because wine and artificial liquors are costly; but you may drink water good cheap, and none will grutch you. Secondly, Water is not strong nor vaporous, it doth not burden the brain like your heady liquors. Now though iniquity be somewhat unlike water in both these respects (for to some their sins are costly enough at present, and they will cost all very dear (except they repent of them before) at the day of reckoning; sin also flyes up into the brain, and doth as much besot, as defile the soul. Now, I say, though sin be thus unlike water) yet the natural man drinks it like water, he takes in and sends out abundance of it; what cares he what it costs him, or how it besots him, neither the present distemperings of it, nor the after reckonings for it, trouble him.

Seventhly, Eating and drinking are the support of nature, by these the body is maintained in life: Now as the body of Nature is maintained by eating and drinking, so the body and life of sin, the corrupt state and strength of man are maintained by the continual actings of sin. The old Adam is nourished by these waters of iniquity. We say in nature, we are nourished by that of which we are made; that which is the matter of our constitution, is the matter of our nutrition; so in this case, a man in nature is composed or constituted of sin; and a natural man is nourished, and preserved by sinning. Continual acts increase the habit; and as a godly man is nourished by holy acts, and strengthened in spirit by spiritual obedience; doing the will of God is the food of the soul. As Christ speaks (John 4. 21.) so doth every true Christian in his degree, It is my meat and drink to do the will of my Father which is in Heaven; or as Job professeth of himself (Chap. 23. 12.) I esteem the words of thy mouth more then my necessary food: Thus also the old man saith, It is my meat and drink to do the will of the flesh, and that is indeed the will of his Father which is in Hell. The words of his mouth, his his Counsels and Laws I esteem more then my necessary food.

So much for the opening and illustration of this Scripture phrase, Drinking iniquity like water. I shall propound one Querie in general, concerning the whole Verse, and so conclude it. Here is a full description of sinful man: But whether Eliphaz speaks this strictly of a person unregenerate, and so applyeth it to Job, or whether this description be not also applicable to a man who is regenerate and godly for the main, and was so intended by Eliphaz, is here a question.

Some conceive that the words will suit none but an unregenerate man; and 'tis grafted upon all hands, that they are most sutable to him. An unregenerate man is abominable and filthy, he drinks iniquity like water: And yet in a qualified sence, we may say all this of a man regenerate: Even He, in reference to the remains of corruption, is abominable and filthy; and He, under some distempers and temptations, drinks iniquity like water: Which words of Eliphaz, a modern Interpreter parallels with those of Paul concerning himself (Rom. 7. 25.) With the flesh I serve the Law of sin. And delivers his opinion in this case, That though Eliphaz aimed at Job in all this, yet he deals with him not as with a wicked man, but as with an erring brother. For whereas he had said (Chap. 13. 23.) How many are mine iniquities? Eliphaz might judge by his words, that surely he thought his iniquities were not very many: And whereas he had said at the twenty sixth Verse of the same Chapter, Thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth: Eliphaz might collect, surely this man thinks his elder years have been so free from sin, that God can find nothing in them, which might justifie him in these severe punishments. Now Eliphaz opposeth these apprehensions, and would both teach and convince him, that as original sin pollutes every man wholly, till he is washed and born again by the Spirit; so no man is so far washed by the Spirit, but that many spots and pollutions of the flesh, do still cleave to him, and often appear upon him. And Eliphaz may be conceived to handle Job in this manner, Agit Eliphaz cum Jobo, non ut improbo, sed ut errante. Coc.

First, To shew him, that though a man be in a state of regeneration, yet he can deserve nothing at the hand of God, because his holiness is still imperfect, and his corruptions are abominable.

Secondly, That the greatest sufferings and afflictions of good men in this life, are very consistent with the Justice of God.

Thirdly, That he might humble Job, who (as he feared) was still too high in his own opinion, and thought better of himself then did become him.

Fourthly, To provoke him to resist his own corruptions stedfastly.

And lastly, To bear the cross (which the Lord had laid upon him for his good, especially for the taming and subduing of his corruptions) patiently.

So that Eliphaz doth not dispute with him upon this Hypothesis, or supposition, or not upon this only, That man by Nature, and without the Grace of God, is filthy and abominable, drinking iniquity like water; but upon this, or this in consort with the former, That man in a state of Grace, or a godly man, is filthy and abominable, in reference to the flesh that dwelleth in him, and that in reference to his frequent sinnings, he may be said to drink iniquity like water: And therefore Job had no reason to be proud, how good soever he was, or how much good soever he had done; and that there was all the reason in the world he should be patient, and take it well at the hand of God, how much evil soever he should suffer.

This resolution of the Querie, as it is profitable, so probable. For howsoever Job's Friends had branded him in divers passages of this dispute, as a wicked man and an hypocrite, and were so understood by Job, as appears in his answers and replyes; yet 'tis most likely his Friends spake so in reference to his actions, not in reference to his state. That he had done like an Hypocrite, or a wicked man, was clearly their opinion; but there is no necessity to conclude from what they said, that they judged him absolutely to be one.

VERS. 17, 18, 19, 20.

I will shew thee, hear me, and that which I have seen, I will declare.

Which wise men have told from their Fathers, and have not hid it.

Unto whom alone the earth was given, and no stranger passed among them.

The wicked man travelleth with pain all his dayes, and the number of years is hidden to the oppressor.

Eliphaz having argued against Job's supposed opinion, of self-cleanness, and personal righteousness, proceeds to the confirmation of his own Position, to which he leads us, by a new Exordium, or Preface, in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth Verses of this Chapter: Secondly, He largely handles and illustrates it from Verse 20. to Verse 31. Thirdly, He applyeth the whole Doctrine to Job by way of dehortation, at Verse 31. and so forward to the end of the Chapter.

The general Argument which he brings to confirm his Tenet, may be thus formed up;

That is true which continued experience, and the consent of wise men in all Ages have taught and delivered to us:

But the experience, and consent of wise men in all Ages, have taught, and delivered this, that a wicked man travels with pain all his dayes, that he is punished outwardly by want and sickness, and inwardly by the gripes and scourges of his own conscience.

Therefore this is a truth.

The major Proposition is the sum of the Preface contained in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth Verses: The minor, or second Proposition, is held forth in the twentieth Verse, and is prosecuted to the one and thirtieth.

I will shew thee, hear thou me. and that which I have seen I will declare.

So the Preface begins: He layes down a double proof in this Preface; a proof first from his own experience, secondly from the consent of others. From his own experience, in this Verse, I will shew thee, hear thou me, that which I have seen I will declare; The consent of others is expressed in the eighteenth and nineteenth verses, Which wise men have told me from their Fathers.

I will shew thee, hear thou me.] As if he had said, Thou art out of the way, thou art in the dark, and therefore in charity, I will lend thee a thread of true Doctrine, to lead thee out of that labyrinth of error, wherein I see thou art intangled; I will shew thee, and all that I desire of thee as a reward of my pains, is but this, Hear thou me, be attentive, or (as the Chalde Paraphrast renders) receive it, take it of me; he that speaks truths deserves to be heard, and that is all I desire.

Cæcutienti tibi & in maximis tenebris versanti, verissimæ doctrinæ lumen præferam. Accipe à me. Targ.

I will shew thee, hear thou me.] But what will Eliphaz shew him? Not that which he had fancied, but that which he was assured of.

That which I have seen I will declare.] Seeing is a sure and particular sense; yet as the act of one sense is often put for the act of another; so Seeing, which is the most noble of the Senses, is often put for all. That which I have seen; is, that which I have learned, that which I have fetched in, or collected by the help of all my senses; yea, by my reason and understanding, That do I here declare unto thee.

More strictly, Seeing may be taken two wayes: First, As noting experience; I have not only heard some reports about these things, but I have seen, and observed them my self; there is a stronger conviction in this, because the sense of seeing is less fallible then that of hearing; and we say, One eye witness is better then ten ear witnesses. Secondly, As I have seen, may be taken for common experiences among men; so for special revelation from God. Some Divine revelations were made in visions; and all Divine revelations were so clear and evident, that they were or might be called Visions, as if the matter of them had been represented to the eye; and hence such as God honoured and trusted with those Revelations were called Certius est, vidi, quam audivi, oculatus testis potior est auritis. Drus.

Seers

Seers (1 Sam. 9.9.) He that is now called a Prophet was before time called a Seer: And he was called a Seer, because the clearness of those messages and manifestations was so great, that they might be judged as objects of the eye, rather then of the ear, or of the understanding. Thus the whole Book of the Prophesie of Isaiah is called, A Vision, or a thing seen; The Vision of Isaiah the Prophet, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem, (Chap. 1. 1.) Yet the Prophet did not receive all the Doctrines which he preached, and Prophesies which he published in that Book, by vision; but the manifestation from God, was so full of light to his understanding, that it was as if he had seen it with his eye. Some expound so here, That which I have seen; that is, that which I have had a special revelation about. As if he referr'd to the fourth Chapter, where Eliphaz reports to Job what a dreadful Vision he had, and what the matter of it was, even much like that which is represented in the following part of this Chapter. A learned Interpreter agrees, that it was a Vision; but, saith he, it was either a fained artificial Vision (such are frequent in Popery) or it was a delusion of the Devil. I do not at all admit this latter branch of his opinion; but I must reject the former, as altogether unworthy of Eliphaz, who was surely a man of integrity, and fearing God, and was therefore above such affected falshoods, and studied deceits, to gain respect and credit among men.

Mihi non videtur improbabile aut delusum fuisse à diabolo, vel ipsum somnium aliquod aut imaginationē commentum esse, ut sibi conciliaret authoritatē. Sanct.

I shall therefore insist upon the former sence, That which I have seen, that is, by common experience, that will I declare unto thee.

Hence Observe, First, What we declare, or communicate to others, we should be well assured of our selves.

That which I have seen declare I unto thee: while we declare, either by way of instruction, to teach true Doctrine, or by way of information, to report the truth of action, 'tis our duty to declare upon knowledge. So the Apostle John, in his first Epistle, Chap. 1. 1. That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life, that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you: He brings in the operations of three Senses, Seeing, Hearing, and Feeling, as witnesses to avouch for, and ascertain that which he had declared; we must take heed of declaring upon surmises, and probabilities, upon a bare hear-say, or I thought so: That which we have clearly learned, we may teach confidently, and nothing besides that.

Observe Secondly, As we must have a ground for what we declare to others, so when we have a good ground we must declare.

That which we know we should make known; That which I have seen I declare unto you; holy knowledge must be communicated, such light must not be put under a bushel, nor must such a Talent be wrapt up in a Napkin: He that is taught should teach. When thou art converted (saith Christ to Peter) strengthen thy Brethren: Let others partake of thy experiences. Come (saith David) and I will tell you what God hath done for my soul: Philip (John 1.43.) being found by Christ, finds Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found him of whom Moses, and the Prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth; the Son of Joseph: He quickly declared what he had seen, and so should we. This is the first proof, That which I have seen, I declare, experience is my ground.

The second proof, is from the consent of others, from the authority of the Ancients.

Which wise men have told from their Fathers, and have not hid it.

Eliphaz treads the same steps, as in his first discourse with Job. For after he had there delivered the contents or sum of his Vision, he appeals to the judgment of the Saints, Chap. 5. So here, having told Job that he would declare what he had seen, he refers him also to the judgment of others, That which wise men have told their Fathers, and have not hid it. I refer you to men, and those not men of a mean rank, but to godly wise men; in which Eliphaz seems again to answer what Job had objected, that the points he had offered were of common and vulgar observation (Chap. 12. 3.) Who knows not such things as these? Eliphaz replyes, these things are no common discourse, they are such as wise men have told from their Fathers: As if he had said, Do not despise what I say, as ordinary, or as a novelty, no, nor as received from corrupt antiquity, for besides what I have seen, I have good authority for what I speak; the ancient and the wise vote with me; Wise men have told it from their Fathers, here is the conveyance.

Wise men. He doth not mean worldly wise men, Philosophers and Polititians; but godly wise men, these have told it from their Fathers; their Fathers told it them, and they told it me; so that this position claims by two descents at least. One of the Rabbins gives it three, if not more: for by the Fathers of the wise men he understands, not their immediate Fathers only, but those who were more remote and further off; yea, possibly those who were furthest off, even as far as Adam.

Rambam subtilius à patribus suis exponit, à patribus eorum. Ut hic tres ætates considerentur una sapientum hac indicantiū, altera patrum, tertia majorum & atavorum. Merc.

Hence Observe, First, It is an ingenuity to acknowledge by whom we profit.

Wise men have told me this, I received it from others, as well as collected it by my own experience.

Secondly Note, Truth should be conveyed down to our Posterity.

Truth is a more precious inheritance then Land or Money; if Parents are careful to secure (as much as they can) earthly things to their Children, how much more should they be careful to secure heavenly? In the first Ages of the World, till the Law was given on Mount Sinai, faithful men were instead of Books, and Tradition supplied the want of Scripture: But now, our recourse must be to what God hath commanded to be written, not to what men have said. No Tradition is of any force, but as consentient with Scripture, and none of so much force as Scripture. The Council of Trent, in the fifth Session, thunders out Anathemas against those who receive not Tradition with the same godly affection, and devotion, with which they receive the Scripture it self; Bellarmine in his controversie about Tradition, entitles his Book thus, Of the Word of God not written; as if the Word of God were to be divided into these two orders, The Word written, and the Word not written: Tradition with him is the Unwritten word, and must be held of as much authority as the Word written; This is (as Christ taxeth the Pharisees) To make the Word of God of none effect, through mans Tradition: It is still a wise mans duty to tell Posterity what the Word and Truth of God is; but we must not receive any thing, as a truth of God, upon the bare Word of the wisest men. Wise men have told their Fathers,

And have not hid it. There is a twofold hiding: First, a hiding to keep a thing safe, that we loose it not: Secondly, A hiding, that we keep it close, and not communicate it: In the former sence, we must hide the truth of God, but we may not in the latter. When David saith, I have hid thy Commandments in my heart; when Mary hid the sayings of Christ in her heart; and when the man that found the treasure (Matth. 13.44.) Went away and hid it, and for joy thereof sold all he had, and bought the field: All these hid it, that it might be forth coming for their own use, they did not hide it, as unwilling to bring it forth, for the use of others; so the idle Servant hid his Talent, and was justly condemned for hiding it, Matth. 25.

Truth is a common good, no man hath the sole property of it; every one may challenge his part of this possession; and the more we part with it to others, the more we increase our own possession. Truth multiplyes in its degree to us, while we make division of it to thousands. A Candle gives not the less light to the owner, because many standers by see by it; and this Candle gives a clearer light to us when we let many see by it: Our knowledge is perfected while it is communicated. This Candle therefore is not to be put under a bushel, but must be set upon a Candlestick, that all may see by the light of it. Shall I (saith the Lord, Gen. 18.) hide from Abraham the thing that I am about to do? No, I will not, For I know Abraham will not hide it: He will command his Children and his Houshold after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord. The Israelites were charged to communicate communicate the wonders which God wrought for them, and the Ordinances which he appointed them, when they were delivered out of Egypt, Exod. 12.

I will open my mouth in a Parable (ſaith the Pſalmiſt) I will utter dark ſayings of old, which we have heard and known: And our Fathers have told us, we will not hide them from their Children, ſhewing to the Generations to come, the praiſes of the Lord, and his ſtrength, and the wonderful works which he hath done (Pſal. 78. 2, 3, 4.) 'Tis our duty to preſerve memorials of the works of God, and to declare his word to all that are about us. What wiſe men know from their Fathers, they will not hide.

Eliphaz yet goes on to deſcribe the men whoſe conſent in opinion he had received about the controverſie in hand.

Verſ. 19. To whom alone the earth was given, and no ſtranger paſſed among them.

If any man ask who were theſe wiſe men? He anſwers, They were wiſe men,

To whom alone the earth was given.] In theſe words Eliphaz ſeems to remove a prejudice that might lie in Job's Spirit againſt the teſtimony of thoſe Ancients: For ſuppoſe they were wiſe men, yet he might ſay, 'tis like they were but mean men, men of no rank or quality, men of ſmall credit or authority, and (we know what Solomon ſaith, Eccleſ. 9. 16.) A poor mans wiſdom is deſpiſed, and his words not heard: Therefore ſaith Eliphaz, you ſhall not put me off thus, nor diſable my witneſſes upon a ſuppoſition, that theſe wiſe men were mean men, for theſe were Chiefs and Princes in their Generation; And he advanceth their honour two wayes; Firſt, in regard of their riches and power, To whom alone the earth was given: Secondly, in regard of their righteous and juſt adminiſtrations, No ſtranger, or ſtrange thing paſſed among them; as if he had ſaid, Job, I ſpeak of men that were fit to ſit at the helm of a Kingdom, and govern Nations, yea, to have the reins of the World put into their hands; I ſpeak of wiſe men who by their wiſdom, and the bleſſing of God, have kept the earth quiet, and ſo have poſſeſſed it alone.

Aſſertur hoc ad amplificandum authoritatem horũ ſapientium, q. d. hi tales & tãti fuerunt ut, &c. Merc.

But it may yet be ſaid, who were theſe Monarchs of the world, and ſole poſſeſſors of the Earth? To whom alone the earth was given: Some conceive that Eliphaz means it of Noah and his Sons, who indeed had the World to themſelves; for the Flood having ſwept away all mankind, except that Family, to him and his Sons the earth was given alone; theſe were the wiſe men (ſaith this opinion) from whom Eliphaz received the Doctrine which he communicated to, and preſſed upon Job; there was never ſuch a Monarch (except Adam the firſt man) as Noah was, he had the whole World given him: Hence the Ancients ſtile Noahs three Sons, The Commanders and Colonels of the whole World: But I conceive, we need not determine it upon thoſe, though poſſibly Eliphaz might have an aim at them. Moſt interpreters take it in general, of the old good Princes, of whom it may be ſaid, The earth was given to them alone; Abraham was a great Prince, and to him, The earth (in one ſenſe) was given alone. But who made this great deed of gift, even the moſt high God, whom Abraham calls (Gen. 14.) The poſſeſſor of Heaven, and Earth: He it is that then gave, and ſtill gives the earth, and he gives it two wayes; firſt, by an act of common providence, thus (as Job expreſſeth it, Chap. 9. 24.) The earth is given into the hand of the wicked: Secondly, he gives the earth by an act of ſpecial providence, or by vertue of a promiſe, ſo Canaan was given to Abraham and his ſeed, the people of Iſrael; and thus the Kingdom of Iſrael and Judah, was given to David and his ſeed.

Iſta phraſi circumloquitur mihi patriarcham Noe cũ tribus ejus filiis. Bold. Methodius alliq; patres antiqui vocant Noe tres filios Mundi chiliarchos.

When it is ſaid here, that the earth was given to ſuch alone, the meaning is not that none had any of the earth given them but they, but none had the earth given them as they, by peculiar promiſe, and ſpecial providence. Further, the giving of the earth may be conſidered, either as the giving that which is good, or as the giving it for good; as a gift of bounty, or as a gift of mercy; in the latter conſiderations, the earth is given to good men alone: None have it for good but they who are good, and they only make a good uſe of it. Hence Obſerve, Sapientibus ſolis terra data eſſe dicitur, quia bonorũ terrenorum ipſi ſunt domini, utentes iis ad ſuum bonũ. Aquin. in loc.

That the earth, or earthly things, are diſpoſed to the Sons of men, by a deed of gift from God:

Secondly, Wiſe, holy men, receive the earth and the things of the earth, by ſpecial gift.

Theſe alone receive the earth from a Fathers hand and good will; it comes to them in the Covenant of grace, to which the promiſe of the earth belongs, as well as of Heaven, Godlineſs hath the promiſe of this life, and of that which is to come; Saints have the earth and all earthly things given to them, in reference to their being in Covenant with God; and thus the earth is given to them alone.

Again, we may expound that term Alone, by the next clauſe, To whom alone the earth was given; that is, as they had great poſſeſſions in the earth, ſo they had thoſe poſſeſſions to themſelves without any to trouble, vex, or moleſt them, which Eliphaz thus expreſſeth:

And no ſtranger paſſed among them.] Some read, No ſtrange thing paſſed among them; Both readings are a deſcription of wiſe and godly Princes, who having the earth given them, No ſtranger, or no ſtrange thing paſſeth among them.

Strangers are here taken under a double notion: Firſt, no ſtranger, that is no enemy: To clear which notion of the word Stranger, we muſt remember that as the Grecians (conceiting themſelves the beſt bred people in the World) called all other Nations Barbarians; ſo the people of Iſrael, the ſtock of Abraham (being Gods peculiar Covenant-people) called all other Nations aliens, or ſtrangers: and becauſe they were hated and maligned by all other Nations, therefore they called all profeſſed ſtrangers enemies; ſo the word is uſed (Iſa. 1. 7.) Your land ſtrangers ſhall devoure; that is, enemies ſhall invade and prevail over you (Pſal. 144. 7.) Deliver me out of the hand of ſtrange Children, or out of the hand of ſtrangers; that is, out of the hand of mine enemies: The Latine word Alienus, is often put for Hoſtis, & the Roman Orator telleth us, That he who is now called a ſtranger was called an enemy by our Anceſtors. The reaſon was, becauſe ſtrangers proved unkind to, yea turned enemies againſt thoſe that entertained them: As formerly Kings were called Tyrants, but becauſe many Kings oppreſſed their people, therefore now oppreſſing Princes only are called Tyrants. So then, to ſay no ſtranger paſſed among them, is as much as to ſay, no enemy, none to moleſt or afflict, paſſed among them.

Again, the word Stranger is taken for one that is erroneous, or idolatrous; for a man unſound in Doctrine, or ſuperſtitious in Worſhip: Wiſe men to whom alone the earth was given, had no ſuch ſtranger paſſing among them; they were not mixed with idolatrous and uncircumciſed Nations, they did not communicate with them in worſhip, as in after-times the people of Iſrael did.

Satis apparet non de hoſte temporali; ſed de eo qui alteri quam veræ religioni addictus eſt, vel qui numina extranea colit. Bold.

This notion of the ſtranger, is an advantage to Eliphaz; as if he had ſaid, The wiſe men whoſe authority I produce in this cauſe, were ſound in judgement, and pure in worſhip, they did not mingle themſelves with Idolaters and Hereticks, they neither learned their works, nor received their Doctrines, and are therefore witneſſes worthy of credit, and againſt whom there lies no juſt exception. No ſtranger paſſed among them.

If we take ſtranger in the firſt ſenſe for an enemy, then the word Paſſed ſignifies as much as invaded, and may well be tranſlated to a military motion: No ſtranger or enemy paſſed; that is, none marched among them, or through their Land, to diſturb, or plunder them; when God is ſaid to give Laws to the Sea, or ſet it bounds which it ſhould not paſs; this imports that the Sea like an enemy would march through the earth, and overwhelm all, unleſs bridled by a Divine decree.

But if we take Stranger in the ſecond ſenſe, for an Idolater, or a man of unſound Principles, then, No ſtranger paſſed among them, is, ſuch were not received, and embraced by them, nor admitted among them.

From the firſt Obſerve, That it is (as the honour of a people to relieve oppreſſed ſtrangers, ſo) the happyneſs of a people to be freed from the oppreſſion of ſtrangers:

From the ſecond Obſerve, That it is the happineſs of a people to be free from the mixture of evil men, whether ſuch whoſe worſhip is impure or, Doctrine untrue.

The

The Lord made frequent promises of this happiness to his people (Isa. 52. 1.) From henceforth there shall no more come into them, the uncircumcised, and the unclean; which is as much as to say, The stranger (for all uncircumcised persons were strangers) shall not come into thee. We have the like promise (Joel 3. 17.) So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God, dwelling in Sion, my holy Mountain, then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no stranger pass through her; Why not any stranger? Forget not to entertain strangers, saith the Apostle (Heb. 13. 2.) Jerusalem in her best dayes shall have strangers, to be visited and relieved by her, but Jerusalem should have no strangers in those dayes to defile and pollute her (Nah. 1. 15.) Behold upon the Mountain the feet of him that bringeth good tydings; for the wicked shall no more pass through thee, for he is cut off: The Hebrew is, Belial shall no more pass through thee. Belial is he that cannot endure to serve; he will not yield obedience to the holy commands of God, he casts off the yoak of Christ, and pulls the shoulder from his burden. This Belial shall no more pass through thee. The purest times of the Gospel are presented under a like promise (Zach. 14. 21.) In that day there shall be no more the Cananite in the house of the Lord of Hoasts; That is, the stranger and uncircumcised, the wicked and ungodly, shall no more be mixed with his people.

Thirdly, in that he puts such under the notion of strangers, we learn, That wicked and Idolatrous persons should be as strangers to us; we must not lay such in our bosom, to maintain any spiritual society with them, though in some cases, we may have civil society with them. (2 Cor. 6. 13, 14.) Be not unequally yoaked together with unbelievers, for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, and what communion hath light with darkness, and what concord hath Christ with Belial, &c. These can never agree together: Let no such stranger pass, or be approved among us in the fellowship of the Gospel; there is not only sin in letting such pass with our approbation, but danger; and that a double danger. Both which are assigned as reasons why we should come out of Babylon (Revel. 18. 4.)

First, we are in danger of partaking of their sins, and that both by contracting the spot of their sins, as also the guilt of their sins.

Secondly, we are in danger of partaking of their punishments, as it there follows, That ye receive not her plagues. There is no safety in being neer those, who are under the curse of God: The companion of fools shall be destroyed (Prov. 13. 20.) Though possibly he be not a fool in any other respect, but because he is in such company.

Fourthly, Taking it for a strange or wicked thing.

Note, That, It is the honour of Magistrates, when no evil passeth quietly in their Territories.

When neither Idolatry in the things of God, nor injustice, nor oppression in the things of men, find any favour with them, this is at once their duty, and their glory.

Eliphaz having by way of preface, given proof of what he was about to press upon Job, both from his own experience and the consent of Antiquity: He now proposes the point it self.

Vers. 20. The wicked man travels with pain all his dayes, and the number of years is hidden to the Oppressour.

In this general Position, Eliphaz intends Jobs personal conviction, that he was wicked, whom he had heard appealing to God (Chap. 2. 10.) Thou knowest that I am not wicked. As if he had said, Thou wouldest make us believe that God will be thy compurgator, and give witness for thee upon his own knowledge thou art not wicked: But we who are but men may know the contrary, for we see all the marks and brands of a wicked man upon thee: The wicked man travelleth with pain all his dayes, and so dost thou: These snares and sorrows speak who thou art, though we say nothing.

Mr. Broughton reads, The wicked killeth himself all his days, he is a self murtherer; that was the report which Eliphaz made of him at the fifth Chapter, Vers. 2. Envy slayeth the silly one. Both Job and his Friends repeat the same thing often, yet with such variety of illustrations, that though for the matter it be the same, yet it is new for the manner: Such repetitions do not only delight, but profit.

The wicked man travelleth with pain all his dayes:] Who is a wicked man, hath been opened at large, Chap. 10. 7. where Job affirms, Thou knowest that I am not wicked; There see the temper of a wicked man, I will not stay upon it here. Only consider how his appellation and condition suit one with the other, The wicked man travels: the Original word for a wicked man signifies an unquiet motion, and so one whose life is a continual, not only motion, but unquietness. Unquiet is the name, and unquietness is the state of a wicked man; he is always raising stirs, and acting Tragedies, His life is always in a hurry, he travels with pain all his dayes.

He travelleth with pain.] This sentence is but one word in the Hebrew; the word signifies any grief, or sorrow, any torture or torment: The translations are various, but all meet in this one sense, that a wicked mans life is a miserable life; All the life of a wicked man is spent in carking care: So the Septuagint. Another renders, It is spent in sorrow. But all may be reduced to that which is most proper to the word: He is in pain as a woman in travail; and whereas we have heard of some Women in travail many dayes; here is a man in travel all his dayes.

Proprie significat cruciatū, lāguorē, pavorem vel dolorem parturiētiū, vel enitentis & molientis facinus aliquod. Omnis vita impii insolicitudine. 70. in dolore. Aquila. Dolet ut parturiens. Pag. Cunctis diebus suis impius superbit. Vulg.

The wicked man travelleth in pain all his dayes; his whole life is nothing else but continual pain, or painful throes towards the birth of some filthy Monster-sin, which sin when it is finished, brings forth death: Somewhat he hath conceived, the Psalmist tells us what; He hath conceived mischief, and he would bring forth iniquity.

The Vulgar Latine translates, The wicked man is lifted up with pride all his dayes; which is as much as to say, He travelleth in pain all his dayes; for though as some say, Pride feels no cold, yet there is nothing feels so much pain as pride doth: And because a wicked man is proud all his dayes, therefore he travelleth with pain all his dayes.

Hence Observe, The life of a wicked man is a very painful life: or thus, The pain of a wicked mans life is the greatest pain.

It is like the pain of a Woman in travel; when the holy Ghost would set forth great pain, he expresseth it by the pain of a woman in travel. But what kind of pain is it, with which a wicked man travels? He hath two sorts of pain.

First, external:
Secondly, internal.

His external pain is of two sorts:

First, Such as God layes upon him, or casts him into; for though many are the afflictions of the righteous, from the hand of God, yet the righteous have not all the afflictions, wicked men have some: They are not only beaten with scourges, but smitten with Scorpions; God rains down upon them snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest; this is the portion of many of their cups, even in this life.

Secondly, Such as a wicked man brings upon himself; Mr. Broughtons reading aims at these pains, The wicked kills himself all his dayes. A wicked man is often very active, sometimes extreamly malitious against others, so malitious that he murders them; and yet it may truly be said he only kills himself all his dayes. The self-love of a wicked man destroys him, and his very earnestness to avoid trouble, tumbles him into it: And this is clear, if we consider either the way which a wicked man takes, or the end which usually he comes unto; his way is a very sad way: A godly man is described (Psal. 118. 2.) Eating the labour of his hands; that is, the very work which he doth, feeds him; and before he hath any reward for his work, he finds a reward in his work, in which sense, he may well be said, to Eat the labour of his hand: On the other side, the labour of a wicked man eats him, the labour of his hand, and the labour of his head, eat him out. The way of sin is a wearysome way (Jer. 9. 5.) They weary themselves to commit iniquity (Ezek. 24. 12.) She hath wearied her self with lies: A Lie is not taken strictly there for an untruth told to deceive others:

others: A lie is any sin, for every sin is a Lie. Sin tells us a fair tale, but it will deceive us at last.

Again, (Isa. 47. 13.) Thou hast wearied thy self, in the multitude of thy counsels. (Isa. 57. 10.) Thou art wearyed in the greatness of thy way. Those counsels were sinful counsels, and these wayes were sinful wayes, both were a weariness, and tired their undertakers. The Lord challenges the Jews (Mic. 6. 3.) To shew wherein he had wearied them; O my people what have I done unto thee, and wherein have I wearied thee, testifie against me. God is very tender in laying burdens upon us, but we are very cruel in overburdening our selves.

And whereas the pain of a wicked man is compared to the pain of a Woman in travail; it is not only like it, but exceeds it: For though when her pain comes upon her, she hath sorrow because her hour is come, yet when she is delivered, she remembreth her anguish no more, for joy that a Man is born into the World (John 16. 21.) The Womans pains end in joy, but the pain of a wicked man is so far from ending in joy, that it hath no end at all, and therefore he is said to travel in pain all his dayes. A wicked man hath the pain, but not the deliverance of a travailing Woman, a Son shall not be born to him. And though he sometimes seems to prosper, and attain his end, yet there is somewhat or other, that sticks still in the birth, and paineth him in the midst of all his prosperity. The Author of that useful History, The Travels of the old Patriarcks, Kings, and Prophets, when he comes to write the motions of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was a great King, but of a most malitious spirit, against the people of God, he observes that this Antiochus in pursuance of his bloody designs, had run more hazards, and taken more tedious journeys to satisfie his malice, and reach his ambitious ends, then any of the Saints had done, upon any command or service of God; upon which consideration, he makes this excellent conclusion, That wicked men take more pains to go to Hell and eternal destruction, then godly men do in the way to eternal life, and salvation. A wicked man cannot go to Hell with ease; he goes with pain to eternal pains. Those wayes of sin which have most pleasure in them, have much vexation in them. (Prov. 23. 29.) Who hath woe, who hath sorrow, who hath wounds without cause? The answer is at hand in the next words, They that tarry long at the Wine, they that go to seek the mixt Wine: The Wine is sweet but it bites like a Serpent, and stings like an Adder, Vers. 32. The voluptuous man drinks larger draughts of sorrow then he doth of Wine; and while the Adulterer goes to the Harlots house, he goes as a fool to the stocks, or as an Ox to the slaughter (Prov. 7.) As pleasure is the Epicures God, so gain is the covetous mans God, yet to get it, he pierceth himself through with many sorrows, and falls into a snare; (1 Tim. 6.) Further, as a sinful conversation among men, so a superstitious service of the true God, and the serving of false Gods is full of trouble.

The false worshipper travelleth in pain all his dayes: All false worship hath a tang of baseness and slavery in it; they that worship the Devil, in what a wretched servitude do they live? In Popery, what vexatious penances do they put upon their blinded Votaries? The Gospel is noble, and the service of it ingenuous, as well as pure or spiritual: Christ hath not called us to drudgery, but to liberty. They are most free, who serve him most.

What pain the Jews travelled in when they Apostatiz'd from God to Idols, Tophet, and the Valley of Hinnon, where they offered their Children in the fire to Moloch, are abundant witnesses. Did God put them to such pain in his service? God called them to offer their Beasts in Sacrifice to him: But they offer their Children in Sacrifice to that abominable Idol. Wicked men live under a hard task-master.

Now besides all these outward pains which either are concomitants, or consequents of wickedness: There is an inward pain far worse then these. Inward pain ariseth sometimes upon the disappointment of his hopes. A wicked man is exceedingly pained with labour in the attaining of his end, but he is much more pained with grief, when he cannot attain his end; he hangs between hope and fear, while he is at work (for he that cannot walk by faith to his end, shall meet with fears enough before he comes at it) but when his sense tells him that he cannot come at it, he falls into the gulf of despair. Besides this pain of fear that he shall not, and that of despair, when he cannot compass his designs or ends, he is often afflicted with a fiercer pain then either of these, even with the gripes and gnawings of his own evil conscience for the evil he hath done. This pain follows some wicked men all the dayes of their life; and it shall be the portion of all wicked men after death. Eliphaz aims at this in the next Verse, while he saith, A dreadful sound is in his ears; there I shall further insist upon it. We have yet another very considerable part of the wicked mans misery held forth in the close of this Verse.

And the number of years is hidden to the oppressor.

The word which we render, Oppressor, signifies a man exceeding powerful and terrible, or by his power terrifying others; He that oppresseth must have power, and some desire power for no other end, but to enable them to oppress. Solomon speaks of a poor man that oppresseth (Prov. 28. 3.) but he oppresseth only those who are less powerful then himself. A poor man that oppresseth the poor, is, &c. One poor man may be as much above another poor man in power, as some rich men are above the poor. Equals in power cannot oppress.

But who is this Oppressor to whom the number of years are hid? The Oppressor in this part of the Verse, is the wicked man in the former part; Eliphaz speaks still of the same person, though under another name, whom he there called wicked, he calls here an Oppressor.

Hence Note, That to oppress is a very great wickedness;

For an oppressor and a wicked man are the same man.

Again, in that the word which signifies an oppressor, signifies also a mighty man, or a man of great strength.

We may further Note, That men who have much power are apt to abuse it for the oppression of others.

It is in the power of my hand said Laban to Jacob, to do thee hurt; And Laban had hurt Jacob, if God had not stopt him; They that have much power in their hands, need much holiness in their hearts, that they may use it well; much power is a temptation to do much hurt.

Pauci anni reconditi sunt violento. Jun.

The number of years is hidden to the Oppressor.

The number of years,] Say some, is an Hebraism, for few years, or years that are easily numerable; a Child may tell the years of an Oppressor, they are so few: Hence the words are also rendered thus, Few years are laid up for the Oppressor. Mr. Broughton translates plainly to the sense, Soon numbred years are stored to the Tyrant.

Numerus annorū, i.e. facile numerabiles.

Hence Observe, First, That wicked Oppressors are often speedily cut off by the hand of God.

(Psal. 55. 23.) Blood-thirsty and deceitful men, shall not live out half their dayes; If God should lengthen out the lives of men set upon mischief, who could live? 'Tis a comfort for us, as well as a curse on them, that Soon numbred years are stored to the Tyrant, his treasure is not great in dayes, who daily treasures up wrath against himself.

Another resuming these words, He travelleth with pain; out of the former part of the Verse, reads it thus, And in the whole number of years which are laid up for him, he travelleth in pain: That is, his whole life is miserable: As if that which is a truth of all wicked men, were more specially applicable to oppressors; That they travel in pain.

Hence we may Note, They who love to trouble others, shall be sure to meet with trouble themselves.

Qui vult à multis metui, multos timeat oportet.

He that desires to be feared, shall be often afraid. Oppressors and Tyrants in all ages have experimented this truth; which flows both from the nature of their unjust actions towards men, as also from the just retaliation of God.

Our reading leads us to a further consideration; The number of years is hidden to the Oppressor: That is (as some expound) they are determined, or defined in the secret counsel of God. It is under a hidden decree how long his oppressing power shall continue, and when he shall receive the reward of his oppressions: Or rather thus, The number of years of his own life is hidden to the oppressor; that is, he knows not how long he shall live.

But is that any special judgement upon the Oppressor, that the number of his years, or how long he shall live is hidden to him? Is not the number of a good mans years hidden to him? Are not the number of every mans years hidden to him? Doth any man know how long he shall live? David indeed prays, Teach me to number my dayes (Psal. 90.) and Make me to know mine end, and the measure of my dayes, what it is, Psal. 39.4. Yet he doth not desire to know precisely the number of his dayes, or time of his end, he only desires to know their general number, or utmost extent spiritually; namely, that at the most they were not many, that so he might make a wise improvement of his life, and a holy preparation for his death.

Seeing then the number of every mans years is hidden to him, how is this reckoned as the peculiar punishment of a wicked man, that the number of his years are hidden to him? I answer, It is true, the number of years is hidden from all men, both from good and bad, the Lord hath made that a secret. Two numbers are secret.

First, The number of the years of the World, when that shall end; Of that day and hour knows no man, no not the Son of man, but the Father only.

Secondly, The number of the years of a mans own life, or the day of his death is a secret which no man knows, though many have been busie to pry and inquire into it. But though godly men know not the number of the years of their own lives, yet this is no affliction to them, under which notion it is here said of the Oppressor; The number of years is hidden to him.

A wicked man is thoughful about this, how he may live long, not how he may live or do well; he would fulfil many dayes and years in the World, that so he might have his fill of worldly profits and pleasures. He is therefore troubled to think his life hangs upon uncertain tearms, because he is uncertain of any good beyond this life. A godly man knows not the number of his years, but he knows by whom they are numbred; that satisfies him, be they longer or shorter, more or less. But a wicked man would have the account in his own hand, he would be Lord of all, even of time too, but he cannot, The number of years are hidden to the Oppressor.

Observe Hence, That the number of the years of mans life is a secret which none knows but God himself:

And as it is so, so it is best for man, that it should be so. The certain knowledge when our lives should end, would hinder us in many duties and services of our lives. Men would be at a stand in their worldly callings, if they were acquainted with the precise date of their standing in the World. Our not knowing this, is not ignorance, but nescience; and were it not for this nescience, we should be taken off from the study of much profitable knowledge. Besides, our not knowing the number of our dayes, stirs up in us a care of improving every day, and to pray with David, Lord teach us to number our dayes. Our not knowing which day shall be our last, should provoke us to spend every day so, that we may have comfort if it prove our last. It is best for us not to know that, the not knowing whereof is a motive to be alwayes doing good.

Secondly, Observe, That it is a great vexation to the oppressor, or wicked man to think of the uncertainty of his own life.

Numerus annorũ incertus est tyrannidis ejus. Vulg. Ex ista incertitudine, sequitur suspicio & timor. Aquin. in loc.

The Vulgar makes this Observation from the Text, his translation of the Text is, The years of his Tyrannical power are uncertain. If such could but live long enough, what work would they make? Yea what a world would they make? The Jesuits say, Take time and you may do any thing. So also saith the oppressor, If I had but time enough, I could do any thing; though I am disappointed now, yet I shall have a day to act what I project, and to pour out my revenges; But this cuts the oppressors heart, he doubts his life may end before he can accomplish his ends. A wicked heart is not more pleased in doing evil, then troubled when he is but under a suspition that he shall want either opportunity, or time to do it. This is added to the painful travel of a wicked man, that he knowes not how long he shall travel in this pain; for though all his be painful dayes, yet he had rather continue in pain, then not continue his dayes. But the number of years is hidden, or a hidden thing to him.

VERS. 21, 22.

A dreadful sound is in his ears, in prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him.
He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness, and he is waited for of the Sword.

ELiphaz having laid down this position, That pain is the portion of a wicked man, goes on to the proof, and illustration of it; first, in reference to the terrours of his conscience; and secondly, in reference to the troublesomeness of his outward state, and the sad changes that are incident to him. That a wicked man travels with inward pain, or terrour of conscience; the first words of this context tell us, Vers. 21. A dreadful sound is in his ear.

קול פחדים Sonitus terrorũ, numerus multitudinis significationem auget, i. e. sonitus maximè terrificus, vel non unius sed multiplicis terroris. Merc.

The Hebrew is, A voice of dreads; the word is Plural, because, not one single terror, but a multitude of terrors, an Army of terrors incamp about the spirit of a wicked man: and these charge him without intermission; as soon as one hath done, another draws up against him.

And he saith, A sound of terrour, because a sound carries fear with it; Fear is a perturbation of the mind, arising from an apprehension of some approaching evil: Now, by how much the nearer evil draweth to us, by so much doth fear increase upon us; and then an evil may be said to be very near us, when we hear the sound of it. We quickly see and feel an Enemy, when once he is come within our hearing. When the King of Israel sent a messenger to take off the head of Elisha, Shut the door (saith Elisha) and hold him fast at the door, is not the sound of his Masters feet behind him? (2 *King.*6.33.) That is, is not his Master near. And when Eliah saw the rain at hand, he thus bespeaks King Ahab, Get thee up, eat, and drink, for there is a sound of abundance of rain (1 *King.*18.41.) So here, The sound of terror, notes the speedy approach of it; the Prophet (*Jer.*4.19.) complains lamentably, My belly, my belly, I am pained at my very heart, my heart makes a noise within me (and why all this?) because thou hast heard O my soul, the sound of the Trumpet, and the alarm of War; that is, because now it appears that the enemy is at hand. When once we hear the sound of the Trumpet, War is not far off, yea it is even at the door, and death is ready to climb up at our windows. Usually the ear receives the first blow; we first hear, and then feel the Sword.

When Eliphaz saith, A dreadful sound is in his ear, we may understand it two wayes; either first, that a wicked man hearing the sad reports of approaching evil, is greatly troubled; or secondly, that a wicked man frames to himself an imaginary sound of evil. His fansie makes a noise, he thinks he hears the sound of Drums and Trumpets, the clattering of Armour, and the clashing of drawn Swords, he hears (as the Prophet Nahum elegantly describes it) The noise of the whip, and the noise of the ratling of the Wheels, and of the pransing Horses, and of the jumping Chariots. Now, whether we understand it of the approach of real dangers, the sound of which, are a terror to him, or whether we take it for those fantastick, panick fears and Satanical delusions, both or either of them render his life uncomfortable, and are the effects of an unquiet, or of a guilty conscience.

Hence Observe, A wicked man is alwayes subject to fear; he that is a servant to sin cannot but be a slave to fear: And he that hath done much evil, suspects much.

While we have Peace within, War without doth not much trouble, though it much afflict us. And while our hearts, toucht by the Spirit of God, make us musick, a sound of terrour to the ear is not terrible.

It

Impius tãtũ metuit, quãtum nocuit.

It is said of a godly man (Psal. 112. 7.) No evil tydings shall make him fear (though there be a dreadful sound in his ear, a sound of danger, yet) his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord. A wicked man is terrified with conceited danger; a godly man is not afraid when there is real danger. A godly man hath a witness for him in himself; a wicked man carries a witness against him in himself; and this witness is also his judge to condemn him, yea his executioner to torment, and vex him; as soon as our first Parents had sinned (Gen. 3. 8.) They heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the Garden, in the cool of the day, and Adam and his Wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord: Here was no appearance of terrour, it was the voice of God walking as a friend, not marching as an enemy, and it was in the cool, not heat of the day; these circumstances argue the guiltiness of Adam and his Wife, who fled and hid themselves at this appearance of the Lord. The voice of God walking, was a dreadful sound in their ears, because they had not hearkned to the voice of God commanding. Wicked Pashur, who opposed the good Prophet, is branded with a new name (Jer. 20. 3. 4.) The Lord said, his name shall no more be called Pashur, but Magor-Misabib; that is, Fear round about, and in the next Verse, the reason is given why this name was given him, For I will make thee a terrour to thy self: He that is a terrour to himself, can no more be without terrour, then he can be without himself. Nor can any thing be a comfort to him, who is his own terrour. And therefore a guilty conscience hears a dreadful sound, what sound soever he hears: he ever expects to hear bad news, and he puts fearful glosses and comments upon that which is good.

Nemo se judice nocens absolvitur.

Pessimus in dubiis Augur timor. Stat.

A wicked man interprets all reports in one of these two mischievous senses, either To the discredit of others, or to the disquiet of himself: Bring what text of providence you can to him, he corrupts it with one of these glosses. Yea, the faithful counsels of his own Friends, are dreadful sounds unto him, for he hath a suspicion that while they are counselling him for good, it is but a contriving of evil against him, or a setting of snares to catch him.

Again, sometimes God creates a sound, or causeth the wicked to hear a dreadful sound (2 King. 7. 6.) The Lord made the Hoast of the Syrians to hear a noise of Chariots, and a noise of Horses, even the noise of a great Hoast, &c. Upon this dreadful sound, they arose and fled. Sometimes a wicked heart creats a sound, and what the Prophet threatens, he hears, the stone out of the Wall, the beam out of the Timber crying against him. The Story tells us of one who thought that the Swallows in the Chimney spake, and told tales of him. We say in our Proverb, As the Fool thinketh, so the Bell clinketh; much more may we say, As an evil conscience thinketh, so every thing clinketh. As he that hath a prejudice against another, takes all he hears spoken of him, and all that he hears him speak in the worst sense, and most disadvantageous construction to his reputation; so he that hath a prejudice against himself, construes all that he either hears or sees against his own Peace: Hence it is that he doth not only flee when he is pursued, but when none pursue (Prov. 28. 1.) The wicked flies when none pursueth (except his own fears) but the righteous is as bold as a Lyon: This terrour was threatned in the old Law (Levit. 26. 36.) They that are left alive of you in the time of your Captivity, I will send fainting in their hearts, in the Land of their Enemy, and the sound of a shaking leaf shall chase them; What poor spirits have they who are chased by the motion of a leaf? The sound of a leaf is a pleasant sound, it is a kind of natural musick. Fear doth not only make the heart move, As the Trees of the Forrest are moved with the wind (Isa. 7.) but it makes the heart move, if the wind do but move the Trees of the Forrest. The Prophet Isaiah tells Jerusalem, Thy slain men are not slain with the Sword, not dead in Battel (Isai. 22. 2.) With what then were they slain? And how died they; a learned Interpreter tells us how: They were slain with fear, and died with a sound of Battel before ever they joyned Battel. This answereth the judgment denounced by Moses in another place (Deut. 28. 65.) The Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind, and thy life shall hange in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have no assurance of thy life.

Hominis tui, nõ expectato adventu hostis, velut transfossi exanimãtur metu. Jun.

But here some may object, Is this the portion of wicked men? Doth a dreadful sound in their ears afflict their hearts? Have not many such, much peace? and do they not either smile or wonder to hear others complaining of an afflicted spirit, and beg prayers for the appeasing of their troubled conscience? which are matters they have no acquaintance with, nor knowledge of.

I answer, First, We are not to understand the proposition, as if all wicked men have, or that any wicked man at all times, hath this dreadful sound in his ear; but thus it is very often, and thus it may be always: thus it is with many, and thus it may be with all wicked men. A wicked man hath (as we say) no fence for it, no priviledge nor promise to secure him from it.

Again, though some wicked men have not this dreadful sound in their ears; yea though they have pleasant sounds in their ears, like them who sang to the Vial, &c. (Amos 6.) Yet first, their peace is not a true peace; Secondly, it is not a lasting peace; Thirdly, that which they have, ariseth from one of these two grounds; either from neglect of their consciences, or from some defect in their consciences. The neglect of conscience from whence this ariseth is twofold, either first, when they neglect to speak to conscience, conscience and they never have a word, much less any serious conference, or discourse; either concerning the state of their hearts, or the course of their lives, and then all's peace with them. Secondly, when the speakings of conscience are neglected, conscience hath a double voice of direction, and correction; conscience tells a man what he ought, and what he ought not to do: conscience checks a man for not doing what he ought, or for doing what he ought not. Yet many over-power and restrain conscience from this office, and never leave opposing, till they have silenced, yea conquered it: Such as these have peace, such a one as it is, and hear nothing but a sound of delight in their ears, while this silence lasteth.

Again, this may arise from some defect disabling conscience, to do its ordinary, or natural duty. (the conscience of an evil man may have some goodness in it) Conscience may be considered two wayes, either morally, or naturally; that only is a morally good conscience, which is pure and holy, a conscience cleansed from the guilt of sin by the blood of Christ; thus no wicked man can be said to have a good conscience. That is a naturally good conscience which performs the office or duty to which conscience is appointed; conscience is set up in man to perform certain offices: If the conscience of a bad man perform them, his conscience (in that sense) is good.

The first office or work of conscience is to observe, and take notice of what we do, conscience should, as it were, keep a Day-book, and follow us up and down with Pen and Ink, to write all our motions.

A second work of conscience is to testifie what we have done, and which way we have moved.

A third, is, to accuse us when we do evil, and to acquit us when we do well: Now as a wicked mans conscience is alwayes morally evil, because stained, and polluted with sin: So many times his conscience is naturally evil too; that is, it will neither take notice of, nor check him for his sin. When the wicked mans conscience is in this evil state, he thinks his state good enough, and so he is at quiet.

Casuists tell us of four sorts of evil consciences, all which may live out of the hearing of these dreadful sounds.

First, A blind ignorant conscience that cannot discern between moral good and evil.

Secondly, A secure conscience, which thinks not of any penal evil.

Thirdly, A dull, lazy, sleepy conscience, which hath little or no sense, either of what is done or suffered.

Fourthly, A seared conscience, which is altogether senseless.

A conscience thus disabled to perform its work, being either blind, secure, sleepy, or seared, is tame and quiet with the worst of men. But all this while, though this wicked man hath some ease, yet he hath no peace; his conscience while feared, is far enough from being setled; his conscience while asleep, is far enough from rest. It is with such, as with some sick men, ask them how they do, they will say, Very well, when as indeed they are so sick, that they know not how ill they are; they take death it self for health, and their not feeling of pain, for the curing of their disease.

But when the conscience of a wicked man is once enlightned, softned, and awakened, he cannot but have these dreadful sounds, which will neither give, nor let him receive any rest. Conscience will awake at last, and speak terrible things; conscience will be a Boanerges, a terrible Preacher, thundring out, not onely a chiding reproof, but a sentence of condemnation, and then the wicked will even gnash their teeth, because conscience did no sooner use its teeth, they will gnaw their tongues for sorrow, because conscience had no tongue to speak, or they no ears to hear what it spake, till it was too late. A dreadful sound in his ear.

In prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him.

The Hebrew is, In peace the destroyer shall come upon him. Peace is so near allied, and so great a friend to prosperity, that one word may well serve both. The wicked mans destroyer shall be to him like Joab to Abner, and Amasa, shedding the blood of War in Peace, and putting that blood upon the Girdle about his loynes, &c. (1 Kings 2. 5.)

But some may demand, How doth this suit with the former Verse? Where Eliphaz told us, that A wicked man travels in pain all his dayes: How is he in prosperity, if he travels all his dayes in pain? I answer, The denomination is given from the greatest part of a wicked mans life, and that is trouble and pain. Or, secondly, if an instance can be given of any wicked man that hath had more good dayes than evil, or that hath had no ill dayes at all, in regard of any outward trouble and pain, then we may reconcile the Text thus; his prosperity is beside his state, yea, in his very prosperity he is in pain: In the midst of laughter his heart is sorrowful, and the end of his mirth is heavinesse. (Prov. 14. 13.) His is but a seeming, not a real prosperity.

Est amplificatio malæ cujusdam impiorum securitatis q.d. si contingat impium nihil timere sed secure agere tunc & inopinato opprimetur. Pined.

Further, these words are an aggravation of his misery, because if at any time he appears prosperous, and free from fear, then sudden destruction overtakes him.

Et cum pax sit ille insidias suspicatur. Vulg. Omnia etiam tuta tyranni & impii timent. Merc.

Or, lastly, The destroyer may be said to come upon him in prosperity, because in his best dayes he fears the destroyer: he suspects danger, when he sees none; and is therefore never out of danger. Who this destroyer is, is left here at large; no particular one is specified, but any terrible one is intended; Eliphaz doth not say, A Destroyer, but The Destroyer. One both powerful, and skilful to destroy, shall come upon him. He shall not onely come to him, but come upon him; to come upon, is to invade, or to assault: A friend comes to a man with kindness and embraces, to visit or salute him, an enemy comes upon a man with blows and violence, to wound and destroy him. In prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him.

Hence observe; When wicked men think themselves most safe, they are neerest to destruction.

'Tis seldome that they think themselves safe, and when they do, they are furthest from safety. 'When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever (Psal. 92. 7.) Their temporal, short spring, is not onely an antecedent, but an Argument of their eternal Winter. And their Winter is not the going down of the sap to the root, but the pulling of them up by the roots; they shall be destroyed.

'(Job 20. 22.) In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits: When it is full Sea with him, his Channel shall be dried up. It was said to that Fool (Luke 12. 20.) This night thy soul shall be taken from thee: The destroyer came upon him indeed in his prosperity, when he sang himself asleep, with Soul, thou hast goods laid up for many years, he could not keep his soul one night. (1 Thes. 5. 3.) When they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape: The general destruction of wicked men in the day of Judgment, shall come as a thief in the night. We have a representation of this, in that woful tragedy which the Lord acted upon the Egyptians (Exod. 12. 13.) At midnight there was a grievous cry, (he came upon them as a thief in the night) for the Lord smote all the first-born of the land of Egypt; they dyed in their warm beds, in prosperity the destroyer came upon them. This is bad enough, yet not the worst of the condition of wicked men: For,

Vers. 22. He believes not that he shall return out of darkness, he is waited for of the Sword.

This is a further account of the inward misery or pain which afflicts the spirit of a wicked man.

He believes not that he shall return out of darkness] He looketh not that he shall escape from darkness. So Master Broughton. There are five interpretations given about this darkness, out of which the wicked man believes he shall not return.

Pii sçt se armant & in spem contra spem sperant. Merc.

First, Some understand it of the darkness of sin; but a wicked man cannot be said to despair of that about which he never had any hope or desire.

Secondly, Some understand darkness literally and plainly, of the darkness of the night, and interpret thus, He believes not that he shall return out of darkness; that is, he is so haunted with fears every night when he lies down, that he thinks he shall never live till the morning: This is a good sense.

Thirdly, Others understand this darkness to be death, he hath a perfect sound of dread when death comes, because he believes not that he shall return out of that darkness. The Resurrection is the consolation of the Saints, in the midst of greatest dangers and thickest darkness; because, though they dye, yet they believe they shall return out of darkness. But a wicked man, who believes or hopes for nothing beyond the time of this life, if he be once cast into the Grave, either thinks he shall lye there for ever, or if he believes he shall rise, yet he doth not believe that he shall rise out of darkness, for he shall rise in darkness, and go down to everlasting darkness.

Fourthly, A fourth expounds it of internal darkness, the darkness of his spirit, or of those mists and clouds which hang about his mind. A godly man falling into this darkness, doth not actually believe he shall return out of it (for such a faith were his return out of it) but a wicked man, as he hath no ground, so no possibility (continuing in the state he is) to believe it. Saul had a woful dark spirit, and believed not that he should return out of it, by the help of God; therefore he went to a Witch (a Counsellour of the Prince of of darkness) for help.

But fifthly, I rather conceive, as often elsewhere, so here, by darkness is meant outward affliction. When the destroyer comes upon him, and he is cast into a sad dark condition, he hath no faith for himself, that he shall return out of it, or be delivered from it. This is an extream aggravation of the miserable state of a wicked man, who either hath no outward prosperity, or his prosperity is nothing to him, he enjoyes it not; but if ever he fall into outward misery, how great is his misery? so great that he gives himself for gone, a lost man for ever: He believes not that he shall return out of darkness.

Observe hence, That a wicked man neither doth, nor can believe deliverance from evil.

First, He hath no ground to believe promises are the foundation of Faith. A wicked man may be under promises of conversion from his sin, but he is not under any promise of mercy while he continues in his sin; the whole Book of God yields him not (in that state) any special promise, for so much as a bit of bread; when he hath bread, he hath it from providence, not from a promise, or but from a general promise. He is fed as a Beast is fed, the Lord being the preserver of Man and Beast: He cannot have a special promise himself, not being an heir of promise: Therefore when he falls into darkness, he hath no ground to believe. Whereas a godly man never hath so much ground to believe, as when he falls into darkness, because then he hath more promises than before; his outward losses gain him the advantage of many sweet promises, which which till then he could not plead, for the succour and nourishment of his faith. As a wicked man hath no promise of God (in the sense explained) at any time; so a godly man hath most promises of God in evil, yea, in the worst of times.

And as a wicked man hath no ground to believe, so he usually hath no heart to believe: and as he hath no reason to hope for better things, so he hath no courage, his spirit sinks and fails when his state doth. Abigail had no sooner told Nabal that the destroyer was comming upon him in his prosperity, but his heart sunk within him like a stone, and he dyed away presently.

Secondly, The best of a wicked mans faith (that he shall return out of darkness) is but a presumptuous fancy, or meer Fool-hardiness. A good man is like a Child in his Fathers house, who takes no care, but casts all upon his Parents; in the greatest storm he commits the helm to Christ, as Pilot; he can say as David (Psal. 42.) when he is in trouble; Why art thou disquieted, O my soul? He calls his soul to question, and would have his soul give him a reason, Why art thou troubled, my soul? hope in God, for I shall yet praise him: But a wicked man hath no God to hope in, therefore he cannot say, I shall yet praise him: That man cannot cast his burden of cares upon the Lord (Psal. 55. 22.) who cares not how he burdens God with his sins; therefore he must bear and sink under both burdens himself: He cannot believe that he shall return out of the darkness of trouble, who delights and sports in the darkness of iniquity.

Again, Consider, this is brought as a proof of the wofull condition of a wicked man. It is misery enough, that the destroyer shall come upon him; but this is more miserable, he cannot believe deliverance from destruction.

Hence Observe; That want of faith in time of affliction, is more grievous than affliction.

It is worse not to believe deliverance, than to fall into trouble; as the life of Faith is the best life, so the life of Unbelief is the worst life. Despair of good is the greatest evil: Faith is not onely the support and relief of the soul in trouble, but it is the victory and triumph of the soul over trouble. Faith doth not onely keep the soul alive, but lively; Faith keeps the soul fat, and in good plight; Faith is a shield, both against temptation and affliction. But every blow falls upon the bare skin of an unbeliever; Faith is a shield both against the fiery darts of the Devil, and (with a difference) against the fiery darts of God also. Let God himself cast his darts at a Believer, Faith secures him from hurt, though not from wounds, yea, his very wounds, through a work of Faith, shall work his good.

It is the comfort of a man that feareth God, and obeyeth the voice of his Servants, that while he walketh in darkness and hath no light, he is bid to trust in the name of the Lord, and to stay upon his God (Isa. 50. 10.) But while a man that doth not fear God, walks in darkness and hath no light, his misery is, that he can neither trust in God till light comes, nor that light will ever come. How happy are the righteous, to whom light ariseth in darkness? How unhappy are the wicked, who being in darkness, conclude that the light will never arise.

Faith makes all evil good to us, and all good better; unbelief makes all good evil to us, and all evil worse. Faith (like the Horse, Job 39. 19.) laughs at the shaking of the spear; unbelief trembles at the shaking of a leaf. Faith finds good in Famine, and a Table in the Wilderness. In greatest dangers, Faith answers, I have a great God; when outward strength is broken, and all lyes a bleeding, Faith answers, The promises are strong still, they have not lost a drop of blood, nor have they a scar upon them. When God himself appears angry, Faith answers, I know how to please him, and I can go to one in whom he is, and will be well-pleased for ever. Thus Faith pulls out the sting of trouble, draws out the gall and wormwood of every affliction. But where Faith is wanting, every affliction is full of gall and wormwood, and every trouble vexeth with a double sting. It stings such, as it is a trouble, and it stings them more, as they see no comfort in, nor way out of trouble. The darkness of darkness is this, Not to believe, that we shall return out of darkness.

And he is waited for of the sword] This clause is near in sense to the latter part of the former Verse, and yet in this variety of expression, there is some variety of intention. For the clearing of it, two things are to be enquired:

First, What is meant by the Sword.

Secondly, What is meant by, waited for of the Sword.

The Sword is taken two wayes in Scripture.

First, literally, for, That weapon of War, and by a Synechdoche the Sword is put for all weapons of War; as also by a Metonymie, for War it self: When the Sword is threatned in Scripture, War is threatned.

Secondly, The Sword is taken for the power of the Magistrate, who bears not the Sword in vain: Christ is described as a King armed with his Sword. (Isa. 11. 4.) By the Sword (that is, with the Word) of his mouth, he will slay the wicked: Christ will pronounce a sentence of condemnation, and deliver them up to execution: Thus the Judge slayes the malefactor with the sword of his mouth.

Nempe sua sententia tradens eum justitiæ ministro.

Further, By a Synechdoche, the Sword is taken for all manner of evil and trouble; whatsoever hurts or afflicts is comprehended under the notion of a Sword (Luke 1. 35.) Old Simeon tells the holy Virgin in his song, Also a Sword shall pass through thy Soul; his meaning is not, that she should be cut off in War by the hand of a Souldier, or in peace, by the sentence of the Judge; but that sore troubles and afflictions, like a sharp sword, should pierce her soul.

Quicquid pungit & percutit, & torquet, & cruciat in scripturis sanctis gladius appellatur. Hieron. in cap. ult. Isa.

Here the Sword may be taken either for the Sword of War, or of Peace, or for any evil that befalls the wicked Man.

But how is he waited for of the Sword? The Original word is rendred two wayes;

First, Actively.

Secondly, Passively.

Some render actively, He is waiting for of the Sword: He stands expecting the Sword, and that in a double sense; he waits for the Sword which he fears will destroy him, or he waits for a Sword, which he desires to defend him. Mr. Broughton gives this sense, Having watch, he thinketh upon the Sword.

Circumspectans undique gladium. Vulg. Sc. vel quo pereat, vel quo se defendat. Tanquam ex specula expectat. Tigur.

Again, Others render it passively, He is waited for of the Sword, when he thinks not of it; The Sword lies in ambush to surprize him. A man is said to be waited for by an Enemy, when he intends to assault him unawares; To be thus waited for by the Sword, is to be waited for by Sword-men. And it is as great a disadvantage to be seen of the Sword, before we see the Sword; as it is (according to the old Proverb) to be seen of the Wolf, or of the Crocodile, before we see either.

Hebraizantes tenent esse participium passivum: hinc Rab. Levi exponit, Conspicitur à gladio. Aspectus gladio. Vatabl.

The wicked is waited for of the Sword, not for any service, but for the revenge it owes him; the Sword lyes behind the door, or under a bush, to snap him as he passeth.

Est Hebraismus, ut videri à gladio sit ab hostibus observari per insidias.

The Septuagint, instead of, he is waited, or watched, or looked for by the Sword, render thus, He is decreed into the hand of the Sword; leading us to the appointment and destination of God, who hath set him out, and marked him for judgment. He is appointed to the Sword: Such a decree the Prophet seems to point at (Jer. 15. 2.) where he brings in the Lord, as resolved to proceed in judgement against all prayers and intreaties, though made by his greatest Favorites; Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet my mind could not be unto this people, but such as are for death, to death, and such as are for the sword, to the sword: That is, such as are decreed into the hand of the Sword, let the Sword take them; the decree shall stand, the sentence is irrevocable.

Decretus in manu ferri. Sept. Conspectus ipse ad gladium. Mont. Nempe à Deo conspectus & destinatus ad gladium. Prævisus enim est ad gladium. Sym.

He dreams of danger when he sleeps, and where-ever he comes, he waits for the Sword; He that hath a mind to hurt others, fears it is in the mind of every one to hurt him: He that is harmless is fearless; and while we go about doing good, we are free from the suspition of evil. Cain having murthered his Brother, complains of the Lords sentence against him, Thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth, and from thy face shall I be hid, and I shall be a fugitive and a Vagabond on the earth, and it shall come to pass, that every man that finds me shall slay me, (Gen. 4.14.) Cains complaint is the Comment of this Text, Every one that finds me shall slay me, is, I wait for, or I expect the Sword: Cain speaks as if an Army were continually pursuing him; or, as if the avenger of blood were alwayes ready at his heels. And that which aggravates the wonder of this jealousie, is, that we can give account but of one man alive in the world besides himself at that time, and that was his own Father Adam; We read not of any Son that Abel left behind him, nor had Cain any Son (upon record) at that time; and yet he cries out as if the World had been full of Inhabitants, and every one of them his Enemy; Every one that meets me will slay me. What is said of Ishmael, is true of Oppressors, Their hand is against every man; and therefore they have cause enough to suspect that every mans hand is against them, they are ever waiting for the Sword.

Ex omni parte inimicos sibi imminere videns. Aquin.

Qui de nullo confidit de omnibus timet. id.

Secondly, from the passive sense, He is waited for of the Sword, Observe,

That a wicked man is in danger whersoever he is.

He cannot set his foot over the threshold but mischief may arrest him; the Lord said to Cain, If thou doest ill, sin lyes at the door; that is, (according to the ordinary interpretation) punishment lyes at the door; it lyes at the door, yea, it will draw the latch, or turn the key, and come in at the door; There is no evil but a wicked man is subject to it; as there is no good but is the inheritance of a godly man, who is therefore called an heir of the promise. He that is an heir of the promise, hath all the good things of this life, and of the next for his inheritance. When he goeth forth, mercy hath him by the hand, yea, mercy lyes under his feet, and holds a canopy of protection over his head. A wicked man is an heir of the curse, and therefore he alwayes stands under the droppings of Divine anger; his breast is the Butt or mark at which God levels the deadly Arrows of his indignation; and he is waited for of the Sword.

Thirdly, Observe, That the expectation of evil is more afflictive than the feeling of evil.

He doth not say, he is slain with the sword, or cut off with the sword; but he is waited for, or he waits for the sword: All evil attends him who is thus attended, or who gives such attendance. He that is alwayes looking for evil, cannot enjoy the good which he sees. For as the assured hope of approaching comfort swallows up our present sorrows, so the continual expectation of approaching sorrow swallows up our present comforts.

Fourthly, It is not said either by what sword, or whose sword, he is waited for, but he is waited for of the sword; here is the sword, but here is no hand named, neither the hand of God, nor the hand of man, drawing and weilding this Sword.

Hence Note; That the destruction of a wicked man is inevitable.

When we neither know whose the Sword is, nor whence the Sword is, how shall we prevent it, or provide against it. When the Lord would assure us that an unavoidable overthrow shall come upon the Kingdomes of the earth, which oppose the Kingdome of Christ, he saith, A Stone cut out without hand shall do this; it shall be done no man knows how or which way; and therefore no man can know how or which way to hinder the doing of it. As there is a Stone cut out without hands, so here is a sword to cut without hands. The judgment of Babylon is thus expressed by the Prophet (Isa. 47. 11.) Therefore shall evil come upon thee, thou shalt not know from whence it ariseth, and mischief shall fall upon thee, that thou shalt not be able to put it off. The former words expound the latter: Why should not Babylon be able to put off the mischief? Because it comes upon her, she knows not from whence. We say in our Proverb, when we threaten a mischief, from which there is no escaping, You shall never know who hurt you: He that knows not who hurts him, shall never know how to help himself; and while the hand that strikes us is not seen, how shall we see to defend our selves against the stroke. He that waits for the sword is alwayes in fear, and he that is waited for by the Sword, is alwayes in danger. Either of these is bad enough; and he that is under both, cannot be worse.

VERS. 23, 24.

He wandreth abroad for bread, saying, Where is it? He knoweth that the day of darkness is ready at hand.
Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid, they shall prevail against him, as a King ready to battel.

THese two Verses are a further description of the perplexed condition of a wicked man, A dreadful sound is in his ears, &c. He is waited for of the Sword. And what more?

Vers. 23. He wandereth abroad for bread, saying, Where is it?

We put in those words, Saying, and Is it? the Hebrew being onely this, He wandreth abroad for bread, where; as if he had said, No man knows where, and he knows not whither himself.

In Hebræo tantum est movetur pro pane.

There is a two-fold interpretation of this Wandring; some understand it of a powerful roving abroad for bread; he takes what he can from those who are next, or he takes what comes next to hand: He must have it, it matters not much with him, how or from whom. Such are called Rovers, they rove abroad for bread, they spoil and plunder others, for the supply of their wants, shall I say, or of their lusts. But I conceive this Exposition unsuitable; and the reason is, because Eliphaz is not here describing the sin of a wicked man, but his punishment; to spoyl and plunder for bread is his sin; to wander for bread is his punishment, and implies the evil and misery that comes upon the wicked, not the evil and mischief that is done by the wicked.

Tyrannorum furta & rapinas hic describi putat Cajetanus.

Secondly, To wander, is the condition of a man who hath no setled dwelling. Paul was once in such a state, Even to this present hour we both hunger, &c. and have no certain dwelling-place (1 Cor. 4. 11.) This was also the lot of the Jewish Martyrs, They wandered about in Sheepskins, &c. (Heb. 11. 37.) These were holy wanderers: They wandered in the world, that they might not wander from God. Here we have an unholy wanderer, who having gone astray from God, found no rest among men, a downright Vagabond; for so the word is applied to Cain (Gen. 4.) A fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be; and we in our Law, call a sort of idle Beggars, Vagabonds, such as go from Countrey to Countrey, from house to house, to seek their bread. Such also were among the Jews, who are therefore called Vagabond Jews, (Acts 19. 13.) To be a wanderer was one of the sharpest threats that God ever denounced against his people, My God will cast them away, because they did not hearken to him, and they shall be wanderers among the Nations.

Panis hoc loco non significat, ut aliâs sæpe, quodcunque esculentum; sed vilissimum quemque cibum quo possit sustentari. Pined.

He wanders about for bread] In Scripture sense, bread takes in all good things, even the best which concern this life: So Christ teacheth us to pray, Give us this day our daily bread. But here by bread, we are to understand the meanest provision, distinct from flesh, and other Food; a man that lives meerly upon bread, hath but poor fare; though bread be the staff of life, yet he that hath nothing but bread to eat, lives meanly, and hath onely enough to keep life and soul together.

His verbis notatur aliud Dei flagellum nempe extrema inopia. Bold.

Yet further, They that wander for bread, must be content with the courset bread, and with a little of that; they are often glad if they get but a dry or mouldy crust of bread to satisfie the cry of hunger. So then, To wander about for bread, is to live a a beggars life, or to be driven to the utmost shifts to sustain life, and keep from starving.

To be brought to a piece of bread (of our own) is to be brought to the lowest ebb in worldly things, (Prov. 6.26.) By means of a whorish woman, a man is brought to a piece of bread; That is, he is made very poor. And if he be at a low ebb, who hath but a piece of bread of his own: what are they who are forced to ask so low as a piece of bread of others? To want bread is ill, but wander about for bread is far worse. He that wants bread is pincht, but he that wanders for it is disgraced.

Exul, inops erres, alienaque limina lustres. Ovid. in Ibin.

Observe

Observe hence, First, To wander about for bread, is a sore affliction.

Such an affliction, as David professeth he never observed the righteous mans seed fallen into (Psal. 37. 25.) I have been young, and now am old, yet never saw I the righteous forsaken, nor their seed begging their bread: The righteous are often troubled, yet never forsaken, or if forsaken of men, yet not of God; when all men, even godly men, forsook Paul, yet God did not: The Lord (saith he) stood by me, (2 Tim. 4. 16, 17.) And though a righteous man may be brought to begg, yet his seed (that is, his whole posterity) is not; or if we take seed for a single person, to see him beg for bread is very rare; so rare it was in those times, that David had not observed it; for he speaks not of that which cannot be, but of that which is seldome or never seen to be. 'Tis a mercy to be denied superfluities, but it is an extream misery to be denied necessaries. The Jews had poor amongst them, but the Law made such provision, that they had no Beggars, or wanderers for bread (Deut. 15.) He is not a Beggar that asks Bread upon a pinch, (for so did David himself, more than once) but he that makes a trade of it.

casus transitorii non reddunt mendicum. Musc. in Psal. 37.

Poverty or want is not a mark of Gods disfavour, no more than riches are a mark of his love: Yet some want and poverty, that especially, which is accompanied with a continual wandering for bread, is a mark of Gods disfavour. It was a Prophetical curse upon the Traytor Judas and his Posterity, (Psal. 109. 10.) Let his Children be continually Vagabonds, and beg, let them seek their bread out of desolate places. And experience tells us, that though sometimes a Lazarus, a good man beg, yet the race and generality of professed Beggars are the worst of mankind.

Secondly, Whereas Eliphaz speaks specially of the Oppressor, and tells us, that he wanders about for bread; we may observe, Oppression is the neerest way to poverty: They who make Beggars to satisfie their lusts, shall be forced to beg for the satisfying of their hunger.

It is very dangerous to make provision for the flesh by lawful means, to fulfill the lusts of it; but it is most dangerous to make provision for the flesh by unlawful means (by wrong and oppression) to fulfil the lusts of it. They who so fulfil their lusts, shall soon be brought to want. Hannah sung out this sudden change (1 Sam. 2. 5.) They that were full have hired themselves out for bread, and they that were hungry ceased. Not that they ceased to be, but they ceased to be hungry, or their hunger ceased. Godly empty ones were filled, and wicked full ones were emptied; and that which makes the want and emptiness of a wicked man so great a misery, is his want of faith and patience when he is empty; he hath done so much evil, that he hath no faith to believe that any man will do him good; therefore his poverty fills him with impatience, and his mind is more unsetled than his estate.

Thus such as are here described (Psal. 59. 14, 15.) At evening let them return, and let them make a noise like a Dog, and go round about the City: Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied: A good man may want meat, but he doth not grudge. He that waits upon God, and believes, shall be satisfied, though not filled.

Again, 'tis propheſied of wicked men (Isa. 8. 21.) They shall pass through it hardly bestead and hungry, and it shall come to pass, when they shall be hungry, that they shall fret themselves, and curse their King and their God, and look upward: When an unbeliever hath nothing to eat, he eats himself. His own fretting wastes him more than his hunger. He then looks upward, not as submitting himself to God in his hunger, not as depending upon God, for the satisfying of his hunger: In which sense it is said (Psal. 145. 15, 16.) The eyes of all wait upon thee, or (as we put in the Margin) look unto thee, and thou giveſt them their meat in due season, thou openeſt thine hand and satisfieſt the desire of every living thing. A wicked man cannot look upward, thus, when he is hungry, he cannot look up and pray, he cannot look up and trust in God; but he looks upward to curse the God of Heaven in his heart, if not with his tongue; he looks upward, because he is vext with all that is done below; he looks upward, not because he hath any pleasant sights in Heaven, but because he is displeased with all he sees on Earth.

He wanders abroad for bread.] Where? or whither doth he wander? That which Eliphaz is conceived to aim chiefly at in this passage, is not so much the real, as the imaginary and conceited want of a wicked man. He wanders while he stayes at home, and seeks for bread, while his Barns and Tables are filled with it. He is terrified with forethoughts of poverty, in the midst of his riches, and when he hath bread, saith, Where is it? He is so troubled with suspected evils, that he cannot take comfort in his possessed goods. Hence observe;

First, That abundance cannot satisfie.

God only is fulness to us. A man may wander about in his thoughts for bread, when he hath bread enough about him, and say he shall be undone, and die a beggar, when he hath abundance. A covetous man is an unsatiable gulf; He only is well who hath enough, and he is best who hath (in temporals) the least enough: But a covetous man hath not enough though he hath more than enough, and much more than needs; he alwayes dreams of dearths, and suspects the Earth will be barren: with these fears he pines, yea martyrs himself, and is not at all enriched with all his riches; he hath sufficient to maintain twenty, yet is told by his unbelief, that he hath not sufficient for one. This is vanity and vexation of spirit; The life of man doth not consist in what he hath, but in what he is, and hopes to be: his life doth not consist in abundance, either for the continuance of it, or for the comfort of it. A man doth not live more dayes, nor more chearfully any day, because he lives plentifully. The creature were a God to us, if it could do this to us; but this, God hath reserved in his own hands (how much soever of the creature he gives out) that we may know our dependance on him.

Secondly, observe. That imaginary wants, or to have an unquiet spirit in the midst of our enjoyments, is more afflictive than to be in real want.

The worst worldly poverty is to be poor when we are rich; as it is the excellency of our spiritual estate to be poor in spirit, in our greatest spiritual plenty to be little or nothing in our own eyes, when we have a great stock of grace: So it is the misery of our temporal estate, to be thus poor in spirit, when we have plenty in the purse; to say we have little or nothing, when we have a great stock of worldly goods.

Zophar concludes of the Hypocrite (Chap. 20. 21.) In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in streights; which may be understood, either first, That when he is full, troubles shall empty him; or secondly, That while his fulness continues, even in his fullest fulness, he shall live, as if he were indeed as empty of wealth, as he is of goodness, alwayes spending himself with fears that all will be suddenly spent; and saying in his heart, This will not hold out, I shall never be able to bring the year about, or bring (as we say) both ends together. Hence his cares are endless, and he grudges himself ordinary comforts, his worldly sorrow consumes him, and he is willing to dye, onely to save charges: That man is in an ill case, who is grudged what he eats or spends by others, but it is far worse for a man to grudge himself his necessary expences.

Some worldly men, whose Barns are full, are ready to say every one to his soul, as he (Luke 12. 19.) Soul take thine ease, thou hast goods laid up for many years: Another hath his Barn full, and yet saith, This will not hold one year, and so gives his soul no ease at all. What the Apostle saith of himself, is true of all those who have an interest in Christ, (2 Cor. 6. 10.) As poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, yet possessing all things: But there are some rich, who make many poor, and themselves poorest of all; for though they have all those things, yet they are as if they possessed nothing. It is an affliction to be poor for want of riches, but it is a curse to be poor in the possession of riches. He that loves Silver shall not be satisfied with Silver (Eccles. 5. 10.) To be satisfied, is more than to be rich, and he is alwayes poor who is unsatisfied; he that expects satisfaction from the creature, creature, shall never find contentation in the creature; and he that expects no satisfaction from the creature, hath contentation in any portion of the creature. A godly man learns in every estate to be content; A carnal man is content in no estate; when he is poor, he sees he hath nothing; and when he is rich, he saith, he hath not enough. Thus he wanders as well when he is rich, as when he is poor, and is therefore never satisfied.

Again, He wanders about for bread, Where? Or saying, Where is it?

Hence Observe, A man that is not good, is uncertain where to receive any good.

Where is it? Though a Believer want bread, yet he knows whither to go for it, and where it is to be had. The earth is the Lords, and the fulness thereof; he goes to Heaven for bread as well as for grace; he knows there is bread in the promise, and to the promise he goes. The promise hath all things both concerning life and godliness. Christ, who is the bread of life, gives us bread for this life; and having Christ with him, we have all things else; bread and cloathing, gold and Silver, are laid up in Christ.

An Unbeliever (as hath been shewed) hath nothing to do with promises, nor with Christ the fulfiller of promises, and therefore he is ever in doubt, when he is in want; and saith, Where is it? He knows not whither to go, nor to whom for the supply of his wants. A wicked man is never in his way, and, in one sence, he is never out of his way. They may go any where, who know not whither to go. They are never out of their way, who have no home. East, West, North, or South, it is all one to them; which way the staff falls, they go, they have no rule nor line to go by; but though a wicked man know not his particular way, yet he often knows his general end, and that is misery, as the next words tell us.

He knows the day of darkness is ready at hand

At Vers. 22. He believes not that he shall return out of darkness; that is (as was opened) in case he falls into evil, he thinks he shall never get out of it; he hath no faith that he shall recover out of trouble, but he hath a strong faith, that he shall fall into trouble: He knows that the day of darkness is ready at hand.

Here are three things to be cleared.

First, What is meant by knowing.

Secondly, What by the day of darkness.

Thirdly, What by being ready at hand.

To know, it is here opposed to an uncertain guess, or to conjecture; to know is as much as to be fully perswaded; to know, is to be assured; the highest act of faith is often expressed by knowledge: Hereby we know that we know him (1 John 2. 4.) That is, hereby we are assured that we know him: so here, He knows; that is, he is assured; it is setled upon his spirit, that the day of darkness is ready at hand. This knowledge riseth not from reports abroad, but from his own breast; so the Septuagint translates, He knows in himself that evil shall be upon him: As a godly man hath a witness for him in himself; so a wicked man hath a witness against him in himself.

Novit in seipso quod manat in ruinam. Certo sibi persuadet atque hujus rei præsagium ex sui cordis sensu facit.

What the day of darkness is, learn upon the former Verse, He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness; There I shewed a fivefold darkness; here I shall reduce it to one of these two.

The day of darkness is either the day of death, or the day of affliction; so 'tis taken (Eccles. 5. 17.) All his dayes he eateth in darkness; that is, he is in sorrow all his dayes: Though he hath Sun-light, or Candle-light enough at his Table, yet he hath no light in his heart. So the Prophet (Amos 5. 20.) Shall not the day of the Lord be darkness, and not light? Even very dark) and no brightness in it? There is a day of the Lord which is nothing but light; and there is a day of the Lord which is nothing but darkness; that is, of tribulation and anguish upon the soul that sins. The Prophet Joel calls it, A day of darkness, and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness. He knows that the day of darkness is

Paratus, firmus, stabilis, certus esse denotat. Drus.

Ready at hand. The word which we translate ready, signifies two things.

First, That which is prepared.

Secondly, That which is established, or confirmed.

We translate to the former, the day is ready or prepared; others render to the latter sence, the day is established, and setled; his day of darkness shall certainly come upon him. And whereas we translate Ready at hand, noting the nearness of the danger. Others, to note the cause of the danger, render, He knows that his own hand hath made a day of darkness; that is, The villanies and wickednesses which he hath committed, cause the clouds of judgment to gather, and look black upon him; his unrighteousness hath hastened on his ruine, and wrapt him up in darkness, He hath brought an evil day upon himself, by his evil deeds; or as the Prophet speaks, His destruction is from himself: He hath pulled down his House with his own hands, and is the sole author or contriver of his own sorrows.

Tygurina per manum intelligere videtur ipsa impiorum scelera, & per paraphrasim sic sententiam elucidat. Scit quod suis factis periculosa tempora accersierit.

This is an experienced truth; but I rather take the words as we render, The day of darkness is ready at hand; that is, it is near, and will shortly seize upon him.

Hence Observe, First, Many a wicked man grows into an assurance of his approaching misery.

It is as hard to perswade some wicked men that their state is naught, as it is to perswade some good men that their state is good; yet as many of the Saints conquer unbelief, and come not only to have some hopes, but high assurances, that there is a day of mercy at hand for them, that they are in a present happy state, and eternal happiness waits for them; so a wicked man (after long debate) may have his unbelief conquered, and though he hath been sowing pillows under his own elbows, though he hath slighted all the counsels, admonitions, and threatnings of faithful Friends, though, notwithstanding all this, he continue long, speaking peace to his own soul, and saying, all is well, yet (I say) this man may have his unbelief conquered, and know at last that there is a day of darkness ready at hand; when his eyes are opened to see what he hath done, and what he hath been, he sees that God hath rejected all his confidences, and that he shall never prosper in them.

Secondly, Observe, That for a man to be assured of his own misery is the height of misery.

Eliphaz puts it here among the punishments of wicked men. This assurance makes his heart shake; this knowledge is full of fear, and therefore full of torment. As to know that a day of light and deliverance is ready at hand, is light while we are in darkness, and deliverance while we are in trouble: So to know that a day of darkness and misery is ready at hand, is darkness to wicked men while they are in external light, and misery in the midst of all their mirth. And as it is the highest comfort of the Saints to know that they have eternal life, to know that they are in the favour, and live in the love of God; (a man may be in it, and not know it, and then though he shall do well at last, yet his state is but uncomfortable, and he that is an heir of Heaven, may walk as an heir of Hell, with a troubled spirit) but to know that it is so, this is Heaven before we come at Heaven; so it is the deepest sorrow of any man in this life, to know that he hath eternal death; an assurance of this, setled upon the spirit (though I conceive a man cannot have an absolute assurance of it, yet to have strong impressions upon the spirit, that he shall never be saved, or that Hell is prepared for him) this is Hell before he is cast into Hell.

A soul that doubts of mercy and of the favour of God, is in a very sad condition, but the condition of that soul is unexpressibly sad, which is assured of judgment, and of the wrath of God.

Thirdly, Observe, That as a wicked man may knows that he shall be miserable in the end, so he may know that his misery is near at hand.

An evil conscience awakened is the worst Prophet, it is full of sad presages; like Micah to Ahab, it never prophesied good, but evil; and it doth not only propheste of evil afar off, but near, or ready at hand: 'Tis true, an evil conscience usually puts the evil day far off (2 Pet. 3. 4.) There shall be scoffers, saying, Where is the day of his coming, &c. The day of darkness is far enough off, it hath been long talked of, but we do not see it, say these despisers: But when an evil conscience is awakened, then he sees evil near, and himself dogg'd at the heels, or (as the former Verse speaks) Waited for of the Sword.

Hæc est pœna impii pars non modica quod cogatur ipse sibi ominari malum. Pined.

As

As a Believer, when the eye of faith is clear, sees mercy near at hand (Faith makes God near, and then all good is near.) So an Unbeliever, when the eye of his conscience is cleared, sees misery near.

Observe Fourthly, The misery of a wicked man is unmoveable.

His day of darkness is established by an irrevocable decree, there is no getting it off; he is under a Divine Fate. A day of darkness may come over the Saints, but that day blows over: David said once of his day of light, It shall never be dark; and of his Mountain, it shall never be removed; yet he was deceived: But a wicked mans day of darkness shall never be light, nor can he use any proper means to turn his day of darkness into light. He cannot pray, and it is prayer that turns darkness into light; he cannot believe, and it is Faith that turns a day of darkness into light; he hath not a Christ to go unto, and it is Christ only who can turn darkness into light, death to life, and the waters of sorrow into the wine of joy; his darkness shall never be removed, who hath not Christ (who is light) to remove it.

Verse 24. Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid, they shall prevail upon him, as a King ready to battel.

In this Verse we have a double effect of those troubles, which are the portion of a wicked man; the first effect is, They shall make him afraid: the second effect is, They shall prevail upon him; both which are illustrated by an elegant similitude, They shall make him afraid, and they shall prevail upon him, as a King ready to Battel.

Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid.] Trouble without, and anguish within (so some expound) He shall have straits in his state, and a strait upon his spirit; both meeting, shall not only afflict him, but make him afraid. The word may be translated to fright, rather then to make afraid: They shall scare him, not only out of his comforts, but out of his wits and senses. There is a threefold fear.

Secondly, Spiritual.

To be spiritually afraid is good; and to be naturally afraid is not evil: So Christ was not only afraid, but amazed (Mark 14. 33.)

Thirdly, There is a distracting, vexing fear, which is both a passion and a perturbation: This is at once the sin and punishment of wicked men.

Consider with what weapons and instruments God fights against a wicked man: he doth not say, Sword and fire shall make him afraid, Armies of enemies shall make him afraid, but trouble and anguish shall do it; God can create and form weapons in our own hearts, to fight against us: Inward anguish is far more grievous then any outward stroke. (Rom. 2. 9.) Tribulation and anguish shall be upon every soul that sins, whether of Jew or Gentile: Anguish is the edge of tribulation, both joyned, wound soul and body; yea, strike through both at every blow.

Hence Note, It is worse to be afraid of evil, then to feel it.

Every thing is to us as we apprehend it, good is not pleasing to us, nor evil afflictive to us, unless we think it so: They who are not afraid of death, welcome it when it comes; others, through fear of death, are held in bondage all the dayes of their life.

Secondly, Observe, Distracting fear is the portion of a wicked man.

The troubles of the righteous are many, but their fears are few (Psal. 112.) His heart is fixed, he shall not be afraid: 'Tis not said, he shall not hear evil tidings (I know no man whose ears are priviledg'd from such reports) but he shall not be afraid; I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against me round about, (Psal. 3. 6.) Though I walk in the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, Psal. 23. 4. are the resolves of Faith: Whosoever hath much fear, hath but little Faith, Wherefore are ye afraid, O ye of little faith? Mat. 8. 26. And how can they but be afraid (when storms arise) who are of no faith? When Faith increaseth, fear decreaseth; and when Faith is come to the height, fear is gone; where there is no Faith, there can be nothing but fear; Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid, that's the first effect.

But that's not all, anguish doth not only fear the wicked man, but prevails against him: Some render, Trouble and anguish intrench about him: The sence is the same, it is such an intrenchment as concludes in a conquest; the besieger prevails. A second reads it thus, Trouble shall make him afraid, and anguish shall intrench about him. The Original joyns the two Substantives together, and the Verb is plural, Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid, they shall prevail against him.

Evil shall get the upper hand of evil men.

A good man, possibly, may be afraid, and afraid sinfully: excess of fear may take hold of him, but he shall not be prevailed against (Prov. 24. 16.) The just man falls seven times a day (into affliction and trouble) and riseth up again; trouble may throw him down, but it cannot keep him down (Mic. 7. 8.) Rejoyce not against me, O mine enemy, when I fall, I shall rise: The Church rises in her falls, and she sometimes foresees her rising, when she is fallen: The wicked fall, and rise no more. And whereas the Saints are more then conquerors through him that loveth them; wicked men are more then conquered, they are utterly ruined, lost, and vanquished, because not beloved. There are two battels wherein we cannot stand without the strength of Christ.

First, The battel of inward temptation.

Secondly, The battel of outward affliction.

We are no match for either, unless Christ be our Second. Satan hath desired thee (saith Christ to Peter) to winnow thee as Wheat (hoping to find, or make thee Chaff) But I have prayed that thy Faith fail not: Peter fell into temptation, yea, he fell in the temptation, yet because Christ undertook for him, the temptation could not prevail against him. And as there is no conquest over Satans temptation, but by the strength of Christ; so none over affliction (which is Gods temptation) but by the strength of Christ (1 Cor. 10. 13.) There hath no temptation (that is, no affliction) taken you, but what is common to man; yet no man can stand under that alone, which may befal any man, therefore it follows) But God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able, &c. Man alone is not sufficient, so much as to think one good thought, how then shall he think good thoughts enough alone, either to scatter a temptation, or to bear an affliction? To carry the soul out in such a conflict requires more then one good thought, yea, more then many good thoughts; it requires good actings; yea, and sufferings too; How shall he do this without the strength of Christ? No wonder then if the lesser of these, yea, the least of the lesser, the least affliction prevail against a wicked man; and if while he runs with Foot-men they weary him, how shall he contend with Horses, with trouble and anguish, shall not these prevail against him, as a King ready to battel? Which is the illustration of the wicked mans downfal: Trouble and anguish prevail against him: But how? Not a little, not with strength only enough to turn the scale of the conflict, but mightily, even with much strength to spare.

As a King ready to battel.] There are four interpretations for the making out of this similitude; some place it between a wicked mans trouble and anguish, and the trouble and anguish of a King ready to joyn battel with a potent Adversary: For, then his spirit is much troubled, knowing how great an adventure he makes, in reference to his state, and how great a hazard he runs, in reference to his life, and person. The charge being sometimes given, to fight neither against small nor great, but only against the King. So wicked man when trouble comes, is like a King going to battel, full of fears and anxious thoughts what the issue and event may be: He looks upon himself as the mark, both of the wrath of God and man, and that every blow shall be directed against his breast.

Trouble and anguish single out wicked men; when God sends out his Armies of judgments, he charges them not to fight against the small or great of his own people, but against the wicked of the world: Wrath aims at them, and therefore they are terrified at the approaches of wrath.

Secondly, Others give out the similitude thus, Trouble and anguish shall come upon him, as a King ready to battel:

As

As when a King goes to Battel he is compassed with a strong guard. (Every General hath his Life-guard, much more Kings) So, trouble and anguish shall compass a wicked man, as yet with widest difference; for the Guard compasseth the King for the safety and preservation of his person; whereas trouble and anguish gather about wicked men for their destruction: But the Text will hardly admit this explication, and therefore I pass it.

Præliaturũ regẽ circundare solebat globus militũ, ut lectio Tygurina indicat. Angustia & circũvallatio eũ circũstãt ut regẽ confertis globis præliaturum.

Thirdly, The Hebrew word which signifies a day of Battel, signifies also a Sphear, or round Globe, we translate it, a Ball (Isa. 22. 18.) where it is prophesied against Shebna, that the Lord would make him an example, and that (as the Hebrew is) Tossing, he would toss him with a tossing, that is, he would surely toss, and turn him like a Ball, into a far Countrey; as a Ball is tossed or thrown, so the Lord would throw him into Captivity. Now because it is a usual way of embattailing; to draw an Army into the form of a Globe, or Ball; therefore the same word which signifies a Sphear, or Globe, signifies also a Battel, from the form of it. Taking it in this sense, for any thing that is round, or circular as a Ball, or Sphear. This third interpretation of the similitude riseth thus, Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid, they shall prevail upon him, as a King put in Chains, or into a hoop of Iron; some labour much for the maintaining of this interpretation, That Eliphaz intends to shew how wicked oppressors shall be surrounded & held fast with trouble, like some great Kings, who falling into the hands of their Enemies, have been shut up in round Iron Cages, as Tamerlane carried Bajazet the Turkish Emperor; or bound in Chains, as it is Prophesied in the 149. Psalm. It was the use of those times, to make hoops of Iron, for the securing of Kings and Princes taken in Battel; the forms of which, and how those captivated Kings were lockt up in them, with the posture of their bodies in that base imprisonment, may be seen in Boldoc upon this Verse; and he annexeth divers texts of Scripture, in which he conceives there is an allusion to this course way of handling Kings.

Fourthly, Our reading compares trouble and anguish to a King, ready to Battel; as if he had said, Trouble and anguish shall prevail upon him irresistably: This is but a high expression of greatest preparation for a Battel; for when a King goeth forth to Battel in person, he will have all the strength of his Kingdom with him, which Job himself clears in the 29. Chapter, Vers. 25. where describing his own former felicity, he concludes, I chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a King in the Army: That is, in great strength and power. So the Apostle speaks (1 Cor. 4. 8.) You have reigned as Kings without us, and I would to God ye did reign; that is, you conceive you have had the confluence of all comforts. and strengths, You have reigned as Kings, I would you had, that we also might reign with you, or share in your felicity. So that when Eliphaz saith, Trouble and anguish shall prevail, as a King armed, and ready to set forth to Battel; his meaning is, They shall prevail strongly, yea irresistably. The wicked man shall not be able to stand their charge, much less repulse it. These several explications of the similitude meet in one common truth: That as the wicked shall not stand in judgment, when God comes to judg all the World; so when the Lord sends forth his judgments upon any part of the World, they are the men that shall surely fall; trouble and anguish shall terrifie them, as a King going to joyn Battel, or as a King taken and captivated in Battel, or as a King conquering and prevailing over his Foes in Battel. Sin prevails always upon wicked men, as a King commanding and ruling over them; at last, trouble (which is the fruit of sin) shall prevail upon them as a King oppressing and destroying them. They who will not submit to the rule of the Law as a King to guide them: shall be forced to submit to the curse of the Law, as a King to punish them.

VERS. 25, 26.

For he stretched out his hand against God, and strengthened himself against the Almighty.
He runneth upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick bosses of his Bucklers.

ELiphaz having explained much of the inward punishment of wicked men, the torture which they indure upon the rack of conscience, as also some of their outward punishments, he subjoyns the reason of both, their sin, in these two Verses, and that not an ordinary sin, but a sin committed with a high hand.

Vers. 25. He stretcheth out his hand against God.

And is it any wonder then that God should stretch out his hand against him? Every sin deserves punishment, and shall be punished either upon the sinner, or upon his Surety; but extraordinary sins call for extraordinary punishments: they who have done much evil, shall endure much. Justice hath an eye to the quantity, as well as to the quality of our works; and that's a work of wickedness in Folio, or of the largest size, which is done with a hand stretched-out: What revenge is big enough for a sin thus big?

Tanto supplicio nunc scelus dignissimũ explicat. Pined.

He stretcheth out his hand against God.] Here are three things to be opened:

First, What is meant by the hand.

Secondly, What is meant by stretching out the hand.

Thirdly, How the hand may be stretched out against God.

The hand may be taken properly, or improperly; properly for that member of the body, which is so useful and instrumental in all the services of this life; and then to stretch out the hand, must be taken in a proper sense; for so wicked men sometimes do; they stretch out the hand of the body against God, by acting sins of violence, and by acting violently in many sins.

The outward members, especially the hand and tongue, are made the weapons of unrighteousness, both against God and Man.

Theod. l. 3. cap. 20. Niceph. l. 10. cap. 35.

The Church-Historian reports of Julian the Apostate, that when he was wounded in the Battel against the Parthians, he took of his blood, and threw it up to Heaven, he stretched out his hand against God, saying, in derision of Christ, O Galilæan thou hast overcome: This outward gesture of his body, expressed the secret indignation of his mind. And it is observed by Jerom, who saith, he received it from the Tradition of the Jewes, that the Amalakites, who were professed Enemies to the Jewes, did lye upon the watch, to take all advantages against them, in their march from Egypt to Canaan, and when at any time they turned aside out of the way, either because of legal uncleanness, or upon any natural necessity, they would fall upon them and slay them; which being done, they cut off that member which had the Seal of the Covenant (Circumcision) upon it, and with their hands stretched out, threw it up towards Heaven, as if they would challenge God himself to revenge their blasphemy of him, and the contempt of that Sacred Institution.

Amalachitæ Israelitas in Exitu de Egypto vel ob lassitudinem vel ob legalem immunditiẽ extra castra degentes occiderunt, & eorũ circũcisionẽ amputatam in substannationẽ Dei projecerunt in cælum. Hieron.

Secondly, The hand is taken improperly, or metaphorically; so, the power of a man is his hand, the strength of his whole body, state, and mind, may be called his hand; his riches are his hand, his credit is his hand, his wit, and parts, Learning, and Eloquence, are his hand, as there is a power in all these. And when it is said here, He stretcheth forth his hand against God; we may understand it in that latitude; for a wicked man improves the strength of his body, the power of his Estate, his Credit, his Wit, all his accommodations in the way of Rebellion against God. A man is said to stretch out himself, when he doth his utmost to attain his end, and makes the most of himself to any purpose: In such cases he stretcheth all that he is (as we say) upon the Tenters; and this all of his put together, is his hand stretched out against God.

Further, To stretch out the hand, imports four things.

Extendere manum est omnẽ adhibere conatũ ad percutiẽdũ hostẽ aut aliquid aliud aggrediendum.

First, To do a thing with the utmost intention of mind and body, to do it with all our might and fullest resolution. Joshua being resolved to bring total destruction upon the men of Ai, Drew not his hand back wherewith he stretched out his Spear, till he utterly destroyed all the Inhabitants of Ai (Josh. 8. 26.) The stretching forth of his hand was emblematical, speaking, or implying that his spirit kept up to the height of resolution, for the ruine of that City and people.

When the Scripture speaks of God, acting towards Man, either either in a way of judgment or mercy, this phrase is often used, (Exod. 6. 6.) Wherefore say to the Children of Israel, I am the Lord, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you with an out-stretched arm. (Exod. 14. 8.) The Children of Israel went out with an high hand; and at the sixth Verse of the same Chapter, the Lord bid Moses, Stretch his hand over the Sea; to shew that he was purposed to work a Miracle, for the deliverance of his people. The Prophets are frequent in this language (Isa. 5. 25.) Therefore is the anger of the Lord kindled against his people, and he hath stretched forth his hand against them: Read Chap. 9. Vers. 12, 17, 21. Chap. 10. 4. Jer. 51. 25. Ezek. 14. 13. Chap. 15. 7. In all these places when the Lord went with full purpose to punish, he is said, To stretch out his hand. Now as when God stretcheth out his hand against Man, it shews his resolvedness to smite, so when man stretcheth out his hand against God, it shews his resolvedness to sin, or his actual sinning with full intention and strength of spirit.

Extendere manū est habitus confidentis & potentiā vires, ostendentis.

Secondly, Mans stretching out his hand, speaks the confidence of a man, that he shall carry all before him, and win the day; it is usual with contenders, especially with Souldiers, before they joyn Battel, to stretch their hands out, to draw and brandish their Swords, in token both of their courage to fight, and of their confidence to prevail. Obstinate sinners are full of false hopes that they shall obtain what they design, and prosper in their projects of wickedness, and therefore they are said to stretch out the hand against God.

Anima quæ in manu superbia. Sep.

Thirdly, Stretching out the hand, is a posture of pride and impudence; pride is written upon a stretched-out-hand. To sin presumptuously, is in the Original to sin with a high hand (Numb. 15. 30.) The Septuagint render that place, The soul that in the hand of pride thinks so, shall be cut off: The Caldee Paraphrase gives it thus; He that sins with an uncovered head; An uncovered head is an argument of boldness, and that he who acts, cares not who sees him. Modesty causeth us to hang down, or cover the head, when we have done ill, and shame makes us cover the head when we receive evil, or are punished (Jer. 14. 4.) The Plowmen were ashamed, they covered their heads because the ground was chapt: for there was no rain in the Earth: So that to do, or suffer with an uncovered head, is like doing or suffering with a high, or stretched-out-hand, boldly, presumptuously, and as it were, hanging out a Flag of defiance against the God of Heaven.

Fourthly, Stretching out the hand, is the posture of a furious mad man; he that wants the use of his reason, makes this use of his hand, laying about him, as if he would do wonders; such madness lodgeth in the hearts of debauched sinners, they do they know not what; they rage and are furious, as if they would pull God out of Heaven, and throw the House, yea the World, out at the Windows: These stretch their hands against God, and they do it three wayes.

First, Against the very being of God; such a wicked man opposeth God as God, he wisheth there were no God, or that himself were God; he would have all power in his own hand: Francis Spira in his despairing distraction said, I would I were above God: In him nature spake her mind plainly, and not in Parables: Nature heightned in wickedness would be above God; therefore a carnal man is called, A hater of God: Now that which we hate we would destroy, and take out of the way.

Secondly, There is a stretching out the hand against God, not only in this open bold challenge, or professed opposition; this very few will own. Few Atheists will speak out their blasphemy, or send their Trumpet to defie God; and most wicked men take a suspicion of this, as the highest dishonour and affront that can be put upon them. What? They oppose God? They stretch out their hand against God? They will tell you, they love God, and it may be they will tell you that God is their God, and yet will be found stretching out their hand against God: therefore not only do his professed Enemies stretch out their hand against God, but even those his professed Friends, who live in the open violation of his righteous Laws; they who oppose the will and Word of God, the Statutes and Ordinances of God, these will be found to stretch forth their hand against God himself.

The Lord complains (Mal. 3. 13.) Your words have been stout against me: Who? we stout against God? when did we speak against God? we never had such a thought in our hearts, much less, such words in our mouthes: So it follows, Yet ye say, What have we spoken so much against thee? The Lord tells them (because it seems they could not) Vers. 14. Ye have said it is a vain thing to serve the Lord, and what profit have we, that we have kept his Ordinances, and ye call the proud happy, &c. To speak, or think thus (though such a word be not spoken formally, as it is probable they did not) is to be stout against God. To say, It is a vain thing to serve the Lord, is not only a disservice, but a Rebellion against the Lord: To say, There is no profit in keeping his Ordinances, is the highest prophanation of his Ordinances; to call, The proud happy, is to stretch out the hand against God, for he stretcheth out his hand against, and resisteth the proud.

Thirdly, The hand is stretched out against God, when it is stretched out against his people, his Servants, or any that are under his tuition, and special protection; to oppose, or stretch out the hand against these, is to stretch out the hand against God. The Prophet Zachary sets forth both the care of God to keep his people from trouble, and his Sympathy with them in trouble, by an elegant Similitude: He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye (Zach. 2. 8.) What part is more sensible of the least hurt, then the eye, or being hurt, causeth a greater smart? God is as tender of his people as any man is of his own eyes. He that toucheth them, &c. to wrong or vex them, toucheth the apple of Gods eye, he lifts up his hand against Gods face, and against the most excellent part of his face, his eye, and against the most excellent part of his eye, the apple of it or ball of the eye which is the proper instrument of seeing. We use to say, There is no sporting with the eyes; men do not like it, to have their eyes played with: Surely then God will not bear it, that any should smite or wound his eyes. And he interprets any hurt done to his people, as done to his own eye, yea to the apple of his eye. When it was under debate in the Councel what should be done with the Apostles, Gamaliel advises, Refrain from these men, and let them alone, &c. Lest haply ye be found to fight against God (Acts 5. 38, 39.) Some possibly would reply, We fighters against God? We love God; here is a company of turblent Fellows called Apostles, who disquiet the City, may we not punish them, but we must presently be judged fighters against God? No, saith Gamaliel, you fight against God, if they and their Apostleship be of God.

Dicimus vulgò cum oculis non ludendum est.

Saul was zealous of the Law, and (as he thought) for God; yet Christ rebukes him from Heaven, with Saul, Saul, Why persecutest thou me? Thou stretchest forth thy hand against me, when thou dost it against the Saints; then, there is a stretching out the hand against God, not only by a boisterous opposition of God, As Pharaoh, Senacharib, and Julian did, but by opposing the wayes or word, the Messengers or Servants of God.

Hence Observe, First, Though every sin be against God, yet some sins are more against God.

We cannot say that every one who sins, stretcheth out his hand against God; there is a difference of sins in degree, though they are all in their nature deadly; there is a presumptuous sin, a sin committed with a high hand, which hath these two things chiefly in it.

First, A sinning against clear light.

Secondly, A sinning with full consent and swindge of will.

In that place of Numbers, where this sin is described (Chap. 15. 30.) There are two other Characters put upon it: First, it is called, A reproaching the Lord: And secondly, a despising of the Word of the Lord; Every sin is a transgression of the Word of the Lord, but every sin is not a despising of the Word of the Lord; every sin is displeasing to God, but every sin is not reproaching of God: Every sin, even the least, is a departure from God, but some sins are full of activity against God.

It is conceived, that the presumptuous sin in the old Testament, is the same with, or answers to, the sin against the holy Ghost in the New; and that which leads to this appre-

henſion is, becauſe no ſacrifice was appointed for that under the Law, as this is ſaid to be unpardonable under the Goſpel. And the Author to the Hebrews is expreſs (Chap. 10.26.) If we ſin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more ſacrifice for ſins. The Goſpel knowes but of one Sacrifice for ſin, and that but once offered; they who deſpiſe that, have deſpiſed all, for there remains no more Sacrifice for ſin. God will not ſend his Son to die a ſecond time for thoſe who have trodden the Son of God in his death under foot, and have counted the blood of the Covenant an unholy thing. God indeed ſtretcheth out his hand all the day long, to a gain-ſaying and rebellious people, that is, to thoſe who ſtretch out their hands againſt him in his Law: But he will not ſtretch out his hand (unleſs to ſmite) to a gain-ſaying and rebellious people, who (in this ſenſe) ſtretch out their hands againſt him in the Goſpel.

Secondly, From the connexion of this Verſe with the former,

Obſerve, That God proportions the puniſhment of man unto his ſin.

There is a twofold proportionating of puniſhment to ſin.

Firſt, In the quality, or manner of it.

Secondly, In the quantity, or degree of it.

The Juſtice of God is viſible in both, according to the exact rules of retaliation: As I have done, ſo the Lord hath requited me, ſaid Adonibezek (*Judg.*1.) He was puniſhed in the ſame manner that he had ſinned, and ſo have many others. But all ſhall be puniſhed in the ſame degree that they have ſinned. If ſin be great, ſo ſhall the puniſhment of it be. When the iniquity of Amorite was full, he had his fill of wrath. When God himſelf was preſſed with the ſin of Iſrael, as a Cart with Sheaves: then he laid on load in judgment. If any wonder why the wicked man ſhould be hurried, troubled, vexed, why he travelleth in pain all his dayes, he may ceaſe to wonder, when he reads, that the wicked man ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God. Is it any wonder God ſhould ſhew himſelf an Enemy to them, who practice the Enemy againſt him? Or that they ſhould be higheſt in ſuffering, who have been higheſt in ſin? The Prophet Amos reproves and complains of thoſe, who made the Ephah ſmall, and the Shekel great (Chap. 8. 5.) That is, who abated the meaſure, and enhanſed, or raiſed the price of their commodities: But if man makes the Ephah, or meaſure of his ſin ſmall, God will not make the Shekel of his puniſhment great. The wages which the Juſtice of God payes the ſinner, ſhall not be a peny more then his ſinning-work hath deſerved.

Thirdly, In that the ſtretching out the hand againſt God, is a ſin againſt light, Obſerve, That ſins committed againſt light, leave the ſoul in the greateſt darkneſs.

A ſin committed in the darkneſs of ignorance, deſerves yet to be puniſhed with darkneſs, even with everlaſting darkneſs; much more thoſe ſins which are committed, not only in, but againſt the light of knowledge. Some ſhall periſh for want of light; they cannot but periſh who live and die in the abuſe of light. Many ſhall periſh becauſe they have not ſtretched forth their hands according to the light received, to work for God; how deeply then ſhall they periſh, who in the midſt of received light, ſtretch out their hands to work wickedneſs againſt God?

Fourthly, Eliphaz deſcribes the wicked man ſtretching out his hand; that is, all the power which God hath truſted him with, to provoke God with.

Hence Obſerve, That wicked men abuſe the good gifts of God, and turn them againſt God himſelf.

They uſe their hand, properly taken, againſt God; as alſo their metaphorical hand, their whole ſtrength againſt God; they ſtretch their authority, their high places, their parts, and wits againſt God; they form weapons out of all the good gifts of God, to fight againſt God; ſuch ſinning is out of meaſure ſinful. The idle Servant was condemned, who did not employ and improve the one Talent which he had received, to his Maſters advantage; of how much ſorer condemnation ſhall they be thought worthy who employ their many Talents to their Maſters loſs, and diſadvantage?

Laſtly Obſerve, Sin is the greateſt evil.

That muſt needs be the greateſt evil which oppoſeth the greateſt good: God is the greateſt good, every ſin is againſt God, and ſome ſins directly oppoſe God. The Apoſtle argues the evil of ſin, from the oppoſition it makes againſt us (1 *Pet.*2.11.) Dearly beloved, I beſeech you as ſtrangers, and pilgrims, abſtain from fleſhly luſts (he doth not ſay, which fight againſt, or diſhonour God, but) which war againſt the ſoul: We have no reaſon to be dallying with luſts, or to be friends with them, when we hear that our luſts war againſt us; but when we remember that our luſts war againſt God, we ſhould not only abſtain from them, but abhor them. Every thing is by ſo much the worſe, by how much that is better which it is contrary unto: There are four conſiderations which heighten the evil of ſin upon this account, that it is a ſtretching out of the hand againſt God.

Firſt, Stretch out a hand againſt God! No man ſhould dare ſo much as to lift up a word againſt God.

Secondly, Stretch out a hand againſt God! No man ſhould dare ſo much as to lift up a thought againſt God.

Thirdly, Stretch out a hand againſt God! Every man ought to fall down before God, and be well-pleaſed with whatſoever God ſaith or doth.

Fourthly, Every man is bound to ſtretch out heart and tongue, and hand, to think and ſpeak and do for God, and when all this is done, we have done but our duty, and the utmoſt that any man doth or can do in theſe, is not half his duty. How wide then is he from, how oppoſite to his duty, who ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God? And (as it follows in the next words.)

Strengthens himſelf againſt the Almighty.] That is, As the Original imports, who makes himſelf a ſtrong Warrier, and will ſhew his valour againſt the Almighty: So Mr. Brougton, He would be valiant againſt the Almighty. Or as another tranſlates to the letter of the Text, He ſhews himſelf a man againſt the Almighty; as if he had ſaid, This wicked man ſtrains all the ſtrength he hath, to ſhew himſelf a man of his hands, or to play the man againſt God. The Apoſtle uſeth that word, in reference to temptation, Play the men, or quit your ſelves like men: Saints play the man againſt Satan; wicked ones play the man againſt God: he ſtrengthens himſelf againſt God. But how? What doth the wicked man to ſtrengthen himſelf? Doth he gather Armies, lay in Ammunition, fortifie Cities, and Caſtles? Doth he thus ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Almighty? All theſe are no ſtrength againſt God, and this is not the way the wicked man takes to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt God; how then? He ſtrengthens himſelf againſt God, by hardening his heart, by ſtopping his ears, by ſetting his face, by debauching his conſcience againſt the call and command of God. Thus,

He ſtrengthens himſelf againſt the Almighty.

Before we had the word God, the ſtrong God, here the Almighty, which word in the Hebrew, ſignifies not only one that hath great power: But,

Firſt, All power; Shaddai is he that hath power to do all things: Omnipotency is one of the incommunicable Attributes of God: All the power of man is of his giving, but he hath not given all power to any man, no nor to all men. Only Chriſt as Mediator, or God-man hath all power given to him. It is not the will of God to do all that is in his power, but it is in his power to do whatſoever he will. If the wicked mans power were ſuch, what work would he make? If he could do as much as himſelf pleaſeth, he would do nothing, which ſhould pleaſe either God or good men.

Secondly, The word ſignifieth, ſuch a one as hath a ſufficiency in himſelf to do what he will; God needeth not to go out for any aid, or call in the aſſiſtance of any creature: Shaddai is the Original of power, he hath all his power laid up in his own compaſs, and his compaſs is infiniteneſs; he is ſelf-ſufficient. Some Princes think they have power enough to do what they will, but they muſt do it with other mens hands. Though they have a civil power or authority to command all, yet they have not a natural power, ſtrength, strength, or ability to execute all. God hath both these powers, he hath absolute authority to command all to serve and help him; and he hath such an absolute ability, that he needs none to serve or help him: He that made the World alone, what cannot he do alone? God calls for our help that we may have the honour of it, not that he hath any want of it.

Qui sufficit omnibus aliis.

Thirdly, Shaddai is he who hath not only enough for himself, but for all others; the five wise Virgins had Oyl in their Lamps, and they had enough for themselves, but they had none to spare, they could not furnish the five foolish Virgins. But the Lord God Almighty hath strength and wisdom for all that come to him, and call upon him: As he is self-sufficient, so he is all-sufficient; his Ocean can quickly fill all our empty Vessels, and his treasury supply and bear all our charges. This Almighty God, who hath power to do what he pleaseth, who hath all this power in himself, and who hath power enough to give out to all that need, and ask it of him, this is the Almighty, against whom the wicked man strengthens himself.

Hence Observe, First, That the heart of man is very busie to arm against God.

As when a people are threatned with an invasion, they then strengthen themselves, they lay in their Provisions of War, and get Forces in a readiness: even thus doth the heart of man: Man hath three usual wayes of strengthening himself against the Almighty. First, By carnal pleas and reasonings. He pretends reason for what he doth; and he strengthens himself against all that God saith, by reason: he sets up reason against that Law which is the quintessence of reason, and will not be mad but by reason, such as it is, and that is, such as he is, a mad one. These reasonings are the strong holds spoken of by the Apostle (2 Cor. 4. 5.) The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds, casting down imaginations, and every high thing, that exalteth it self against the knowledge of God: As the weapons of this warfare are not carnal but spiritual, so the strong holds which these cast down, are not corporeal, but carnal; they are not made of Stones, and Timber, of Earth, or Iron, but of the subtilties, slights, excuses, subterfuges, and arguings of fleshly minded men. All which the Apostle wraps up in the latter words calling them imaginations, or ratiocinations, and high things; that is, such things as are formed in the high and proud conceits of the creature exalting it self against the sound and saving knowledge of God: Such as these:

First, Others do so.

Secondly, Great ones do so.

Thirdly, This is the custom of the World.

Fourthly, If I should not do so, I should dishonor, yea and undo my self: And why should I refrain what others do, or what would be my own undoing? No reason for any of these. Thus he strengthens himself against the Almighty: his reason (such as it is) will bear him out.

Secondly, He strengthens himself against God upon presumption of mercy from God; why may not I do thus? God hath mercy for sinners, why not for me though I sin? The Apostle cautions the Ephesians (Chap. 5. 6.) against such presumptions. Let no man deceive you with vain words, for because of these things, the wrath of God comes upon the Children of disobedience: It is good to plead mercy to strengthen Faith, that sin committed shall be pardoned; but wo be to those, who plead mercy to strengthen themselves in the committing of sin.

Thirdly, Others strengthen themselves against the Almighty with hopes of worldly gain, and they incourage themselves in an evil matter, with promises of good; We shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil, cast in thy Lot among us, let us all have one Purse: Thus Solomon personates the inticements of sinners (Prov. 1. 13, 14.)

As a gracious heart strengthens it self for God:

First, By the promises of God.

Secondly, By the experiences which himself, or others have had of Gods dispensations.

Thirdly, By considering the nature of God, how gracious, how good, how powerful, how faithful he is.

Fourthly, By remembring his relations to God; he is my Father, my King, &c. Shall I not venture to do or suffer for him?

Now (I say) as a gracious heart strengthens it self for the Lord, or (as the Apostle adviseth, Ephes. 6. 10.) Grows strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, putting on the whole Armour of God: So a wicked heart strengthens it self against the Lord, or grows strong against the Lord, and the power of his might, yea of his Almightiness, putting on the whole Armour of the Devil, that he may be able to stand against all the encounters of the Word, and of his own conscience. For as the Word of God, and the graces of the spirit are the Armour and weapons by which the Saints strengthen themselves against Satan; so carnal reasonings and the lusts of the flesh, are the Armour and weapons by which wicked men strengthen themselves against God.

A wicked mans chief care is to fortifie and incourage his lusts; to put warm cloaths to his sinful heart, and make it stout against God: Sin begins with turning the heart from God, and sin ends in turning the heart against God: The first step in sin is a neglect of God, the second step is contempt of God, the third and last is a War with God: He strengthens himself (for the Battel) against the Almighty.

Secondly Observe, Sin runs us against reason, and causeth us to act not only wickedly, but foolishly.

Is it not folly and madness for weakness to contend with Omnipotency? When a sinner hath strengthened himself the best he can, the very weakness of God (as the Apostle speaks) is stronger then he. What King (saith Christ, Luk. 14. 31.) going to make War against another King, doth not first sit down, &c. As if he had said, The Kings of the Earth are not so foolish, so brainless, and counsellless to contend with those, whom they cannot match; they will hardly venture a Battel with ten thousand against twenty thousand, they will rather make a disadvantageous Peace, then proceed in a War upon such disadvantages. The King of Israel reproved the challenge which the King of Judah sent him, by the Parable of the Thistle in Lebanon, aspiring to match with the Cedar in Lebanon (2 King. 14. 9.) What's a Thistle to a Cedar? Then what is man to God? See then what a reasonless, yea sensless creature man is, who will needs go out against God to Battel, though all the number he can muster, is not only as disproportionable as ten thousand to twenty thousand, as a Thistle to a Cedar, but more then one single man is to a Million of men, or then a bruised Reed to the strongest Oak. God with ease made all the power of man alone, and he, though alone, can more easily destroy it: it cost him but the speaking of a word to set it up, and he can pull it down with, yea without a word speaking. Many men have been styled, The great, The strong, The mighty: But no man ever durst own this style, The Almighty: This title of God in the Text, The Almighty, should make the mightiest of men, the Nimrods of the World afraid to meddle, yea to think a thought of medling with God. The absurdity of men in strengthening themselves against the Almighty, may appear yet more distinctly in three particulars.

First, He that is Almighty is stronger then All; there cannot be two Almighties. Hence the Apostle argues (1 Cor. 10.) Will you provoke the Lord to anger, are you stronger then he? It is base and cowardly to provoke those that are weaker then our selves; it may give us trouble enough to provoke those who are as strong as our selves, but it is either madness or desperateness to provoke those who are stronger then our selves. And when the Apostle demands, or rather expostulates, Are ye stronger then he? His question calls for this positive assertory answer, we are infinitely weaker then he; and therefore there is no prevailing against him, not only not in all things, but not in any thing. It is possible for a weak Enemy to prevail sometimes upon a mighty Enemy. The Romans who commanded the world for many ages, and were too strong for any Nation, did yet receive some foils; though they were never conquered, yet they were sometimes worsted, not only by surprisals and Ambuscadoes, but in the open field; and even petty Princes gave checks for a while, to some of their designs. But El-shaddai, the Almighty God, never received any defeat, nor is he within the possibility of a surprize.

Secondly, Not only cannot the Lord be defeated, but he cannot be endammaged; he never loſt (as we ſay) ſo much as a hair of his head, nor did he ever ſuffer ſo much as the ſcratch of a Pin. The Romans obtained ſome Victories with ſuch extream loſs and hazzard, that it hath been ſaid, Two or three more ſuch Victories, would utterly undo them; they who were never defeated or foiled, have yet been greatly endammaged in Battel; and their cleareſt gains have not been without ſome loſs: but the Almighty never loſt the worth of a thread, or drop of blood, in all thoſe innumerable Victories which he hath gained.

Thirdly, Man cannot ſo much as hinder or retard the deſigns of God. He tranſcends all the impediments, and throws open all the Barracadoes that are ſet in his way. He will work and who ſhall let him? (Iſa. 43. 13.) There is no putting of a bar in his way; and therefore if any ſhould anſwer the queſtion, Who ſhall let it? Yes, there are ſome will let it, the great men, the Nobles of the Earth, ſay no; they will let it. But they ſhall not, ſaith God, in the next Verſe (Verſ. 14.) For your ſake (ſpeaking to his people in Captivity) I have ſent to Babylon, and have brought down all their Nobles. The Original word for Nobles, ſignifies alſo Bars, the Bars of a door, or Caſtle-gate, as we put in the Margin of our Bibles; to note, that Nobles and great men ſhould be the ſtrength of a People, and a ſtop to the entrance of any evil among them: but if in ſtead of that, they prove like Bars, only to hinder the good of a People, and to lie croſs in all publike proceedings; then the Lord, the Lord of Lords, and King of Kings, brings them down, and breaks them all to pieces. I will work, and who ſhall let it? The Nobles, the Bars ſhall not, though Bars of Iron to Gates of Braſs.

It was ſaid in opening the words, that ſtretching out the hand is the poſture of a mad man: Conſider this, and then ſay, Is it not the maddeſt madneſs to ſtretch out the hand againſt God, or to ſtrengthen our ſelves againſt the Almighty, to oppoſe him, againſt whom it is impoſſible not only to prevail, but to do him the leaſt hurt, or give him the leaſt check or ſtop in his way? If we ſhould ſee a man ſet his ſhoulder againſt a Wall of Braſs, or blow a Feather againſt it, hoping to overturn and batter it down, would not we ſay, this man is either a Fool, who never had the uſe of reaſon, or a Mad-man, who hath loſt his reaſon? He that oppoſeth the counſels and ways of God, can no more overthrow them, then a Feather can a Wall of Braſs, or the touch of a little finger, the ſtrongeſt Tower. The Pſalmiſt repreſents us with theſe ſimple attempts (Pſal. 2. 1, 2, &c.) Why do the Gentiles rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The Kings of the earth take counſel, &c. Come let us break their bands and caſt their cords away from us: What follows? He that ſits in Heaven ſhall laugh, the Lord ſhall have them in deriſion: He ſees how poor, how inconſiderable, theſe motions and commotions, both of the Many and of the Mighty are, to give check to that Decree of his Almightineſs, to ſet his Son upon the holy Hill of Sion.

Eliphaz hath not yet done with his deſcription of the impotent rage of man againſt the Almighty God. O ſinful vain man, whither wilt thou go? What wilt thou do next? The next Verſe tells us, Verſ. 26. He runs upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick Boſſes of his Bucklers.

This 26. Verſe is an amplification, or aggravation of the madneſs of a wicked man, who, when he hath ſtrengthened himſelf againſt God (as he thinks and hopes) ſufficiently, then he runs upon him, &c.

Eliphaz carrieth on the metaphor of a Battel, which before it is fought, Armies are muſtered, and drawn up in view of each other; and then to ſhew their courage, they ſtretch out their hands, draw their Swords, and as ſoon as the Signal of the Battel is given, by ſound of Trumpet, beat of Drum, or diſcharge of Cannon, they run on upon one another; and when the Battel comes to the heat and hight, they charge home, even upon the necks of one another, and upon the Boſſes of their Bucklers: Here's the deſcription of a fierce charge. This wicked one is a Champion for Hell, he challenges the God of Heaven, and runs upon him, &c. with utmoſt violence: That's the ſum of the words, I ſhall now open them a little further.

He runs upon him, even upon his neck.

There is a difference among Interpreters about that Antecedent, ſome underſtand God: As if the meaning were, God runneth upon a wicked man, like a ſtrong Warrier, with incredible ſwiftneſs and irreſiſtible force, to caſt him down. The wicked man having ſtretched out his hand, and ſtrengthned himſelf againſt the Almighty, now the Almighty runs upon his neck, even upon the thick boſſes of his Buckler; Come ſaith God, I will have a bout with thee, if thou dareſt, I will try it out with thee, I am not afraid of thy ſtiff neck, though it hath Iron ſinews, nor of the thick boſſes of thy Buckler, though they be of Steel.

Quia impius manũ in Deũ extẽdit ideo currit in eũ Deus ad collum & in dẽſitate corporũ clypeorũ ejus, q. d. in ea quibus iſte maxime roboratur. Rab. Lev. Vatabl. Beza.

Thus ſome, both later Writers, and ancient Rabbins, give the ſenſe, but I rather conceive (with others) that Eliphaz ſtill proſecutes the ſtrange progreſs, and hightned wickedneſs of man, who having ſtrengthned himſelf, by hardning his heart againſt God, runs upon him, even upon his neck, &c. Taking this ſenſe, there is a different reading; thus, He runs upon him with his neck; we ſay, the wicked man runs upon the neck of God; they ſay, A wicked man runs upon God with his neck; their meaning is, He runs upon him audaciouſly and proudly. The neck lifted up, is a token of pride, and preſumptuous boldneſs: And to run with the neck, is to run with the neck lifted up, or ſtretched out; which is indeed the periphraſis of pride. (Pſal. 75. 5.) Speak not with a ſtiff neck; that is, with a ſpirit unwilling to ſubmit to my diſpenſations. The Prophet Iſaiah complains, and threatens (Iſa. 3. 16.) Becauſe the Daughters of Sion are haughty, and walk with ſtretched out necks: That is, becauſe they teſtifie the pride of their hearts, by the gate and poſtures of the body, as much as by the vain attire, and apparel of the body: Therefore the Lord will ſmite, &c. The Lord tells Moſes (Exod. 32. 9.) I have ſeen this people, and behold it is a ſtiff-necked people: He complains by the Prophet (Iſa. 48. 4.) I knew that thou art obſtinate, and thy neck is an Iron ſinew: Stephen the Proto-Martyr gives a breviate of all their rebellions, Act. 7. and concludes (Verſ. 51.) Ye ſtiff-necked, &c. The ſtiff neck and the proud hard heart are the ſame, all the Bible over.

Quia impius manũ in Deũ extẽdit ideo currit in eũ Deus ad collum & in dẽſitate doriorũ clypeorũ ejus, q. d. in ea quibus iſte maxime roboratur. Rab. Lev. Vatabl. Beza.

Thus the wicked man runneth upon God with his ſtiff, that is, his proud daring ſpirit. As before, He ſtretched out his hand, ſo now (which is more) his neck againſt God. The metaphor is taken either from Souldiers in battel, who to ſhew their valour, hold up their heads, and ſtretch out their necks, running head to head, and ſhoulder to ſhoulder, when they come to cloſe fight.

Or, It is a metaphor taken from a Bullock unaccuſtomed to the yoak; who therefore will not ſubmit his neck to bear it. Wicked men are called Children of Belial, becauſe they endure not the yoak of obedience; when God would put his yoak upon their necks, they lift up their necks, or run upon him with their ſtiff-necks.

Hence Note, It is pride of ſpirit which cauſeth man to oppoſe God.

The Apoſtle James ſaith, God reſiſteth the proud (Jam. 4.) which intimates, yea and ſpeaks out, that the proud aſſault God. As the wicked in his pride perſecutes the poor (Pſal. 10. 11.) So in his pride he oppoſeth God. And as he that loveth God, follows, yea runs after God to obey him; ſo he that hates God runs upon him by diſobedience. An act of ignorant diſobedience is a going from God; an act of known diſobedience, is a running upon God: Running upon God, is not only ſinning, but impudent ſinning. The Angels in Heaven cover their faces before God, daring not to behold him: Humble ſinners on earth, ſuch as the poor Publican (Luke 18.) venture not to lift up their eyes to Heaven, but proud ſinners, lift up their necks againſt God. They who care not what God ſaith to them, care as little what they do to God: And they who have no faith in God, ſeldom have any fear of him; theſe run upon him with their necks.

Per ſuperbiã homo maximè deo reſiſtit & ſuperbus propter præſumptionẽ ſpiritus contra Deum currere dicitur. Aquin.

But I return to our Tranſlation, He runs upon him, even on his neck: That is, on the neck of God: that is, he ſins fiercely, and fearleſly; he doth not dare God at a diſtance, or like a Coward, ſpeak great words, and vaunt of what he will do when his Adverſary is out of ſight and hearing; but he charges on boldly in his very face.

It

It is said of the Ram (by whom the Prophet means Alexander the Great, King of Greece, That when he saw the He-goat (that is, Darius King of Persia) he ran upon him: That is, he assaulted him speedily and boldly, overthrowing his whole estate, and so making himself sole Lord of Asia. The whole course of his Victories are described by this word, He ran upon him (Dan. 8. 6.) And when Job would shew how fiercely the Lord handled him, he gives it in this language, I was at ease, but he hath broken me asunder, he hath also taken me by the neck and shaken me to pieces (Job 16. 12.) As God in a way of highest punishment, or chastisement, is said to take a man by the neck; so man in a way of highest sinning and rebelling, is said to take God by the neck, or to run upon his neck: He that ventures upon the neck, cares not where he ventures; and he that runs upon the neck of God, cares not on whom he ventures. And as in height of love, a friend runs and falls upon the neck of his friend; thus Joseph did on his Brethrens necks (Gen. 45. 14.) and the Father of the Prodigal (Luke 15. 20.) Ran and fell upon his Sons neck, and kissed him: So in heat of wrath, an Enemy runs upon the neck of his Enemy; and wicked men (who are enmity against God) run upon the neck of God.

Cum eo concurrens collũ invadet. Tigur.

Some conceive that this running upon the neck of God imports two things.

First, That the wicked man imagines himself, as having an equality of strength with God.

And secondly, That he hath authority above God, or that he is Gods better, and superior.

Erat pene genus ut Magistratus si quem suo imperio parum obedientem viderit, in collum invaderent & intorquerent. Liv. l. 4.

This latter they ground upon an old custom among Magistrates, who finding an offender contumacious, were wont to command the Officer to take him by the neck, and drag him out of the Court, to receive his punishment. But I shall not insist upon that Criticism; especially considering the incongruity of it with the next words;

Even upon the thick bosses of his buckler.

Malefactors are never permitted to come armed before the Judge to their arraignments.

בעבי נבי מגניו In densitate altitudinũ scutorũ ejus: in crassitiem corporũ scutorum ejus. Merc.

The word which we translate Thick, signifies also Fat, because fat is thick: Hence the Vulgar Latine translates, He is armed with his fat neck: But I pass that. According to our reading (which keeps closer to the Original) Eliphaz describes the ancient and present form of Bucklers, which as they are defensive weapons, so also offensive, and therefore have not only bosses for ornament, but (one especially in the center or middle with a sharp pike in it) for use: For as the whole Buckler secured the body against the Arrow or Sword of the Adversary, so if he pressed near, this high Boss, or Pike of the Buckler served to pierce and wound the Adversary. So that while the wicked man is said to run upon God, even upon the thick bosses of his Buckler; it shews the highest valiancy of a wicked man in opposing God; he fights not only afar off, but near at hand, and presses upon him, though within the reach and danger of his Weapon.

Alludit ad pervetustum præliandi modum cum clipeo, in cujus medio erat prominentia, quæ dicitur umbo, in quo erat cuspis quo cominus concertabatur. Bold.

Hence Observe, There is no danger can keep a wicked man off from sin.

Like the Horse in this Book (Chap. 39. 22.) He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted, neither turneth away from the Sword; he swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage, he saith among the Trumpets, Aha, aha: Though God have a Buckler, man will come upon him; yea, though God have a Boss upon his Buckler to strike and wound him, yet on he comes. The Buckler of God is the Law or Word of God, and the Bosses of this Buckler are the threatnings and curses of the Law. Now, when man sins, notwithstanding the Law, which is the Buckler by which God saves and protects his Honour and his Holiness, his Name and Glory from the wounds which sinful man is ready to give him, then man may be said to run upon his Buckler. And when notwithstanding the sharp threats and terrible curses of the Law, which are the thick Bosses with which he wounds those who transgress his Law, when, I say, notwithstanding these, man adventures to sin and transgress the Law, he may rightly be said, To run upon the thick Bosses of his Buckler. God gave Adam a Law, Of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, thou mayst not eat: Here was the Buckler; and when he added this threat, In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely dye: Here was the Boss. God sent a word to Pharaoh, Let my people go; this was a Buckler: If thou refuse to let them go, I will slay thy first-born; this was the Boss. Adam run upon the Boss of the Buckler, so did Pharaoh, and so do all wilful sinners.

A wilful heart will go on in sinning, whatsoever God is speaking, or doing (Isa. 57. 17.) I was wrath, and smote him, yet he went on frowardly in the way of his heart: Neither the wrath of God, nor their own smart, stop their progress, though smitten, yet they went on, Saints sometimes go on in sinning, though God be smiting; they have run upon the Bosses of the Buckler, to the wounding both of their souls and of their outward comforts; wicked men will run upon them to the damning of their souls and bodies. Though they see, yea, feel the Bosses, judgments not only threatned, but executed, yet on they will, and (like wicked Ahaz) In the time of their affliction sin more against the Lord. This is the height of sinfulness. As it shews the truth and height of holiness in the Saints, when they will not only run to God in fair times, when men approve, but in the worst times, when men oppose; when they venture to do their duty upon the Bucklers of men, yea, upon the Bosses of the Buckler, extreamest danger: So it shews a like strength and height of wickedness, when men venture upon the Bosses of the Buckler, upon the point of the naked Sword of Gods displeasure; they will venture, let it cost what it will; though the Lord set a flaming Sword in the way of lust, as he did in the way of the Tree of Life (Gen. 3.) though the Lord set an Angel with a drawn Sword in the way of lust, as he did in Balaam's way, when he was going to curse Israel, yet on they will; Till the heart be changed, neither Swords, nor Bucklers, nor Bosses, neither wrath threatened, nor executed, can cause a sinner to change his course.

This the Prophet complains of (Isa. 9. 13.) The people turneth not to him that smiteth them, neither do they seek the Lord of Hosts: Their incorrigibleness under severest corrections is elegantly described by another Prophet, enumerating five special strokes or smitings, to every one of which he subjoyns, Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord, Amos 4. 6, 7, 8, &c. When the bellows were burnt, and the lead consumed of the fire (that is, when all instruments and means of refining them were spent and worn out, yet their dross remained in them) The Founder melted in vain, for the wicked (that is, their wickednesses, or evil things) were not plucked away (Jer. 6. 29, 30.) They went into the Furnace full of dross, and they came out as full of dross as they went in. The Founder blowed his fire till he burnt his bellows, but their lusts had no scent of fire upon them; his lead (by which he seperates the dross from the metal) was all consumed and evaporated, but the dross of their corruptions wasted no more then the purest gold doth in the fire. Hence the Lord resolved to waste no more of his judgments upon them: Why should you be smitten any more, ye will revolt more and more (Isa. 1. 5.) To revolt from God, and to run upon him; are sins of the same strain; and they who revolt from him, will not fear to run upon his neck, even upon the thick Bosses of his Buckler.

Thus Eliphaz hath given us an account, why the Lord afflicts a wicked man all his dayes; he fights against God all his dayes. We have a reason of this reason in the next words; why it is that this wicked man is such a valiant Champion against God, why he commits wickedness with so much greediness; It is, Because he covers his face with his fatness, &c. The fatter and fuller he grows in fulfilling the lusts of the flesh, the more hungry and sharp set he is to fulfil them. Full-feeding in sin, doth not satifie, but increase a sinful appetite.

VERS. 27, 28, 29, 30.

Because he covereth his face with his fatness, and maketh collops of fat on his flanks.
And he dwelleth in desolate Cities, and in Houses which no man inhabiteth, which are ready to become heaps.
He shall not be rich, neither shall his substance continue, neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

He shall not depart out of darkness, the flame shall dry up his branches, and by the breath of his mouth shall he go away.

AS the two former Verses shewed sin the cause of those evils which befal a wicked man; so here Eliphaz shews us two causes of their sin.

First, Their riches.

Secondly, Their power.

The first is here described tropically by Fatness.

Verse 27. He covereth his face with fatness, and maketh collops of flesh on his flanks.

Both parts of the Verse mean the same thing; shewing the wicked mans worldly prosperity by the usual visible effects of it; a fat face, and fleshy flanks.

He covereth his face with fatness,

Exilit præ adipe oculus eorum. i. e. exisse videntur præ genarum turore & pinguedine. Bold.

That is, he is exceeding fat; a phrase like that (Psal. 73. 7.) Their eyes stand out with fatness: The Hebrew is, Their eyes are gone out of their heads through fatness: That is, They seem as gone or going out of their heads. 'Tis usual in the language of the Holy Ghost, to describe wicked men by fatness, (Psal. 78. 31.) He slew the fattest of them; that is, the worst of them, those who were most rebellious, longing after dainties, when God had given them bread from Heaven. David sets forth his Enemies (and so the Enemies of Christ, of whom that Psalm is a Prophesie) under this notion (Psal. 22. 12.) Strong Bulls, or fat Bulls, came about me: By the fat Bulls he means the Scribes and Pharisees, the high Priest and Rulers, who (as it were) beset Christ with continual conspiracies. More plainly (Psal. 17. 9, 10.) Keep me from mine Enemies that oppress me: They are inclosed in their own fat, with their mouth they speak proudly. Again, (Psal. 119. 70.) Their heart is as fat as grease, but I delight in thy Law.

Singulari quodam infamiæ titulo impii & iniqui in scriptura vocantur pingues.

The Scripture speaks thus, not as if fatness had any moral evil in it, or as if leanness had any moral good in it. Fatness doth not discommend us, nor doth leanness commend us to God; yea, a man lean in body may have the worst fatness, he may be proud, swoln and puft up in spirit; and a man fat in body may have the best leanness, much self-emptiness, and poverty of spirit. But because they who have abundance, and grow fat with the Creature, are tempted to forgetfulness of, and rebellion against God; and because a body overburdened with flesh and fat, renders the mind more indisposed to holy and spiritual activity; and usually they who bestow most care and cost in pampering their bodies, go with pined, starved, and lean souls; therefore fatness bears ill in Scripture.

Hoc Ægyptii inusre videbantur, dum sacerdotes Isiaci solebant dare Api Bovi quem colebant potũ ex quodam puteo non autem ex Nilo, quia ejus aqua potu creditur pinguedinem carnisque magnum facere incrementũ. Plutarch. Tract. de Iside, &c.

It is observed by Plutarch, that the Egyptian Priests gave their Apis (a Deity which they worshipped in the form of an Oxe) the water of a Pit, or Well, not the water of Nilus, to drink; the reason was (not as some assign it, because they thought those waters were prophaned by the Crocodile, for the Egyptians had that River in high veneration, but) because the waters of Nilus were fatning, nourishing waters; therefore their Apis, whom they adored as a God, and from whom they expected continual help, must not drink of it, lest the grosness of his flesh should disable him for their assistance. Fat corpulent men are, in common experience, unweildy, sleepy, and (comparatively) unfit for action. It was a custom, as my Author reports, among the ancient Spaniards and Gaules, to keep a constant measure, which if a Woman (she not being with Child) did exceed in the compass of her waste, she fell under disgrace, and lost much of her reputation, by having got so much of fat and flesh about her: And doubtless it had somewhat of disrepute in it, in Job's time, else Eliphaz (a man of experience) had not given this as a piece of a wicked mans description. He covereth his face with fatness.

Ibevi etiam & Galli antiquitus zonæ mensuram habebant, quam si mulier, quæ gravida non esset capere non posset probro magno afficiebatur. Alex. ab Alex. l. 2. c. 25

And maketh collops of flesh upon his flanks.

Which Master Broughton renders thus, And maketh plaits upon the paunch. Mr. Calvin translates it thus, He hath larded his guts.

Est descriptio summæ abundantiæ. Jun.

This latter clause of the Verse is of the same intendment with the former: And that which both reprove as sinful, is the intentness of mans spirit about the pampering of his flesh.

He covereth his face with fatness, he makes collops, &c.

He doth not say, Because he is fat, but because he covers his face with fatness, &c. That is, he sets his heart upon his belly, and makes it his business to pamper his body. He is active, yea, full of activity in getting this cover, or mask of fatness upon his face; and this mask discovers the naughtiness of his heart.

Hence Observe, That it is a sign of an evil heart, or a lean soul, to intend the flesh, or to study the satisfying of the bodily appetite.

A carnal man gives himself to deliciousness; his greatest labour is about that, for which Christ forbids our labour, The meat that perisheth (John. 6. 27.) This covering of our selves with fatness, and making collops of fat, the Apostle reproves in those, Whose God was their belly (Phil. 3. 19.) and in those who served not the Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly (Rom. 16. 18.) They who serve their belly, as they should serve God, make a god of it; and they who serve their belly at all, do not serve Christ at all. We may provide for the belly, but we must not serve it; and they who do so, deserve rather to be called Epicures then Christians. That's sinful fatness which is got upon terms of slavery, or service to the belly; yea, a man that is intentive upon that question, What shall I eat? and careful how to feed his flesh, though he do not grow fat by it; yet he shews himself full of sin by it. The design of such is for the flesh, though their flesh do not thrive under that design. As a man may be very covetous though he continue poor and lean in purse; so a man may be very luxurious, and a great servant to Bacchus, and Belly-chear, though he continue lean and poor in body.

The blessing of God fattens some, and such fat ones bless God. David propheses, that when The Kingdom shall be the Lords, and he the Governor among the Nations (which is very parallel with what those great voices said after the seventh Angel had sounded, Revel. 11. 15.) The Kingdoms of this World are become the Kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever; and when this shall be, saith David (Psal. 22. 30.) Then all they that be fat upon the earth, shall eat, and worship; that is, the great ones shall submit to Christ; his Kingdom shall be inlarged, and not only the poor, who are described in the latter part of that Verse in the Psalm, under the name and notion of such, as go down to the dust, but the rich shall receive the Gospel. Kings and Queens, persons of authority and wealth, shall come to the participation of the grace of Christ (Isa. 60. 3, 10.) They who have their bellies full of the meat that perisheth, shall have their souls full of that meat which endures to everlasting life. (Psal. 45. 12.) The rich among the people: What people? The first words of the Verse tells us, he means the Tyrians, who were a wonderful rich people (Isa. 23. 8. Ezek. 27.) and the Tyrians are here put, by a Synechdoche, for all other Heathens; for though Tyre were a City in the Tribe of Aser (Josh. 19. 29.) yet it was at that time possessed by Heathens. Now, saith the Psalmist, The rich among these people shall intreat thy favour: That is, the Churches favour. God will work their hearts to an earnest desire of admission into the society of the Saints, and to live under a professed subjection to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, who have abounded in worldly possessions, and hold the World in subjection to their power: These rich and fat ones among the people shall intreat thy favour. This propheste was in part fulfilled (Mark 3. 8.) where we read of great multitudes from Tyre and Sidon flocking after Christ: So that it is not riches and fatness precisely considered, but the intending of our skin, or our studiousness to fill our selves with earthly delicates, which shews we have weak appetites to, or rather a loathing of the things of Heaven.

Secondly, This covering the face with fat, is here presented by Eliphaz as a cause or occasion at least of the wicked mans arming himself against God.

Bonorum abundantia vitiorum omnium materiam subministrat.

Hence Observe, That an evil heart turns the blessing of God into rebellion against him

The Jews were thus charged (Deut. 32. 15.) Jesurun waxed waxed fat, and kicked. The Lord complains of this, as of a ſin, which he ſcarce knew how to pardon (Jer. 5. 7.) How ſhall I pardon thee for this? Thy Children have forſaken me, &c. When I had fed them to the full, they then committed adultery, and aſſembled themſelves by troops in the harlots houſes. Thoſe are great ſins indeed, which put the Lord (whoſe title is, The God pardoning ſin, and ready to forgive) into a query about their pardon and forgiveneſs. Such kind of ſinning made Jeruſalem a Siſter to Sodom; that is, as like Sodom, yea, and Samaria too, as if they had been one Mothers Daughters, or as if they had been of one and the ſelf-ſame blood and ſtock (Ezek. 16. 49.) Behold this was the iniquity of thy ſiſter Sodom, pride, fulneſs of bread, and abundance of idleneſs was in her, and in her Daughters: Plenty of the Creature, and plenty of ſin, went together; and whereas Jeruſalem ſhould have ſerved God, ſhe ſerved her luſts in the abundance of all things. We have a ſaying, when men are lifted up upon the enjoyment of outward good things (in alluſion to Beaſts) Provender pricks them. They act more like beaſts then men, who kick againſt God, who feeds them, and turn his bread of bleſſings into the ſtones of diſobedience. What outward good thing will not an evil heart abuſe, and wax wanton with, when it is ſo apt to abuſe ſpiritual things, and to turn the grace of God into laſciviouſneſs; that is, to grow wanton and laſcivious, becauſe God is gracious?

Thirdly Obſerve, They take little care for their ſouls, who take overmuch for their bodies.

They who deſire to pleaſe appetite, cannot endeavour to pleaſe God. When the Apoſtle exhorts to put on the Lord Jeſus, he dehorts from providing for the fleſh (Rom. 13. 14.) Put ye on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and make not proviſion for the fleſh to fulfil the luſts thereof: As if he had ſaid, Unleſs you forbear providing for luſts, you will have little leaſure, and leſs deſire to put on Chriſt. (Epheſ. 5. 18.) Be not drunk with wine wherein is exceſs (that is, be not inordinate in the uſe of the creature) but be filled with the ſpirit: As if he had ſaid, You will never be filled with the Spirit, if overfilled with wine; if you give up your ſelves to ſatisfie carnal appetite, you will not have any appetite at all to ſpirituals. There is an inward gluttony and drunkenneſs, when the thoughts run upon dainty diſhes, and full Cups, or when men chew their meat and wine in their thoughts, before they eat or drink. Now as well they (or rather they more) who are inwardly drunken with exceſſive deſires of wine, as they who are viſibly drunken with the exceſſive taking down of wine, are far enough either from the deſire or attainment of a filling with the Spirit. The ſpirit of the Buttery, and the Spirit of God, have no more agreement then the fleſh and the Spirit; yea, that ſpirit is the groſſeſt part of ſinful fleſh, and therefore can neither take care for, nor bear with, the things of the ſpirit. So far of the firſt cauſe of the wicked mans exceſſive ſinning; his exceſs in the uſe of the Creature, ſet forth by the ordinary effect of it, Fatneſs, He covereth his face with fatneſs: The ſecond follows.

Verſe 28. He dwelleth in deſolate Cities, and in houſes wherein no man inhabiteth, which are ready to become heaps.

This Verſe ſhews a ſecond cauſe of the wicked mans fierceneſs againſt God, His power over men; which is deſcribed (as the former) by the effect of it, He hath made Cities deſolate. It requires much power to overthrow whole Cities; that which is ſtrong cannot be deſtroyed without ſtrength; ſuch was the power of the man whom Eliphaz deſcribes, ſuch his ſtrength: He ſubdued ſtrong Cities, he conquered men, and he thought he could conquer God too. But though to deſtroy and pull down intimate ſtrength, yet to build and ſet up Cities requires greater ſtrength.

This ſtrength alſo is here aſcribed to the wicked man, who,

Firſt, Either comes to Cities already overthrown, or overthrows Cities.

And then ſecondly, builds the Cities which are overthrown, that himſelf may dwell in them. He will not dwell in Cities built to his hand, or in Palaces ready made, but he will make goodly Palaces out of the deſolate places; a City waſted by War, by Fire, and Sword, ſhall revive out of the rubbiſh, and recover to its ancient ſplendor, if he undertake it.

Maſter Broughton renders clearly to this ſence, Though he makes dwellings of Cities ruinated, of houſes undwelt, which were coming to heaps of ſtone: Here's the compleatneſs of his worldly power. He makes flouriſhing Cities deſolate, and deſolate Cities flouriſh; he dwells in deſolate Cities, in Houſes where no man inhabiteth; that is, in Cities which he himſelf once made deſolate (having caſt out their proper Inhabitants) but hath now re-edified and enlarged for his own uſe and honour.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That a wicked man cares not whom he ruines, ſo he may raiſe himſelf.

Down with Kingdoms, down with Cities, down with all, ſo he may ſtand, or have his own ends.

Secondly Obſerve, (which is the ſcope of Eliphaz) A man that hath great power among men, begins to think himſelf ſtrong enough for God alſo.

He made earthly Cities deſolate, and none was able to reſiſt him, therefore he hopes to make Heaven deſolate, and diſturb the Throne of God; He runs upon his neck, &c.

Again, Some expound this Verſe not of the cauſe of this mans ſin, but of the puniſhment of his ſin; He dwells in deſolate Cities, in places where no man dwelt: That is, He ſhall dwell alone, he ſhall either refuſe, or be refuſed by all good company, For this miſerable ſolitude may ariſe two wayes.

Terrores de quibus nuper dictum eſt, non patiuntur impium in facemiliari hominum conſortio vivere, ideo deſolatorium urbium ruinas & latibula quærit. Pined.

Firſt, From trouble of mind; he having oppreſſed others, ſhall find himſelf at laſt ſo oppreſſed with the witneſs of his own conſcience, that to avoid it, he retires into deſolate places, into waſte Wilderneſſes, into old ruinous buildings, where none dwell but the Owl, and the Screech-owl, (Iſa. 34.) He that finds not his own conſcience good company, never finds any.

Secondly, This wicked man is caſt out from the company of men, he hath bern a ſcourge to many, and now all are a ſcourge to him. Tyranny grows intolerable to mankind (Dan. 4. 33.) Nebuchadnezzar was the greateſt Monarch in the world, and a proud Tyrant; at laſt he was turned out to graſs: his Nobles, Lords, and Subjects forſook him, and he who ruled men, lived among beaſts; or as the ſame Propheſie of Daniel reports it (Chap. 5. 20.) When his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was depoſed, or (as the Chalde) made to come down from his Kingly Throne, and they took his glory from him, and he was driven from the ſons of men, &c. Which we may anſwer with Job's Text, He was forced to dwell in deſolate places.

Hujuſmodi tyranni ejiciuntur in exilium.

The Roman Story tells us of Nero, that perceiving himſelf a loſt man, by the revolt of ſome Provinces, and the general complaint of the people againſt his inſolent Government, he wandered up and down, and crept firſt into a Thicket, by and by into a Cave with Sporus his filthy Favorite, and at laſt when he heard of the ſentence of death given againſt him by the Senate, and that their Officers were haſting to attach him, he, with a little help of one of his Servants, cut his own Throat.

Thirdly, Others interpret theſe words, as noting the wicked mans worldly decay; he ſhall not have a houſe to put his head in: His ſtrong Cities and goodly Palaces, ſhall go to ruine; or he ſhall be forced to dwell in a ruinous houſe, a houſe ready to fall about his ears, who before lived in ceiled houſes; he hath pulled down other mens houſes, and now he dwells in houſes ready to fall down; he impoveriſht others, and now himſelf is turned out among the poor.

Hence Obſerve, That God often makes the puniſhment of man ſuitable to his ſin.

The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth, the wicked is ſnared in the work of his own hands (Pſal. 9. 16.) The judgments of God are alwayes juſt, and ſometimes their juſtice is viſible. As the wicked feel them, ſo all may ſee them, and ſay, Righteous art thou, O Lord. The Prophet deſcribes this retaliation of Divine judgment (Iſa. 5. 8, 9.) Woe to them that add houſe to houſe, and lay field to field, till there be no place (that is, no place for others to dwell in) that they may be placed in the midſt of the earth:

What is the danger of this? In mine ear ſaith the Lord of Hoſts, of a truth, many houſes ſhall be deſolate, many and fair without Inhabitants: Here is deſolation, the reward of deſolation; and as they took bread from others, and pull'd the cup from their mouthes, ſo their bread ſhall be taken away, and their cup left empty. Thus it follows in the Prophet (Verſ. 10.) Yea, ten Akers of Vineyard ſhall yield one Bath: A Bath was a meaſure among the Jews of Liquids, containing, as is conceived, about eight Gallons: So that when he ſaith, Ten Akers of Vineyard ſhall yield one Bath; the meaning is, there ſhall be a great ſcarcity of Wine: An Aker of Vineyard ſhould not yield a Gallon of Wine; that's a miſerable Vintage. And the ſeed of an Homer, ſhall yield an Ephah: An Homer was a meaſure for dry things, containing ten Ephahs: So that when it is ſaid, The ſeed of a Homer ſhall yield an Ephah, the meaning is, they ſhall reap but the tenth part of the ſeed ſown, which is a miſerable Harveſt, and the higheſt threat of enſuing Famine. Thus the Lord puniſhed them as they had ſinned; they ſtarved the poor, and God threatens to ſtarve them. Hunger never pinches ſo terribly, as when it is a puniſhment ſent at the cry of the hungry.

Again (Iſa. 33. 1.) When thou ſhalt ceaſe to deal treacherouſly, then they ſhall deal treacherouſly with thee: When the deceiver is deceived, and the treacherous dealer ruined by treacherous dealing men, then the truth and faithfulneſs of God are eminently exalted. And as it is in puniſhments, ſo often in rewards, God doth us good in the ſame way wherein we have done good. The Midwives ſaved the Males of the Iſraelites in Egypt, and by this act of pitty built the houſe of Iſrael, which the Lord took ſo well at their hands, That he built their houſes, or made their houſes flouriſh (Exod. 1. 21.) As the deſtroyer ſhall be deſtroyed, ſo the builder ſhall be built; mercy loves to be exact as well as judgment.

Again, Eliphaz tells us of Cities and Houſes ready to become heaps.

Hence Note, The moſt flouriſhing Cities, the ſtrongeſt Structures in the World, are ſubject to ruine.

Art cannot prevent the decayes of Nature, much leſs the Decrees of Divine Juſtice. Material Jeruſalem was threatened, that one ſtone ſhould not be left upon another, which ſhould not be caſt down; the event anſwered that prediction. Myſtical Babylon is under a more dreadful doom, and the event will in due time anſwer that prediction. Babylon is ready to become heaps, and one ſtone ſhall not be left upon another: There is no cement can hold that together, to which God ſaith, Fall.

Eliphaz having ſhewed the cauſes of the wicked mans impudent oppoſition againſt God, and (according to the two latter Expoſitions of this Verſe) ſome part of his puniſhment, proceeds further to ſhew his puniſhment.

Verſe 29. He ſhall not be rich, neither ſhall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

Verſe 30. He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs, the flame ſhall dry up his branch, and by the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away.

Here is compleat miſery in externals. The judgment is laid down two wayes.

Firſt, Negatively.

And ſecondly, Affirmatively.

Negatively, what the wicked man ſhall not be, what he ſhall not attain to; and then affirmatively, what the wicked man ſhall be, or what ſhall come upon him; the Negative part hath a gradation of four ſteps.

The firſt is this, He ſhall not be rich.

The ſecond is, His ſubſtance ſhall not continue.

The third is, He ſhall not prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

The fourth is this, He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs.

Thoſe are the Negative parts of his puniſhments, the Affirmative are two.

Firſt, The flame ſhall dry up his branch.

Secondly, By the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away.

He ſhall not be rich.

The words ſeem to carry an oppoſition all along to the wicked mans purpoſes and projects. The wicked man ſaith in his heart, if not with his mouth, He will be rich; to which God anſwers, He ſhall not be rich. The Apoſtle (1 Tim. 6. 9.) ſpeaks of ſuch a ſort of Rich Will-bees, They that will be rich fall into temptation, &c. When a man comes to this height of reſolvedneſs, He will be rich whatever comes of it, or whoever ſtands in his way; he will be rich and ask no mans leave, no nor Gods leave, then God riſes to his high reſolves, He ſhall not be rich: Let it come to tryal whoſe word ſhall ſtand, his, or mine: And when once this word is gone out of Gods mouth, then he, and all his trees which ſhould bear him that golden fruit, are blaſted and mildew'd. Then, though he lay the ſtrongeſt projects for riches, yet he ſhall not be rich, though he ſweat and toil to be rich, though he dig deep into the ground, and turn every ſtone above ground, to find riches, yet he ſhall not be rich; though he cares not whom he makes poor, yea, though himſelf live poorly all his dayes, that he may dye rich, yet he ſhall not be rich.

Hence Obſerve, It is not in the power of man to get riches.

A man may make it his deſign to be rich, but he cannot make himſelf rich. Moſes (Deut. 8. 18.) gives it in charge to the people of Iſrael, Thou ſhalt remember the Lord thy God; for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, &c. Man is very apt to forget the Author, not only of his ſpiritual, but of his temporal good things, and is readier to aſcribe his riches to his own getting, then to Gods giving. Temporal good things lye more level to the power of Nature, and humane Induſtry, then ſpirituals; yet we can no more attain temporals then ſpirituals without the power of God. Chriſt teacheth us, that our care can no more add a penny to our eſtate, then a cubit to our ſtature (Matth. 6. 27.) How often have we ſeen experience ſealing to this truth? Many have endeavoured after, and reacht at riches, in good and hopeful; in fair and probable wayes, yet they have not reacht to riches. Others have ſtriven for riches in baſe and unwarrantable, in unjuſt and ſinful wayes, yet they could never get a ſtep beyond beggery.

Ex quocunque piſcatu non evadet ditior.

The Lord gives them a ſtop, and ſaith, Ye ſhall not be rich; evil men do not alwayes thrive; Peter, a good man, fiſhed all night, but got nothing, till Chriſt bid him put down the Net. Some have caſt their Net in all ſorts of waters, yet could never catch the great fiſh of worldly wealth. It is the bleſſing of God that makes good men rich; and it is a permiſſion from God that makes evil men rich. Godlineſs is profitable for all things, having the promiſe of this life, and of that which is to come, yet every godly man meets not with the profit of this life; ungodlineſs is profitable for nothing, having neither the promiſe of this life, nor of that which is to come, yet ſome ungodly men meet with the profit of this life. Though ſinners are never on the thriving hand, yet they often thrive in their way; and though Saints are ever on the thriving ſide, yet they do not alwayes thrive in their way: Neither the one ſort nor the other thrives, if the Lord ſaith, They ſhall not be rich: When he ſaith ſo to the Saints, it is to humble them; but when he ſaith ſo to a wicked man, it is to puniſh him; He ſhall not be rich, that's the firſt ſtep of his miſery.

But ſuppoſe he get riches, yet he cannot keep them; The wages which he earns is put into a bag with holes, or pierced through, all's gone (Hag. 1. 6.) Carnal men are like leaking Veſſels to the Word of God, they (as the Apoſtle cautions Believers, leſt at any time they ſhould, Heb. 2. 1.) alwayes let it run out. Now as they let out what they have heard of the Word of God; ſo God lets out what they have got of the World: He makes all the Veſſels which hold their earthly ſubſtance leaky: So it follows,

Neither ſhall his ſubſtance continue.

This is his ſecond woe: The word which we render Subſtance, ſignifies alſo Power, and Strength; becauſe riches impower and ſtrengthen men to do great things; but how ſtrong and ſubſtantial ſoever they are in the opinion of men, their time is but ſhort, They ſhall not continue; and this ariſeth two wayes.

חיל rebur, pro opibus ſæpe ſumitur. Latine copias poſſis vertere. Merc.

Firſt,

Summis negatum est stare diu.

First, From the nature of the things of the World, which are all frail and momentary; and though we call them Substance, yet indeed they are but a Shadow, there is no continuance in them.

Secondly, This ariseth from the judgment and curse of God, both upon such rich men, and upon their riches; if the Lord doth not stop them from getting riches, yet he can speak a word, and blast all that they have gotten.

Hence Note, That the most substantial of earthly things are of small or no continuance.

More particularly.

That ill gotten goods are not lasting, or long-lived.

Sometimes they melt away, and dye in the same hands that got them; they alwayes dye and melt away in some of their hands, for whom they were gotten. There is no tack in their estate, in whom there is no Justice. That which is gathered by the unrighteousness of man, shall be scattered by the wrath of God. As the little which a righteous man hath is better, so it is surer then the great riches of many wicked. Sin makes no provision at all for the soul; and it makes very ill provision for the body. The title by which we hold worldly things, is more considerable then worldly things themselves. To hold in Capite from Christ is as the purest so the strongest Tenure: Only he who continues the same for ever, and changes not, can give continuance to that which is changeable.

But suppose the wicked mans substance doth continue long for bulk and matter, yet the beauty and comfort of it shall not continue for a moment; which is the third step of this Gradation.

Neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

Riches are one thing, the perfection of riches is another; as in spiritual things there is the substance of them, and the perfection of them; so in temporals: The word signifies, the consummation of any thing, or the bringing it to its perfective end (Isa. 33. 1.) When thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee: The Prophet doth not mean it of making an end by way of cessation, as if hand, heart, or tongue, did cease dealing treacherously (for so wicked men will never make an end of wickedness, if they might have an eternity to act evil in, they would act it eternally) but he means it of making an end by way of consummation; as if he had said, When they are come to a full stature in treachery, and have compleated their conspiracies against goodness, and good men, then they shall be dealt with in their kind, and as they best deserve. Now as a wicked man would compleat his sin, and often reaches the very perfection of it, so he would compleat his estate, and doth sometimes reach to the perfection of it. The wicked man would be perfectly rich, he is not satisfied to have a compleat estate, or enough for meat, drink, and cloathing, he must have a great estate, enough for pride, pomp, and glory; Manna pleases him not, he must have Quails, superfluities as well as necessaries: He thinks a little too much in spirituals, but a great deal is not enough for him in temporals: His internal imperfections trouble him not, his aim is at perfection in externals. That is perfect only in a strict sence, to which nothing can be added, and from which nothing can be taken away: The wicked man would attain to such perfection, but he cannot; his own heart forbids the first, for how much soever he hath, he would have more added to it; he saith not, it is enough, though it be too much; God forbids the latter, his portion shall be abated, or (in the words of the Text) He shall not prolong the perfection thereof.

מגלם perfectio eorum a גלה perfecit, alii Minlam unicam, dictionem perinde ac si duæ essent exponunt, quasi מן להם ex eo quod est illorum, i.e. res illorum non extendentur per terram. Merc.

The utmost perfection he can attain unto, is but the shadow of perfection; and though shadows towards the setting of the Sun grow longer and longer, yet no shadow can be prolonged, they quickly pass and fly away. Solomon tells us (Prov. 12. 3.) A man shall not be established in wickedness, but the root of the righteous shall continue: A wicked man may be set in the ground, but he hath no root in the ground: Their stock shall not take root in the earth, and he (that is, God) shall blow upon them, and they shall wither (Isa. 40. 24.) A tree not rooted falls by a puff of wind, or withers while it stands. The tree of a wicked man may have a great body, but he hath no good root, he is not rooted in Christ, he hath no hold of the Covenant, therefore his perfection cannot continue.

Nec mittes in terra radicem ejus. Vulg.

Hence Observe, That as there is no worldly perfection of any long continuance, so the perfection of wicked men is of shortest continuance.

Nubecula est, cito transibit.

Athanasius said of Julian the Apostate, when he was in the height, in the very Zenith and perfection of earthly felicity, having ascended the Impereal Throne, and given the Law to a great part of the then known World, He is but a little Cloud, he will soon vanish. And indeed his glory and the perfection of it did not continue, for when he was but thirty years old, in that prime of his natural course and constitution, he was cut off; his power could not protect his person, nor prolong his perfection on the earth.

David professeth, as from his own experience (Psal. 119. 96.) I have seen an end of all perfection: The term of universality, All, doth not compass in every kind of perfection, but all the perfections of one kind. The end of Divine perfections cannot be seen; when we have seen the most of them, there is more of them unseen; but the end of all humane perfections may be seen. There is a twofold sight.

First, Of the eye.

Secondly of the understanding.

David's eye had seen the end of many humane perfections, and his understanding saw the end of them all; he had seen some ending, and he saw all must end. Never dream of prolonging your perfection here. No wordly thing can continue long, for the World it self shall not continue long: If the Scaffold or Stage upon which these perfections are shewed, or acted, must fall, the perfections themselves cannot stand. There have been but few that ever advanced so far as to an earthly perfection; but there was never any one that prolonged his perfection on the Earth. Adam did not continue in that created perfection, which had no imperfection in it; How then shall any of his Children continue in an imperfect (such is their best-) perfection.

As Eliphaz hath shewed us the wicked mans misery in the not prolonging of his perfection; so now he shews us a further degree of it, by the prolonging of his affliction.

Verse 30. He shall not depart out of darkness.

Here is the fourth step of this Gradation. The wicked mans misery in misery: He cannot stay in a good, nor get out of an ill estate. Eliphaz seems to take off an Objection, for some might say, What if the wicked man do not grow rich for the present? What if his substance doth not continue? What if he prolong not his perfections, or fall from the top-stair of his high condition? Yet we hope at last he may out-grow all this, and get riches which he had not, or regain those which he had? No saith Eliphaz, Either the wicked man shall not rise to riches, or if he rise he shall fall, and when once he is fallen, he shall rise no more; either he shall not get into the light, or if he do, he shall be soon overtaken with darkness; and when once he is in the dark, he shall come out no more, He shall not depart out of darkness.

When the wicked man is in the light, he sings, Loth to depart, but he must; and when he is cast into darkness, ness, he cryes, Haste to depart, but he cannot: The wicked man, like the evil Angels, is held in chains of darkness, which he is neither able to break off, nor to file off: He hath said to God, who is light (yea, because he is light) Depart from me; and God saith to him, Thou shalt not depart out of darkness.

There is a twofold darkness.

First, Inward.

Secondly, Outward.

Both metaphorical. By darkness some understand inward trouble, or grief of spirit; others expound it of outward troubles and calamities upon his estate: 'Tis true of both, for he shall depart neither out of the one nor the other; but rather take it here for outward trouble; and then, Not to depart out of darkness, imports abiding misery, irrecoverable irrecoverable sickness, decayes and losses, which shall never be repaired.

Hence Note, Wicked men falling into trouble, shall not know the mercy of a resurrection out of trouble.

The just man falleth seven times, and riseth again (Prov. 24. 16.) The just man is subject to take falls of two sorts, and both of them Seven times; that is, often.

First, He falls into sin.

Secondly, He falls into trouble.

He riseth from both these falls: He riseth from the first by repentance; he riseth from the second by deliverance. Solomon's Text is to be understood of this second sort of falls, and may therefore be expounded by the direct words of David, (Psal. 34. 19.) Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of them all: The righteous have as many resurrections as falls, But (as Solomon makes the Antithesis in the place fore-cited) the wicked shall fall into mischief. Solomon doth not tell us expressly, what the just man falls into, but he tells us he shall rise again: He tells us expressly what the wicked man shall fall into, but he doth not tell us, that he shall rise again; nay, he tells us implicitely, that he shall never rise again. He that riseth again did not fall into mischief, how great soever the evil was which he fell into; and he that doth not rise again fell into mischief, how little soever the evil was which he fell into. Nothing makes our falling either into sin, or trouble, a mischief to us, but our continuing in it. He goes far (we say in our Proverb) who never returns; he falls low, who never riseth; and he stayes long in darkness, who never departs out of it. Darkness is the portion of a wicked man, and he shall never depart out of darkness; neither out of that darkness of sin, nor misery; he hath no desire to depart out of the former, and he hath no promise to depart out of the latter. Thus we have seen the negative punishment of a wicked man, what he shall not be, what he shall not receive; this is enough to make him miserable, but positive evil will make him outright miserable. This Eliphaz prosecutes in the next words.

The flame shall dry up his branches.

The flame is taken two wayes: Either,

First, For the wrath of God which goeth forth, causing judgment to take hold of sinners: Or,

Secondly, For the judgment it self, which is an effect of his wrath.

The wrath of God burneth against the wicked as a flame, and then judgments burn up the wicked; there is no heat to the heat of Divine wrath; neither is there any thing punitively hot, till Divine wrath heats it.

Sunt qui ejus liberos intelligunt; sed nos allegoricè intelligimus omnem ejus splendorem, opes, &c. Merc.

The flame shall dry up his branches: Some by his branches understand his Children, they shall dye; Children are branches, they stand, saith the Psalmist, like Olive plants, or branches, round about the Table of a man fearing God: Such branches Job had, but they were dryed up, and probably Eliphaz might give him a rub upon that soar in this expression.

Flamma exurens, in Heb est vehementissimi supplicii atque adeo aterni symbolum. Duci videtur translatio à more hostium vastantium regionem aliquam qui segetes & arbores succendunt.

Secondly, Others by branches understand His followers and flatterers, who live upon him as branches upon a Tree; but to pass these restrained Interpretations: I conceive we may take the Branch in general, for all that belongs to a wicked man, his Children, his Friends, his Followers, his Flatterers, his Honour, his Riches, his Power; all these look green, and are his beautiful branches; and all these the flame dryeth up. The Prophet complains (Joel 1. 19.) O Lord to thee will I cry, for the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness, and the flame hath burnt all the trees of the field: The flame, of which he cryes out, and which did not only dry the branches, but devour the Trees of the Field, was the extream heat of the Sun; which as it usually sends out refreshing beams, so when God is angry, it can send out scorching flames, and those beams, which tempered with showers of rain, nourish the Earth, in the long withholding of rain scorch the Earth. And what then befel the Trees properly taken, and their branches, doth often befal both Trees and branches taken in the metaphorical sence, as here in the Text, a flame dryes them up. A godly man is compared to a Tree flourishing and growing by the water side; wicked men are compared sometimes to flourishing Trees, but they grow by the fire side: The flame dryes up their branches.

Hence Note, First, The wrath of God is a drying, yea, a devouring flame; the flame of Gods displeasure puts all into a flame.

That flame will burn up branches, how goodly, how strong, how high soever they are grown; though as strong as the Oaks of Bashan, though as high as the Cedars in Lebanon, yet this flame will dry them up. The Prophet Zechariah speaks this point, while he thus bespeaks Lebanon (Zech. 11. 1.) Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy Cedars: 'Tis interpreted as a Propheste of the destruction of Jerusalem, and Judea, by the Roman power; as Christ after threatened them for rejecting him and his Counsel: The words of the Prophet may be understood two wayes, either literally, for the destruction of that Forrest of Lebanon, which the Romans cut down for the service of their Siege against Jerusalem; or figuratively, for the flourishing estate of Jerusalem, whose branches, though like the branches of the Cedars in Lebanon, were dryed up by the flame of that dreadful War. In which stile and figure the Prophet Isaiah denounceth the judgments of God (Chap. 2. 12, 13.) The day of the Lord shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, &c. And upon all the Cedars of Lebanon. And the Prophet Ezekiel puts forth this Riddle and Parable (Chap. 17. 3.) Thus saith the Lord, A great Eagle (that is, Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon) with great wings, long winged, full of feathers, which had divers colours, came into Lebanon (that is, unto Judea and Jerusalem) and took the highest branch of the Cedar; namely, Jehojakim the King of Judah, and carried him captive to Babylon.

The Lord can make any affliction a consumption to the most beautiful branches of a sinful people, or person.

Whatsoever he useth as an instrument of his indignation, is his flame: In this sence, the very waters which drowned the old World, were the fire and flame of God: He can by poverty, as by a flame, consume and dry up riches; by disgrace, as by a flame, consume and dry up honour; by sickness, as by a flame, consume and dry up health; God hath special flames for every special branch, nothing can continue to do us good, when God gives Warrant or Commission to any of his flames to scorch and consume it. The flame shall burn up his branch,

And by the breath of his mouth shall he go away.

We have the flame of God in the former clause, and the breath of his mouth in this: Some Interpreters conceive that Eliphaz mentions these two, The flame and the breath, purposely to put Job in mind what God had done to him; for we read in the first Chapter of this Book, of the flame of God, a fire from Heaven consuming that branch, his flocks of Sheep, and a breath from God, namely, a mighty strong wind, destroying a more precious branch, his flock of Children: Eliphaz cloaths this discourse in such terms as might easily remind and represent to Job, what God had done to him, in the day of his calamity.

And by the breath of his mouth shall he go away.] There is yet a difference among Expositors about the Antecedent to his: His mouth; Whose mouth? Most understand it, of the breath of Gods mouth, as hath been hinted already: Some expound it of the breath of the wicked mans own mouth: I shall touch upon both.

First, By the breath of Gods mouth he shall go away: The breath of God may be taken two wayes.

Either first (as the flame before) for his anger, which is often expressed by puffing the breath.

Secondly, It may be taken for the decree, or determination of God.

Both these wayes a wicked man goes away by the breath of God; first, by the anger of God; if God do but breath angerly upon him, he is blasted and gone, His glory and greatness languish before the least puff of Divine displeasure: God needs not make great preparations of Armies, or Forces, to contend with wicked men; he needs not raise Mounts and Batteries, to overthrow their best Fortifications of Riches and Honour: The Channels of waters were seen (saith David, Psal. 18. 15.) and the foundations of the World

World were diſcovered, at thy rebuke O Lord, at the blaſt of the breath of thy noſtrils. The Prophet tells thoſe, who neglected to build the Houſe of the Lord (Hag. 1.9.) Ye looked for much, but lo it came to little, and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it: God did but blow upon it, and by the breath of his mouth all their expected encreaſe went away. When Pharaoh purſued the Iſraelites in the height of pride and preſumption, the Text ſaith, It came to paſs in the morning watch, the Lord looked upon the Hoaſt of the Egyptians through the pillar of fire, and of the cloud, and troubled the Egyptians, and took off their Chariot wheels, that they drave them heavily (Exod. 14.24,25.) God confounded them by a look; how eaſily can the Lord riſe up and deſtroy all the power that riſeth up againſt his people? He can do it with a breath from his mouth, With a caſt of his eye. When Chriſt was apprehended by the Officers armed with Staves and Swords; he ſaid, Whom ſeek you? They anſwered, Jeſus of Nazareth: He ſaith, I am he. (Chriſt was not afraid to confeſs himſelf) As ſoon then as he had ſaid unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to the ground (John 18.6.) What a ſtrange power was here, that Chriſt could caſt them down with a word, and that not an angry word, not a word of conviction but confeſſion; he did not chide them, and ſay, Ye wretches, how dare you lay your hands upon me, who am an innocent perſon; how dare you carry me to judgment, who ſhall one day be your Judge; Chriſt ſpake no ſuch terrible language, but only ſaid, I am he, and down they fell. If theſe words of ſubmiſſion had ſuch a force in them, as overthrew thoſe Officers to the ground, how ſhall his Enemies ſtand before the thunder of his ſevereſt increpations, and final ſentence? As the Lord needs not make great proviſions for comforting of his people, if he ſpeaks a word, it is done; if he give but a good look, their hearts revive; Lord lift up the light of thy countenance upon me; thou haſt put gladneſs in my heart (*Pſal.*4.6,7.) So if God do but darken his countenance againſt wicked men, and frown upon them, if he do but breath at them, he puts ſorrow enough into their hearts, even conſuming killing ſorrow; By the breath of his mouth they go away.

Verba vel mandato ex ore Dei procedēte. Jun.

Again, take the breath of God, For the decree of God: for the word or command which goeth out of his mouth, by this breath of God, they go away. The deſtruction of the wicked is under a Decree; God hath ſpoken in his holyneſs (Pſal. 108.7,8,9.) That is, he hath given out his word from Heaven, the habitation of his holineſs, and of his glory; or, He hath ſpoken it certainly, there is nothing but holineſs in his word (and that's the ſtrength of words) David having received this word, ſtands aſſured, That as Shechem, and Succoth, Gilead, and Manaſſeh, Ephraim, and Judah, would willingly ſubmit to him, and yield obedience; So alſo, that Moab, Edom, and Philiſtia, who were his profeſſed Enemies, ſhould be ſubdued to him. He expected to conquer and triumph over them, to put them to the baſeſt offices, as his Vaſſals, becauſe God had decreed and ſpoken it in his holineſs. God hath ſpoken the word (ſaith he) therefore it ſhall be done, yea 'tis done; and therefore David cryed, All's mine, Gilead is mine, Manaſſeh is mine, Moab and Edom are mine, as ſoon as God had ſpoken the word. All that ever was done in the World, hath been done by the breath of Gods mouth; that is, by the word or decree of God: So ſome underſtand that of the Apoſtle (2 *Theſ.*2.8.) And then ſhall that wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord ſhall conſume with the ſpirit, or breath of his mouth, and deſtroy with the brightneſs of his coming: Antichriſt hath ſtood long, and he hath been for ſome time declining; his downfal haſtens; the breath of God will leave him breathleſs: As he hath ſtood by the flattering breath of men; ſo he ſhall fall by the conſuming breath of God.

This conſuming with breath, notes either (as before) the eaſineſs of that conſumption, 'tis done with a breath, or the way and manner of doing it; 'tis done by the command and decree of God, or by the Preaching of the Goſpel, which indeed gives Antichriſt his fatal blow, and ſhakes all the Towers of myſtical Babylon, and is called by the Prophet, The rod of his mouth, and the breath of his lips (Iſa. 11.4.) He ſhall ſmite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips ſhall he ſlay the wicked. Life and death ſit upon the lips of Chriſt, he hath a reviving breath, and a killing breath; he quickens the deadeſt heart, and deads the quickeſt, the proudeſt heart with a word ſpeaking. By the breath of his mouth the wicked go away.

Spiritu oris, ſc. ipſius impii, credo potius referrendum eſſe ad impium quaſi ille ſibi ipſi fuerit mortis cauſa dum contra Deum loquitur conſidēter & libere. Sanct. Spiritu oris ſui, i.e. ſuis verbis quæ ſpiritu & halitu in ore formantur.

Further, The breath of his mouth, ſay ſome, is the breath of the wicked mans own mouth; By the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away: That is, by the words which breath out of his mouth. His paſſionate diſtempered ſpeeches ſhall undo him, while he ſpeaks, either outragiouſly, and blaſphemouſly againſt God, or falſly and ſeditiouſly towards man, his ruine enters at the opening of his lips.

The motion of the breath is the preſerver of life, and while breath laſts, life laſts; yet many a mans life had laſted longer had it not been for his breath. The wicked mans breath proves his death, and his tongue which hath been a ſcourge to others, becomes a Sword to himſelf. His words poſſibly have wounded, and his breath hath been the death of many: But now he is wounded by his own words, and cruſht to death by the weight of his own breath, or by the fall of his own tongue upon him: So the Pſalmiſt gives it (Pſal. 64.8.) They ſhall make their own tongues to fall upon themſelves; that is, Their own words ſhall be brought as a Teſtimony againſt them, and condemn them. The tongue is a little member (ſaith the Apoſtle James, Chap. 3.5.) And therefore a light member; yet it falls heavy, as heavy as lead. A man were better have his Houſe fall upon him, then that (in this ſenſe) his tongue ſhould fall upon him. Some have been preſſed to death, becauſe they would not ſpeak, but ſtood mute before the Judge; but more have been preſſed to death by their ſinful freedom, or rather licentiouſneſs in ſpeaking; this hath brought them to judgement, and caſt them in judgement: Their tongue hath fallen upon them, and by the breath of their mouth, they have gone away.

Laſtly (but I will not ſtay upon it, becauſe the Original doth not well bear it) theſe words are caſt into the form of a ſimilitude, deſcribing the manner how the wicked man, and all his glory ſhall go away; even as a breath, or as his breath; As the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away; that is, he ſhall go ſpeedily, he ſhall go ſuddenly: A breath is ſoon fetcht, it is both come and gone in a moment; A breathing time, is a Proverbial, for a little time (much like that, In the twinckling of an eye). Thus man comes and goes, is come and gone (eſpecially a wicked man who is driven by the wrath of God) as ſoon as ſeen by others, as ſoon as he hath breathed himſelf: It will not be long ere he goes, and he will not be long a going. For as the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away.

The breath of man goes continually, and ſo doth the life of man; while man ſleeps, his breath goes, and ſo doth his life; while man ſtands ſtill, his breath goes, and ſo doth his life: The breath, indeed, is ſometimes in a hurry, and goes faſter then it doth at other times; but though the life of man doth not go faſter at one time then at another, yet it always goes.

Or if at any time our life may be ſaid to go faſter then at another, it is when our breath is (by ſome ſtop in its paſſage) at a ſtand; and when ever our breath comes to a full ſtop, our life is not only going, but quite gone.

The life of man hath ſo much dependance upon his breath, that it is called Breath, and the breath of life: When God formed man out of the duſt of the ground, he breathed into his noſtrils the breath of life, and man became a living ſoul (Gen. 2.7.) And as ſoon as God calls back this breath of life, man becomes a dead body, or a carkaſs: The life of man muſt needs go as his breath, for it goes with his breath; and when the life of a wicked man is gone, all (that he called his) his worldly glory, goes with him: In that day all his thoughts periſh: For, As the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away.

Eliphaz having laid down the wicked mans ſad condition, and the cauſes of it, concludes with a uſe or application of the whole Doctrine, at the 31. Verſe, Let not him, that is deceived truſt in vanity, &c.

VERS.

VERS. 31, 32, 33, 34, 35.

Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity; for vanity shall be his recompence.
It shall be accomplished before his time, and his branch shall not be green.
He shall shake off his unripe Grape as the Vine, and shall cast off his flower as the Olive.
For the Congregation of Hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery.
They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

ELiphaz laid down his Doctrine, at the 20. Verse of this Chapter, That a wicked mans life is a miserable life, he travels in pain all his days; and having insisted long upon the proof, he now gives us the application of it, in a use of dehortation, Vers. 31. Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity.

He inforceth this dehortation by a summary repetition of the Doctrine before delivered; which he doth,

First, Plainly in the close of the 31. and in the beginning of the 32. Verses, For vanity shall be his recompence; it shall be accomplished before its time.

Secondly, He doth it allegorically, in the close of the 32. Verse, and in the 33. His branch shall not be green: He shall shake off his unripe Grapes as the Vine, and shall cast off his flower as the Olive.

Having thus pressed his Doctrine by this powerful motive, he concludes his whole Sermon, with a fresh assertion of his Doctrine, against two sorts of wicked men in particular, which yet may comprehend all wicked men;

First, Of Hypocrites, who corrupt the worship of God, or are corrupt while they pretend to worship God. Ver. 34. For the congregation of Hypocrites shall be desolate;

Secondly, Of oppressors, who pervert Justice, or deal falsly among men; The fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Under these two heads, we may reduce all sorts of sinners; sinners against God, under the notion of Hypocrites: And sinners against men, under the notion of Oppressors, who pervert Judgment by giving or taking Bribes: All which Eliphaz concludes, by a description of their evil actings (the cause of all their sufferings) under that elegant metaphor of Child-bearing; They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit: Thus you have the resolution and scope of the latter part of this Chapter.

Vers. 31. Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity.

These words contain the dehortation; here are three terms to be explained.

First, What is meant by being deceived.
Secondly, What by trusting.
Thirdly, What we are to understand by Vanity.

Let not him that is deceived.] The Original word signifies, either the turning of the foot, or the turning of the heart, or both out of the way (Psal. 119. 176.) I have gone astray, like a lost Sheep: That is, I have been deceived, and so have gone out of the way of thy holy Commandments. Satan is an ill guide, and our hearts are no better: He that follows either, quickly looseth himself: And until God seeketh us up (as David prays in the next words) we cannot find our way when we are once out of it (Ezek. 44. 15.) The Priests, the Levites, the Sons of Zadock that kept the charge of my Sanctuary, when the people of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me: When the people walked in by places, and were intangled in the briars of their own corruptions; then the Priests kept the charge of the Lord: It was a great mercy, that when the people were deceived, the Priests were not; that when the Sheep went astray, the Shepherds did not: If Priests and people go astray together, who shall reduce them? But to the point; Israel went astray. They who led them did not cause them to erre (once they did as the Prophet complains) Who then did? Many go astray, when none lead them astray: Man can deceive himself fast enough, if none else do; yet the word implys also the cunning activity of an external agent, to lead poor souls out of the way. We may take in both here; Let not him that is deceived, whether by the fallacious arguings of his own heart, or by the subtlety of any other, whether Men or Devils,

Trust in vanity.] Or, Let him not believe in vanity: Trusting is an act of faith, and though a man may believe, and not trust; yet no man can trust, who doth not believe. We translate the word not as signifying only bare believing, but as it reaches that higher act of trusting: He that is most deceived, is most apt to trust that which will deceive him more; and gives not only his consent, but confidence to that which either is not at all, or is that least which it pretends to be, fit to be trusted, Vanity.

Let him not trust in vanity.] The word which we render Vanity, is not Habel used by Solomon (Eccles. 1. 2.) Vanity of vanities, which signifies only a light thing, such as is a vapour rising from the earth, a bubble swelling out of, and floating a little upon the water, or more strictly, a puff or breath of the mouth; but it signifies rashness, falseness, a lie, a deceit; vain things are false, lying, and deceiveable; therefore, one word serves for both.

Again, Vanity may be here taken two ways, either for the sin, or deceit, with which a man is mislead; and then the meaning is, Let not him that is deceived by sin, trust in sin: Or secondly, Vanity may be taken for any creature comfort, and contentment, especially those which are the revenue, or income of sinful practices. Sin leads to profit, to pleasure, to honour, to these frail and transitory things sin leads us, in hope of satisfaction by them, and then the meaning is, Let not him that is deceived, trust in that which sin promiseth, and professeth it will do for him, or advance him to: Sin in its nature is vanity, and all the fruits or issues of it are vain too. Therefore, as nothing, and nothing, added together, make nothing, so vanity and vanity put together, make but vanity: The total summ cannot exceed the Items or particulars; Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity, for vanity shall be his recompence.

Hence Observe, First, Man is very apt to be deceived; so apt to be deceived, that he is scarce ever undeceived.

Eliphaz speaks here, not only of a possibility to be deceived, but of being actually deceived; and this ariseth two ways, first from the impotence and weakness, from the blindness and ignorance that is in man; he that is blind and weak, is easily mislead; every man naturally, how strong, how wise, how knowing soever he seems to be, is yet weak, blind, and ignorant in a very great measure; and therefore very deceivable: Man is full of craft, this makes him deceitful; he is empty of true wisdom, this renders him deceiveable.

Secondly, As man may quickly be deceived, by reason of the ignorance which is in him, so also by reason of those subtle enemies, who are alwayes about him, yea and within him. We live (as I may so speak) among Cheaters, and Cozenners, and there is a great Cheater lives in us; how hard is it then not to be deceived? If a man be in a Croud among many Cut-purses, and Cheaters, he is in danger to lose his Money every moment; it is so with us: though carnal men are not at all aware of it, nor they who are most spiritual, so much aware of it as they should. It is dangerous to live among deceivers, though we know them, and are aware of them; it is most dangerous to live among deceivers, and not to know them, for then we cannot be aware of them; but it is madness to know we live among deceivers, and yet not to be aware of them.

There are three notorious Deceivers, who labour to ensnare us; we need not wonder though some who are watchful against them, are deceived by them: but it would be a wonder, and such a wonder as yet was never seen, if they should not be deceived, who never watch against them.

First, Our own hearts which have not only an impotence or weakness (as I noted before) whereby they are apt to be deceived, but there is in our hearts an activeness, yea an efficacy to deceive; we are not only passive, but active; we are seldom, if at all, deceived, till we deceive our selves:

selves: And some men are very active in deceiving others, so all men are active in a degree to deceive themselves. (Jer. 17. 9.) The heart of man is deceitful and desperately wicked: The heart is deceitful in reference to a threefold object.

First, The heart would deceive God himself, and impose upon the All-wise: That's the design of a Hypocrite, his business is to deceive God, though the issue be the deceiving of himself.

Secondly, The heart of man is deceitful in contriving wayes to deceive and supplant other men. The complaint of the Prophet goes very high upon this (*Mich.*7.2.) The good man is perished out of the Earth, and there is none upright among men; they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net. To lie in wait, is the act, and a Net is the instrument of a Deceiver: the Prophesie of Christ goes yet higher (*Matth.*24.24.) For there shall arise false Christs, and false Prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that (if it were possible) they shall deceive the very Elect. Deceit works to its utmost possibility, when it puts hard to deceive those, whom to deceive is impossible. If Elect men could be deceived, God should be deceived in his Election; But this is impossible, and therefore that is; the man who is elect is deceiveable, but because he is an elect man, he cannot be deceived: And though an elect man may be deceived in some things (for even he is subject to errour, because he is still (while in this World) the subject of sin) yet he cannot be so far deceived in any thing, as to null or frustrate his election. How restless is man to deceive man, seeing he ceaseth not his endeavour to deceive, where he cannot prevailingly deceive.

Thirdly, (Which I conceive the Text in Jeremiah specially aims at) the heart of man is very busie to deceive himself. 'Tis bad enough to deceive others, but to deceive our selves is worse, and that not only because it makes us more miserable, but more sinful: Self-deceit is the most sinful deceit. The heart of man is desperately wicked, there is no hope that it will leave off to do wickedly, seeing it is of counsel against its own peace. And surely, man is not only under a possibility to be deceived, in regard of the impotence and blindness of his heart, but also under an impossibility not to be deceived, in regard of the skill and unwearied activity of his heart to deceive himself.

Secondly, Man hath another deceiver continually about him, The World, and all that is in the World, The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life; all these are but as so many snares and juggles to cozen, and deceive poor man.

Thirdly, The Devil, who is The Deceiver; of whose devices we are not ignorant (saith the Apostle) he is full of tricks and plots; he hath his methods, his arts to deceive. Ever since the Devil deceived himself, he hath been studying how to deceive man; he doth not only go about like a roaring Lyon, but like a subtle Serpent, and a cunning Fox, seeking whom he may devour; or he is a Lyon to devour those whom he hath first deceived as a Fox, or as a Serpent: Man is a perswadable creature (Gen. 9. 27.) God shall perswade Japhet to dwell in the Tents of Shem: The Original word there used to perswade, signifies also to deceive, because perswasions are often made as Engins, or baits to deceive.

There is also a kind of holy fraud in the Gospel, and man is as it were deceived into the obedience of it, Being crafty I caught you with guile (I fetcht you over, did I not?) saith Paul (2 Cor. 12. 16.) Now as man is sometimes deceived for his good, so he is often and easily deceived for his hurt, by these three deceivers. Satan, the World, and his own Heart, perswade him by an unholy deceit to dwell in the Tents of sin.

Bis poteſt ſumi & cū יאמן credet, ne credat in vanitatem, & cum נחעה deceptus, deceptus inquā per vanitatem, ne in eam fidat.

Again, Some who by vanity understand sin, read the word Vanity twice, Let not him that is deceived by vanity, trust in vanity; that is, Let not him that is deceived by sin, trust in sin; which interpretation yields us this truth, Sin is deceitful, or thus, Sin doth nothing but deceive.

The Apostle, (*Heb.*3.13.) chargeth sin with deceit to its very face, Exhort one the other, while it is called to day, least any of your hearts be hardned through the deceitfulness of sin; there are three eminent evils in sin;

First, There is a pollution in sin, it defiles.

Secondly, There is baseness in sin, it dishonours.

Thirdly, There is a deceitfulness in sin, it would make us believe we shall be, and receive, that which it is not able to perform.

Hence the Apostle (Rom. 6. 21.) puts the question to those who were once the servants of sin, What fruit had ye then in those things whereof you are now ashamed? He asketh them, and bids them ask their own hearts, what fruit had you? as if he had said, I know when you were servants of sin, your sins promised you great matters, great rewards: the Tree of sin seems to be loaded with fruits, the boughs of it look as if ready to break with goodly fruits; fruit pleasant to the eye, sweet to the taste, and desireable to make one wise; but I beseech you tell me what fruit had you in those things whereof you are now ashamed? If you be ashamed to tell me; I will tell you, The end of those things is death; that's all the fruit which the Tree of sin bears. Sin deals with us, as Jael with Sisera (*Judg.*4.18.) She stood at the Tent door, when he came panting from the Battel, and said to him, Turn in my Lord, turn in; she took him into her Tent, and laid him down, covered him warm, and when he asked her for Milk, she gave him Butter, Butter in a Lordly dish; here were fine words, and seeming promises: yet she honestly deceived him, She put her hand to the Nail, and her hand to the workmans Hammer, and nailed his temples to the ground. Thus sin bids us turn in, promises to cover us warm, gives us Butter in a Lordly dish, but never tells us of that woful end, and wretched catastrophe which it intends unto us: Sin deals with us as Dalilah with Samson, takes us into its bosome and embraces; but then it hath a plot to cut the lock of our strength, to deliver us over to the Philistims, to call in Legions of Devils to sieze upon us, and make us grind at the Mill of their basest drudgery.

More distinctly, sin deceives by a threefold promise.

First, By a promise of profit (Prov. 1. 13.) Come cast in thy lot with us, let us lie in wait for blood, &c. We shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil: but this precious substance, proves only a pernicious shadow; and these spoils taken, spoil those who take them.

Secondly, Sin deceives by promising content, and sweet delight; what thoughts had Ahab concerning Naboths Vineyard? If he could but get it, he were a made man; what pleasure should he have in those shady walks? what Grapes and Wine from those fruitful Vines? Sin promiseth as largly as God doth, to give us not only delight but satisfaction; that we shall not have so much as an empty corner in our souls; all shall be filled: whereas in truth there is nothing but emptiness, and dissatisfaction in any creature, especially when sin leads or helps us to the enjoyment of it.

Thirdly, At least, sin promiseth and gives its word for it, that we shall be free from trouble, and feel no evil; That we shall have peace, though we walk in the imagination of our heart (*Deut.*29.19.) That as they flattered themselves in the Prophet, we shall not see Sword, nor Famine: These vanishing dreams of plenty, of good things, and immunity from evil, carry thousands of souls captive to the basest bondage of sin.

Further, This vanity, from trusting which the deceived soul is called off by Eliphaz, is conceived to be worldly riches, and the fullest possession of the creature; these are vanity: That they are, is a common theam, and yet though it be much spoken of, it is very little believed; we are apt to over-rate the things of the World, and under-rate the things of Heaven. The creature is vanity, not only in regard of the nothingness of it, but vanity in regard of that which we call the somethingness of it, or the best of it.

The Prophet Jonah makes the word which we here translate vanity, the Epethite of that which is commonly translated vanity (Jon. 2. 8.) They that observe lying vanities: Idols are vanity, and a lie, because though they can do no good at all, yet they promise much: Riches are vanity, and a lie, because they cannot do so much good as they promise. Solomon saith in his Ecclesiastes, That Money answereth all things (Chap. 8. 10.) And so it doth as the value of all earthly things is made by Money, and as Money is the price of all earthly things. But though Money answereth all things, by satisfying our engagements, yet it answereth nothing to the satisfying of its own engagements. Money and riches have paid many a mans debts, and enough of them will pay any mans debts, but they have never paid their own debts, no more then Idols have, and therefore they justly bear the brand of this reproach, Lying vanities: That they are so, appears clearly in two particulars.

Vanitates mēdacissimæ mendaces.

and

First, In the report which they make of themselves.

Secondly, In the promises which they make to us.

First, In the report which they make of their own worth; if you look upon the bill of the creature, it puts down, not only a hundred for fifty, but a million for a mite: For, how much soever it is worth, yet it bears no proportion to that which it would be esteemed worth: As some rich men are not half so rich as they desire to be reckoned; so riches themselves are not so rich by thousands of thousands as they would be reckoned.

There is indeed a created worth in the creature, for it is the work of God; but since the sin of man hath (as to us) both imbased, and imbittered the creature, it is worth nothing comparatively to that at which it is rated, both in its own, and our Books.

Secondly, The creature (in this notion) is a lying vanity, while it perswades us; that in the enjoyment thereof we shall be happy; whereas our happiness doth not consist in any creature-enjoyment; unless God himself be our portion, we are both poor and miserable in the fullest possession of the creature. God is the living stream, the creature at the best was but a Cistern, and now it is but a broken Cistern which leaks out all the waters that pass into it, unless God stop the chinks, and mend the cracks of it, by Jesus Christ.

Again, The creature promiseth to ease us of our cares, yet it doth but multiply them: The creature promiseth to satisfie our desires, yet it doth only encrease and enlarge them. Riches are not food, but fewel to our desires; they do not allay our appetite, as bread doth, when received into the stomack, but enflame our appetite, as wood doth, when it is cast into the fire.

Further, The creature promiseth to protect us; hence that of Solomon (Prov. 10.15.) The rich mans wealth is his strong City: That is, it promiseth to be so, and tells him, it will do that for him, which a strong City doth for its Inhabitants, defend him against all Commers and Invaders; yet the same Solomon assures us in the next Chapter (Vers. 4.) That riches profit not in the day of wrath. And Ezekiel threatens the Jews, That their Silver and their Gold shall not deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord.

Lastly, the Creature promiseth to continue with us. Riches tell us, that though Father and Mother forsake us, yet they will not, though Wife and Children forsake us, yet they will not; they make us believe that they will stick closer to us, then Christ himself, and yet they are upon the wing presently, they flie away as the Eagle, and are gone out of sight, they do not only perish in the using, but perish from our use.

Is not all this and a thousand times more, which might be said of their lying, and vanity, enough, and more then enough to justifie those titles which the Spirit of God hath bestowed upon them, that they are vanity and a lie, or as Jonah calls them, Lying vanities.

And yet (to close the point) we must remember that creature-riches are not a lie, nor deceitful in themselves. There's no more deceit in the greatest abundance of Gold and Silver, then there is in a wholsome savory piece of bread. Riches are not vain and deceitful, as our hearts are said to be deceitful (Jer. 17.9.) nor as lust is said to be deceitful (Ephes. 4.22.) For these things are deceitful only through the deceitfulness of our hearts, and lusts: Or they are deceitful Objectively, not Actively; we are deceived about them, not by them. They do not deceive us till we are decived; nor do they deceive us either as possessed or used, but as adored and trusted. Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity.

Thirdly Observe, Man must and will have somewhat to trust to, or lean upon.

And therefore rather then fail, he will trust that which cannot but fail, Vanity. Like one that's ready to drown, he catcheth at any thing, a rotten stick, or a straw, and would support his whole body, by that which is not able to bear the weight of his little finger. Man is a weak creature, sense and nature are enough to make him sensible of his natural weakness; and these also are enough to prompt and provoke him to seek help without himself, though they are utterly insufficient to direct him whither to go for the surest help; It is the priviledge of God alone to have nothing to trust to, or to be above trust: He who is all strength needs not trust. As he doth not put trust in his (Vers. 15.) Because he knows they are frail and mutable: so he hath no need to trust them, because he knows himself not only strong, but immutable. God is all that he is from himself, and therefore he ever continues to be what he is, by himself. But man who is not a spring to himself of Being, cannot be a support to himself for the continuance of his Being; much less for the continuace of his well-being. And as man's necessity calls him to trust, so his duty calls him to trust God: Man fell at first by his desire to stand alone, he would be independent; and men fall every day, because they desire to stand by that which cannot stand alone. It is a special part of that worship which we owe to God, to trust him; and whatsoever we trust besides God, we make a God of it. He that trusts not in the God that made him, makes many Gods (such as they are) by trusting them. While Job puts that negative supposition (as to his own case, Chap. 31.24.) If I have made Gold my hope, or have said to the fine Gold, thou art my confidence: He more then implyeth that many had. Man ought to trust God, but few will; many will trust in Creatures, but none ought: Man will be trusting in somewhat, and he is so forward to trust in vanity (which indeed is nothing) that it is the hardest thing in the World to take him off. We cannot press either our selves or others too much, to trust God, and we cannot repress them enough from trusting vanity: Man is very ready to exercise and put forth an act of trust, and he is as ready to mistake the object of trust.

Lastly Observe, Man is apt to trust that which hath deceived him; or man being once deceived, trusts that which will deceive him again.

Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity: We say, Such a man hath deceived me once, but he shall not deceive me the second time: But carnal hearts being deceived once by sin and vanity, are willing to be deceived a thousand times; being once deceived, they care not how often they are deceived: That of the Prophet is an eminent Testimony to this too much experimented truth (Isaiah 44.20.) He feedeth on ashes; that is, he is as much deluded as a man is, who eats ashes, thinking it to be bread or other good chear; or his Idol which promised him great matters and much joy, hath given nothing but ashes, sorrow, and misery; of which, ashes, and especially feeding upon ashes, was an emblem: Now though it were thus with him, yet (saith the Prophet) A deceived heart hath turned him aside that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, is there not a lie in my right hand? that is, Though he sees himself deceived, yet he hath no power to withdraw from the deceiver, nor to question the deceit; he is so bewitched with the sorcery of sin, that he cannot deliver his soul from the snares of it; but being deceived, he is willingly deceived, and looks upon his deceiver as his trusty Friend.

God never deceived, no nor failed any man that trusted in him (Psal. 9.10.) Yet the hearts of the most will not be perswaded to trust God; sin and the creature deceive all that trust in them, yet we can hardly call or beat the heart off from trusting them. Sin seldom looses its credit; sin hath broken and undone thousands, yea all who have trusted it; yet still it hath credit among thousands, and can be trusted with more then this World is worth, the precious soul of man, for the asking. But let not him that is deceived, trust (any longer) in vanity, if he do, he shall never be a gainer, no nor a saver by it;

For vanity shall be his recompence.

Vanity fills both parts of the Verse, and meets us at every turn, yet with a difference: In the former part by vanity was signified either sin, or the creature; in this latter part, vanity notes misery, or the effect and fruit of sin.

Hence

Hence Observe, The vanity of misery overtakes all those who are deceived by the vanity of sin.

Vanity is their recompence.] There are two sorts of recompence.

First, Of wrath.

Secondly, Of favour.

Evil deeds have their recompence, as well as good. To me (saith the Lord, *Deut.*32.35.) belongeth vengeance and recompence; that is, the recompence of vengeance; as the Apostle expounds it (*Heb.*10.30.) For we know him that said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompence saith the Lord: God will not live long in any mans debt; As holy Gospel-confidence hath a great recompence of reward (*Heb.*10. 35.) So every disobedience of the Law received a just recompence of reward (*Heb.*2.2.) And God is so exact in giving the recompences of punishment, that he will not spare his own, when they are so foolish as to trust in vanity (*Prov.*11.31.) Behold the righteous shall be recompenced in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner: that is, A righteous man shall be corrected, though he sin of infirmity; how then shall the wicked be punished who sin with presumption and delight. As a wicked man hath all his recompences of good on the earth (*Mat.*6.2.) They have their reward; so a righteous man hath all his recompences of evil of affliction in the earth; he hath none beyond. But, we may strongly argue, that the wicked, who trust in vanity shall be recompenced with sorrow for ever; seeing the righteous, if they do but a little turn aside to vanity, shall be recompenced with sorrow here: That's the Apostle Peter's way of reasoning (1 *Epist.*4.18.) If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? Surely, as the Prophet concludes (*Isa.*59.18.) According to their deeds accordingly he will repay fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies, to the Islands he will repay recompence.

Secondly, as vanity in the former clause is taken for the Creature, Observe, The Creature is most vain to those who trust it.

The Creature is a vain thing in his hand, who believes and trusts in God, but it is exceeding vain in his hand, who trusts on it; and the more it is trusted, the more vain it is. If we make it our staff, it will be our scourge: if we lean upon it as our rock, it will run into our hands like a broken Reed: The best way to keep up our comfort in the Creature, is to keep our distance from the Creature. And they shall find most content in the World, who live furthest off it, and expect least from it. God is good, and the more we trust him, the better he is to us, yea he is not good at all to us, unless we trust him: But the best of creatures trusted to become evil, yea an Idol to us. Trust not in vanity (such are all creature; in their best estate) for vanity shall be your recompence.

Again, The word which we translate, recompence, signifies a change, or the exchange which is made of one thing for another: While Job exalts the value and excellency of wisdom above all created excellencies, he saith (Chap. 28. 17.) The Gold and the Chrystal cannot equal it, and the exchange of it shall not be for jewels of fine Gold.

So some render it here, Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity, for vanity shall be his change: Whensoever he changeth, he shall change into vanity, or when he hath driven a trade in sinful vanity, to the highest; the best exchange which the Merchandize thereof yields him, is miserable vanity: Vanity can produce nothing to us but vanity: The effect is not better then the cause, nor the fruit then the Tree; and that which we receive in exchange, though it may be of another kind, yet it is of no better value then that we give in exchange. Hence Observe,

That a wicked mans state never changeth for better, but from good to bad, or from bad to worse.

Till the man himself be changed from bad to good, his state can never change from bad to good: And suppose his outward state be good, then the worst thing that can befal him, is this, that his state should not change. His settledness in that which is civilly good, doth but more settle him in that which is morally evil. They have no changes, therefore they fear not God (*Psal.*55.19.) What can be worse for man then this, not to fear God, who is the chiefest good? Who would not fear to be without changes, when he hears that being without them, keeps out this fear?

Suppose further. That the wicked mans outward estate be evil, then it is worse to him, when he changes to outward good: if he change from sorrow to joy, from poverty to riches, from sickness to health, from a prison to liberty, in all these, or in any other of like nature with these, he changes to his loss: That man can never change for good, who continues evil. Such a mans outward estate often changes from bad to worse; if it change from bad to good, that is bad for him; and if being good, it change not at all, that is worst of all.

It is a part of the misery of man, that his state is changable, but that is incident to the best of men: We shall be unchangable in our state, till we come into the presence of God, who is unchangable in his nature. We may say also (considering the many troubles which we are subject to in this life) that it is a part of our happiness, that our state is changable. Those changes which are from evil to good, or from good to better, are to be numbred among our blessings; such are the changes of the Saints, all their changes are for the better: yea those changes of the Saints which are from joy to sorrow, from riches to poverty, from health to sickness, from liberty to a prison, from life to death, in a word, their changes from any kind of outward temporary good, to outward temporary evil, are yet for their good. He cannot change but for his good, who is good, and who abides always under this promise, that all shall work together for his good.

An evil and a good man differ in nothing more then in their changes; nor should any self-consideration provoke an evil man more to desire that he may be changed to good, then this, that his changes may be for good. Who would continue or trust in vanity, were he perswaded that vanity shall be his change?

Secondly, Observe, That such as our way is, such will our end be.

If we walk and trust in vanity, we shall have vanity for our recompence, or our change. Every mans end is virtually in his way: So the Apostle argues elegantly (*Gal.*6.7.) Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man sowes that shall he reap, he that sowes to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; he that sowes to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting: If the Husband-man sow tares he must look to reap tares: A seed-time of tares, and a Harvest of Wheat, were never heard of in the same ground: As the seed is, such is the crop (*Isa.*3.11.) Wo to the wicked, it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hand shall be given him. There is nothing worse for some, then to have their reward brought in, and all that is owing to them paid: The very receiving of their debts and rewards, is their undoing for ever.

All the misery of a wicked man is summed up in this, He shall have the reward of his hands. Wrath, and death, and Hell, are his rewards, and all the wages which the work both of his hands and heart can earn, and these he shall have fully paid to him: Vain he hath been, and vanity shall be his recompence.

Some read this Verse, not as a dehortation, Let not him that is deceived trust, or believe in vanity; but as a negative proposition (for that particle in the Hebrew, which sometimes carrieth a prohibition, notes also a bare negation; so here) He that is deceived with vanity will not believe (the same word signifies both to believe and trust) that vanity shall be his recompence: He will not believe a change, much less such a change; This is a clear sense, and it hints us this Observation.

That a wicked man is full of infidelity or unbelief, that his estate is evil, or shall ever be worse then it is.

The unbelief of man is as strong against the threatnings, as against the promises: The Saints are hardly brought to believe, that glory shall be their recompence, that the purchase which Christ hath made of Heaven, and eternal happiness belongs to them. A wicked man will not believe that tribulation and anguish shall be upon him, or that the wrath of God is revealed from Vanitate nomē variè hic sumitur, quā ob rem forsan & varie scribitur, oriri loco sig. vanas res quibus fidebat, scopes: gloriā, posteriori loco vanitatem in quā hæc omnia redigēda sint dum ex his decidens miser fiet. Merc.

Heaven against his unrighteousness, he will not believe that he shall go to Hell and be damned, or that everlasting fire shall burn him, or the worm that dies not, feed upon him; he that is deceived will not believe these things, and the Devil hath as great an advantage upon men, by making them strong in unbelief: As God hath, by making his people strong in Faith.

The first assault that ever the Devil made against man, was to weaken Faith, or strengthen unbelief about the threatnings: While he laboured to deceive the Woman, he laboured as much to perswade her, That vanity should not be her recompence: God had said peremptorily, In the day that ye eat thereof, ye shall surely die: The Devil denied as peremptorily, Ye shall not surely die (*Gen.*3.4.) The people were commanded to say Amen to every branch of the Curse (*Deut.*27.16,17,&c.) Though it be the lowest way of obedience to obey, because we believe the truth, and certainty of the Curse; yet it is a high act of obedience to believe it: And Satan is as busie against our faith, in the threatnings, as he is against our faith in promises. This unbelief opens the way to the committing of sin, and sweetens sin while we are committing it: Were it not for this unbelief sin could not be bread, much less (as it is to many) pleasant bread. Sin would be Gall and Wormwood in the acting of it, did we believe, that it will be bitterness in the end. Who would do the work of sin, did he believe that vanity should be his recompence? Because this threat is not believed, therefore the Law which forbids sin, is not obeyed. As Faith is a shield to the new Man, so unbelief is a shield to the old Man; as Faith quenches the fiery darts of the Devil, or his allurements to sin; so unbelief quenches all the fiery darts of God, or his threatnings of punishment. Tush say they, We shall never see Sword nor Famine, we need not fear (which is so much talked of) death or Hell: Vanity shall not be our recompence.

Rab. Kimchi exponit Sheve, pro æquali seu æqualitate. q. d. Ne credat qui deceptus est æqualem semper & sui similē sore sibi statum, vel eodē semper modo res sibi cessuras. Merc.

There is a third reading of the Text: The former word which we render Vanity, is translated by some of the Rabbins, Equality, or a thing that is equal, the latter, as we, a lie, or Vanity. This varies the whole strain of the Verse, and yet the Exposition given upon it is clear, both to the general scope, and to the sense given immediately before. Let not him that is deceived, believe that he shall be always equal, or of the same estate, for vanity shall be his recompence. He thinks to carry it smoothly, and with an even thred, but he is deceived. Things will not alwayes stand at the same point and poyze with him, and therefore let him not feed himself with groundless ayery hopes, that they will: His affairs will not always have the same face, nor bear the same aspect toward him; now they smile and look pleasantly, but anon they will frown and look sowre.

Lastly, Keeping near the same sense still; the words are thus translated: He that is deceived, will not believe the right word, or the word of truth, but he will believe a lie in stead of it: As if Eliphaz had thus school'd and caution'd Job, I have told you this as from God; but I know he that is (as you are) misled, and deceived, will not believe the word of God, who cannot lie; he will believe a lie rather. As the carnal heart changes the glory of God into a lie, so the truth of God into a lie, or embraceth a lie for truth; he that believed not the right word, will soon believe that which is wrong. As they who receive not the love of the truth, are (by the just judgment of God) given up to strong delusions, to believe a lie: So also are they, who receive not the truth. As the not doing of good, is not only it self an evil, but leads us also, or lays us open to the doing of many evils, yea of any evil: So the not receiving of truth is not only an errour, but it leads us also, or lays us open to the receiving of many, yea of any errour.

Eliphaz having thus pressed his dehortation upon Job, not to trust in vanity, lest he find vanity the reward and recompence of that unholy faith and trust; proceeds yet further to press his dehortation by the same argument for the matter, though varied in the manner of expression, in the beginning of the next Verse.

Vers. 32. It shall be accomplished before his time, &c.

These words are a strong enforcement of the motive laid down in the former Verse, Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity: Why, what if he do? Vanity shall be his recompence: That's the first part of the motive. The second is,

It shall be accomplished before his time.] What shall be accomplished? There is no express Antecedent in the Hebrew; we may understand, either first, the life of the wicked man himself, of whom Eliphaz had before discoursed. Or secondly, the estate of the wicked man. Or thirdly, the designs and plots of the wicked man. Taking in all three, the meaning is, That himself and all that he hath gotten, and all that he hath projected, Shall be accomplished before his time; and what's this but vanity for his recompence?

In non die suo cōplebitur. Mont. cōpleri ante diē, &c. est potius perire quā ullū cōplementū & perfectionē accipere. Pined.

To be accomplished before the time, is not to be accomplished at all, it notes rather perdition then perfection. The word which we translate to accomplish, signifies also to cut off; as we put in the Margin of our Bibles, It shall be accomplished, or cut off before his time: The Vulgar translation fills up the sense thus, Before his dayes can be filled, he shall perish.

Antequā dies ejus impleantur, peribit ut sit חמלא מלל succido. Morte immatura prævenietur vel gladio, vel morbo, vel aliqua alia vio'enta causa in die non suo implebitur sepulchrum ejus. Targ.

As the Relative looks to the wicked man himself, Observe,

An untimely death is the portion of a wicked man.

He shall be accomplished in a day that is not his, or before his proper day. In opposition to which, Eliphaz had promised, *Chap.*5. That a godly man shall come like a sheaf of Corn into the Barn, fully ripe: Now saith he, This wicked man shall be like untimely fruit, accomplished, cut off, and perishing before his time. We have such an Expression (*Eccl.*7.17.) Be not righteous over-much, neither make thy self over-wise; why shouldest thou destroy thy self? Be not over-much wicked (not that there is any mediocrity in wickedness, or that a man can be wicked in due proportion, but saith he, take heed of high actings in wickedness) why shouldest thou die before thy time? Some wickednesses lie close, men live and continue in them long unseen; others are so open and abominable, that their actors are obnoxious to the hand of Justice: He that is wicked over-much, that is, extreamly wicked, shall be cut off some way or other before his time.

Quarrellers die by the Sword, Drunkards die by surfet, Adulterers decay into filthy diseases, Sorcerers are killed by the Devil, Malefactors of all sorts are cut off by the sentence of the Magistrate. Most desire to live long, and yet they take a course to make their lives short; they forget that short way to long life (Psal. 34. 12.)

Implere dies ad lōgā ævicē, senectā pertinet, vel denotat illā ætatis maturitatē, quæ nō annorū numero; sed pietatis perfectione definitur.

That promise (*Isa.*65.20.) stands opposite to this threatning, There shall be no more there an infant of dayes, nor an old man that hath not filled his dayes: A good man fills his dayes, a wicked man shall be accomplished, or there shall be an end of him before his day; both, before that day which he would live to, according to the course of his desire, and before that day which he might live unto, according to the course of nature.

Besides, a wicked man never fills his dayes, though he be full of dayes; he that is not prepared for death (how old soever he is) dies before he is ripe: he is ripe for destruction, but he is neither ripe nor fit for death: The youngest Saint that dies, dies ripe, though he die before he come to that estate, wherein nature useth to crop men off; yet, he (as the Apostle speaks, *Ephes.*4.13.) is come to the fulness of the stature of Christ.

Pii licet ætate juvenes, senes sunt moribus.

Secondly, Referring these words unto the estate of a wicked man, it shall be accomplished, or cut off before the time; that is, his pomp, and greatness, all that he hath gotten together (of which he spake in the precedent part of the Chapter) shall be scattered suddenly.

Hence Note, Wicked men often outlive all their worldly enjoyments.

Some live to be their own Executors; they dispose, or rather dissipate all; they leave nothing when they die, for others. The pride of wicked men shall have a fall, their present possessions and future hopes shall come to nought (*Prov.*3.16.) Solomon tells us, that Wisdom hath length of dayes in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor: We may say of sin, Shortness of dayes is in its right hand, and in its left hand, poverty and disgrace. The former point saith, that a wicked mans dayes are short, he shall be cut off before his time, death cuts him off. The latter saith, his pomp, his riches and honour, all these shall be cut off before the time. We have seen some who have raised great estates by sin, and they have seen an end of all in misery.

Thirdly

Thirdly, Taking the Antecedent to be the designs and contrivements of the wicked man,

Hence note, The counsels, designs, and contrivements of wicked men, do often prove abortive.

They are accomplished before their time. Their plots break out before they are ripe, and then all's spoyled. So it was with the Powder-plot, it was accomplished before the time; it was discovered before it could be acted; we have often seen grand designs laid in the dust, crusht in the shell, and nipt in the very bud. As the Prophet reproves some for staying too long, in the place of breaking forth of children (Hos. 13. 13.) That is, they have let their purposes dye under tedious consultations, or irresolutions for acting: So we may deride others for staying too little in the place of breaking forth of Children. God in judgment hastens them to action before their designs are fully matured by consultation, It is accomplished before his time.

And his branch shall not be green.

In the close of this Verse, and in the next, Eliphaz in several metaphors, prosecutes the declining condition of wicked men; His branch shall not be green.

His branch] Or his hand shall not be green; so the word signifies properly: And, that some understand in a figure, his hand shall not be green; that is, himself shall be unapt, and unfit for work. When an arm is dryed up, or a hand palsied, it is unserviceable: The hand of a godly man is green, he is laborious, and fit for labour; the hand of the wicked man, as it is alwayes sinfully dried up, in reference to the doing of any good, so it is often judicially dried up, lest it should do hurt; his hand shall not be green, that is, he shall not have power ro do that evil which he would: When Jeroboam put forth his hand from the Altar, &c. his arm dryed up, so that he could not pull it in again to him (1 Kings 13. 4.) His hand, his arm was not green, he could not use it to hurt the Prophet. (Zech. 11. 17.) The wicked Idol Shepherd is threatned, His arm shall clean be dryed up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkned: that is, He shall neither have counsel nor strength, he shall neither be able to advise nor act; his eye shall be darkned, so that he shall not be able to see his way; his arm shall be dryed up, he shall not be able to attain his end (Psal. 75. 5.) None of the men of might have found their hands; as we say of a man that goes lamely or lazily, He cannot find his feet; so of a man that acts lamely and lazily, or of a souldier that fights faintly and cowardly, He cannot find his hands; or, in the language of the Text, His arm or hand is not green.

We translate metaphorically, so the word signifies not a hand, but a branch; because a branch or bough of a tree puts forth from the body of it, as the hand or arm is stretcht from the body of a man; by this branch we may understand either of those two things noted before.

First, The estate of the wicked man; for that is as a branch shooting and growing out from him;

Or secondly, The designs and counsels of the wicked man; they also are branches sprouting from the corrupt stock of his heart: and so this clause is of the same sense with the former; It shall be accomplished before his time, his branch shall not be green: that is, he shall not prosper in any thing he possesseth, or undertaketh.

But, thirdly, There is a distinct sense, and so the branch is the Posterity, the Children of this wicked man. As he, and his plots shall fail, so his Children likewise. Children are compared to branches (Psal. 128.) His Children shall stand like Olive-plants (or branches) round about his Table.

Priusquam impius senescat, interbit; & liberi ejus subtatis flore orientur. Paraphr.

His branch shall not be green] Greenness notes flourishing (Cant. 1. 17.) where the Spouse and Christ speak one to another of their several excellencies, she saith, Vers. 16. Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, yea pleasant, also our bed is green. By bed some understand holy Ordinances, wherein the Lord communicates himself to his people. Our bed is green; that is, Ordinances are pure, flourishing, and fruit-bearing. In the same sense the word is used (Luke 23. 31.) If they do these things in a green Tree, what shall be done in the dry? that is, If they do these things in a vigorous, strong, and flourishing tree, meaning Christ himself, who was like a tree full of sap and life; what shall be done in those that are dry? The best of men compared to Christ, are but dry trees, how fear and rotten then are the worst? And if Christ suffered these things for sinners, himself being without sin, what shall those sinners suffer, who are without Christ? They, like dry trees, will soon be consumed by the fire of Gods wrath. So that, when he saith, They shall not be green, it is as much as to say, They shall have no strength, vigour, life, nor beauty. Taking the branch in this sense for Children, Observe,

A wicked Father brings a curse, and withering upon his whole Family.

His branch shall not be green. Though they walk not in the ways of their Fathers, nor inherit their sins, yet they may receive temporal fadings, and outward decays upon their Fathers account. It is a misery to be the branch of a wicked stock (for though an evil stock may have good branches, they who are evil, not onely (as all are) descending from a common evil stock, but also from a particular evil stock (as most are) even some of these are made good by transplantation into Jesus Christ, yet (I say) it is a misery to be a branch of an evil stock) many Children have fared the worse for the wickedness of their Parents, even good Children may fare somewhat the worse for their Parents wickedness. Though God will not lay eternal judgment upon them for the wickedness of their immediate or remoter Parents, yet they may feel delinings, and lose much of their greenness and beauty. It is a disadvantage to be in any relation to a wicked man, Servant, Wife, Children, his whole Family may groan and smart for his sake, His branch shall not be green. That's not all yet;

Vers. 33: And he shall shake off his unripe Grape as the Vine, and shall cast off his flower as the Olive.

That is, His unripe Grapes and Flowers shall be shaken and cast off. By whom? Some say by God. He (that is, God) will snap off his sour Grape as the Vines, saith Master Broughton; and indeed whatsoever is the wind that shakes them, it is God who blows and sends the wind.

These words are a gradation to what went before, here are two similitudes to set forth one thing, the certain and sudden destruction of all the hopes of a wicked man, His branch shall not be green; his Children and Posterity, especially they that follow his steps shall wither; and, which is yet a greater judgment, He shall shake off his unripe Grapes as the Vine, &c. Though his branch be green a while, though he hath leaves and buds, yet before 'tis perfect fruit, and gives a pleasant taste, it shall be destroyed: This he shadows under these metaphors, of the Vine, and the Olive, shaking off his unripe Grapes, and casting off his Flowers.

The Naturalist observes, that these trees flourish near about the same time, and that the Vine and the Olive joyn, and are (as it were) spoused together; and if storms, or blasts of wind smite the Olive and the Vine, while they put forth their flowers, the hope of the Husbandman is utterly disappointed. We may sum up the meaning of these two similitudes into this brief conclusion.

Eodem fere tempore vites & oleæ florescunt, Plin. l. 17. c. 25. Aliquando vites maritantur oleis. id. ib. c. 4. Pessimus est inter omnia, quum deflorentem vitem & oleam imber percussit; quoniam simul defluit fructus. Plin. l. 17. c. 25.

That God will utterly destroy the very appearing hopes of wicked men. Their boughs and branches may be green, some flowers, some unripe Grapes may appear; here is hope; but, He shall shake off; that is, God shall shake off by some terrible storm which he will raise, by some sudden judgment which he will send) their unripe Grapes, and their fairest Flowers.

Hence observe, Violent judgments storm wicked men out of all their comforts.

Thus the Egyptians are threatned (Isa. 18. 5, 6.) Before the Harvest, when the bud is perfect, and the sour Grape is ripening in the Flower, he shall both cut off the sprigs with pruning-hooks, and take away, and cut down the branches: They shall be left together, unto the Fowls of the Mountains, and to the Beasts of the Earth, and the Fowls shall Summer upon them, &c. The Bud is perfect, while the fruit is imperfect, while God takes away their Buds, he destroyes their hopes. And as God hath his winds at hand, to shake the fruit from off the branches; so he hath his Pruning-hooks to cut off the branches also.

De immatura morte filiorum duas similitudines affert.

Some interpret these unripe Grapes of the Vine, and Flowers of the Olive, as the branch before, for Children, as if Eliphaz would here re-mind Job, how his Posterity, the Grapes of his Vine, were shaken off, before they were ripe, and the Flowers of his Olive blasted in the Bud; or, as if he would upbraid him with the four manners, and ill-tasted conversation of his Children, under this Allusion of unripe Grapes, which, instead of pleasing the palate by a savoury relish, do only by their sharpness set the teeth on edge.

Odiose Eliphaz ut acerbos filiorum Jobi mores notaret, ipsos omphaci contulit.

Hence Note, It is an affliction upon the best, and a judgment upon many, to have their Children, their Grapes and Flowers rent from them, and taken away unripe: And then especially it is so, when God leaves no Grapes on the Vine, no Flowers on the Olive.

To lose a hopeful Child is an affliction, what is it then to lose them all?

Eliphaz having dehorted the wicked man from trusting in vanity, upon these considerations; gives in the strength of his whole discourse in the two last Verses of the Chapter.

Vers. 34. The Congregation of Hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Epilogus est totius loci. Merc. Apodosis superioris allegoriæ Jobum perstringens cui ista obvenerant. Jun.

Vers. 35. They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

As if he had said, Here is the sum of all, of all the sins, and of all the punishments of a wicked man. Here are two sorts of wicked men described, and these two (as was toucht before) by a Synechdoche, include all.

The first are such as worship God falsly, or with false hearts: they draw near to God with their lips, but their hearts are far from him, these are Hypocrites, The congregation of Hypocrites shall be destroyed.

As these are false with God in his worship, so others are false with men in their commerce and dealings. These are comprised in the second branch, Fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery: Bribery is put for all sins against our Neighbours, and hypocrisie for all sins against God. So that here we have sinners against the first Table, and sinners against the second; sinners against God, and sinners against men; in the compass of this division all sins and sinners are contained.

The Congregation of Hypocrites.] That is, Hypocrites, how many soever there be of them, though they be a full Congregation: Hypocrites, how strongly soever they are conjoyned and cemented, yet they shall be desolate.

יעד Significat non solum congregari; sed in fœdus & pactum aut amicitiam convenire. Illa quæ congregantur ab hypocrita. Aquin.

The Hebrew word signifies, not only to Congregate, and gather together several persons into one place, but to associate them into a Covenant, League, or Confederacy one with another: as if he had said, Though hypocrites combine, and covenant together, yet this covenanting Congregation, or these unholy Leaguers, shall be made desolate.

A second interpretation gives it thus, The Congregation of hypocrites; that is, all that Hypocrites do congregate; whatsoever they gather together, whether things or persons, their Riches, their Honours, their Relations, all shall be desolate.

Shall be desolate:] Or barren; the word signifies both; that which is desolate brings forth no fruit, and that which brings forth no fruit will quickly be desolate.

What an Hypocrite is, hath been shewed before, Chapter 8. therefore I will not stay upon it, but refer you thither, where Bildad told Job, The hope of the Hypocrite shall perish: Only note two things from the whole, The congregation of Hypocrites shall be desolate.

First, An Hypocrite is under a curse. Of all men in the World, Hypocrites are deepest under a curse: They are most cursed, who are most wicked; Hypocrites are therefore more wicked than others, because they would seem not onely somewhat, but much more holy than others. It is bad enough to be bad; but it is worse to appear good when we are bad. They who delight in the shews of moral goodness, when they hate, or care not for the reality of it, shall surely meet with, not shews, but realities of penal evil. Their painted feigned fire of zeal shall be punished with the true fire of Divine wrath.

Secondly, Observe, Hypocrites, how many soever they are, how strongly soever they are confederate, how much soever they have gotten together, shall be made desolate.

It is not possible to make any power to withstand the power of God. Though like those uncircumcised Nations, Gebal, and Amnon, and Amalek, the Philistims, and those of Tyre, they all consult, and lay their heads together, to make a Congregation, yet God will break them all. How long soever their train be, how many soever their attendants be, and how strong soever their correspondency be, yet the Congregation of Hypocrites shall be desolate.

And fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Fire may be taken two wayes.

Either literally, and strictly, for the element of fire, or for ordinary fire.

Or it may be taken figuratively, and metaphorically, and so it signifies:

Either first, The wrath of God.

Or, secondly, Any effect of the wrath of God, any revenge, or judgment which God pours forth on wicked men. And so, what judgement soever God sends, we may call it a Fire, even that deluge of Water (as hath been noted) which drowned the old World, was (in this sense) a fire.

Divine judgments are represented by fire, upon these three grounds.

First, Because, as fire, they break forth suddenly, and unexpectedly; they are not like the fire that is for use, which we are long preparing and blowing before it will burn; but the Judgments of God are like an accidental fire, which breaks out, when no man looks for it, in a moment.

Os & lingua tribui solet igni nam dicitur lambere & depascere.

Secondly, They are fire, because of their destroying nature, so the Text speaks, it eats up, or devours. Fire is a great eater, fire hath a strong stomach; what will not fire digest? Fire will digest the whole sublunary World at last. The Element shall melt with fervent heat: Fire will digest Stones, Adamant, and Iron. Such is the wrath of God, nothing can stand before it, it will subdue the hardest materials, and toughest pieces. The hot stomach of the Ostrich (as some affirm) concocts Iron; what will not the heat of Gods anger concoct, and consume to ashes?

Thirdly, There is a mercilesness in the judgments of God, as in fire: We say, Fire and Water have no mercy; there is no intreating them, they are not onely hard, but impossible to be intreated. Such (in reference to wicked men) is the wrath of God; as good speak to fire not to burn, or to water not to drown, as to the wrath of God not to consume wicked men; it must and will do it (Jer. 15. 1.) Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, &c. to intreat, yet the sentence shall not be taken off, wrath must burn. Though prayer hath in many cases quenched wrath, yet sometimes the wrath of God cannot be quenched by prayer, nor intreated down, there is no speaking to it; and sometimes that it might burn quietly, the Lord hath said, Pray not for this people. Fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Tabernacles of bribery, may be taken two wayes: Either for the Tabernacles of those who have taken bribes: Or the Tabernacles of those who have given bribes; for there goes (as we say) but a pair of Shears between him that gives, and him that takes bribes; both are of a piece, and both are alike mischievous and wicked. Some take bribes to pervert Justice, and others give bribes to pervert Justice: Fire is prepared for both their Tabernacles; that is, for their whole estates, or for all that belongs unto them. Yet Eliphaz may seem rather to aim at bribe-takers, or unjust Judges (among whom, he secretly numbers Job) who suffer themselves to be corrupted with gifts, and to have their eyes put out by rewards: The Septuagint is expres in that sense, Fire shall consume (say they) the Tabernacles of Bribe-takers. And indeed, if there were no bribe-takers, there would be no bribe-givers: as we say, There would be no Thieves, if there were no Receivers. The Receiver makes the Thief; and corrupt Judges, who take bribes, make so many bribe-givers.

δωροδοκίων munera accipientium. 70.

Further, The word which we translate Bribery, signifies properly a gift; and the Text may be rendred thus, Fire shall con- consume the Tabernacle of Gifts. There are many gifts which are far from bribes. There are five sorts of gifts.

First, Gifts of Charity to the poor.

Secondly, Gifts of friendship between equals.

Thirdly, Gifts of duty from inferiours to those above them, to testifie either thankfulness or obedience.

Fourthly, Gifts of bounty and grace, from Superiors to those who are below them, to testifie their favour to them, and that they are well-pleased in them, or in their services; There is no hurt either in giving or receiving these gifts. These are onely testimonies of respect from man to man, and tend onely to maintain humane society.

But there is a fifth sort of Gifts, which we may call gifts of injury, or in the language of the Text, Gifts of Bribery: These are given, either to pervert, or delay Justice, and to overthrow a man and his cause.

Quid est שוחד quod facit, הר unum, dantem scilicet & accipientem; quam primum accipit munus ab ipso, tunc accedit anima ejus ad ipsum, & fit sicut ille ipse. Rab. Becei, &c. Buxtorf. Lex.

The Hebrew expresseth a gift in general, and a bribe, by the same word; because, as all bribes are gifts, so very many gifts are bribes. Gifts of charity, of friendship, of duty, of favour, are but few in comparison of bribing gifts. And 'tis exceeding hard for any man that is interessed in affairs of Judgement between man and man, to receive a gift from either of them, and not be brib'd by it, to transgress the rules of equity and righteousness. A gift transforms the Judge into a party, or makes (as the Hebrew Criticks tell us upon that word) the Judge and party to be but one person.

Lastly, The Tabernacles of bribery, may be taken, not only in general for the estates of those who have given or taken Bribes; but particularly for the very Houses which have been built by giving or taking bribes. Some have built houses, with what they have gotten by giving Bribes, and many by taking Bribes, have got enough to build houses: While such look on their houses and dwellings, they may say, if they will say the truth, Injustice hath built us these houses; these are the tabernacles of bribery.

Hæc sunt peccata Germanorum.

A Traveller coming to Rome, and viewing many famous structures, and goodly houses there, asked who built them? It was answered, These are the sins of Germany; the meaning was, that the Money brought for Pardons out of Germany, built those Houses. So we may say of many fair places, and goodly dwellings, These are Bribes and Oppressions, such a man built these by iniquity. Bribes may build houses, but bribe-takers cannot protect them: The Tabernacles of bribery shall be consumed.

Hence Observe, First, Bribery is an odious sin.

That sin which is put to express all sins against our neighbours, must needs be a very odious, as well as a very comprehensive sin. God loves judgment, bribery opposeth what God loves. God commands charity, as well as judgment; and delights to see men bountiful as well as righteous: Yet charity without judgement, and bounty without righteousness, are an abomination to God. God is a God of judgment, they that are against judgment, act not only against the rule which God makes, but against the example which God gives. It is as much the honour of God, that he is a God of judgment, giving all their due; as that he is a God of mercy, giving to all his what they have not at all deserved.

Secondly, Observe, That which is sinfully gotten, shall be miserably lost. Fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery.

There is nothing gained, though much be gotten by injustice. Many give bribes to undo others, and all who receive bribes, undo themselves. What is the advantage of any sinful gain, when the fire of Gods wrath consumes the gainer? What shall a man give in exchange for his soul? And as the loss is infinite, that comes by sin, in reference to the next life; so at best, the gain is little, in reference to this present life: Either the actor of injustice, or his heir, shall find a fire in the foundation, a fire in the Stones and Timber of his House, and down 'twill come; Bribery never bought any lasting materials to build with: Woe be to him (saith the Prophet, Hab. 2. 9, 10, 11, 12.) that coveteth an evil covetousness; or (according to the Hebrew) that gaineth an evil gain to his house, that he may set his nest on high, that he may be delivered from the power of evil: Thou hast consulted shame to thy house, &c. For the Stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the Timber shall answer it. What shall the stones cry? Or, what shall the beam answer? The stones shall cry, that the mortar in which they were laid, was tempered with the bloud of innocents; and the beam shall answer, that it was set up by pulling down the poor.

Those are crying sins indeed, which cause stones that cannot speak) to cry: And what answer can be given for those iniquities which provoke Timber beams to answer? Such is the iniquity of oppression and injustice, which are the fruits of bribery. See a parallel place (Jer. 22. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17.) the sum of which may be drawn up into this conclusion, given by Eliphaz, Fire shall consume the Tabernacles of Bribery.

Eliphaz having thus described the perishing estate of wicked men, as an argument to deterr and stave them off from wickedness, concludes his whole discourse with an Allegorical recapitulation both of their sin and misery, in the last words of this Chapter.

Vers. 35. They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

The Scripture is frequent in this metaphor; we have it (Psal. 7. 14.) almost word for word, Behold he travelleth with iniquity, and hath conceived mischief, and hath brought forth falshood. (Isa. 59. 4.) They conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity. The Apostle James (Chap. 1. 15.) speaks the same language, When lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin, and sin when it is finished, bringeth forth death. All alluding to the natural conception, formation, and production of Children. We have these three in the Text before us, the order of the words being a little altered.

Here is first, Conception; They conceive mischief.

Thirdly, the Birth; Bring forth vanity.

More strictly to the method of Eliphaz; we have first, the Conception; secondly, the birth of sin: And as if one birth were not enough, they return to their work, providing for a new birth of the old man; Their belly prepareth deceit.

עמל Labor, molestia, perversitas.

They conceive mischief.] The word which we translate mischief, signifies properly, labour, hard labour, or labour accompanied with a great deal of pains and sorrow; it signifies also wickedness, perverseness, We translate mischief, They conceive mischief, or some mischievous device to the dishonour of God, and the wrong of man.

They conceive] Conception is here the work of the mind; we ordinarily say, We conceive such a thing; that is, We take it in, or apprehend it by an act of the understanding.

Here's the truest character of a wicked man, he is one that conceives mischief. The allusion teacheth us:

First, That a wicked man sins with much freedom of spirit, or he sins freely.

He conceives mischief. The conceptions of the mind cannot be forced, nor can the conceptions of the body; and therefore the Law resolves it, That there is no rape, where conception follows. These conceptions are the joynt actings of the will and understanding, both concur in them. An unregenerate person is free to do evil, he needs not be forced to it, he cannot be forced from it; and every evil is the more evil, by how much the more freely it is done. The more voluntarily we sin, the more wickedly we sin.

Again, The conceptions of the mind are deliberate, there is a collecting of one thing from another, a debating in conceiving. Hence Note, Secondly, Wicked men sin with deliberation.

They sit down and meditate, they lay the frame of wickedness in their hearts, and then set it up, or act it with their hands.

Note thirdly, All the conceptions of wicked men are wickedness.

They are very fruitful in wickedness, and they bear no other fruit. Mischief is not onely that which he conceives, but all that he conceives; he conceives nothing else. A wicked man cannot think or conceive one good thought; he may think of that which is materially good, but he conceives no good (*Gen.*6.5.) All the thoughts of the imaginations of his heart are onely evil and that continually. All the Creatures which he forms in his mind, all the children of his understanding are deformed and monstrous; He conceives mischief, which, as it notes a continued act, so an act continued about, or upon the same object.

Fourthly, Observe, To be a contriver, a plotter, a conceiver of mischief, is worse than to be an actor, or a doer of mischief.

It is ill to have a hand in any sinful evil, it is worse to have a head in it, but worst of all to have a heart in it. Conceivers of mischief always have their hearts and heads in mischief; and if they are not stopt, will have their hands in it too: they who are plotters, and designers, would be actors. Hence they are called Workers of iniquity. They have an inward shop, and an outward shop: first they work it in their thoughts, and mould it there, and then it comes out. To conceive mischief, is properly the Devils trade, he rather deviseth than acts wickedness. There are many wickednesses in the World which he cannot act; but he is or would be the plotter, setter, and contriver of them all: This is the wickedness of the Devil: and every conceiver and deviser of mischief is of the Devils trade. A good man may (possibly) do evil, but a wicked man deviseth evil. As it notes the spiritualness of a man in holiness, when he doth not onely act that which is good, but his heart is upon it, he conceives and frames it in his mind. So it notes a man spiritually wicked, when his mind frames wickedness. The Apostle concludes of himself, (Rom. 7. 25.) So then with my mind I serve the Law of God, but with the flesh the Law of sin. Not that he willingly gave up his flesh to sin, but that he was carried through the infirmity of the flesh to some sinful actings, while his mind, his devisings, and contrivings, were according to the Law of God, and he delighted in the Law of God concerning the inward man. This is the spiritualness of holiness, and without this, there is no outward act of any account with God. It is what the mind moves to, not what the mouth speaks, or the hand doth, which commends us to God. What is it to God, that we serve his Law with our flesh, if with our minds, we either serve the Law of sin, or do not serve the Law of God? Man is not what he acts, but what he conceives, unless he act what he hath conceived. They conceive mischief,

And bring forth vanity.] Now they come to the birth; they are in travel after conception; they bring forth, and the Childs name is Vanity.

The Original word is rendred three wayes.

First, We say Vanity.
Secondly, Another saith Lyes.
A third saith Iniquity.

The word will bear any of, or all the three translations. They bring forth vanity, a lye, iniquity. They who conceive mischief, may bring forth any thing but what is good. Those three words may serve the same thing; every vanity is a lye, and any lye is vanity, and iniquity is both lye and vanity. The persons of whom Eliphaz discourseth, are said to bring forth vanity, on these three grounds.

First, Because they sometimes bring forth no fruit at all; they are conceiving mischief, but they can make nothing of it, their conceptions end in abortions; they devise and plot, but all is hatching of wind: The Church is so expressed, though in a different case (Isa. 26. 17, 18.) Like as a Woman with Child, near the time of her delivery, is in pain, and cries out in her pangs; so have we been in thy sight, O Lord; We have been with child, we have been in pain: The Church had conceptions for good, she hoped that the Lord would have done some great thing for her; yet after her conception, and travel, see what she brings forth, We have been in pain, and brought forth wind; that is, nothing at all, it proved a meer timpany; for so he explains it, We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth, neither have the Inhabitants of the World fallen; that is, we have not obtained that deliverance that we hoped for in the earth, neither have our enemies (who are called by the Prophet, The Inhabitants of the World) been subdued under our power; they have not fallen. Now as the Church and people of God sometimes are disappointed in their expectations; they conceive, yet bring forth wind, not that Man-child of mercy which was expected: So, much more do wicked men, after all their pleasing conceptions, and pangs of travell, they bring forth vanity; and their vessel is marr'd upon the wheel.

Secondly, They are said to bring forth vanity, or a vain thing; because what they bring forth is not proportionable to their expectation. Their Mountain proves a Molehill or (as it was said of old) a Mouse. Parturiunt montes,&c.

Thirdly, Because the birth is not onely alwayes below, but often quite cross to their expectation; they conceive mischief against others, and bring forth mischief upon themselves: this is vanity, yea, and vexation of spirit, They bring forth vanity.

Observe from this allusion; Wicked men cannot but act evil.

They who conceive, must do their utmost to bring forth conceptions. As a Woman with Child cannot but bring forth when her time is come, and her pains are on her; if you would give her all the World it is impossible to divert or delay the birth. So is it with a wicked man, when he hath mischievous conceptions in his heart; He sleepeth not unless he do mischief (Prov. 4. 16:) Whatever comes of it, fall back, or fall edge, he must do it. He cannot forbear an attempt to do it, though it cost him his life; many have been at that cost, in attempting to do it, but could not.

Observe, secondly, Wicked men are oft put to much pain in fulfilling their lusts, or in acting their conceived mischiefs.

It is with such men as with the Women in Child-bearing, on whom the Lord hath laid that heavy burthen, In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children (*Gen.*3.16.) wicked men feel this to the full, In sorrow they bring forth: The wicked man travelleth in pain all his dayes, vers. 20. It is their delight to sin, but for the most part they smarr in sinning, and run through many sorrows to accomplish their sin. They are so mad upon sinning, that the sweetness of doing mischief pleaseth them more, than all the troubles they go through in doing it discourageth them. Many evils cannot be done with ease, it costs sinners dear to effect what they design; they often have, as we say of women, after long and sore travel in child-bearing, A very hard bargain of it, and pay very dear for that which is worth, or worthy of nothing but repentance or greater pain.

Thirdly, Taking vanity for iniquity; which sense was given in opening the terms.

Observe, Such as our thoughts and conceptions are, such are our productions.

They conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity; such as we plow and sow in the mind, such is the Harvest of our actions: The very form, the lineaments and portraiture of a mans spirit, is drawn upon the things he doth; his works are the image of his heart. As it is said of Adam in nature, He begat a Son in his own likeness; so doth every man in morals. Our actions are as our selves are, they are begotten and brought forth in our own likeness, whether good or evil, onely with this difference; Good actions are born in our supernatural likeness, evil actions in our natural likeness.

Fourthly, As to bring forth vanity imports, as was interpreted, either no fruit, or that which is not sutable to the designs and desires of wicked men, Observe, Sinful conceptions often prove abortive, and miscarry; they bring forth nothing, or nothing as they would have it, who have conceived them.

The birth is sometimes short in degree, and not seldome contrary in kind; they have not what they expect, yea, they have what they least expect (Psal. 2. 1.) Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? Why a vain thing? Because they cannot obtain their desire: it is vain to imagine the pulling down of Christs Kingdome, which must stand for ever. Pharaoh designed mischief, Let us work wisely; (here is the language of conceivers) but he brought forth vanity, in all the notions spoken of: vanity, as it was a sinful and wicked act; vanity, as he failed in the thing he did expect; he thought to bring destruction upon Israel, but he could not; he thought to subdue the people of Israel, and make them ſlaves for ever, but he could not: He brought forth vanity alſo in the worſt ſenſe, the iſſue was contrary to his expectation, himſelf and his Army were ſwallowed in the Red Sea, and Iſrael was ſaved. Haman deviſed miſchief againſt the Jews, but he brought forth vanity; he did not effect what he intended againſt them, this was vanity; nay, it wrought the contrary way, himſelf was hanged on the gibbet he had prepared for Mordecai, this was vanity and vexation too; every wicked man brings forth vanity in ſome one, if not in all theſe notions of it, after all his conceptions of miſchief.

Perſeverante allegoria venter ſumitur ex conſueto loquendi modo ſacri ſermonis pro intelligendi facultate. בטן

And their belly prepareth deceit.] The belly is taken here metaphorically, for the underſtanding, or mind; becauſe natural conception is in the belly wrought; therefore Eliphaz proſecutes the Allegory in ſuitable expreſſions, Their belly prepareth deceit.

The word ſignifies,

To prepare { Accurately, / Strongly.

Their belly prepareth deceit: They expreſs a kind of curioſity in working, they are very exact in every point; they prepare with art, they will not have their work like a Cobweb, curious, yet weak; but they muſt have it ſtrong too; they prepare for eſtabliſhment, and plot as if it were for everlaſting. So the word is uſed (Pſal. 37. 3. Pſal. 89. 14.) Righteouſneſs and judgment are the habitation of Gods throne. It is this word, The eſtabliſhment or ſtrength of Gods throne is righteouſneſs and judgment: Righteouſneſs and judgment are the baſis and eſtabliſhment of all Thrones; That which hath made Thrones to totter in all ages, hath been the want of righteouſneſs and judgment.

The wicked man in the Text prepares not only curiouſly, but ſtrongly; as he likes no bungling, ſo he is not pleaſed with toyes and bables; he would lay his deſignes ſo cunningly, and ſo firmly, that as they ſaid of the Powder-plot, All the Devils in Hell ſhall not diſappoint it: He hopes to catch and hold, not the weak Flyes only, but the ſtrongeſt Eagles, in his deceits and ſnares.

Their belly prepareth deceit.] That is, they prepare to deceive and enſnare: The Prophet denounceth judgment againſt the Prieſts, againſt the houſe of Iſrael, and againſt the houſe of the King, becauſe they had been a ſnare upon Mizpeh, and a net ſpread upon Tabor (Hoſ. 5. 1.) that is, becauſe they had prepared nets and ſnares to entangle and deceive the people. Their bellies prepared deceit; and ſo did theirs, who ſaid (Jer. 18. 18.) Come, let us deviſe devices; let us contrive ſomewhat to enſnare the Prophet (Jer. 18. 18.) Their belly prepareth deceit: He ſpeaks in the preſent tenſe, as if they were alwayes doing it; they know neither vacation nor ceſſation from this wicked work. It is a continued act, Their belly prepareth.

He doth it not by ſtarts and fits, his belly is ever preparing; when one deceit is wrought off, he goes to work upon a ſecond, and then he projects for a third. Some ſpeak of a perpetual motion, we find it here; what a man doth naturally, he doth conſtantly. Though there be much art in preparing deceit, yet it is the work of ſinful nature; the frame, the engine of a wicked mans heart moves perpetually, He prepareth deceit, he is alwayes at it. As David profeſſeth (Pſal. 45. 1.) My heart is inditing a good matter, I will ſpeak of the things which I have made touching the King. David had ſome holy work ready made, but he had more a making; he ſaith not, I have endited, but my heart is enditing; I am upon it, it is my continual ſtudy. So alſo the wicked mans heart is alwayes preparing and deviſing unholy work, or that which is evil.

Again, Their belly; that is, their mind prepareth.

Hence Note, The mind of man is the Shop wherein deceit is framed;

Yea, the mind is not onely the Shop, but the Artificer; and it is not onely the Shop and the Artificer, but the very Tool that frames it: The underſtanding and wit of a wicked man, hammer out, and ſhape all his deceitful wares.

The hand and tongue begin where the mind ends; the tongue publiſheth, and the hand executes what the mind prepares, and the heart ſuggeſts. That which one of the old Poets ſaid of the Belly, under the notion of Appetite and Hunger, the ſame we may ſay of the belly, in the notion of this preparing; This belly is the Maſter of all ſinful arts, and that which gives out, and furniſheth man with all the cunning deceits of wickedneſs. Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, theft, falſe witneſs, blaſphemies (Matth. 15. 19.) theſe are the wares which are not onely laid up in the heart, as in a Store-houſe, but made in the heart, as in a Work-houſe; and from thence they proceed ready made. The belly prepareth deceit.

Artis magiſter ingenique largitor venter. Perſ.

Laſtly, Mark how Eliphaz deſcribes the wicked man in his actions, He conceiveth miſchief, and brings forth vanity. And yet again, he is preparing deceit.

Note from it, An evil heart is never diſcouraged by any diſappointments from going on in evil.

One would have thought, after he had conceived miſchief, and brought forth nothing but vanity, that we ſhould have heard no more of him; that he would now ſit down and be quiet, but his belly prepareth deceit preſently; he will to it again, he will try once more; if he fail in one plot, he hopes to thrive in another; he will ſow his ſeed of ſin in the morning, and in the evening he will not withhold his hand; and though he ſee neither of them proſper, yea, though he ſee both of them blaſted, yet he will to his ſowing again. As a gracious heart receives many diſappointments and diſcouragements, but, ſaith he, I will not give over, My belly ſhall prepare ſtill, holy, and juſt, and righteous things; and the more he is diſappointed, the more holily he acts: So doth a wicked man more ſinfully; for he acts as ſtrongly and naturally in his ſtate, as a godly man doth in his; and therefore he will not be put off by diſappointments. He ſaith in the words of Solomon (Prov. 23. 35.) They have ſtricken me, and I was not ſick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not, when I awake, I will ſeek it yet again. Wicked men in general, as well as Drunkards in particular, of whom Solomon there ſpeaks, meet with many blows, and are often ſick with following their ſin; yet (becauſe they are never ſick of ſin) as ſoon as ever they awake, and recover a little, they forget all their wounds and ſickneſſes, and reſolve to ſeek it again. They pleaſe themſelves ſo much with what is to come, that they ſlight all that hath been done, and reſolve with thoſe (Iſa. 56. 12.) To morrow ſhall be as this day, and much more abundant: They are preparing for ſin, even while they are ſinning: It is ſaid (Revel. 6.) that he on the Red Horſe went forth conquering and to conquer: he had not onely a preſent conqueſt, but a project to conquer; he was actually a Conqueror, and having conquered, he had freſh deſigns in his eye. As Chriſt goes out thus conquering, and to conquer, ſo wicked men go out doing evil, and to do it; deceiving, and to deceive. Their belly prepareth deceit: though they have brought forth vanity once and again, yet they prepare, as aſſured of victory.

This ariſeth three wayes.

Firſt, From the extream love and good affection which a carnal heart bears to ſin: as the love which believers bear to Chriſt, is not onely a motive provoking them to do for Chriſt, but alſo to perſevere in doing for Chriſt, though they ſuffer much in doing for him; he that loves Chriſt, will not onely ſweat at his work, but bleed at his work, if his work cannot be carried on without bleeding. Thus alſo the love of wicked men to their luſts, is not onely a motive provoking them to fulfill their luſts, but to endure any thing for the fulfilling of them; Love is the ſpring of labour, actions are affections put forth, and made viſible: Love is alſo the ſpring of valour, as well in a bad cauſe, as in a good cauſe: What is it that love dares not attempt, towards the attainment of what we love? Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it. Love is ſuch a vehement flame, that though you caſt the waters of ſorrow, yea, flouds of trouble upon it, yet theſe cannot extinguiſh it; much more then will it keep alive after many deferrs and diſappointments. It is the obſervation of one of the Ancients, that Love built the two Cities; Holy Love built the City of God, and unholy Love built, or is daily building the City of Satan: And though it be much hindred and oppoſed in building this City; yea, though the materials with which it would raise and fortifie this City, be often scattered and broken, yet these Builders will provide more materials, Their belly prepareth deceit.

Secondly, This their unwearied projecting and acting after discouragements and disappointments, ariseth from the extream desire they have to attain their end. It is a true Axiom, that, The appetite of the end is infinite. Whatsoever a man proposeth to himself as his end in any undertaking, will carry him on without end till he do attain it: As rest is the natural end of motion, so till man hath reached his civil (though sinful) ends, he cannot rest. A wicked man proposeth an end to himself in evil actions, as well as an honest man doth in good: and therefore till that profit, or pleasure, or honour, or revenge, which he proposeth to himself be enjoyed, he is unsatisfied; let God or Man put as many stops as they will in his way, let his first, and second, and third conceptions of mischief conclude in the bringing forth of vanity, yet he is not concluded by it, he will try a fourth, and a fifth time too, His belly again prepareth deceit.

Thirdly, His hope to speed at last, puts him forward to new experiments, when former ones have failed; he perswades himself he shall obtain, if he continue. As the Saints having prayed, and waited long without an answer from God, yet go on praying, their belly prepareth new prayers, because they have a good ground to hope that God will hear at last: So ungodly men persevere in plotting mischief, because they have strong hopes (though but the shadow of a ground to hope) that they shall one day accomplish their desires. As the heart would break for sorrow, so both heart and hand would break off from labour, were it not for hope. But where hope of attaining lives, especially where it is lively, there such will labour as long as they live: Though they have hitherto been deceived in their expectation, yet their belly prepareth deceit.

Thus Eliphaz prosecutes his dehortation; and though he saith not to Job, as Nathan did to David, Thou art the man; yet Job was the man he meant, the man, who (in his opinion) had conceived mischief, and brought forth vanity; yea, the man whose belly was even then preparing deceit. How much Eliphaz was deceived, appears upon the whole matter; what Jobs belly, his mind, his inward man was preparing, will appear by his own answer in the two Chapters following.

CHAP. XVI. Vers. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

Then Job answered and said,

I have heard many such things: Miserable comforters are ye all.

Shall vain words have an end? Or what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?

I also could speak as ye do: if your souls were in my souls stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake mine head at you.

But I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

HIS Chapter, and that which follows, contain Jobs second answer to the second charge of Eliphaz. He calls it an answer, but in strictness of speech it is a rejoynder; and he rejoynes with some acrimony and sharpness of speech. The longer contention is maintained, the hotter are the spirits of the contenders; and the more we are put to answer, the more angry are our answers.

Vers. 1. Then Job answered and said;

And what said he? His answer consists of three general parts.

In the first, he confutes what Eliphaz had asserted; which he doth to the eighteenth Verse of this sixteenth Chapter.

Secondly, He proceeds to corroborate and confirm his own Tenet or Opinion; which he doth to the eleventh Verse of the seventeenth Chapter.

Thirdly, He renews his former complaints and desires; which he doth from that eleventh Verse to the end of the Chapter.

The first part of his answer, is confutation; and he begins his confutation with an accusation; with an accusation of those who had disputed with him: and that's the subject of these five Verses, in all which he taxeth, or checks his friends for their unfriendly and uncomely dealing with him; and he checks them (as Eliphaz had done him at the beginning of the former Chapter) upon five points of errour and unfriendliness.

First, For speaking unprofitably, or for telling him no more than he knew before, at the entrance of the second Verse, I have heard many such things.

Secondly, He chargeth them for speaking such things, as did rather increase, and boyl up, than mittigate and allay his sorrow, Miserable comforters are ye, in the close of the second Verse.

Thirdly, He accuseth them for speaking so much, or for endless speaking; their discourse was tedious, they would not give over, Thus he takes them up at the third Verse, Shall vain words have an end? What, will you be endless? will you never have done?

Fourthly, He accuseth them for their causless speaking, in the same third Verse, What emboldeneth thee? (or what provoketh thee) that thou answerest? As if he had said, Have I given thee any cause?

Fifthly, and lastly, He reproveth his and their whole carriage towards him, by a serious profession of his contrary carriage, or that he was purposed to deal better with them, upon supposition that they were in his case; and this he doth two wayes;

First, Telling them what he could do, if they were in his case; Verse 4. I also could speak as you do, if your soul were in my souls stead, I could heap up words against you, &c.

Secondly, Telling them what he would do; But I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief, Verse 5. That's the course which I would take; I could deal as harshly with you as you do with me, but I would not; you should find me in another strain and temper. Then Job answered and said.

Vers. 2. I have heard many such things: miserable comforters are ye all.

We find this point tossed both wayes; Jobs Friends telling him, that he spake but ordinary matter, and he telling them that they spake so too. Bildad chargeth Job with it, Chap. 8. 2. How long wilt thou speak these things? And how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind? As if he had said, Thou speakest impertinently, or what thou speakest doth not much concern the point in hand, it comes not up to the matter; yea, it is quite besides the mark. And so Zophar (Chap. 11. 2, 3.) Should not the multitude of words be answered? And should a man full of talk be justified? Thou doest but Verba dare, thou speakest to little purpose, or little to the purpose, though thou speakest much.

Eliphaz puts the same language upon him, (Chap. 15. 2, 3.)

2, 3.) Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the East wind? Should he reason with unprofitable talk, or with speeches wherewith he can do no good? Thus his Friends accused him of that for which now he accuseth them; and he himself had accused them once and again of this before: So (Chap. 12. 2, 3.) Who knoweth not such things as these? They are but vulgar truths which you have told me; and (Chap. 13. 1, 2.) Loe mine eye hath seen all this, mine ear hath heard, and understood it; what ye know, the same do I know also; I am not inferiour to you. You produce nothing all this while but what I am well acquainted with; which is fully the sense of this Verse: I have heard many such things: that is, Every man can speak as much as this. Here Job playes the Orator, or Rhetorician, whose business and design (as the great Orator tells us) is as much as he can to extenuate, and lay low the arguments and reasons of him that he opposeth. Job stands as Defendant here, his Friends as Plaintiffs; therefore he endeavours to render their Charge weak, and what they said, sinnewless; I have heard many such things as these.

Rhetorico modo principium sumit ab extenuatione, vice quippe defensoris agit. Pined. Defensor causam fuisse negabit si potest, aut eam vehementer extenuabit. Cic. l. 2. ad Heren.

Job doth not accuse his Friends, as giving out false and erroneous Doctrine: for himself had heard and learned those things before; but he accuseth them for bringing proofs which were not to the purpose, or which were insufficient to prove their purpose: As if he had said, I expected when you would produce some stronger arguments to maintain your opinion, or clearer answers unto mine: I waited for some new matter, and to have heard somewhat that I had not heard before, but you have deceived my expectation: For, I have heard many such things as these.

Hence Note, First, Some truths are of very common observation.

Who knoweth not such things as these? Every Child that hath been Catechised, knows them. 'Tis no disparagement to any truth, that it hath been often heard, and is commonly known. The more common a truth is, the more weighty it may be. Yet, Which gives us a second Observation.

Ordinary truths will not serve in extraordinary cases, and that which every man knows and hears, will not resolve us in those points which few men know or hear.

As Jobs Person was a Phœnix in the World, his age afforded not his second; There is none like him in the earth, saith God himself to Satan (Chap. 1. 8.) So Jobs condition was a Phœnix, it had no second; there was no man tryed like him in the whole earth; and therefore his case could not be measured by the common Standard, or rule of Providence. He had need hear that which was never heard before, who bears and feels that which was never born nor felt before. There are some temptations on afflictions, as the Apostle speaks (1 Cor. 10. 13.) which are common to man: Common truths may comfort and satisfie the consciences of such. But there are temptations (such were Jobs) which are not common to man, we can hardly find their parallel, or a president of them in the Records of any age: Common truths will not comfort, nor satisfie the consciences of such. Every dispensation hath a doctrine suitable to it; dispensations which are seldome seen, call up doctrines which are seldome heard.

Secondly, Job complains, that he hears only those things which he had often heard.

Hence observe, It troubles a man in trouble, to be often pressed with the same thing.

A man at ease is pained with unnecessary repetitions; much more a man in pain, and though they who like and love the things which they have heard, do both love and like to hear them often; yet (in some cases) they may hear them too often. Some indeed speak very prophanely, what Job spake justly; who when they would not put off submission to, and attendance upon holy Doctrine, say, We know before we go what he will say: We know such things as the Preacher usually speaks; what can he tell us, that we have not heard before? That's the language of the Prophane; We know as much as he can teach us.

Though it be granted, that a man knows as much as the Preacher can tell him, yet he ought to hear it again. Though the matter be known before, yet to hear it often may work a better knowledge, and leave a stronger impression upon the heart than ever. 'Tis profitable to write the same things, therefore it cannot be unprofitable to hear them (Phil. 3. 1.) Brethren, to write the same things, to me, it is not grievous, and to you it is profitable: If to write, then to speak the same things is profitable. In the Story of the Acts of the Apostles, when Paul had preached in the Synagogue; the Jews being gone, the Gentiles besought him, That those words might be preached the next Sabbath (Acts 13. 42.) The repeating and inculcating the same thing, is not alwayes blameable, and it is sometimes desireable: but when a man is under sore afflictions and temptations, when he is burthened with many sorrows, it is very grievous to have those things that have been often answered or assented to, again objected, or asserted. A weak stomach must have variety and change, to entice the appetite, and so must a troubled and distempered spirit; I have heard many such things: And hereupon he inferrs:

Miserable comforters are ye. As if he had said, This is a miserable way of comforting, alway to be beating upon, and inculcating the same thing; Job calls his Friends Physicians of no value, (Chap. 13. 4) Here he expounds himself, while he calls them, Miserable comforters: He is a Physician of no value, who instead of curing, increaseth the disease; and he is a miserable comforter, who instead of abating our sorrow, adds to it, and heightens it, Miserable comforters are ye.

It seems the Friends of Job (at least to his sense) had forgotten the design they proposed to themselves when they first undertook this visit, (Chap. 2. 11.) They made an appointment together, to come, and mourn with him, and to comfort him. That was the intendment of Jobs Friends at their first addresses. Yet, after so long a conference, he makes this report, Miserable comforters are ye; ye rather vex than heal any sore; you, my Friends, have troubled me more than my wounds, you have wounded my spirit more than Satan did my flesh; Miserable comforters are ye.

Consolatores malorum; i. e. malos potestis consolari. August.

One of the Ancients renders the words thus, Ye are comforters of evil men; or, possibly, you may comfort evil men; but you cannot comfort me. As that which is one mans meat is another mans poyson; so that which is one mans comfort is another mans sorrow. All good men cannot take in their comforts the same way; but the way of comforting good and evil men, differs as much as good and evil. The words of flattery and falshood will serve to comfort the one, no words will comfort the other, but those of sincerity and truth. I dare not conceive Jobs Friends such as would sow Pillows under the elbows of evil men, yet surely they put hard stones under the sore and aking arms of this good man.

Consolatores Onerosi. Vulg.

The Vulgar translation speaks thus, Ye are burdensome comforters. A comforter should take off burdens; sorrow is a burden: As the judgments that God threatned upon the Jews, and other Nations, are represented in the Prophets, under the name of burthens, The burthen of Judah; the burthen of Israel; the burthen of Moab; the burthen of Babylon; the burthen of Idumea: So any affliction upon a person, is his burthen; and the business of those who come to comfort a soul in affliction, should be to take off his burthen, at least to lighten it. Jobs Friends did indeed bind the burthen faster upon his spirit, and therefore he might well call them Burthensome comforters. False hearts count all truth a burthen: The land (saith Amaziah) is not able to bear his words (Amos 7. 10.) yet his were words of truth, and tended to peace. Some truths may be burthensome at some times to a good heart. Hard words are alwayes burthensome; Job had store of them.

מנחמי עמל Consolatores laboris aut molestiæ. Heb.

The letter of the Hebrew gives the sense thus; Ye are comforters of trouble; that is troublesome comforters: As if he had said, Ye do not comfort me in my troubles, but ye trouble me with your comforts: Ye are comforters made up of trouble; that's the predominant Element, which denominates your complexion and constitution; ye are so troublesome, that you seem to be nothing but trouble. Our rendring in the concrete is clear to Jobs scope, Miserable comforters are ye all.

Hence

Hence obſerve, Some, while they go about to act the part of comforters, do but add to their ſorrow, whom they pretend to comfort; and inſtead of comforters, prove tormentors.

But when doth a man deſerve this title, A miſerable comforter? That which cauſed Job to charge his Friends with this miſcarriage of their pains with him, will reſolve the queſtion, and tell us when.

Firſt, They gave him little hope of good, or they did not open to him a door of hope wide enough: 'tis true, they made ſome overtures that way, which yet (comparatively to what they ought) were ſcarce conſiderable. And Eliphaz, who had been ſomewhat large upon the point in his firſt congreſs with Job, ſpeaks nothing of it in his laſt: For, as if he thought his caſe deſperate, and had given him for a loſt man, he ſhuts up in the dark, as we ſee, in the cloſe of the former Chapter; where he thunders out the judgments of God upon Hypocrites, and Bribe-takers, without ſo much as one word of comfort to the penitent: This is to be a Miſerable comforter. The ſong of comforters ſhould at leaſt be mixt, like that of David to the Lord, of mercy, and of judgment (Pſal. 101. 1.) A ſong of judgment alone, or moſt of judgment to a heavy heart, may be called (like that of Jeremie) A Lamentation, but it is not a Conſolation.

Secondly, They (as was toucht before) tyred out his afflicted ſoul with tedious diſcourſes, and unpleaſing repetitions; they alwayes harped upon the ſame ſtring, and that makes no muſick to a diſconſolate Soul. As God complains of thoſe Prayers as unpleaſing, which are full of unneceſſary repetitions; ſo alſo thoſe counſels are unpleaſing to man, which are made up of needleſs repetitions. To preſs the ſame point, though true, oft and oft, is a wearineſs to the ſpirit; and becauſe it ſuggeſts this ſuſpition, that the hearer doth oppoſe, or reſiſt that truth, it proves an upbraiding, rather than a teaching, or a comforting: Comfort muſt be ſtollen in unawares, by a holy ſlight of hand, it muſt not be beaten in with beetles, as it were by force of hand.

Subripere debet conſolatio & furtum facere affectibus. Sen.

Solomon tells us (Prov. 25. 12.) As an ear-ring of Gold and an ornament of fine Gold, ſo is a wiſe reprover upon an obedient ear. What he ſpeaks of a reprover is as true of a comforter; and he onely is fit to be a reprover, who is skill'd, or knowes how to be a comforter. He that will open or launce a ſore, had need be acquainted with the means of healing it. The ſpirit of God, who is the Reprover, (John 16. 8.) is alſo the Comforter (John 14. 26.) We may therefore take up Solomons Proverb here, As an ear-ring of Gold, and an ornament of fine Gold, ſo is a wiſe comforter upon an obedient ear. They who hang Jewels in their ears (as it was the cuſtome of thoſe times, and is to this day) take that which is of great price and value, yet of little weight: No man hangs a Talent, or a great lump of Gold in his ear: Gold is precious, but much Gold is ponderous, and burdens, rather than adorns the ear; the bulk of it is more comberſome, than the beauty of it is conſpicuous. So comfort, which is the moſt pleaſant Jewel of the ear, ſhould be pure and precious as the Gold of Ophir; but yet it muſt be like an ear-ring, which, though it be not light, in regard of worth, yet it is light in regard of weight. We muſt not load, but guide a man with counſell, nor muſt we burden him with many, but eaſe him with pertinent words of comfort.

Eſto correptio non levis prætii ſed levis ponderis.

Thirdly, That which rendred them yet more miſerable Comforters, was, their unkind grating upon that ſtring of his ſinfulneſs and ſtudied hypocriſie. Job acknowledged himſelf a ſinner, and that he could not be juſtified in the ſight of God by any righteouſneſs of his own; yet ſtill his friends were unſatisfied about his ſincerity; and ſtill they preſented him with ſuſpicions of ſecret wickedneſs, as the cauſe of all his ſufferings; ſtill they told him of the ſad fate of Tyrants, of Oppreſſours, of unjuſt Judges, of unſound, and falſe-hearted Worſhippers; and though they did not apply theſe Parables perſonally to Job, yet the general diſcourſe ſounded, as if they had ſaid, Thou art the man.

Now as the Apoſtle ſpeaks concerning death (1 Cor. 15. 56.) ſo may we ſay concerning any affliction, The ſting of affliction is ſin; the ſting of ſickneſs, the ſting of poverty, the ſting of diſgrace is ſin: when the leaſt trouble is armed with ſin, the ſtrongeſt tremble at the ſight of it. A godly man can eaſier bear the weight of all afflictions, than the weight and burthen of one ſin; ſo long as he ſees all clear between God and his own ſoul; ſo long as he can look up to God, as having his ſin pardoned, and can approve his heart to God, that he lives not in any known ſin; in this caſe, though the Lord lay the heavieſt burthen of affliction upon him, he can go lightly under it; The ſpirit of a man will bear all theſe infirmities: but if his ſpirit be wounded, either with the guilt of ſin, or with the fear of the wrath of God, how can he bear it? This afflicts more than all other afflictions. This was it which cauſed Job to cry out, Miſerable comforters: His Friends ever upbraiding him with his ſin, his ſin, his ſin, as the root, and therefore as the ſting of all his troubles. They applied nothing but theſe corraſives to his wounded ſoul, which called aloud for the balm of Gilead. There are two ſorts of miſerable comforters.

Firſt, They who flatter the ſoul that lives in ſin.

Secondly, They who imbitter, and burden their ſouls, who, being under burdens of ſorrow, are alſo in bitterneſs for their ſin.

Some ſow Pillows under the elbows of thoſe who delight in ſin, and dawb them up with untempered mortar; others thruſt ſwords, and ſhoot arrows into the bowels of thoſe who mourn for ſin; and inſtead of bringing well-tempered mortar to bind and cement their ſouls, lay hard ſtones under them, which vex and gall their ſouls. Both are Miſerable comforters.

They who undertake the office of comforting others, ſhould conſider theſe three things eſpecially.

Firſt, The nature of affliction, whether internal, or exterternal; that which will comfort a man in bodily afflictions, will not do it in ſoul afflictions.

Secondly, The degree, or meaſure of affliction: If the Plaiſter be too narrow for the Sore, how can it heal?

Thirdly, They ſhould conſider the temper of the Perſon afflicted, if he be preſſed in conſcience for ſin, they ſhould not preſs his conſcience with ſin; much leſs ſhould they thunder out judgment and terrour againſt him for ſin; if he be very weak, they ſhould uſe few words; if he he paſſionate, they ſhould uſe gentle words, leſt, inſtead of perſwading, they provoke his ſpirit: Many a ſoul is caſt down, and ſwallowed up in deſpair, by the ignorance or unfaithfulneſs of thoſe who would be called Comforters, and Supporters: (Ezek. 13. 19.) They ſlay the ſouls that ſhould not dye, and ſave them alive that ſhould not live. Unskilful Phyſicians of the body, kill more than bodily diſeaſes. And though the unskilfulfulneſs of Soul-phyſicians doth not indeed kill ſouls that ſhould dye (for 'tis their own ſin that kills them) nor can kill the ſouls that ſhould not dye (for the medicine of Chriſts moſt precious blood will heal and ſave ſuch from their ſins) yet un-skilful ſoul-phyſicians ſhall be judged and dealt with, as having done all this, becauſe they have done their utmoſt to do it; which is alſo the meaning of that Text (1 Cor. 8.) And through thy knowledge ſhall the weak brother periſh, for whom Chriſt dyed: that is, an indiſcreet uſe of that liberty which thy knowledge teacheth thee, doth that which may be accounted a deſtroying of thy weak Brother. As that knowledge, ſo the ignorance before ſpoken of, ſlayes the ſouls that ſhould not dye. As it requires the power, ſo the wiſdome and teachings of God to comfort and extricate poor ſouls, in and from the Labyrinth of their ſorrows.

The Lord hath given me the tongue of the learned: What to do? That I ſhould know how to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to him that is weary (Iſa. 50. 4.) It is a great piece of learning to ſpeak aright to a weary ſoul, to deal with them ſo, as neither to flatter them in their ſins, nor oppreſs them under their ſins; to deal with them ſo in their affliction, as that we neither cauſe them to ſlight the hand of God, nor yet to ſink under it. He that can guide and ſteer the courſe of a ſoul that is afflicted, and toſſed with the tempeſt of ſin and ſorrow, between this rock and gulf, the Scylla of preſumption, and the Charybdis of deſpair, he is a learned Pilot indeed.

This Learning is the ſpecial gift of God; Chriſt himſelf acknowledgeth, that the Lord his Father had given him the tongue tongue of the learned for this end. This learning is not taught in the Schools of men: Philosophers and Orators never taught such an art of consolation; nor can it be attained by the bare teaching of the holiest Doctors and Preachers of Divine truths. We may have a rich furniture of materials for this work, and yet make no work of it, nor be able to put truths and consciences rightly together, unless the anointing teach us. As the Prophet brings in our great Master and Tutor in this heavenly science, again confessing of himself (Isa. 61. 1.) The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the meek, he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives. Till we are anointed by God, we cannot speak effectually to man; without the Spirit who is the Comforter, we prove but miserable comforters; we bungle at the work, and rather undo souls, then do them any good: We may preach good tidings, good news, from Heaven (the Gospel is nothing else but good news) yet no good comes of it, till the good Spirit comes with it, both instructing the hearts of those that hear, and the tongues of those that speak, duly to apply the Word.

Master Calvin upon this place saith, Some Comforters have but one song to sing, and they have no regard to whom they sing it: All persons, all estates, and all conditions are alike to them. The wisdom of a Comforter consists in discerning and making these differences: As the Apostle Jude hints unto us (Ver. 22, 23.) And of some have compassion, making a difference; and others save with fear: As faith saves all, so (in a sence) fear saves some; that is, they must be terrified and made afraid, that they may be saved. Job's Friends would needs save him with fear, whereas they should have had compassion of him, and have spoken kindly to him: Because they could not make this difference, therefore they took a wrong course with him, and were justly taxed without distinction, Miserable comforters are ye all.

Verse 3. Shall vain words have an end?

As if he had said, I have got no comfort, I would fain get some rest; your words have not refreshed me, I desire you would not trouble me, you have done me no good, will you have done?

Shall vain words have an end? The Hebrew is, Shall words of wind have an end? That expression hath been opened twice before. How long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong East-wind, saith Bildad (Chap. 8. 2.) Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the East-wind? saith Eliphaz (Chap. 15. 2.) Job retorts it upon them, Shall words of wind have an end? You tell me that my words are windy, yours are so indeed: I must hide my self from these blasts and storms of your tongues, unless you grow calmer; Shall windy words have an end? Words are windy:

Projicit ampullas, &c.

First, When they have no solid reason, no substance in them: Reason is the substance of words, and so is truth; these two go alwayes together; and where these are not, nothing goes out of the mouth but wind we say of all words which are not followed with action, Words are but wind; we may say so also of all words which are not accompanied with reason.

Verba plena spiritu superbiæ.

Secondly, Words are windy when they have much pride, and swelling conceitedness in them: The Scripture calls such words, Swelling words of vanity: That which swells our hearts, will quickly swell our lips; pride doth both. Pride is a wind within us; vain words are a wind without us: The proud man knows not how to ease himself of this wind within, but by breaking it out in words.

Thirdly, Words are windy when they have much passion in them, when they are angry and furious; an angry man blusters rather then speaks, and makes a noise rather then a discourse. While David (Psal. 39. 2, 3.) was dumb with silence, while he held his peace from good, his sorrow was stirred, his heart was hot within him, and while he was musing, the fire kindled: While some are even hoarse with speaking, while they cannot hold their peace from evil, their anger is stirred, their hearts are storming within them, and all their talk is only a wind blowing without them.

We read of a strange distemper in two sorts of men, who ought of all others to be most composed and temperate (Hos. 9. 7.) The Prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad: Our Translators put in the Margin, The man of the Spirit; for Ruach in Hebrew, signifieth both the wind that blows in the air, and the Spirit of God which moveth in our hearts: We take that sence, The spiritual man, or the man of the Spirit; that is, the man that pretends to have, or should have the Spirit of God (his business lying wholly in spirituals) this man is mad; he is so far from acting to the height of those graces which the Spirit gives, that he acts below that Reason which Nature gives. Ish ruach.

Yet the Original may be rendred thus (and so divers learned Hebricians render it) The man of wind, or the windy man, is mad: Anger is a short madness, and he that speaks angerly, is in danger to speak madly.

Job's Friends were not men of wind, nor were they mad, and the words which they spake had a general sence and savour of truth and soberness in them; yet (as to Job's particular case) they wanted some grains of truth and reason, they were too high and swelling, considering how low and humble he was; they were too full of passion, being spoken to a man so full of sufferings. And therefore though that censure of his Friends words, as vain (who indeed were wise and grave men) was too censorious and sharp, yet it must be granted, that their words also were too sharp, even such as vexed his spirit, and wore out his patience, upon which account he expects and begs an end of them. Shall vain words have an end? That is, Will you make an end of vain speaking? I pray do, I wish you would: Cut of the thread of this discourse, you have spun it out and continued it, but too long already.

The Hebrew word which we translate an end, springs from a root which signifies to cut off, because every end, whether of time, or things, is the cutting off of that time or thing, the end of which it is. While Job asks the Question, Shall vain words have an end? He speaks the vehemency of his own desire and expectation, to see an end of them. I shall not stay here to give any Observations upon these words, but refer the Reader to the Texts before alledged, in the eighth and fifteenth Chapters, where this expression is more fully opened.

Only Note, First, Vain words are very burdensome to a serious ear, much more to a sad heart.

Secondly, It is good to end that quickly, we should not have begun.

Profitable words may be too long continued, but unprofitable words cannot be too soon ended! It is best not to speak vainly, and it is next best to cease, or give over such kind of speaking quickly. There is a time to be silent from good words, as well as a time to speak them; but there is no time to speak evil words; all times, in reference to them, are times of silence. An Aposiopesis, or sudden stop of speech, is the most sutable figure of Rhetorick which they can use, who speak unsutably. As the end of what we say or do well is best; so the ending of what we say or do amiss is best. Perseverance in every good word and work is Angelical, and the highest perfection of duty; but perseverance in an evil, whether word or work, is Diabolical, and the utmost departure from duty. Let not thy mouth open to utter vanity; but if it doth, shut it quickly: be not heard speaking that twice, which should not be spoken once.

Or what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?

If thou wilt not make an end, then tell me why? Give me a reason; what is it that stirs thee to reply upon me, What emboldeneth thee to answer? The Hebrew word signifies, first, To strengthen, to fortifie, or confirm; he that is strengthened, is emboldened. It signifies also to be sharp, or bitter (1 Kings 2. 8.) David on his death-bed, tells Solomon his Son, and Successor in the Kingdom, that Shimei had cursed him with a grievous curse; that is, with a strong, bitter, and provoking curse, of which we read the Story (2 Sam. 16. 5.)

This Query is rendred three wayes.

First, As we, What emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?

As

As if he had said, I thought I should have silenced thee before this time, or that thou wouldest have put silence upon thy self; I wonder who, or what it is that sets thee on to speak still; Dost thou think by thy renewed onsets to weary me, and make me yield at last? Hast thou a hope to prevail upon me by thy importunity, when thou canst not by thy reason? Or hast thou further strength of reason, fresh arguments to produce in confirmation of thine opinion? Are these but fore-runners, or thy Vauntguard? Is the main battel yet behind? Hast thou some reserves of greater power then thou hast yet led up against me? Let me see them if thou hast: If not, give over, and hold thy peace; For what shall either I or thou get by a further progress? What emboldeneth thee to answer?

Job speaks wonderingly, his reason was at a loss about the cause of his Friends boldness, and therefore he admires it: There are two things which may embolden a man to answer.

First, The goodness and justice of that cause which he undertakes.

Secondly, The strength and assistance of God to carry him through it.

Upon these grounds, the youngest David may be bold to enter the Lists, and dare the Combate with the strongest Goliah. But there are two other things which usually embolden men to answer.

First, Self-confidence.

Secondly, Unwillingness to yield.

They who are thus emboldened, will not give over answering, though they have no further light of truth, or reason to hold out in their answers: Job surely had such apprehensions of his Friend Eliphaz, which moved him to ask, What emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?

Hence Note, Such is the stiffness and vanity of some, that they will hold on a contention, though they have no further grounds of truth or reason to continue it upon.

They will speak on though it be the same thing, only in a new dress of words. They have store of words, though scarcity of matter; we may justly say to such, What emboldeneth you to answer? It is more then boldness, a kind of impudence in such to answer: Pertinacy of spirit disdains to lay down the Bucklers. They who contend for victory, rather then for truth, will not be answered, how much soever they are answered: And they who are more loath to be foiled, then will to be rectified, will hardly submit to the plainest and clearest evidence.

Quid exacerbat te ut respondeas. Jun.

The second reading is, What doth provoke thee to answer? Or, What imbitters thy spirit that thou answerest? As if Job had said, Surely Eliphaz my fair discourse with thee, should have stopped the course of this severe proceeding with me before this time; thou hast loaded me with hard words, and uncharitable jealousies; But have I spoken provokingly, or bitterly to thee? My conscience tells me that I have not, and thou knowest I have not.

He that impartially reads over Job's answers to Eliphaz, may find here and there a sowre passage; but as we say proverbially, You must give loosers leave to speak. The wise Physitian hears his Patient giving him uncomely language, yet will not hear it, much less retort or answer so again: They who are in pain must be born with; though they provoke, it must not be called a provocation; and though they give offence, yet it must not be taken. When the Child cryes, the Nurse sings: God himself bears with the manners of his people (so the word intimates, Acts 13. 18.) as a Mother doth with a froward Child; and so should we with the frowardness of our weak and afflicted Brethren. So that in this sence, the provocations which Job gave his Friends, were not to be reckoned as provocations; and he might well say to Eliphaz, What provoketh thee to answer? If I (in the case I am in) have spoken passionately, Wilt thou be provoked by it? Thou shouldst not. Thou oughtest to pass it by, and cover it with the garment of charity.

Yet further, we may take the words as a total denial of any provocation given on his part.

Whence Note, Some will speak harshly to, and of those who never provoked, or gave them cause.

Water runs clear till 'tis troubled and stirr'd by some outward violence: But the spirits of some men run muddy, though nothing from without stirs them. The Prophet compares all wicked men to the troubled Sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt (Isa. 57. 20.) The Sea is not alwayes troubled, when the Winds are quiet, that is quiet; we often see a smooth Sea, as smooth as Glass: A wicked man is like the Sea when 'tis enraged, he is such a Sea as knows no calm; he is like the Sea, not only when it is troubled, but when it cannot rest. Though no breath of Wind from abroad offend him, yet he storms: He hath lusts in his own bowels, which provoke him when nothing else doth; yea, those lusts within provoke him, when all without labour to pacifie him.

So David complains (Psal. 120. 5, 7.) Wo is me that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the Tents of Kedar; that is, with the Sons or Descendants of Ishmael, who have learned of their Father to mock and persecute; I dwell in the Tents of Kedar: But what caused them to mock and persecute? Was it any provocation that David had given them? No, for he saith in the next words, I am for peace (I would live quietly with all my heart) but when I speak, they are for war. A motion for peace, becomes a provocation to war? It is sinful to speak rashly, or harshly, though we are provoked; What is it then to speak so when we are not provoked? They angred Moses at the waters of strife, they provoked his spirit; yet it went ill with Moses for their sakes, when he spake unadvisedly with his lips (Psal. 106. 32, 33.) But what was this unadvised speech. Moses reports his own infirmity (Numb. 20, 10. 11.) And Moses and Aaron gathered the Congregation together before the Rock; and he said unto them, Hear now ye Rebels must we fetch you water out of this Rock? And Moses lift up his hand, and with his Rod he smote the Rock twice, &c. The error of Moses in this business was twofold.

First, That he did not only smite the Rock, but smite it twice with the Rod in his hand, whereas he had order only, to take the Rod in his hand, and speak to the Rock before their eyes, and it should give out water (Vers. 8.)

His second error was, that he did not only speak to the people (for which in that transaction he had no order from God) but spake bitterly and harshly to them, calling them Rebels, and slighting them, Must we fetch water for you? &c. What, for you, who are a murmuring and gainsaying people? God knew the stubbornness of that people, and their rebellions against him, yet he did not call them Rebels, but said in the close of the eighth Verse, So shalt thou give the Congregation, and their beasts drink. God had more reason and power to call them Rebels then Moses had, yet he did not. And because Moses did, that unadvised speech of his, and the actions which attended it, were called Rebellion, at the twenty fourth Verse of the same Chapter, Ye (saith the Lord of Moses and Aaron) rebelled against my word at the waters of Meribah.

Now, if Moses was thus reproved and censured by God himself, for speaking passionately, to a people who had provoked both God their Deliverer, and him their Leader; What reproof do they deserve, who, either upon none, or very little provocation, call their Brethren, Hypocrites, Hereticks, Schismaticks, Rebels, perjured Persons, Men of prostituted consciences, or at least, of unsetled and uncertain Principles? Will not the Lord take notice of this bitterness, even in those who are his precious Servants, towards their fellow-servants, when he laid so heavy a penalty (as non-admission into the promised Land) upon a pair of the most eminent and faithful Servants that ever he called forth to his work, since he laid the foundations of the World?

This falls heavy upon the present Age: Whence is that bitterness, that Gall and Wormwood which falls from many, both Tongues and Pens, every day? What hath provoked them thus to speak and write? I confess there have been provocations, and some do but give Gall for Gall, and Wormwood for Wormwood; yet it cannot be denyed, but that many speak and write bitterly, when they have had no provocation; yea, most who speak bitterly, have been treated gently; and few who answer angerly will be able to give a good account what had provoked them thus to answer; and how much soever any man hath been provoked, voked, the Lord may juſtly make him ſmart for ſuch ſmartneſs in anſwering. It will not bear us out in acting or ſpeaking beſides the rule, becauſe others do ſo. Paul ſhews us our duty in his own practice (1 Cor. 4. 12, 13.) Being reviled we bleſs, being defamed we entreat: We muſt not defame them that defame us; we muſt not revile our revilers. Then woe to thoſe who revile ſuch as bleſs them, and defame ſuch as entreat them: O what provoketh ſuch to ſuch wayes of anſwering?

Quid tibi moleſtum eſt ſi loquaris? Vulg.

There is yet a third reading of this clauſe, which I will but touch, When ſhall vain words have an end? But what trouble is it to thee if thou ſpeakeſt? Or, Is it any trouble to thee if thou ſpeakeſt? As if he had ſaid, I cannot much wonder though thou doſt not end theſe vain ruffling diſcourſes, for I am perſwaded they are no great trouble to thee, how much ſoever they are to others; ſuch words coſt thee little ſtudy; thou needeſt not beat thy brains, or bite thy nails for ſuch matter as this. That which comes next, and lyes uppermoſt, is all that ſome men have to ſay, when they have ſaid all. They that ſpeak moſt to the pain of others, take leaſt pains themſelves. We ſay, Good words are cheap, it coſts little to ſpeak fair; but ill words are cheaper. Foul language coſts little in the preparation, though it may prove coſtly enough in the event. There is a profitable ſence in this tranſlation, though I will not give it for the meaning of the Text.

It is our duty to conſider before we ſpeak, as well as before we act; and to put our ſelves to ſome trouble in preparing what we have to ſay, before we give others the trouble of hearing it. When God calls us to ſpeak, either in our own defence, or for the edification of others, on a ſudden, we may expect (according to the Promiſe, Matth. 10. 19.) That it ſhall be given us in that hour what we ſhall ſpeak. If the Providence of God ſtraiten us, the Spirit of God will enlarge us; that Promiſe will help us, when we have no time to prepare our ſelves; but it will not, if we neglect the time in which we ſhould prepare our ſelves: For when Chriſt ſaith in that place, Take no thought how or what ye ſhall ſpeak, we muſt expound it like that (Matth. 6. 25.) Take no thought for your life, what ye ſhall eat, or what ye ſhall drink; which is not a prohibition of all thought about thoſe things, but only of thoſe thoughts which are diſtracting and diſtruſtful.

Job having reproved his Friends theſe three wayes, for the manner of their dealing with him; now reproves them by a ſerious profeſſion of his better dealing with them; in caſe (as we commonly ſay) The Tables were turned, they coming in his place, and he in theirs: This he doth in the two Verſes following.

Verſe 4. I alſo could ſpeak as ye do, if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead: I could heap up words againſt you, and ſhake mine head at you.

5. But I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief.

Job in this context tells his Friends two things.

First, What he could do.

And ſecondly, What he would do.

The former of theſe is laid down expreſly in the fourth Verſe.

Verſe 4. I alſo could ſpeak as you do, if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead, &c.

The Soul is here put (as often elſewhere in Scripture) for the whole man; then, his meaning is (and ſo Maſter Broughton tranſlates) If you were in my place, or in my condition. If God ſhould tranſcribe my wounds and ſorrows upon your backs and conſciences, or if my grief dwelt in your bowels, I could ſpeak as you do, &c.

The ſufferings of the ſoul hold out the ſufferings of the whole man, upon a twofold conſideration.

First, Becauſe the ſoul is the principal part of man. When that which is chief ſuffers, all may be ſaid to ſuffer.

Secondly, Becauſe afflictions which lye upon the ſoul are moſt afflictive: The ſenſitive power of the body, is called the ſoul, and we are moſt ſenſible of thoſe afflictions which fall immediately upon the rational ſoul. That man forgets the ſorrows of his body, whoſe ſoul is ſorrowful. The more inward any ſuffering is, the more grievous it is.

I alſo could ſpeak as you do, if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead, &c.

Some read the words Interrogatively, Could I ſpeak as you do? If your ſouls were in my ſouls ſtead, could I heap up words againſt you, and ſhake my head at you? Mr. Broughton gives that ſence fully, Would I ſpeak as you, if you were in my place, would I compoſe bare words againſt you, and nod upon you with my head? The meaning is Negative, If you were in my ſouls ſtead, I could do none of theſe things. Could I do them? No (as we ſay) I could as ſoon eat my own fleſh as do them: If I were at eaſe, and you in pain, could I deal thus with you? I would dye rather then deal ſo with you. This reading is good, and hath a greater emphaſis in it then our bare affirmative reading, though the ſence and ſcope of both be the ſame.

If your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead.] Some read this Optatively, or as a wiſh, O that your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead; and then the latter words are taken as a promiſe or profeſſion of offices of love: First, I would heap up words for you.

The Hebrew word which we tranſlate to heap, ſignifies properly to prepare and fit a thing, to faſhion and put it into a good frame; it is not a rude, inartificial heaping of things together, without form or faſhion, as the firſt Chaos was; but a beautiful elegant digeſtion, or compoſure of them, into the exacteſt form and faſhion, like that of the ſeveral pieces of the World, conjoyned in that work of the ſix dayes creation: As if he had ſaid, O that your ſoul were a while in my ſouls ſtead, ſee how I would uſe you, how I would deal with you; truly, all the hurt I would do to you, ſhould be this, I would prepare the ſofteſt and the ſweeteſt words I could with all my skill and rhetorick, to eaſe your ſorrows; I would ſpeak muſick to your eares, and joy to your hearts; I would ſtudy and compoſe a ſpeech on purpoſe, to revive and raiſe your drooping, deſponding ſpirits.

So alſo the ſecond branch may be interpreted, And ſhake mine head at you, or over you: For to ſhake the head, notes pity and compaſſion; to ſhake the head is the poſture of thoſe who mourn with, or for their Friends. Hence the word is tranſlated to bemoan (Nah. 3. 7.) Who will bemoan him? (Chap. 42. 11.) Job's Friends came to bemoan him; 'tis this word, They came to ſhake their heads over him, becauſe of all the evil which the Lord had brought upon him: One of the Ancients makes this expoſition of the Text, I would have ſhaken my head over you bemoaningly, or with compaſſion: The ſame word may well ſignifie to ſhake the head, and to pity, ſeeing they who pity others, uſe to ſhake their heads over them, and ſay, Ah my Friend, or Ah my Brother.

καὶ ἐκίνουν ἂν ἐφ' ὑμῖν τὴν κεφαλὴν συμπαθῶς. Et moviſſe ſuper vos caput condolenter. Chryſoſt.

So then, if we read the words as a wiſh, O that your ſouls were in my ſouls ſtead; yet Job did not wiſh it for their hurt, but that he might have an opportunity to ſhew how much he would labour to be their Servant in Love, to do them good.

Hence Note, A good man doth not wiſh ill to thoſe who have rewarded him with evil upon any other terms, then a diſcovery of his own goodneſs.

'Tis ſin to wiſh that they who are in a comfortable condition might fall into our miſery, though they have been miſerable comforters to us in our miſery. We may not (in this caſe) wiſh pain or ſorrow to any ſort of men, except upon one of theſe two conſiderations.

First, That we may give them an experiment of our tenderneſs towards them, in doing them all the good we can in their affliction.

Or ſecondly, That God may give an experiment of his graciouſneſs towards them, in doing them good by their afflictions.

The Prophet Iſaiah (Chap. 14. 10.) foreſhews how they who had been weakened by the power of Babylon, ſhould inſult over weakened Babylon, All they ſhall ſpeak and ſay unto thee, Art thou alſo become weak as we? Art thou become like unto us? The people of God ſhall at laſt rejoyce (in reference to the glory of God, and publick good) to ſee their deſtroyers deſtroyed, and thoſe weak who have weakened them. But the people of God (in reference to any private, or perſonal intereſt) cannot rejoyce at the deſtruction, ction, or in the weakneſs of any man, much leſs can they wiſh them weak that they might have an opportunity to rejoyce over them. Paul was a Priſoner, and in bonds, yet he did not wiſh the worſt of his enemies in priſon, or in bonds with him; he only wiſht that they might enjoy the ſame liberty by Jeſus Chriſt, which himſelf enjoyed. For when he had almoſt perſwaded King Agrippa to become a Chriſtian, he ſaid, I would to God, that not thou only, but alſo all that hear me this day, were both almoſt, and altogether ſuch as I am, except theſe bonds (Acts 26. 28,29.) I would keep my chains and troubles to my ſelf, I would have none of you know my ſorrows; but I would that all your ſouls were in as good a ſtate as mine, and knew my comforts. A holy heart wiſheth all well, as well as it ſelf; and if at any time he wiſheth that to the worſt of his enemies, which is penally evil, he doth it with an eye both to their ſpiritual and eternal good.

Thus of the words as they are read in the form of a wiſh.

We read them as a Suppoſition, If your ſouls were in my ſouls ſtead: And then the two latter branches muſt be interpreted as acts of unfriendlineſs, ſhewing what Job could, but would not do, as was toucht before.

I could heap up words againſt you.] That is, I could make long ſpeeches, and enlarge my ſelf in diſcourſe, I could ſpeak terror, and thunder out whole volleys of threats againſt you; I could deaf your ears with loud voyces, and ſad your hearts with heavy cenſures. There is a figure in Rhetorick called Congeries, or The heap. Many words to the ſame ſence, eſpecially when there is little in them but words, are called juſtly, a heap of words: Now, ſaith Job, I could be as nimble at this figure as you; and with my ſpeech I could mix your action.

Quaſſare caput, apud authores Latinos geſtus eſt hominis irati aut minantis aut lamentantis. Druſ.

Shake my head at you.] Shaking the head, notes ſcorn and threatning (Pſal. 22. 7.) All they that ſee me, laugh me to ſcorn; they ſhoot out the lip, and ſhake the head, ſaying, He truſted on the Lord, &c. So the afflicted Church complains (Pſal. 44. 14.) Thou makeſt us a by-word among the Heathen, a ſhaking of the head among the people. We have this action joyned with two more, which ſignifie the greateſt contempt, by lamenting Jeremiah (Lam. 2. 15.) All that paſs by clap their hands at thee, they hiſs, and wag their head at the Daughter of Jeruſalem, ſaying, Is this the City that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole Earth? Ridentes caput motitant. Druſ.

Our bleſſed Saviour (upon whom contempt and ſcorn was to vent it ſelf all manner of wayes, he being to bear all that ſcorn, as well as all that pain which was due to our ſins; our bleſſed Saviour, I ſay) was ſcorned this way (Matth. 27. 39.) And they that paſſed by reviled him, wagging their heads. So then to ſhake, or wag the head at a man in affliction, ſpeaks, as ſometimes our pity, ſo moſt times our contempt; and as it is uſually accompanied with audible mockings, ſo it ſelf is a viſible mock: Which being interpreted, ſpeaks thus to the perſon afflicted, Thou evil-doer, or thou hypocrite, thou doſt even well become thy ſufferings, all theſe miſeries are well beſtowed on thee, &c.

In this ſence Job ſeems to ſpeak here, I could ſhake my head at you: I have indeed been as one mocked of his Friend (Chap. 12. 4.) and I could mock my Friends, I could laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh; but my conſcience bears witneſs with me, that if it ſhould come, I would not.

Hence Note, Firſt, A godly man hath a power to do that evil which he hath no will to do.

A carnal man hath a will to many evils, for which he hath no power or opportunity: A godly man would not do any evil, how much power and opportunity ſoever he hath. And indeed though he hath a natural, or civil, yet he hath not a moral power to do any evil. In which ſence the Apoſtle ſpeaks of a regenerate perſon (1 John 3. 9.) He that is born of God cannot ſin: He hath a natural power to ſin any ſin, to lye, to be drunk, to be unclean, &c. He may have a civil power to oppreſs, to deceive, to wrong his Brother; yet he cannot turn either his hand or his heart to ſuch works as theſe are; he hath learned better, and is better. He is born of God, his blood and pedigree is ſo high, that he cannot meddle, nor trade in ſuch low things. Wiſdom is too high for a fool (ſaith Solomon, Prov. 24. 7.) and folly is too low for a wiſe man. When Joſeph was ſolicited by his Miſtreſs to commit folly with her, he anſwers, How can I do this great wickedneſs, and ſin againſt God? (Gen. 39. 9.) Joſeph wanted neither power nor opportunity to do that wickedneſs, yet he ſaith, How can I do it?

Paul and his fellow-Apoſtles had wit and parts ſufficient to oppoſe the truth, yet he ſaith (2 Cor. 13. 8.) We can do nothing againſt the truth, but for the truth. Paul was a great doer, and he ſaith (Phil. 4. 13.) I can do all things through Chriſt ſtrengthening of me; but Paul could do nothing to the diſhonour of Chriſt. Doubtleſs Paul could have maintained an Argument, and drive on an Objection as far as another man, againſt the truth, if he would have ſet himſelf to it, and have made that his buſineſs; but he had not a mind to do it: The bent of his ſpirit did not lye that way, he was all for Chriſt, and the Goſpel; he was a Giant for the truth; but an Infant, a weakling, as weak as water againſt it; he had neither an underſtanding to conceive, nor a tongue to ſpeak to the diſſervice of Jeſus Chriſt.

Narrat juſtas quid facere potuit, ſed ne juſtitiam deſeret, quod facere potuit declinat. Greg.

It is a good Obſervation of one of the Ancients, upon this place, A juſt man declares what he can do; but that he may not deſert Juſtice, he forbears to do what he can. The providence of God ſets bounds to the power of a carnal man; but the Spirit of God ſets bounds to the power of a holy man: if a carnal man keep within compaſs at any time, it is becauſe he is reſtrained; but a godly man keeps within compaſs, becauſe he is renewed. Laban tells Jacob (Gen. 31. 29.) It is in the power of my hand to do thee hurt: And why did not Laban hurt Jacob? Was it from any principle of love or righteouſneſs in Laban's breaſt? The Text is ſilent in that, and Laban himſelf ſeems to tell us, whence it was, in the ſame Verſe, The God of your Fathers ſpake unto me yeſternight, ſaying, Take thou heed that thou ſpeak not to Jacob, &c. And this his ſpeaking to Laban, Jacob calls, Gods rebuking of Laban (Verſ. 42.) implying, that if God had not ſtopt him, he would have done him hurt.

It was more then once in the power of David's hand, to hurt, yea, to ſlay Saul, and he was ſtrongly moved by ſome of his great Officers to do it, yet he ſtrongly refuſed to do it, or to ſuffer it to be done, becauſe it would have been ſin in him to do it, himſelf being a private perſon, and the way in which he had any opportunity to do it, being only a private way, when Saul was in the Cave, covering his feet (1 Sam. 24. 3.) or in a Trench faſt aſleep (1 Sam. 26. 7.) and therefore (though he had ſtrengthened himſelf againſt Saul with an Army, and was ready (upon his provocation) to ſtretch forth his hand againſt him in battel, yet) he ſaith, Who can ſtretch forth his hand againſt the Lords anointed, and be guiltleſs? David was not ſtopt from hurting Saul, by a rebuke from God, but by the rule and dictate of his own conſcience. The thing might have been eaſily done, but becauſe it could not be innocently done, therefore David could not do it.

Secondly, Obſerve more ſpecially to the matter of this Text,

A godly man (when himſelf) cannot be harſh and grievous to others, though he have never ſo much advantage to be ſo.

His cannings are not for ſuch uſes. What the Apoſtle ſaith of his Miniſterial power, a gracious heart ſaith of all his power, It is for edification, not for deſtruction (2 Cor. 13. 10.) He deſigns his power for the help and comfort of all, not for the hurt or grief of any. A good man is merciful to his Beaſt; how then can he be unmerciful to his Brethren? He pitieth a beaſt fallen under a burthen; how then can he be cruel to his Brother when he is under burthens? Nature, or common humanity abhors ſuch actings; much more doth Grace. Paul gives this charge to Believers, Bear ye one anothers burthens, and ſo fulfil the Law of Chriſt (Gal. 6. 2.) This Law of Chriſt is written in the heart of every man, who is Chriſts, and therefore he is far from adding to another mans burden: He that hath a fellow-feeling of his Brethrens ſorrows, will not encreaſe their ſorrows: no man will purpoſely encreaſe, or add add to that burthen which himself must bear. Could I speak as you do?

Thus for the Negative, what Job would not have done, if their soul had been in his souls stead.

But, What would he have done? He tells us in the next Verse, this is the course that I would take.

Verse 5. I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

This is my design, and all the hurt I intend you. These words in the substance of them have been opened (Chap. 4.4.) where Eliphaz tells Job, that he had done, what here he promised he would do, Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees: Thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands. Eliphaz had given testimony for Job, that he had done, what Job now professeth he was resolved to do, and would do, in case he were put into their condition, and they into his, I would strengthen you with my mouth: That is, with the words of my mouth; and (which is the same) The moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

Here are the two parts of consolation, and the two great duties of a Comforter.

The first, is to strengthen sorrowful man.

The second, is to abate the strength of his sorrows.

Job was resolved upon both: Were they weak in faith, and hope, he would strengthen them: were their fears and doubtings strong, he would endeavour to weaken them, I would strengthen you with my mouth; and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

Motio labiorum meorum prohiberet. Heb. sc. dolorem vestrum.

The word Grief is not expressed in the Hebrew; there it is only thus, The moving of my lips should assuage; be it what it will that grieves you, I would labour to assuage it: I would assuage your fears, your sorrows, your impatience, your unbelief; whatever spiritual evil were upon you, the moving of my lips should be for the removing of it: Or (as others render) For the turning of it away. For the word signifies,

First, to abate in degree.

Secondly, To turn away, or to stop altogether.

My design should be upon both, I would study to the utmost of my power and parts, not only to mitigate, but quite to remove whatsoever I should find an affliction to you.

It hath been shewed (Chap. 4.4.) what power words have, both to strengthen weak faith, and to assuage the strongest grief, thither I refer the Reader; only take two brief notes from it.

First, A good man doth not only abstain from the hurt that he might do another, but he labours to help him, and to do him good.

Not to heap words in anger upon them that are in misery, not to shake the head at them in contempt, is only a Negative piece of charity and kindness: 'Tis our duty to use our utmost endeavour to refresh and comfort them. Negative acts of kindness are not the fulfilling of the law of love; it is not charity to the poor, to say I will not make them poorer, I will take nothing from them; it is our duty to give them of what we have. When a man is sorrowful, it is not enough to say, I will not increase his grief: it is our duty to lessen it, yea, to turn it into joy.

And this is more considerable, in reference to the persons with whom Job had to do; they had given him very hard measure, yet he would not requite them with hard measure; he would measure that to them which was good, and he would give them good measure. It is the common rule of humanity, to do good to those who do us good; it is more then beastly, even devillish cruelty, to hurt those that do us good; it is the height of Christianity, to do good to those who have been a hinderance to us, and to comfort those who have caused our sorrow. The Apostolical rule is, Recompence to no man evil for evil (Rom. 12. 17.) And again (ver. 19.) Dearly beloved, avenge not your selves, but rather give place unto wrath: The Apostle doth not mean, that we should give place to our own wrath; if we do so, we give place to the Devil, as the same Apostle intimates (Eph. 4. 26. 27.) Our own wrath must be stopt and resisted, quenched and put out. Then, what, or whose wrath is it, that we are commanded to give place unto? This wrath may be taken two wayes.

First, For the wrath of that man who is our enemy; we must give place to his wrath, not by approving him or his wrath, but by not answering him with wrath. If when another storms we are calm, if when he rages, we shew all gentleness and meekness both of speech and spirit, then we give place to his wrath; that is, we make it room to pass away and evaporate: Solomon's Proverb is the sum of this Exposition (Prov. 15. 1.) A soft answer turneth away wrath; but grievous words stir up anger.

Secondly, When Paul adviseth us not to avenge our selves, but rather to give place to wrath, we may understand it of the wrath of God; and the very next words, which the Apostle alledgeth from (Deut. 32. 35.) carry the sence clearly this way, For it is written, vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord: As if the Apostle had said, If you take upon you to avenge your selves, you take Gods work out of his hand; it belongs to God as much to take revenge, as it doth to give reward. And therefore as a man, who having done good, is over careful and anxious how to get his reward, takes rewarding work out of Gods hand, and shall have no more reward then he can get himself; as Christ tells the Pharisees in that case (Mat. 6. 2.) Verily I say unto you, ye have your reward: And all that a man can get himself, is not worth the having.

So the man, who having suffered wrong, goes about to revenge himself, takes revenging work out of Gods hand, and shall be righted no further then he can right himself, which is but little, if any thing at all; whereas if he would give place to the wrath of God; that is, let God alone, by such wayes as his Justice shall raise up, to right him, against his adversary, he would right him fully. So that our Interest doth not lye in returning evil for evil, but in returning good for evil to our enemies; as Saint Paul concludes (Rom. 13. 20.) Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head: That is, thou shalt either melt and mollifie his spirit towards thee, as hardest metals are by coals of fire (some such melting we may see in Saul towards David, when he forbore to take vengeance on him (1 Sam. 24. 16. Chap. 26. 21.) or thou shalt heap coals of divine vengeance upon him, by making his malice and hatred against thee more inexcusable: Which latter, though it may be looked upon as a consequent of our doing good to our enemies, yet we must take heed of making it the end why we do so, for that were to seek revenge while we forbear it, and to do good for that end, were to be overcome of evil; which the Apostle forbids in the close of that Chapter.

Job in this Text was far from professing a readiness to assuage the grief of his unkind, or enemy-like Friends, upon hope that God would encrease their sorrow.

Secondly, Observe, Words duly spoken and applyed, are of great power.

How forcible are right words? Is Job's question (Chap. 6. 25.) He doth not there answer his question, nor tell us how forcible they are, but here he doth. They are of such force, that they strengthen weak souls, and assuage the most swelling floods of sorrow.

God at first gave being and motion to all creatures, with the moving of his lips: He by the moving of his lips hath ever since ordered all their motions: The word of man produceth great effects; the tongue sets all hands on work; and what almost cannot the tongue of man do? The tongue is a little member (saith the Apostle James, Chap. 3. 5.) and boasteth great things: Now as the tongue of vain men boast great things which they cannot do; so the tongues of wise men can really do great things. Vain men (as we say) will take thirteen to the dozen, but cannot perform one. Wise men though they speak not much, yet they can perform much with a word speaking. And though as the same Apostle declaims most holily against the tongue of a wicked man (Vers. 8.) that his tongue is such an unruly evil, that no man can tame it; yet there have scarce ever been found any men so unruly, but the tongues of wise and godly men have tamed them: Yea, the tongue of a wise man is to an unruly man, and often to a multitude of unruly men, as a bit in a Horses mouth, or as a Rudder to a Ship, turning him or them about which way soever he listeth; as this Apostle teacheth us by these similitudes (Vers. 3, 4.)

the tongue of every man is to, and doth to himself, whether it be good or evil. And as the tongue is thus powerful in civilizing the rude, and in appeasing the humours of those who are most outragious; so it is very powerful in supporting those that are ready to sink, and in asswaging the grief of those who are most disconsolate and sorrowful.

Lastly, Whereas Job speaks peremptorily, as if he saw the effect, or were assured of it aforehand, I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should asswage your grief: Job knew that the success of all his counsels depended upon the concurrence and blessing of God; yet thus he speaks.

Hence Note, A man may say he hath done that, for the doing of which he hath used suitable and faithful endeavours, whether the thing be done or no.

The Lord saith to Jerusalem by the Prophet Ezekiel (Chap. 24. 13.) Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged. Now as God takes it upon him, that he had purged them, though they were not purged, because he gave them so many means and helps for their purging; so any man in his proportion, may take it upon him, that he hath strengthened their faith, abated their grief, yea, and saved their souls, among, and towards whom he hath diligently used those means appointed by God for the attaining of those great and noble ends, though possibly those ends be not attained. God himself reckons thus of all the labours of his faithful servants, they shall be rewarded as having done that which they have been doing with their hearts, hands, and tongues, though they see little fruit of either. Then I said, I have laboured in vain (Isa. 49. 4.) but though it was in vain to those for whom he laboured, that is, they got no good by it, yet it was not in vain to him who laboured, he got much good by it; as it follows in the same Verse, Surely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work (or my reward, one word signifies both reward and work, to shew that these can never be seperated, my work, saith he) is with my God: And Vers. 5. Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God shall be my strength.

As we are not to judge of the goodness of any cause by the success, but by the justice of it; so neither doth God adjudge the reward of any work by the success, but by the goodness of it, together with the sweat and sincerity of him that doth it. As the will of a godly man is accepted for the deed, so his deed is accepted for the success.

VERS. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Though I speak, my grief is not asswaged: and though I forbear, what am I eased?
But now he hath made me weary: thou hast made desolate all my company.
And thou hast filled me with wrinkles, which is a witness against me: and my leanness rising up in me, beareth witness to my face.
He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me: he gnasheth upon me with his teeth, mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me.
They have gaped upon me with their mouth, they have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully, they have gathered themselves together against me.
God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over to the hands of the wicked.

IN the five former Verses of this Chapter, Job reproved the personal failings of his Friends towards him; he now enters upon the confutation of their opinion. This is the constant method, both of Job and his Friends; they never come to the matter till they have fallen upon the man; nor touch the opinion, till they have dealt with the person. And this is the tenor of most mens spirits, to this day, in disputes and controversies; and some do not only deal with the man before the matter, but lose the matter in dealing with the man, entangling, and engaging themselves so much in personal quarrels, that they forget, or desert the doctrinal quarrel. Job and his Friends, though they were too mindful of the former, yet they did not forget the latter, and here Job addresses himself unto it. Yet before he enters upon the state of the question, he sets forth his own state, and shews how it was with him; granting (which Eliphaz had made the ground of his accusation) that he was in an extreamly afflicted condition, yet denying what he from thence inferred, that he was therefore wicked, or continued knowingly in any sinful course. He describes his afflictions with much variety of Argument and Elocution, to the seventeenth Verse.

First, Aggravating them by their unmoveableness, or remedilesness: His sorrows were stubborn, and such as would not yield to any kind of remedy.

Verse 6. Though I speak my grief is not asswaged, and though I forbear, what am I eased?

In the former Verse Job speaks in a high strain of assurance, that if his Friends were afflicted, The moving of his lips should asswage their grief: But it seems, his own experience had taught him, that the moving of his lips could not asswage his own grief; Though I speak (saith he here) my grief is not asswaged.

Hence Observe, A man may do that for others which he cannot do for himself.

He may comfort others in their sorrows, when he cannot comfort himself; he may resolve others in their doubts, when he cannot resolve himself; he may answer to cases which their consciences put him, when he cannot answer his own; yea, tis possible for a man to speak such words to another, as may turn him from his sin, and save his soul, and yet himself continue in sin, and lose his own soul for ever. Naturalists have a rule concerning the Senses, That, when a sensible object is brought too near, or laid upon the sense, it not only hinders, but takes away the present sensation. This holds a proportion in rational actings: the nearer any one is to us in relation, the harder it is to fix counsel upon him; and because we are neerest to our selves, therefore it is hardest of all to counsel our selves.

Our Saviour Christ prevents what he foresaw some ready to object against him (Luke 4. 23.) Ye will surely say unto me this Proverb, Physitian heal thy self. The Proverb in its Original is (I conceive) to be understood personally; but as Christ suggests it there, it is to be understood Nationally, or Provincially, Heal thy self, is, heal thy own Countrey; exercise thy power of working miracles there, as well as thou hast done it in other places; that this is the meaning of it, appears plainly by the next words, Whatsoever we have heard done in Canaan, do also in thine own Countrey: For Christ as yet had wrought no mighty works of healing there (Mark 6. 5.) But why was Christ so slow in manifesting himself to his own Countrey-men? He gives the reason (Vers. 24.) And he said, Verily I say unto you, no Prophet is accepted in his own Countrey: The Gospel of Mark (Chap. 6. 4.) adds two closer relations, His own Kin, and his own House: They in a mans house are nearer to him then his kindred abroad; and his kindred are nearer to him then his Countrey-men; now among these, a Prophet hath no honour: They know him so much, that they do not respect him, or his sayings. The Jews said, Is not this the Carpenter, the Son of Mary, the Brother of James, &c. Christ being thus near to them, had little honour among them. Now for as much, as a man is nearer to himself, not only then his Countrey-men, but then any of his Kin; therefore his own counsels and comforts have ordinarily so little effect upon himself; he is not accept in his own breast. There are some indeed so gracious, or great in their own eyes, that they will ask counsel of none but themselves, nor follow any advice but their own; but usually man seeks out, as being neither able to satisfie his own doubts, nor abate his own sorrows, though possibly more able for both, then he to whom he seeks. Though I speak, my grief is not asswaged; and though I forbear, what am I eased?

Some conceive Job speaking here like an Orator, who seems to stand in doubt what to do, and threfore trembles out his Preface in such words as these, Shall I speak, or shall I be silent? Shall I open my lips, or shall I forbear? Job's pain received no check which way soever of these these he took, and therefore it seemed vain to attempt either.

Nunc eo res, redierunt, ut quo me vertam nesciam aut quid agam, nam nec loquendo nec tacendo quicquam proficio. Merc.

Though I speak.] That is, If I stand up in my just defence to answer, and take away your Objections, yet my grief is not answered; that is as busie with me, and as talkative as ever it was; yea, then you object my impatience under sufferings, as an argument of my sin.

And though I forbear.] That is, If I bite in my pain, and speak not, if I stand mute, as attentive to hear you speak, yet my sorrow moves not; yea, then you judge my silence an argument of my secret guilt, and that all is true which you have said against me, because I say nothing for my self. Thus,

What am I eased? Saith the Text in our translation? The Hebrew saith, What goeth from me? That is, What of my pain, what of my sorrow goeth away from me, when I cease, or forbear to speak? So that,

The general sence of this Verse is to shew that his troubles were past hope of redress; they found no cure; none by speech, none by silence: Grief is sometimes eased by speaking, sometimes by silence, either our own or others.

To say nothing is a medicine for some mens sorrow: the sorrow of others cannot be medicin'd, but by saying much: A plaister of words hath cured many a wound, and the more words have been used, the more some wounds have festered, and the anguish of them hath increased.

Hence Observe, There is no means of remedy left for that evil which is not remedied by the use and tryal of contrary means.

If neither speech nor silence ease a mans mind, what can? We find such a kind of arguing (though in a different case) used by Christ (Mat. 11. 16, 17.) Where when he would shew how impossible, or at least how extreamly difficult it was to please the Jews (they were a humorous people, and let a man put himself in what posture he would, they would find some fault, or have somewhat to object against him) Whereunto (saith Christ) shall I liken this generation? (they were so untoward, that Christ speaks as if he were straitened, how to find out a fit comparison for them, or could scarce tell to what they were like; yet he tells us) They are like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling to their fellows, saying, We have piped and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not lamented. When a man will neither mourn with us, nor rejoyce with us, what shall we do with him? How shall we please him? For what company is he fit? That such was the tendency of this similitude, appears plainly in the application which Christ makes (Vers. 18.) For John came neither eating, nor drinking, and they say he hath a Devil: They did not like the mournful, austere course of John: The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they said, Behold a man glutonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of Publicans and sinners: They did not like the free converse of Christ. When a people are of this spirit, or at this lock, that neither a man who is affable and courteous, ready both to receive, and give civilities, is welcome to them, nor yet he who is austere, and reserved, close and strict in his way, can give them any content, who, or what can content them? When neither piping nor mourning, when neither dancing nor sorrowing takes with us, what can? When we would describe a person, whose troublesomeness of spirit seems unanswerable, we say of him, He is quiet neither full nor fasting: That is, He is never quiet, or nothing can make him quiet. Abraham saith to his Nephew Lot (Gen. 13, 8, 9.) Let there be no strife I pray thee, between me and thee, and between thy Herd-men and my Herd-men, for we are brethren, &c. If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right, or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left. Now as it is an Argument of the sweetest spirit, and fairest disposition, when a man is ready to take either hand, rather then break the peace; so it argues the sowrest spirit, and most untractable disposition, when a man will neither go to the right hand nor to the left, when he will neither move forward nor backward; when he will neither give nor take, neither buy nor sell, there is no dealing with such a man, for he waves all the wayes of dealing.

Thus also we conclude a people incorrigible, who continue in their sins, whether God smite or heal, whether he deliver them from, or deliver them up into the hand of judgments, because these are the utmost bounds, or the extreams of all those providential dispensations which God useth at any time to turn a people from their sin.

Again, We say they are unperswadeable, whom neither fair means, nor foul, can reduce; speak them fair, they are naught; speak them foul, they are naught still; promise them good, they remain evil; threaten them with evil, they will not be good. You may carry it out in all experiments, whersoever you find an evil frame of mind or body, or of affairs, which mends not, or doth not alter for the better, by the application of the other contrary, when the former hath been applyed without success, you may write under it (as to humane helps) This is a desperate case, a distemper incurable.

Yet further, Job in these words reflects upon his Friends; as if he had said, Some men by complaining, and opening their sores to those who visit them in their affliction, find their Friends relieving them presently with sound counsel, and pouring the oyl of consolation into their wounded spirits; but alass, it is not so with me, for whether I speak or hold my peace, it is all one; ye are all against me, and are neither perswaded by my speech nor by my silence, to apply proper remedies for the asswaging of my grief, or the easing of my pains.

Hence Note, It is the duty, and should be the care of those who visit Friends in affliction, to pick somewhat out of what they say, or at least to take occasion from their silence, to administer consolation to their grieved minds.

When the Servants of Benhadad came to Ahab to sue for their Masters life; the Text saith (1 Kings 20. 33.) The men did diligently observe whether any thing would come from him (that is, whether any word of hope would come from Ahab) and they did hastily catch it: And Ahab had no sooner said, He is my Brother; but they catcht at this word of comfort, they had what they lookt for, and said, Thy Brother Benhadad. If thou owneſt him as a Brother, surely thou wilt not use him as an Enemy: There is (to the point in hand) a holy cunning in catching up words, which drop from the lips of men in affliction; and 'tis our wisdom to make improvement of them.

As for instance, There was an ancient Professor (as I have been informed) in much distress of conscience, even to despair; he complaining bitterly of his miserable condition to a Friend, let this word fall, That which troubles me most, is, that God will be dishonoured by my fall: This word was hastily catcht at, and turned upon him to the asswaging of his grief, Art thou careful of the honour of God, and dost thou think God hath no care of thee, and of thy salvation? A soul forsaken of God regards not what becomes of the honour of God: Therefore be of good cheer; if Gods heart were not towards thee, thine could not be towards God, or towards the remembrance of his Name. Thus words should be watcht, yea, and silence should be watcht for advantages to ease a distressed soul.

Lastly, These words may refer to God; as if Job had said, Whether I speak, or whether I forbear, God doth not come in to my help, I find no comfort from him; he puts no stop to my pain, nor doth he asswage the floods of grief which are ready to swallow me up. He gives me no ease at my complaining cryes, nor doth he give me any at my patient silence. The next Verse seems most sutable to this exposition, where Job applyes himself to God, shewing what he did to him, both while he spake, and while he held his peace; he wearied him still, and left him in a wearied condition.

Verse 7. But now he hath made me weary, thou hast made desolate all my company.

We may see (in this context) that the spirit of Job was much troubled, by the troubledness of his speech. At this seventh Verse he speaks in the third Person, He hath made me weary: And before he gets to the end of it, he speaks in the second Person, Thou hast made desolate: In the eighth Verse, Thou hast filled me with wrinkles: In the ninth Verse, He teareth me in his wrath: The tenth Verse is Plural, They have gaped upon me: Strange kind of Grammar; sometimes in the third Person, sometimes in the second, sometimes in the Singular, sometimes in the Plural number; His mind was uneven, or unsetled, and so was his discourse:

discourse. We must not play the Criticks with the words of man in pain, nor submit their sentences to a Desk of Grammarians: Broken language, and incongruities of speech, do well enough become broken hearts, and wounded spirits: God will not call his Scholars in the School of affliction to the Ferula for such faults or false Latine falling from their mouthes, either in prayer or conferences, while their hearts are true, and the language of their spirits pure.

But now he hath made me weary.

אך עתה

But now.] Now, is not here a Particle of time only, or a specification of the season, noting that then God either began, or still continued to make him weary; but it carries also a strong asseveration, or the certainty of the thing; as in that promissory exhortation (Hag. 2. 4.) Yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the Lord, and be strong, O Joshua. Though you see things yet below expectation, though this be a day of small things, yet take heart and encourage your selves to carry on this reforming work. Yet now be strong, even now, when so many things might weaken both your hearts and hands, and be ye assured that I will not reject your confidence, but will cause you to prosper in it. And in promises, besides the certainty of the thing promised, and the speedy fulfilling of them, it intimates much sweetness of affection in him that makes the promise. On the contrary, in threatenings, and comminations, besides the certainty and speed of them, it notes the sharpness and severity of his spirit, who gives those threats. So (Isa. 5. 5.) And now go to, I will tell you what I will do to my Vineyard. Now, go too, is chiding chear. As if the Lord had thus rated them; What? Have you served me thus, as sure as I formerly planted and hedged this Vineyard, so surely will I now pull down the hedge, and root it up. In this fulness of sence take it here, But now he hath made me weary; certainly, or of a truth he hath; I was once sweetly and strongly hedged about with mercy, But now he hath made me weary and desolate.

Nunc in principio dictionis quandam cordis dulcedinem connotare solet. Bold.

He hath made me weary.] He, is not expressed in the Hebrew, and therefore there is a doubt who is meant by this He.

Some understand it of his grief and sorrow, and read it thus, But now it hath made me weary; my pain hath tyred me.

Nunc autem oppressit me dolor meus. Vulg.

Secondly, Others understand it of what had been spoken by his Friends; your tedious discourses, and severer censures have quite spent my spirits, and made me weary.

Our Translation leads us to a person, and our Interpretation leads us to God; He, that is, God, hath made me weary. Job every where acknowledgeth, that God was the Author and Orderer of all his sorrows: Now he

Non solum fatigationē denotat, sed & fastidiū molestissimū, tum animi tum corporis.

Hath made me [weary] Or, He hath wearied me; it is but one word, and it signifies not an ordinary weariness, nor such a weariness as comes upon us after a turn or two in the Fields: A man who walks into the air, to refresh himself, may come home weary; but it notes such weariness as we feel after long and tedious travel, or after a hard journey; yea, it notes not only weariness of body, but the weariness of the mind. It is possible for a man to weary his body, and yet his mind remain unmoved; bare outward action stirs not the mind. To ride, to run, to dig, or thresh, weary the body, not the mind; but those works which with action have contention in them, as to argue, and dispute, do at once exercise and weary both mind and body. The weariness of the mind is the most painful weariness: Job's weariness takes in both; Thou hast wearied my body, and wearied my mind too; I am full of sores without, and of sorrow within. And such was that weariness spoken of by the Prophet (Isa. 47. 13.) Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels: That is, In going long journeys, to ask counsel of thy adored Wise men, or Wizzards rather, of Southsayers, and Diviners; in this pursuit thou hast laboured thy body, and vexed thy soul, but profited neither. After all thy travels what hast thou brought home but weariness? Tyred flesh, and a tyred spirit, is all the fruit of our addresses for comfort to any but God, or in the way of God.

Sept, Exponunt de defectu rationis q. d. vix præ dolore sui mei compos.

The Septuagint translate yet higher, Thou hast made me mad, or beside my self: The Hebrew word signifies to distract, or to put one out of his wits: As if Job had said, I am scarce my own man, being over-burdened with those sorrows God hath laid upon me.

Hence Observe, First, A state of affliction is a wearisome estate.

A man may be wearied who never stirs foot from the place where he stands or sits. O the weariness of a sick bed! Suffering wearies more then doing; and none are so weary as they who are wearied with doing nothing.

Observe Secondly, Some afflictions are a weariness both to soul and body.

There are afflictions which strike quite through; and there are afflictions which are only skin-deep: As there is a filthiness of the flesh, and a filthiness of the spirit, properly so called (for though every sin of the flesh, or outward man, defile the spirit, yet there are many filthinesses of the spirit, which are never acted by the flesh, or outward man.) Thus the Apostle distinguisheth (2 Cor. 7. 1.) There are also some filthinesses which strike quite through flesh and spirit, body and soul. Thus there are some afflictions which are meerly upon the flesh; there are other afflictions which are purely upon the spirit; the skin is whole, the body is in health, but the soul is wounded, an Arrow sticks within: And there are a sort of afflictions which strike quite through body and soul; as old Simeon tells the Virgin Mary, A Sword shall pierce through thy soul (Luke 2. 35.) Or as the Psalmist speaks of Joseph (Psal. 105. 18.) according to the letter of the Hebrew, Whose feet they hurt with fetters, his soul came into iron, or the iron entred into his soul: Such afflictions are like the Roll spoken of by the Prophet Ezekiel (Chap. 2.) Written with lamentations, mourning, and woe, within and without: Some woes are written only without, some woes are written only within, others are written without and within. Their characters are legible upon the flesh; and their effects descend and sink into the spirit. Job's afflictions were of this extension, he was smitten all over, and written quite through with woes and lamentations.

Thirdly, As the word reacheth the distemper of the brain.

Observe, Some afflictions do not only afflict, but unsettle the mind.

They unsettle not only the comforts, but the powers and faculties of it: A man under some afflictions can scarce speak sence while he acts faith, or do rationally while he lives graciously.

A soul that hath grace, yea much grace, may appear much scanted in the use of reason: As oppression (from men) makes a wise man mad (Eccles. 7. 7.) And the more wise a man is, the more mad it makes him: Fools can bear oppression, and not be troubled much, because they do not understand what justice and right means; and that's the reason why in those parts of the World where Tyrants reign, they love to keep the people ignorant, poor, and low, for such are not much sensible of their oppressions; but oppression is very grievous to an ingenious, wise, and understanding man, and therefore 'tis said to make him mad: The purest intellectuals have the quickest sense of injuries. Thus also some afflictions from the hand of God may (in a degree) make a godly wise man mad, and put him for a present plunge beyond the command of his understanding. It is the confession of holy David (Psal. 73. 22.) I was even as a beast before thee, so foolish was I and ignorant: If David a godly man acted below reason, when he saw the prosperity of the wicked; how much more may a godly man act below reason, under the feelings of his own adversity. Heman is express in this (Psal. 88. 15.) While I suffer thy terrors I am distracted: Yet the word in the Psalm doth not signifie properly the distraction of a man that is mad, but the distraction of a man that is in doubt; or the distraction of a man who knows not what to do, not of a man who knows not what he doth, and yet that distraction doth often lead to a degree of this; for a man who is much troubled to know what to do, and cannot know it, grows at last to do he knows not what. We may also take in that about distraction arising from affliction, which was toucht about distraction caused by oppression: Those Christians, who are highest in spirituals, and have the quickest sense of Gods dispensations towards them, do soonest fall into it; whereas a soul upright in the main, yet being of weak and low parts, and of small experience in the things of God, will go, yea groan under a heavy burden of affliction all his dayes, and not be much moved with it.

Affliction is the burthen which God layes upon us, and it is our duty, not only to bear it, but to bear it with contentedness; yea we should labor to bear it with joyfulness. My brethren (saith the Apostle James, Chap. 1.) Account it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; that is, Into divers afflictions. But yet the best cannot alwayes rejoyce in temptations, nor triumph under a cross; when affliction according to that description of the word (*Heb.*4.12.) comes quick, and powerful, as a two edged Sword, and pierceth to divide between the soul and the spirit, the joynts and the marrow, when affliction (I say) cuts to the quick, a Believer is put hard to it; he may be so far (for a time) from triumphing and rejoycing, that he can scarcely find himself contented or patient; his burden may cause him to cry out, O, the weariness!

Carnal men cry out at every burden of duty in the service of God, O what a weariness is it! They are tired with an hours attendance in holy things; O the burthen! Much more do they cry out under the lighter burdens of affliction. How tedious is a day, or an hour of affliction; two or three fits of an ague, an aking tooth, a soar finger, O what a weariness is this! They sink presently. True Believers, as they have more patience in doing, so in suffering; yet even their patience doth not alwayes hold out; they, as Job, speak sometimes mournfully, and complainingly: But now, he hath made us weary.

Thou hast made desolate all my company.

Quod loquitur n unc in secũda nunc in tertia persona nihil in sententia mutat id quod admodum frequẽs est in Scriptura Pined.

It was He in the first clause, Thou in the second; he and thou are the same person in Jobs Grammar, as was toucht before.

Thou hast made [desolate.] The word Shamam, signifies to waste, and destroy, and that not by an ordinary destruction, but so to destroy, as works the beholders into amazement and wonder: This word signifies both to wonder, and to destroy; because great destructions cause wonder.

Vastari seu desolari, ita ut videntes obstupescant & horreant.

Thou hast made desolate [all my company:] Thou hast made such a desolation among them, that all who are about me lift up their hands (as we say) and bless themselves, admiring to see this day. God brought such a desolation upon Jerusalem, as set the World a wondering (*Lam.*4.12.) The Kings of the Earth, and all the Inhabitants of the World would not have believed, that the Adversary and the Enemy should have entered into the Gates of Jerusalem: Christ will come (at last with such mercies) to be glorified in his Saints, as will cause him to be admired in all them that believe (2 *Thes.*1.10.) He now comes sometimes with such afflictions to his Saints, as easily cause them who believe much more those who believe not to admire. Thou hast wonderfully desolated, or wasted,

Et in nihilũ redacti sunt omnes artus mei. Vulg.

All my [company.] The word which we translate Company, is rendred, The joynts or members of the body by the Vulgar Latine, Thou hast reduced all my members to nothing: As if he had said, Thou hast loosened the whole compages, or structure of my bones and body, thou hast untied, or cut asunder all the ligaments that held me together. This translation is but an allusion; because the members of the natural body are like a company of men joyned together in a civil or spiritual body, which is therefore commonly called a Corporation. Some contend much for this sense, Thou hast made desolate all the members of my body: Especially, because the scattering of his Family doth not so well agree, or comply (say they) with the weariness before complained of, nor with the leanness, and wrinkles, which are spoken of afterward; both which belong properly to the body.

Yet I pass that, and take the word as we read it, to express a distinct affliction, thou hast wearied me in my person, and hast made desolate all my company; What company?

q. d. desolasti omnẽ Synagogã meã. Bold.

First, Some understand it of the company which used to flock to his Synagogue, in holy duties, and exercises: As if he had answered the words of Eliphaz (*Chap.*15.34.) The Congregation (or Company) of Hypocrites shall be desolate: Here, saith Job, I grant it, God hath made desolate all my company. The Synagogues, and places of publick meeting were wont to be filled, but now that resort is stayed, they are all scattered, or diverted, and those publick places are filled with howlings and lamentations. Thus he grants Eliphaz what he had objected, and yet denies what he thence inferred, that he was an Hypocrite.

Secondly, Rather, interpret it of the company he had in his own House, or for his particular Family. So it is a renewed complaint of the loss of his Children and Servants, of his Friends and Familiars, who used to resort to him, and stay about him.

Thou hast made desolate all my company: Some of Job's company were made desolate; that is, they were destroyed; most of his Servants were slain by the Chaldeans, and Sabeans, and all his Children were slain by the fall of a House (*Chap.*1.) This company was made desolate indeed: Yet when he saith, Thou hast made desolate all my company, his meaning is, as Mr. Broughton translates, Thou hast made me desolate of all my company; that is, I am left alone.

Heman complains much when he wanted this mercy, Lover and Friend hast thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkness. Job makes, as a more particular, so a more pathetical enumeration of this loss (Chap. 19.13, 14.) To be desolate, is so great an affliction, that it is often put for all afflictions; and to be desolate of company, is the worst desolateness. When David had said, I am desolate and afflicted, he presently adds, The sorrows of my heart are enlarged (*Psal.*25.16, 17.) A man may be much afflicted, and yet not desolate, but a man cannot be at all desolate, but he must be extreamly afflicted. When the Prophet would put all the miseries of the Jews into one word, he puts it into this (*Isa.*1.7.) Your Countrey is desolate, your Land strangers shall devour it in your presence: And when a Land is devoured of strangers, either it is made desolate of its own company, or its own company is made desolate. Babylon boasts (Revel. 18.7.) I sit a Queen, and am no widow; that is, as I have power, so I have resort and company enough, I am not desolate: The Apostle puts these two together, Widow-hood, and Desolateness (1 *Tim.*5.5.) Now, she that is a widow and desolate, &c. So that when Babylon saith, I am no widow, her meaning is, I am not desolate; and hence the punishment of Babylon is threatned in this language (Revel. 17.16.) The ten horns which thou sawest upon the Beast, these shall hate the Whore, and make her desolate, &c.

Those ten horns are ten Kings, who sometime doted upon the painted beauty of that Whore, and then made frequent addresses to her, and did throng about her from all parts of the World; but when once their eyes shall be opened, their hearts will soon be alienated; They shall hate the Whore. And then as they withdraw affection, so visits and messages; Babylons Courts shall be crouded with Suiters no longer: Thus they shall make her desolate of the company of her old friends, before they make her desolate by bringing in new enemies, who shall strip her, not only of her company, but of her cloathes, yea of her skin; they shall make her naked, and eat her flesh, and burn her with fire (Revel. 17.16.) Thus, as the misery which came upon Jerusalem, so the misery which shall come upon Babylon meet in this, The making of their company desolate: yet in this they differ, the desolations of Jerusalem shall be (at least mystically) repaired, but the desolations of mystical Babylon (when they are fully come upon her) shall be irreparable.

Man is naturally (as the Philosopher calls him) a sociable creature, he loves company; they who are for a solitary life, Monks and Anchorets, seem to have put off the nature of man. There is an elective aloneness, or retiredness, at sometimes very useful for contemplation aad prayer, And we are never less alone, then when we are so alone; for then God is more specially with us, and we with him. It is said of Jacob (Gen. 32.24.) Then Jacob was left alone, not that Jacob's company had left and forsaken him, but but that Jacob for a time had left his company? So, some render the Text actively, He stayed, or remained alone. Jacob stayed alone purposely, that he might have freer communion with God in that recess and retirement from the creature: It is good for man to be alone from the company of man, that he may enjoy (more fully) the presence of God.

Yet God himself said at the first when man was created, It is not good for man to be alone: There was no moral evil in that aloneness (for when God spake this word, there was no such evil in the visible World) but God called it evil, because it was so incovenient for the civil well-being and inconsistent with the natural propagation of man. And therefore as in reference to both these evils, God said with his own mouth, It is not good for man to be alone; so in reference to the former of the two, God said by Solomon, Two is better then one, and wo to him that is alone (*Eccles.*4.9,10.) Job puts his aloneness among his woes, Thou hast made desolate all my company.

But it may be said, Had Job no company? Were not his Friends about him? Did not these three come to mourn with him, and to comfort him? And had they not been in discourse with him all this while?

Yes, he had company, but it was not suitable company; he had evil ones about him, as he complains (Chap. 19. & *Chap.*30.) and though his three Friends were good men, yet to him they were no good company, because so unpleasant in their converse with him.

Hence Note, Some company is a burthen.

We say of many men, We had rather have their room then their company. Man loves company, but 'tis the company of those he loves. The comfort of our lives depends much upon society, but more upon the suitableness of society: It is better to dwell in the corner of a house top, then with a brawling Woman in a wide house (Prov. 21.9.) And it is better to be in a Desert among wilde Beasts, then in a populous City among beastly men. This made the Prophet desire a lodging in the Wilderness (*Jer.*9.2.) The Countrey about Sodom was pleasant, like the Garden of God, yet how was the righteous soul of Lot vexed with the filthy and unrighteous conversation of the Sodomites? How uneasie are our lives made to us by dwelling among either false Friends or open Enemies?

In the Creation, when God said, It is not good for man to be alone; he subjoyns, Let us make him a help meet for him. Adam had all the beasts of the earth about him, but they were no company for him, man knows not how to converse with beasts, or employ his reason with those that have none. As, it is not good for man to be alone, so to be in company that is not meet for him is as bad, or worse then to be alone. Therefore saith God, Let us make him a help meet for him; the making of a Woman brought in meet company for mankind; yet some men are as unmeet company for men as beasts are, and are therefore in Scripture called Beasts. Paul fought with such beasts at Ephesus; there are few places free of them, and many places are full of them. David crys out, Wo is me that I am constrained to dwell in Mesech, &c.

There was company enough, but it was woful company. The Primitive Saints associated themselves, they continued in fellowship one with another, as well as in the Apostles Doctrine, or in breaking of bread and prayer (Acts 2.42.) They were all of one mind, and were therefore fit to make one body. The communion and fellowship of the Saints, is the lower heaven of Saints. And the making of such a company desolate, is the saddest desolation that can be made on earth: Communion of Saints in Heaven, is one great accession to the joy of Heaven. And 'tis a great comfort to the Saints in the midst of all the ill neighbourhood which they meet with here, to remember that they shall meet with no ill neighbours there; none but Friends there, none but loving Friends. There shall not be a cross thought, much less a cross word or action among those many millions of glorified Saints for ever; nor shall there be any among them there but Saints; no tares in that field, nor chaff in that floor, no Goats in that Fold, no nor any Wolves in Sheep-skins, no prophane ones there, no nor any Hypocrites there. Unsutable company would render our lives miserable in Heaven it self. If God should say to the godly and the wicked (as David once did to Mephibosheth and Ziba, Thou and Ziba divide the Land) divide Heaven among you; might not they answer (with reverence) as Mephibosheth did to David, Nay let them take it all to themselves, O our souls come not into their secret, and unto their assembly let not our honour be joyned: if Swearers, Adulterers, Lyers, should be our company in Heaven, Heaven it self, were unheaven'd, and everlasting life would be an everlasting death. And that which further argues the burthensomness of unsutable company, is, that even wicked men themselves cannot but confess that they are burthened with the company of those who are good; if such come in presence where they associate in any sinful converse, how weary are they of their company? How do they even sweat at the sight of them? And how glad are they when such turn their backs, and are gone: the only reason why they like them not, is because they are not like them, and they are not good company, because they are good. All company is made desolate to us, which is not made suitable to us. Job had many about him, yet he complains, Thou hast made desolate all my company.

Job goes on yet to describe his troubles; he wanted desireable company about him, but he had store of witnesses against him; he was emptied of his comforts, but filled with sorrows, as might be seen in the symptoms and effects of sorrow.

Vers. 8. Thou hast filled me with wrinckles, which is a witness against me: and my leanness rising up in me, beareth witness to my face.

As if he had said, Though I hold my peace, and say nothing, though I do not aggravate my grief, yea though I should extenuate and hide it, yet there are witnesses enow of it; my wrinkles speak my grief, and my leanness shews that I am feasted with the sowre herbs of sorrow: That's the general sense of this Verse.

Si vellem cælare aut verbis extenuare dolorē meū rugæ meæ testimonium dant, &c.

Thou hast filled me with wrinkles.] It is but one word in the Hebrew, we might render it, Thou hast wrinkled me; or as Mr. Broughton, Thou hast made me all wrinkled. The word is not found in this sense any where else in Scripture; but very frequently among the Rabbins. There are also two other significations of it which Interpreters have taken in here.

Rugas contraxit active corrugavit.

וקמטתני
& corrugasti me. Non alibi quā in hoc libro in scriptura reperitur. Quod succidisti me, testimonio est. Merc.

First, It signifies, To cut off, or to cut down (*Chap.*22.15, 16.) Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have troden? Which were cut down out of time: That old way was the way of sin (the way of holiness is the oldest way, but the way of sin is a very old way.) They who have trod the way of sin, were cut down by judgment, and they were cut down out of time; that is, the course of Divine Justice prevented the course of nature and struck them to death before death useth to strike. So some render it here, and then the sense riseth thus, Thou hast cut me down by the stroke of these afflictions, and this is a witness against me.

Secondly, The word according to the Chaldee, signifies to bind, and fasten one with Cords, or with fetters of Iron, as Malefactors are bound in Prison (*Prov.*5.22.) His own iniquity shall take the wicked, and he shall be holden with the Cords of his sin. The Hebrew word which we render to hold, or fasten, is expressed by this of Job in the Chaldee Paraphrase. Taking this sense of the word, the interpretation given of the whole is, Thou hast bound, or straitened me with the cords of my affliction, lest I should get out, or make an escape, and this is a witness against me: There is a truth in both these readings, as to this place; but because wrinkles are more proper to the leanness which follows, therefore I shall not stay upon them, but keep to our own reading.

In significatione Chaldaica exponitur pro ligare & constringere.

Quod his dolorū vinculis constrictum me tenes, ne quæ elabi queam, testimonium fecit in me. Merc.

Thou hast filled me with [wrinkles.] Wrinckles are caused two wayes.

First, Through old age; for then the moisture of the body being consumed, and so the skin contracted, wrinckles appear: These natural wrinckles cannot be avoided, if nature hold out to old age.

Secondly, There are accidental wrinckles, such as are caused by strong diseases, which sucking up, or drawing out the moisture of the body, fade the beauty of it. Great sicknesses hasten on gray hairs, and make a young man look old. Job was not filled with the wrinckles of old age (he was was in the ſtrength of nature at that time) but he was filled with the wrinckles of ſickneſs and ſorrow; grief had made furrows in his face, and his tears had often filled them: we commonly ſay, Sorrow is dry; 'tis ſo, becauſe it is a drier. Solomon tells us, that A merry heart doth good like a medicine, but a broken ſpirit (which is the effect of much ſorrow) drieth up the bones (Prov. 17. 22.) The Church crys out in the Book of Lamentations, My fleſh my skin he hath made old (*Lam.*3.4.) How did God make them old? He made them old not by giving them many years, but by giving them many troubles. Many troubles in one year, will make a man older then many years.

We have heard of ſome, whoſe hearts being filled with vexing cares have filled their heads with gray hairs in a very ſhort time. As ſome have an Art to ripen Fruits, before nature ripens them; ſo the Lord hath a power to haſten old age, before nature makes us old. Thou haſt made my skin old; that is, full of wrinckles and leanneſs; theſe are the liveries which old age gives. The Apoſtle aſſures us, that Chriſt ſhall one day preſent the Church to himſelf, in the perfection of ſpiritual beauty and glory; that beauty and glory is deſcribed by the removal of that from her ſpiritual eſtate, which Job complains of in his temporal eſtate: Job was full of ſpots and wrinkles, but ſhe ſhall appear, Not having ſpot or wrinckle (*Epheſ.*5.27.) that is, Without any note or mark of old age upon her. A ſpot defaceth the beauty of a Garment, and wrinckles ſpoil the beauty of the face. An old Garment is full of ſpots, and an old face is full of wrinkles. Old things paſs away when we are made new creatures by grace; yet in that ſtate (becauſe we are not perfectly freed from the old man) our garments have ſome ſpots, and our faces ſome wrinkles upon them: But in the ſtate of glory, when all old things, even all the image of the old Adam ſhall be totally aboliſhed, we ſhall not have ſo much as one ſpot or one wrinkle. Believers have now a righteouſneſs in Chriſt without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing; they ſhall then have a holineſs in themſelves, without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing; that is, They ſhall not only not have any ſpot or wrinkle upon them, but they ſhall have nothing like it, nothing which hath any relation to it, nothing which either themſelves or others ſhall miſtake for it, they ſhall neither ſuſpect nor be ſuſpected to have a ſpot or a wrinkle about them. A perfect ſoul-ſtate, and a perfect ſtate of body, hath no wrinkle in it. Job to ſhew the decays and blemiſhes of his body, ſaith he was full of wrinkles.

Again, Theſe wrinkles by an elegant metaphor may refer to his whole outward condition: For as a mans face is wrinkled when he grows old, ſo are his riches when he grows poor, and ſo is his honour when he grows out of repute. Poverty is the wrinkle of riches, and diſgrace is the wrinkle of honour; we may take in all three here, for not only was Job's body, but his wealth and honour were extreamly wrinkled; and therefore he had great cauſe to cry out according to all the interpretations, Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles.

Which witneſs againſt me.] I ſhall give the meaning of that, when I have opened the latter clauſe, where it is repeated, My leanneſs riſing up in me, beareth witneſs to my face: both parts of the Verſe have the ſame meaning.

My leanneſs riſing up in me.] Some think, that Job anſwers what Eliphaz had given, as part of the deſcription of a wicked man, in the fulneſs of his proſperity (*Chap.*15.27.) where he tells us, that, He covereth his face with fatneſs, and maketh collops of fat on his flanks; as if he had ſaid, Friend Eliphaz, thou haſt told me, that wicked men are fat and full, if ſo, what are they who are lean and meagre? canſt thou according to thy own rule, read wickedneſs in my phyſiognomie? My leanneſs riſeth up in me, canſt thou raiſe an argument from that againſt me?

My leanneſs.] Job's body was lean, his Purſe and Name were lean, his leanneſs and his wrinkles were of the ſame extent, both reaching all his worldly concernments. The Lord threatens Idolaters (*Zeph.*2.11.) that he will famiſh, or make lean (ſo we put in the Margin) all their Gods. Jehovah, the true God, who ſaith to man (Pſal. 50.12.) If I were hungry, I would not tell thee, tells theſe falſe Gods, that he will make them hungry: But what was the meat of theſe Gods? It was the honour and credit, the worſhip and ſervice which they had among men. Indeed they who deny the true God, his due honour and worſhip, do what they can to famiſh, or make him lean; and when the true God (as he hath done by the Preaching of the Goſpel) turns men from Idols to ſerve, and worſhip him the living God, then he famiſheth thoſe Gods: When Idols loſe their eſteem, their leanneſs riſeth up, and they go down. Thus alſo it is with man, his leanneſs may be ſaid to riſe when his credit falls.

Further, There is a twofold leanneſs.

First, Of the ſoul, or inward man.

Secondly, Of the body, or outward man.

When the Jews luſted in the Wilderneſs, and called for fleſh to ſatisfie the fleſh: God (ſaith the Text, *Pſal.*106.15.) gave them their requeſt, but ſent leanneſs into their ſoul. The ſoul in a proper ſenſe, is neither fat nor lean, and therefore the ſoul in this place of the Pſalm, muſt be taken improperly, or elſe the leanneſs of it muſt. The ſoul is put improperly for the body, or for the whole man, and ſo, he ſent leanneſs into their ſouls, is, the curſe of God cauſed them to pine ſecretly, or he ſlew the fatteſt of them (openly) and ſmote down the choſen men in Iſrael: So this leanneſs is expounded (*Pſal.*78.31.) as if he had ſaid, God made them a thin and a lean company before he had done with them. Yet beſides this (I conceive) the Text doth intend ſome ſpiritual judgment; and then the ſoul is taken in a proper ſenſe, but leanneſs in an improper ſenſe: and ſo, he ſent leanneſs into their ſouls, is, while they inordinately deſired meat for their bodies, God withheld the ordinary food of their ſouls: He did not adminiſter his grace and holy ſpirit (which are the fatners of the ſoul) while they were thus hungry after dainties for the fleſh.

Job's Friends thought him a lean ſoul, but he here confeſſes the leanneſs of his body; and in that his continual ſorrow the cauſe of it. So the Prophet crys out, My leanneſs, my leanneſs, wo unto me (*Iſa.*24.16.)

My leanneſs [riſing up.] Fatneſs riſeth up, and not leanneſs, when a man grows lean, his fleſh falls and abates; skin and bone ſtick together, Why then doth he ſay, My leanneſs riſeth up?

Though, when a man is lean, his fleſh falls, yet his bones riſe: A fat mans bones are (as it were) buried in fleſh, you can ſcarce feel his ribs, but when he grows lean, his bones ſtick out, and riſe up: That is the meaning here, my leanneſs riſing up.

Job aſcribes a rational act, both to his wrinkles and to his leanneſs, as if both did ſpeak, and which is more, give evidence concerning him; he brings them forth as witneſſes at the bar, this ſpeaks, and that ſpeaks, he doubles it, My wrinkles witneſs againſt me, and my leanneſs riſing up witneſſeth to my face: When a witneſs is to give in his evidence in any cauſe before a Judge, he riſeth up, or ſtandeth forth, that all may ſee him; Job preſents his leanneſs in the proper poſture of a witneſs riſing up.

Maciei videtur dare perſonam ut paulo ante rugis.

The Original varies ſomewhat in the latter clauſe from the former; we render both by witneſſing, but we may read it thus, Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles, that hath been, or is a witneſs, or (as M. Broughton reads) a proof, my leanneſs riſing up (or which riſeth up againſt me) anſwers (or ſpeaketh) to my face. The meaning is, Theſe outward evils are evidence enough to my Friends, that God is angry with me, and that I am wicked againſt God.

Job grants that thoſe wrinkles, and this leanneſs were witneſſes of his afflictions, he never queſtioned their teſtimony, as to that point, neither indeed could he. Jonadab ſaid to Amnon, Why art thou being the Kings Son, lean, or thin, from day to day, wilt thou not tell me? (2 *Sam.*13.4.) His leanneſs told his Friends plain enough, that all was not well; he read that in his face, only he could not read the particular ilneſs there. If we ſee a young man, eſpecially the Son of a Great man, or of a King (who is waited upon with all worldly delights) wrinkled, and lean, is it not a witneſs that he hath been ſick, or is overwhelmed with ſorrow? theſe teſtifie to his face, he cannot conceal it.

Magnũ cevtè peccatum, quod tantũ in florente illa ætate deformitatẽ & ſenilem ſpeciẽ induxit. Putant tãtas afflictiones teſtes eſſe magnæ culpæ & iræ Dei. Coc.

But Job's Friends ſaid, theſe were witneſſes of his ſin: they produced the wrinkles of his body as a witneſs of his wrinkled ſoul; and the leanneſs of his outward man, as an argument of his inward leanneſs; they ſaid, theſe teſtified plainly, that he was not only a great ſinner, but an Hypocrite: And thus they argued all along, this was their conſtant plea; Job muſt needs be (according to this opinion) opinion) a man of an evil life, because his life was filled with evils; Thou hast filled me with wrinkles, which is a witness against me, &c.

Little afflictions leave no wrinkles, no leanness behind them, we recover out of them, and nothing appears of them; as it is in sinning, some sins leave no mark, such are our daily infirmities, and common failings; but there are other sins, which leave a mark behind them, you cannot get them off suddenly, it may be you cannot claw off the marks of some sins as long as you live: though the sin be fully pardoned, yet the mark, the wrinkle, the leanness of it may remain to your dying day. David being defiled with adultery and murder, prays, Cause the bones which thou hast broken to rejoyce: Those two were such sins as broke his very bones; they were to his soul, as the breaking of a bone is to the body: If a man break a bone, though it be well Set, yet it leaves a mak. David carried the skar of those sins to his Grave: Though God had forgiven those sins, and did not remember them, to impute them to David, yet when God had occasion to speak of David to his highest commendation, he could not forbear the mention of those sins (1 Kings 15.5.) David did that which was right in the Lord, and turned not aside from any thing that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah. The wrinkle or stain of that sin stuck upon David's reputation, when the guilt of it was quite removed, and washed off from his person. 'Tis so with afflictions, some afflictions leave no mark, others go deep: Though all afflictions are light comparatively to the weight of glory, as the Apostle speaks (*2 Cor.*4.17.) For our light affliction which is but for a moment, works for us a far more exceeding, and eternal weight of glory: Yet afflictions being compared among themselves, some are light, and some are heavy: As a Cart that is heavy laden, cuts deep into the earth, and tells you where it hath gone; so doth the wheel of a heavy afflicton drawn over body, soul, or state.

Secondly, Observe (which is the natural theology of the Text.)

Wrinkles, and leanness in youth, or strength of age are an argument of extraordinary sorrow.

Thirdly, Take the words according to the sense of Jobs friends, which Job also hints as meeting with their objection, They witness against me: that is, You use them, you bring them as witnesses against me:

Then Note, Great afflictions are looked on as proofs, or witnesses of great sins.

We no sooner hear of, or see a man under great afflictions, but our first thought is surely he hath committed some great sin. This is almost every man's suspicion; but it is an ill grounded suspicion. This point was spoken to (Chap. 10. 17.) where Job tells the Lord, Thou hast renewed thy witnesses against me, &c. There 'twas shewed how afflictions are brought in by God and man as a witness; and this was the greatest evidence, and (upon the matter) all the evidence which the Friends of Job brought against him, his wrinkles, and his leanness: I shall here only add this caution.

Take heed of passing judgment upon the evidence of such witnesses as these, wrinkles, and leanness; for though every wrinkle witnesseth that a man is a sinner (were it not for sin we should have remained ever in our body and outward condition, as Believers shall be restored by Christ, without a wrinkle) yet they are not witnesses that a man is wicked: I may say two things of these witnesses.

First, They are always doubtful witnesses.

Secondly, For the most part they are false witnesses.

It is a very questionable and uncertain evidence which afflictions give against us: For no man knows love, or hatred, by all that is before him: We can but guess at the best, by what they say. But usually they bear false witness against the innocent; so they did against Job; they witnessed that of him to his Friends which was not right. Therefore the Vulgar translates the latter branch (though not well to the letter of the Original, yet well as to the sense) A false witness is risen up against my face, contradicting me; that is, Opposing or weakning all that I have said concerning my own innocence. Yea if we make affliction a witness, we may rather make it a witness of sincerity, and of grace, a mark of adoption and sonship, a mark of divine favour and fatherly love, then of man's wickedness, or of God's rejection and disfavour. The word is clear and expres for this (*Heb.*12. 6, 7,8.) For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every Son whom he receiveth, &c. But if ye be without chastisement whereof all are partakers, then are ye Bastards and not Sons. So then, our wrinkles and our leanness may upon Scripture warrant, be brought as witnesses for us, but we have no warrant to conclude upon their witness, either against our selves, or others.

But it seems Job had a higher witness against him (if such witnesses might be allowed) then a wrinkled skin, or a lean face: Behold now his torn flesh, and his limbs rent in sunder, as if (not only like Daniel) he had been cast into a Lyons Den, but as if (which Daniel did not) he had felt the worst of the Lyons teeth and pawes.

Vers. 9. He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me; he gnasheth upon me with his teeth, mine enemy sharpeneth his eye upon me.

Strange language! He teareth me in his wrath who hateth me. Job gives us a description of the Lords dealing with him, in allusion to the fury of wild Beasts, Lyons, Tygers, and Bears, who gnash their teeth, and sparkle with their eyes. when they either fight one with another, or fall upon their prey.

He teareth me in his wrath who hateth me.

'Tis doubted whom Job meaneth by this Tearer: Some judge this Title applicable only to the Devil, and interpret Job speaking of him; the Devil hateth me, He teareth me in his wrath: Job was delivered into the hand of the Devil (*Chap.*2.) And this is the courtship of Hell, He teareth.

Secondly, Others understand it of his extream pain and torturing disease, that tore him like a savage Beast.

A third expounds it of his Friends, as if he compared them to wild Beasts, who in stead of comforting his spirit, did (upon the matter) tear his flesh between their teeth.

Fourthly, 'Tis conceived, he means those vain ones of whom he speaks (Chap. 19.) that came about him, and troubled him.

But fifthly, and most generally, this Text is interpreted of God himself, He teareth me in his wrath who hateth me. For though Job speaks here distractedly, discovering rather his grief then his enemy; or as a man wounded and smitten in the dark, he perceives he hath an enemy, he feels the smart, and bears the blows, but he is not able to see who hurts him, yet in this confusion of language, his heart was still upon God who ordered, and disposed all those armies of sorrow, which assaulted him on every side.

He [teareth] me in his wrath.] The Hebrew word Taraph is near in sound to our English Tear, and it significth to tear as a Lyon his prey (*Gen.*49.9.) Judah is a Lyons whelp, from the prey my Son thou art gone up. The same word in the Verb notes Tearing, and in the Noun a prey, because the prey is torn by the teeth, or claws of the Lyon.

He teareth me in his [wrath.] Wild Beasts tear not so much for wrath, as for hunger; they tear out of a desire to fill themselves, rather then out of malice to destroy others. But Job saith, He teareth me in his wrath who [hateth] me.

The word signifies not an ordinary, but an inward hatred, and with the change of a letter it is the same by which the Devil is expressed, Satan, an adversary, or the adversary; so called because of his extream hatred against mankind, yea against Christ himself. Job speaks of God as if he bare such a hatred against him as Satan doth, an inward perfect hatred.

Thus some translate, He prosecutes me with inward hatred: A hard expression of God; Doth he tear a harmless soul, and tear him in wrath? Yet this is not all; to make up the measure of this excessive language, take two aggravations more.

He gnasheth upon me with his teeth.] Job pursues the allusion still: Beasts (as it were) whet their teeth that they may devour their prey: This action of gnashing the teeth is ascribed to men, and it notes four things.

First,

Rugæ meæ testimonium dicunt contra me, & suscitatur falsiloquus adversus faciē meā cōtradicēs mihi. Vulg.

Ejusmodi querimoniæ in neminem certo jactatæ afflicti hominis propriæ sunt.

טרף Feravit prædā rapiēdo & lacerādo propriē est.

חרק Frenduit dentibus; est invidētiū, irascentium irridentium habitus. Loquitur ad similitudinem bestiæ quæ homini cōminando dentes contra ipsū parat. Aquin.

First, Extream envy (*Pſal.*12.10.) The wicked ſhall ſee it and be grieved, he ſhall gnaſh with his teeth and melt away; the deſire of the wicked ſhall periſh: But at what was this wicked man grieved, till he gnaſhed his teeth? Was it a grief of compaſſion at the miſery of others? No, it was a grief of envy at the proſperity of others, as is clear from the words immediately foregoing. The horn of the righteous ſhall be exalted with honour: Envy is the vexation and depreſſion of our own ſpirits, at the exaltation of another man in riches or in honour. It is not a ſickneſs catcht from another mans diſeaſe, but a ſickneſs catcht from another mans health.

Secondly, Gnaſhing of the teeth, notes extream deriſion, or higheſt contempt and inſultation over a man in miſery (Pſal. 35.15, 16.) But in mine adverſity they rejoyced, and gathered themſelves together (that is, they gathered themſelves together for joy, or to rejoyce) yea the very abjects gathered themſelves together (ſuch as all honeſt, or civil men had caſt out of their company and ſociety, aſſociated and knotted themſelves into companies) againſt me, they did tear me (that is, my good name) and ceaſed not; with hypocritical mockers at feaſts, they gnaſhed upon me with their teeth: Where it is alſo obſervable, that we have the former act complained of by Job, joyned with this, Tearing, with gnaſhing of the teeth.

Thirdly, Gnaſhing of the teeth is the effect of extream pain; thus the damned in Hell ſhall gnaſh their teeth for ever (*Mat.*8.12. *Mat.*13.42.) That gnaſhing of teeth ariſeth from a mixed paſſion, partly from envy, and partly from ſorrow; envy at the good which the Saints enjoy, and ſorrow at the evil which themſelves feel; hence comes gnaſhing of teeth in Hell.

Fourthly, Gnaſhing of teeth is an argument of extream wrath and anger (Acts 7.54.) where it is ſaid of Stevens at once Auditors and Enemies, When they heard thoſe things, they were cut to the heart (Peters Auditors, Acts 2. were prickt at the heart with godly ſorrow, Stevens Auditors were cut to the heart with ungodly anger) and they gnaſhed upon him with their teeth. The gnaſhing of teeth here ſpoken of is the concomitant of ſuppoſed wrath, He teareth me in his wrath, and gnaſheth upon me with his teeth.

Yet further:

Mine enemy ſharpeneth his eyes upon me.] This notes the fierceneſs of an enemy: Wild Beaſts when they fight, whet their eyes as well as their teeth; and a man that is extreamly enraged, looks upon his oppoſite as if he would look through him: Thus Job repreſents the Lord in all the poſtures of an enemy, He ſharpneth his eyes againſt me.

The word ſignifies to ſharpen as a Sword, or a Spear, or any inſtrument of Iron is ſharpned (1 *Sam.*13.20.) There was no Smith in Iſrael; but all the Iſraelites went down to the Philiſtims to ſharpen every man his ſhare, &c. That word is uſed here, Mine enemy ſharpneth his eye like a Sword, as if he would ſtrike me through with his eye; we ſay a man hath a piercing eye, when he looks very angerly.

When we are well-pleaſed, kindneſs is ſeen in our eyes; we give our Friends a pleaſant and gentle look; Chriſts tells the Spouſe (*Cant.*4.9.) Thou haſt raviſhed mine heart, my Siſter, my Spouſe, thou haſt raviſhed my heart with one of thine eyes. The Hebrew is, Thou haſt taken away my heart with one of thine eyes. A holy love-look ſtole away Chriſts heart; he could not but love the Church when (through the comlineſs which he had put upon her) ſhe looked ſo lovely on him. As thus a look of love from the Churches eye ſtole away Chriſts heart, ſo a look of mercy from Chriſts eye broke Peters heart, yea and opened the Flood-gates of his eyes too (*Luk.*22.61,62.) And the Lord turned, & looked upon Peter, and Peter went out & wept bitterly.

There are ſoft looks as well as ſoft words, and there are hard looks as well as hard words: The eye is a Spear and an Arrow, yea a ſharp Sword as well as the tongue; He ſharpneth his eyes upon me, as if he would ſtab me to the heart with a glance of his eye. The eye hath its ſcintillations, its ſparklings, even as bright burniſht Braſs, or as a burning Lamp, or as the morning Sun ſends forth his rays and beams, ſuch ſcintillations doth the eye of ſome men ſend forth naturally. The Roman Hiſtorians report of Auguſtus Caeſar, and our Turkiſh Hiſtorian reports of Tamerlane, that ſuch a majeſtick luſtre ſparkled from their eyes, as dazled the eyes of their beholders, which (ſaith my Author) cauſed the latter, in a comly modeſty, to abſtain from looking earneſtly upon ſuch as ſpake with him. What the eyes of theſe great Princes did naturally, the eyes of many do when they look paſſionately. Chriſt hath a ſharp eye, ſo ſharp, that his eyes (as repreſented to John in a Viſion) were like a flame of fire (*Rev.*1.14.) The eyes of God are ſo ſharp naturally, or according to the excellency of his nature, that no eye can behold his face; and himſelf beholdeth not only every face, but pierceth into every heart: yet beſides this natural ſharpneſs of his eye towards all, he angerly ſharpens his eye againſt his Enemies. God was indeed Job's Friend, and Job was Gods Favourite, yet here he ſpeaks of God (as he had alſo done before) as of his Enemy; and as of an Enemy, declaring himſelf at his eye, Mine enemy ſharpneth his eye upon me.

Job attributes this to God, in the extremity of his pain; this was the voice of his fleſh, it was not the voice of Job himſelf: this was the voice of his ſenſe, not the voice of his Faith. Would you know what was the voice of Job himſelf, or of Job's Faith? Hear that (*Chap.*13.15, 16,18.) Though he kill me, yet will I truſt in him. He alſo ſhall be my ſalvation, and I know that I ſhall be juſtified. Hear again his Faith ſpeaking (*Chap.*19.25.) I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I ſhall ſee him again with theſe eyes: Though ſenſe ſaw God as an Enemy ſharpning his eyes upon him, yet Faith ſaw God his Redeemer, in this aſſurance, that he alſo ſhould behold him with an eye of ſenſe, I ſhall ſee him with theſe eyes.

Adverſariũ ſuum vocat Job nõ amicos ſolũ ſed omnẽ creaturã, quæ reſiſtit Domino reſiſtẽte, accuſat Domino accuſante, damnat Domino dãnante, aut ipſum Deum adverſariũ intelligas. Brent.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That God dealeth with thoſe whom he loveth dearly, as if he hated them.

Secondly, They whom God doth love, may be under preſent apprehenſion that God hates them.

I only name theſe points as ariſing from this place; they have been handled (Chap. 13.24. Chap. 14. 13.) upon thoſe words, Until thy wrath be paſt; and therefore I ſtay not upon them here.

Thirdly, Note, God (to ſenſe) doth ſeem to exerciſe a kind of cruelty (even the cruelty of wild beaſts) towards thoſe whom he dearly loves.

What are tearing and gnaſhing of teeth? What is the ſharpning of the eye? Is not any one of theſe, much more all theſe in one, the diſcovery of cruelty? Job ſaith all this: and doth not Hezekiah ſay as much (*Iſa.*38.13.) I reckoned till morning, that as a Lyon, ſo will he break all my bones, from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me. We find God taking upon himſelf thoſe ſimilitudes, not only in reference to his Enemies, but alſo to his own people; for as he deals with the wicked when they provoke him, ſo in proportion with his own. Outward diſpenſations make no difference; I will take vengeance, I will not meet thee as a man (*Iſa.*43.3.) that is, I will not ſhew ſo much as any humane pity or compaſſion, much leſs Divine, but I will meet thee as a Beaſt. Thus God threatned to deal with Babylon; and thus he appears to deal with Sion, with the choiſeſt Sons and Daughters of Sion.

And thus he profeſſed (Hoſ. 5.14.) For I will be unto Ephraim as a Lyon, and as a young Lyon to the Houſe of Judah; I, even I, will tear and go away; I will take away, and none ſhall reſcue him.

Job having ſhewed what hard uſage he had from God himſelf, who appeared as an enemy, proceeds now to ſhew what hard and courſe uſage he had from men, who were indeed his enemies, into whoſe hands God had delivered him.

Verſ. 10. They have gaped upon me with their mouth, they have ſmitten me upon the cheek reproachfully, they have gathered themſelves together againſt me.

The perſon is now changed, as alſo the number; before it was He, now They: And who were they? We have no Names to give them; only in general. Theſe were the inſtruments which God let looſe upon him; his Friends, ſay ſome; his Enemies, ſay others. Whoſoever they were, doubtleſs they were either down-right Enemies, or Enemy-like Friends; their own behaviour ſpeaks them ſo, They have gaped upon me, &c.

He varies, or heightens their enemy-like behaviour by three expressions.

First, They have gaped upon me with their mouth.

Secondly, They have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully.

Thirdly, They have gathered themselves against me.

I shall open them distinctly.

They have gaped upon me with their mouth.

Gaping with, or opening the mouth, implies two things.

First, Scorn and derision (Lam. 2.16.) All thine enemies have opened the mouth against thee, they hiss and gnash the teeth; they say we have swallowed her up: certainly this is the day we looked for. The Church in affliction was afflicted with scornful gestures.

Secondly, As gaping with the mouth notes scorn, so also cruelty; he that gapes at another, tells him (though he say nothing) that he could devour him, and eat him up (as we say) Without Salt; Such a one shews that he needs no Sauce (*Psal.*22.13.) They gaped upon me with their mouthes, as a ravening and roaring Lyon: A Lyon gapes at his prey to devour it. Job often complains both of the contempt and cruelty of many against him; and their gaping upon him includes both; which are also again intimated in the next clause.

They have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully.

Some render it, Reproaching me, they have smitten me on the cheek: Smiting on the cheek is taken two wayes.

Literally.

Metaphorically.

What literal smiting is, all know, and most have felt: but had Job any about him who used him thus rudely? I conceive, not; and therefore we may understand him metaphorically. So, smiting on the cheek, is to reproach: And these words, They have smitten me on the cheek reproachfully, are no more nor less; then, They have reproached me. To smite on the cheek, is a thing so reproachful, that, by an Hebraism, it signifieth to reproach (*Lam.*3.30.) He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him, which is expounded in the latter clause by this, he is filled full with reproach. The sufferings of Christ, which were full of reproach, are thus Propheſied, I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting (*Isa.*50.6.) Christ was smitten on the face literally (Matth. 26. 67.) Then did they spit in his face and buffetted him, and others smote him with the palms of their hands. He was smitten also tropically, being put to open shame, and disgracefully dealt with. That of the Apostle clears this sense (2 *Cor.*11.20.) Ye suffer a man to bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you on the face, that is, If he disgrace you: So the Apostle expounds it (*Vers.*21.) I speak concerning reproach. Paul (*Chap.*12.) had a messenger of Satan sent to buffet him, to cuff, or smite him with the fist, so the word signifies; what that was, at least in part, he explains (*Vers.*10.) I will therefore take pleasure in reproaches. Thus the Prophet describes the dishonour which should be put upon the Judge (Micah. 5.1.) Now gather thy self in Troops, O daughter of Troops, he hath laid siege against us; they shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek, that is, The enemy shall pour contempt upon thy Kings and Princes; in which sense they may be said to be smitten upon the cheek, though no rod nor hand touch them. And some interpret that (Mat. 5.39) If any man smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the left also, not of hand, but tongue-smiting, or of suffering reproach. As if Christ had said, If any one disgrace thee a little, bear it, yea though he should disgrace thee a great deal more, yet bear it: Smiting upon the right cheek, notes a lesser injury received. When a man smites another on the right cheek, he smites with his left hand; the left hand strikes the right cheek, and the left hand is the weaker in most, and gives a weaker blow. If thou receive a blow on thy right cheek with the left hand, turn the other, and let him smite thee with the right hand, let him give thee a smarter, a harder blow: that is, If a man disgrace thee a little, reward him not with disgrace, but prepare to bear a greater, turn the left cheek. And the reason of this was, because slaves and condemned persons were thus smitten, as also such as were supposed to speak irreverently to the Magistrate.

Percutere maxillâ Hebraïca locutio est, quæ significat gravissima contumelia aliquem afficere.

cum aliquis propter gravē aliquam ignominiam pudēfit, licet vis omnis absit, & plagaverberari dicitur in maxilla. Sanct. in Mic.c.5.v.1

Hence it was that when Paul had spoken freely to the Councel, saying, Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day: presently Ananias the high Priest, commanded those that stood by him to smite him on the mouth (*Act.*23.1,2.) In which case Christ himself was smitten by an Officer that stood by (*Joh.*18.22.) From all which Scripture testimonies it is more then manifest, that to smite a man on the cheek, is to disgrace, because they who fell under disgrace, were usually smitten on the cheek: and this I take to be the most suitable interpretation of Jobs complaint in this place, They smite me on the cheek reproachfully.

Hence Observe, First, The best Saints on earth have been smitten and deeply wounded with reproach.

God himself gave an honourable testimony of Job, there was none like him, he had no peer on earth, for holiness and uprightness; yet men gave testimony against him, as if he had been the scum of the World, for unholiness and hypocrisie. David, a man after Gods own heart, was (not only reproached, but) a reproach among all his Enemies, but especially among his neighbours (or nearest Friends both in habitation and relation) and he heard the slander of many (*Psal.*31.11, 13.) The word of God was made a reproach to the Prophet Jeremy (*Chap.*20.8.) And the spirit was made a reproach to the Apostles (*Act.*2.13.) Others mocked, saying, These men are full of new Wine: When indeed they were filled with the holy Ghost (Vers. 4.) Drunkards made Songs upon David, but the Apostles were sung about for Drunkards.

We are fools, saith Paul (that is, We are so called and accounted) for Christ, and being defamed (or as the word bears, blasphemed; to speak against any thing of God in Man, is blasphemy, as well as speaking directly against God) we entreat. And to shew, that this was no prick with a Pin, or small scratch upon their credit, which made him complain, he tells us what this fame did amount unto, We are made as the filth of the World, and as the off-scouring of all things unto this day (1 *Cor.*4.13.)

The whole World lieth in wickedness (which is a moral filthiness) so that to be the filth of the World, is to be the filth of filthiness; the filth of a clean thing is bad enough, what then is the filth of a filthy thing? The off-scouring of any thing is base, then what is the off-scouring of all things, which must needs include the basest things? These Apostles who were the ornament and glory, the purest and most refined pieces of the whole inferiour World, were yet made (not that these reproaches did at all change them from what they were in themselves, but they made them to be in the opinion of others, what they least of all were) the rubbish, and the refuse, the sweepings, and the dross of the whole World. The Apologies of Tertullian and others, do abundantly testifie what reproaches the Primitive Christians suffered, both in reference to their practice and worship. Athanasius was called Sathanasius (as if he had been a Devil incarnate) by the Abbettors of the Arrian Heresie, which he stiffly opposed: And some who were displeased with the Opinions and Writings of Cyprianus, called him in contempt, Coprianus, or one that gathers dung, as if his Books were nothing but dung-heaps.

nōme & est stercoreus, hinc copriō scarabeus, à luto scilicet. Bech. de Orig. Ling. Lat.

How Luther, Calvin, and other Reformers of the former age, were smitten reproachfully, both by the tongues and Pens of the Popish Party, is known of all these parts of the World: And how much this trade (which is indeed the Devils trade) of slandering the footsteps of Gods annointed ones, is continued unto this day, we have but too much evidence. A man can scarce appear, indeed, for God, but he is thus smitten on the cheek by men. Religion and the power of godliness have ever been an occasion of contention; and for the most part, to smite with reproach, hath been the manner of contending.

There are not many enemies of good men, who have a Sword to draw against them, but all the Enemies of good men have ill words enow at command to throw against them, and of them they are seldom sparing: And, though (which is bad enough, yet no better can be expected of them) this trade of reproaching be driven most by evil men against those who are good, yet (which is far worse) we may learn from this instance between Job and his Friends (for even they did not spare to reproach him) that (which shall be a second Observation)

A second Observation.) A good man may so far forget himself as to speak reproachfully against his Brother.

Yea, the reproaches of Professors one against another, have been (as they are the saddest, so) the sharpest and bitterest reproaches. They who agree in most things, take it most unkindly when they differ in any thing; and are more ready to revile one another about the points wherein they differ, then to bless God for those wherein they are agreed. The Papists did not more reproach Luther and Calvin, whose judgements concurred in opposing them, then Lutherans and Calvinists have reproached each other, where they are opposite in judgement: The corrupt remains even in good men, tell them that whosoever differs from them stands in their light and obscures their excellency, and therefore that themselves may shine the brighter in what they hold, they little care (when master'd by self and passion) how obscure, yea fowl they render them, who hold the contrary.

While Infidels reproached Christians, it was the glory of Christianity, and while the wicked reproach the godly, it is the glory of godliness; but while one Christian reproaches another, the glory is departed from godliness. Is it not enough that the Servants of God are thus smitten by the world, must they needs smite their Fellow-servants, and revile those who are (upon the main) in the same way of God wherein they are, only because they are not fully in their way? Yea, when possibly, they may be in a higher and more perfect way then they? Is it not enough that the Bryars and Thorns, which are among the Lillies, tear and scratch them? Shall the Lillies degenerate into Briars and Thorns one towards another? Or if at any time a Lilly of the one side tear, and be harsh, should not the Lilly on the other side be kind and gentle? If Israel transgress, let not Judah offend too. Luther was often at Sharps with Calvin, but Calvin professed (and that was a Noble profession) Though Luther call me Devil, yet I will honour Luther as a Servant of God.

Holy Job cannot be excused for his failings in this, who as he complains here, that he was reproached by his Enemies, yea and by his Friends too, yet he gave his Friends some advantage to complain also of harsh words, if not of reproaches cast upon them.

Thirdly Observe, Reproach is a very heavy burthen.

Remember (Lord) the reproach of thy Servant, how I do bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people, wherewith thine Enemies have reproached thee, O Lord, wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine annointed (Psal. 89. 50, 51.) And again (*Psal.*69.9.) The reproaches of them that reproached thee, are fallen on me. Yet more (Psal. 42. 10.) As with a Sword in my bowels (or in my bones) they reproach me, while they say, &c. Reproach is not only a burthen upon the back, but a Sword in the bowels. A reviling, reproaching tongue is compared in Scripture to three things.

First, To a Razor.
Secondly, To a Sword.
Thirdly, To an Arrow.

A Razor is so keen, that it takes off every little hair; reproach cuts a hair, it will have to do even with undiscernable evils. A Sword wounds at hand, and smites those that are near; an Arrow wounds afar off: So that whether a man be far off, or near, whether his errour be small or great, or but imaginary, it is all one to a reproachful spirit; his tongue serves him for all turns. David was tryed by all manner of reproaches; but those which pinched and pressed him most, were his reproaches about spiritual things. Any reproach is bad enough, but a reproach in Religion, is worst; to be reproached with our prayers and with our God, Where is your God? Such reproaches, how deep do they go? They strike to the very heart. Credit is a precious commodity; a man is more tender of it, then of his flesh; now all reproach falls upon our credit, and the more excellent that piece of our credit is, upon which the reproach falls, the more grievous is that reproach to us. Credit in spiritual things is the most excellent credit: Thus David was reproached, and so was Job, Is this thy fear, and thy confidence? Is this the thing thou hast so long boasted of? Christ was to bear the greatest burthen of affliction, and therefore he did not only bear the Cross, but reproach with it; he suffered death, and reproach with death; he suffered the shameful death of the Cross, in which there was more then a reproach, a curse, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a Tree: Christ must die an ignominious death, as well as a painful, and the ignominy was a heavier burden then the pain. We are exhorted (*Heb.*13.13.) To go out bearing his reproach; as intimating, that to bear the reproach of Christ, would be harder to us, and a stronger temptation, then to bear the cross of Christ. As the greatest part of Christs sufferings for us, was to bear our reproach, so the greatest part of our sufferings for Christ, is to bear Christs reproach: Let us go forth unto him without the Camp, bearing his reproach. And indeed reproach is so great a burthen, that were not this consideration in it; that it is Christs, no man would bear it; and they will yield to do any thing rather then suffer reproach, who are not able to say that their reproach is the reproach of Christ. Moses looked upon his reproach, as the reproach of Christ, he did not esteem his own reproach, but the reproach of Christ greater riches, then the treasures of Egypt (*Heb.*11.26.) Our reproach is nothing but dung or dross which hath weight in it to press us, but no worth in it to enrich us; but the reproach of Christ is treasure, which though it have weight in it to press us, yet it hath abundance of worth in it to enrich and crown us. The Apostle calls it, The reproach of Christ, both because Christ did bear such reproach himself, and because Christ owned Moses in bearing that reproach; yea he owned that reproach which Moses bare, as if he had born it himself; while we are reproached for Christs sake, Christ is reproached; and though it should grieve us that Christ is reproached in us, yet it may comfort us, that Christ takes our reproach as his. They have smitten me on the cheek reproachfully, and yet they have not done with me.

They have gathered themselves together against me.

It seems they contemned and reproached him not singly or every man apart; but they joyned all together in consulting and plotting against him.

The word that we translate to gather together, hath a second signification, namely, to fill, either as a room is filled with Goods, or Persons, or as the stomack is filled with meat, or food, or as an Army with Men. Hence Mr. Broughton translates, They come by full Troops upon me: And another, They will be filled with me, or upon me. The Vulgar explains it thus, They are filled or satiated with my punishment: or as a third, They have taken their fill of pleasure at my miseries. The reason of this sense ariseth from the former; because, where many things or persons are gathered together, they fill up that place.

1. Implere, complere.
2. Colligere, congregare, quod rebus collectis impleantur loca.

First, It signifies to gather together, as men are gathered in a civil Society, and combination: Job supposed his Friends conspired his hurt, and that they gathered themselves together against him, who pretended to gather themselves together for him; or we may apply this to his professed Enemies, who were very unanimous to vex and trouble him.

Hence Note, Men are apt to agree in doing hurt.

Union is not alwayes a sign of a good cause: 'Tis but seldom we can agree to do a common duty. Good men want the cement of love in a good cause; evil men seldom want it in a bad. Behold saith God, *Gen.*11.5,6.) This people are one, and they all speak one language: their language was one, and so were their hearts, to build a Tower, whose top might reach to Heaven: The builders of Babel are more united, then the builders of Sion. The Psalmist complains of the Enemies oneness (*Psal.*83.5,6,7.) They have consulted together with one consent (or heart) they are confederate against thee. Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek, the Philistims, and them that dwell at Tyre: Ashur is also joyned with them, &c. All Nations, even Heterogenial Nations, can joyn in mischief; men of several Kingdoms, and spirits, Pilate and Herod joyn to crucifie Christ; but as it is most beautiful and pleasant (*Psal.*133.) So, O how hard a thing is it for Brethren to dwell in unity? They who have one God, one Lord, one Faith, one Spirit, one Baptism, one Hope; yea they who (in one sense) are one Body, and one Spirit (*Ephes.*4.4,5.) are seldom one.

Super me implebnntur. Mont.

Satiati sunt cænis meis. Vulg. Ex manis suis voluptatem suam expleverunt. Sygur.

From that second sense of the word, They have filled, or satiated themselves with me,

Note, It is a kind of pleasure to some to see others in pain.

We should be pained with the pain of others; fellow-feeling is a duty; how far are they departed from this duty, who are so far from feeling the sufferings of others, that they take pleasure in their sufferings?

There are two sorts of pleasure, which every good man should abhor.

First, Pleasure in sin, our own, or others: The worst that was said of the wicked Gentiles was this, They not only do such things, but take pleasure in them that do them (Rom. 1.32.)

Secondly, Pleasure in the sufferings and sorrows of others; some do not only put others to the suffering of sorrow, but take pleasure in the sorrow which they suffer; they make their tears as Wine, their ashes as Bread; and until they see them weeping and feeding on ashes, their own Wine is as tears, and their Bread as ashes to them. Haman came full from the Queens Banquet, and he was invited by her to a second Banquet the next day, yet still he was hungry, and said (Hest. 5.13.) All this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the Kings gate: Tis like, Haman had eaten and drunk freely, yet the Banquet had not filled his belly: All this availeth me nothing. More then forty of the Jews bound themselves under a curse, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul (Act. 23.12, 13.) It would have been better to Haman then meat and drink to have killed Mordecai, and all the Jews.

Some have been heard to say, O how sweet is revenge! What a pleasant draught is a draught of blood! Spightful spirits hunger and thirst for the downfal and misery of those who stand in their way; nor will any thing satisfie hatred, but the ruine of those who are hated; and when once they see them ruined, they are satisfied. As envy is troubled at the good which another enjoyes more then at all the evils which it self feels; so malice is more satisfied with the evils which befal others, then with all the good which it self enjoyes (Exod. 15.9.) The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil, my lust shall be satisfied upon them. Pharaoh and his Courtiers, yea all the Egyptians hungred and thirsted for the flesh and blood of Israel: They had a lust, or a longing rather (as women with Child have sometimes inordinate appetites after strange meats) to eat mans flesh, and drink the blood of the slain: Revenge is as craving a lust as covetousness, but it is a lust more easily satisfied then covetousness. This encreases by receiving what it desires, but that (if it may have it) is satisfied: That which covetousness receives, is only as fewel to a fire, but that which revenge receives, is as food to the stomack; the desire of the end is infinite, but the end being once attained, desire is at an end: Ye are filled with me.

Appetitus finis est infinitus.

Job having thus described the instruments and manner of his affliction, turns his thoughts from them to the supream efficient, and orderer of his afflictions.

Vers. 11. God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over into the hands of the wicked.

The words seem to bear an allusion to the proceeding of an earthly Judge, who having tryed a Malefactor, and found him guilty, pronounceth sentence of death upon him, and then delivers, or turns him over to those whose office it is to see execution done accordingly.

The word which we render to deliver, signifies also to shut up, which suites well with the former notion; for a condemned Person is more closely shut up, and more narrowly watcht, then before: But who were the ungodly to whom he was delivered? and the wicked into whose hands or power he was turned? These were not only the Chaldeans, and Sabeans, but also all such as shewed any malice against him, or willingly afflicted him in his afflictions.

סרט Avia divertit, deflexit, declinavit.

The words carry in them a correction of his former complaint, as if he had said, Why do I trouble my self with men, why do I complain of their unkindness or cruelty against me? God hath done it; he hath delivered, and turned me over (as a Magistrate doth a Malefactor whom he hath condemned) into the hands of these tormenters, he hath sealed a writ for my execution. Thus Job ascribes all to God; he sometimes wrangles with men, but as often before, so now again, he looks beyond them, at once seeing and adoring the hand of God, putting him and his estate into the hands of men.

Hence Note, First, Wicked men are ordered by Providence.

They cannot take till God puts into their hands: a Sparrow falls not to the ground without God, much less doth a godly man fall into the hands of the wicked without God. They do but execute what God decrees, though they do it without any respect to his decrees, and quite cross to his commands. Many will be found at once executing the decrees and disobeying the commands of God.

Secondly, God delivers his dearest Children into the hands of wicked men, for trial and correction.

Their graces and goodness appear most, when they are under the handling of evil and graceless men. Many of their corruptions are purged out, while they are in their power who are not at all purged from their corruption. Foul hands may serve to wash that clean which is foul; and they who are but dross, may fetch off the rust which cleaves to the purest mettal.

Thirdly, Note, It is an aggravation of affliction to be given up to wicked men.

It is an affliction to be in their company, what is it then to be under their power? Wo is me, saith David, that I dwell in Mesheč; how woful then is it to be a Prisoner in Mesheč? While God keeps the Rod in his own hands, the smart is not so grievous: We learn this in David's choice (2 Sam. 24.14.) when three evils were offered him, he resolves, Let me fall now into the hand of the Lord (for his mercies are great) and let me not fall into the hand of man. A good man can easier die by the hand of God, then receive a slight wound by the hand of an Enemy: As those comforts are sweeter, so those sufferings are not so bitter which Believers receive immediately from God.

Est hoc in judicio Domini gravissimum quod adversariis videatur favere, & a parte eorum stare, consilia conatusque ipsorum contra nos prosperando. Brent.

It is hard to suffer from equals, much more from inferiours, but most of all when we suffer the fatherly displeasure of God from those who are the objects of his displeasure as a Judge. Let the righteous smite me (saith David, Psal. 141.) a reproof from them is oyl, but a reproof from the wicked is Gall and Vinegar to a godly heart: The reason why a godly man chuses rather to be smitten by the righteous, then the wicked, is, because they have somewhat, possibly, much of God in them; therefore much more doth he say, Let the righteous God smite me. It is a mercy, if we must needs be chastised, when God will chastise us himself, and not give us into the hands of men whose mercies are cruel.

There are two things which make it so grievous to the people of God, when they are delivered up into the hands of the ungodly.

First, Their cruelty: Their mercies are cruel, how unmerciful then are they in their cruelties? As they know no measure in sinning against God, so they keep none in vexing man. The Lord promiseth (Psal. 126.3.) The Rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous; implying, that by the good will of evil men it should rest there; they would never take it off, if God did not.

Secondly (which troubles more then the former) Their blasphemy. And that first against God himself, as if he either could not deliver out of their hands (2 Chron. 32.14.) What is your God that he should be able to deliver you out of my hand (Psal. 42.) Where is now their God? Thus the wicked Jewes into whose hand God delivered his Son, did even dare God to come to his rescue (Mat. 27.43.) Or, as if he took their part, and favoured the cause which they have in hand. Secondly, They blaspheme, or speak evil both of the wayes and people of God. What's become of your prayers now? Where's your fasting now, of which you boasted, that it would do such wonders? It is a soar affliction to be under the rule of wicked men, much more to be under their rage: that prophetick curse which David denounceth against his Enemy, is thus expressed (Psal. 109.6.). Set thou a wicked man over him: A wicked man were better be under the power of good men, then then of the wicked (for a good man cannot be so severe to a wicked man, as one wicked man is to another) but if a wicked man be so cruel to wicked men who are so like him, how cruel must he needs be to godly men who are altogether unlike him?

Fourthly, Note, Godly men look through all second causes to the first.

As they rest not in the creature for the good which they receive, so they stay not in the creature when they receive evil; they see a hand of God in and over all.

Note Fifthly, We glorifie God as much in acknowledging afflictions, as in acknowledging mercies and blessings to come from him.

He is the Author of both; he takes it as much upon him, that he creates darkness, as that he forms light; that is, as the next words expound it, That he creates evil as well as makes peace (Isa. 45. 7.) Now if the Lord challenges this as a part of that glory which he will not give to Idols, then, we give him the glory of the only true God, while we acknowledge this.

Sixthly, Note, There is no way to settle or quiet the heart, till it look up to God as the disposer of our troubles.

This was Job's last resort: And this was David's when Shimei cursed him, God hath bid Shimei curse: This kept down those angry motions, which must else have boiled up as high in his spirit, as they did in Abishai's, himself being more deeply concerned in it then Abishai was. Job having discovered this frame of spirit more then once before, I here only touch upon it.

Lastly, Take this comfortable Corolary from the whole.

Though God doth often deliver his choicest Servants into the power of wicked men, yet he never delivers them up to the will of wicked men: They cannot do with his people what they please; they shall only do what God himself pleaseth, though they displease God highly in doing it. God never turns the least of those who believe in his Name, out of his own hand, though he turn them over into the hand of the ungodly: as God keeps his title to them still, so he still keeps the possession of them. Saints in the hand of the vilest men, are in the hand, or possession of God two wayes.

First, They are in the hand of his power, he can fetch them out of the hands of men when he will.

Secondly, They are under the hand of his care, and this five wayes.

First, To provide, that though they endure much hardship in their hands, yet they shall receive no hurt; God doth not turn his into the hands of evil men for evil, but for good.

Secondly, He hath them in the hand of his care to furnish them with strength to suffer.

Thirdly, To teach them how to profit by sufferings.

Fourthly, To moderate the hands of the wicked towards them; their hands shall not be heavier then he hath appointed, they shall not give you a stroak more then he hath numbred out.

Lastly, As to order how much, so likewise how long they shall suffer: Our times are in Gods hand, when we are in the hand of men. As they cannot add a drop to our cup, so not a Sand to our Glass, beyond what the Lord hath appointed out.

VERS. 12, 13, 14.

I was at ease, but he hath broken me asunder: he hath also taken me by my neck, and shaken me to pieces, and set me up for his mark.
His Archers compass me round about, he cleaveth my reins asunder, and doth not spare; he poureth out my Gall upon the ground.
He breaketh me with breach upon breach, he runneth upon me like a Giant.

JOB still prosecutes the same argument, setting out his afflictions in their darkest colours to the seventeenth Verse of this Chapter, and then with highest confidence attesting, yea calling Heaven and Earth to attest both the righteousness of his wayes towards men, and the rightness of his worship rendred unto God.

These three, with the two Verses following, contain two general points.

First, He tells us how, and in what manner he was handled by God in those days of his affliction, Vers. 12, 13, 14.

Secondly, He tells us how he behaved himself under the hand of God, or how he was affected with these afflictions, Vers. 15, 16. I have sowed sackcloath upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the dust, &c. As Gods hand was heavy upon him, so he held out all the demonstrations and emblems of a heavy heart: I sowed sackcloth upon my skin.

He begins with, or rather prosecutes the description (for he had spoken much of it before) of his sad afflictions. And because contraries illustrate, and set forth one another, therefore, he first shews what condition he had been in: Secondly, what he then was in. Our present wants and evils are aggravated by our former comforts and enjoyments.

This course and method Job takes to aggravate his;
First, Telling us that he was once whole and at ease.
Secondly, What he at that time was, pained and broken to pieces.

I was at ease.

But how doth this agree with what Job affirmed (Chap. 3. 26.) I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet, yet trouble came. It seems Job was never at ease, and yet he saith here, I was at ease: He that is not in safety, and hath neither rest nor quiet, surely, He is in little ease.

There is no contradiction between these two, we may easily reconcile them, and make up the seeming difference, thus. When Job saith (Chap. 3.) I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; his meaning is, that his spirit did not trust upon his outward prosperity: He had abundance in the World, but he had no carnal confidence in worldly things. Job never said to his soul (when his Barns were full, and his substance multiplyed) Soul take thy ease, eat and be merry, thou hast enough laid up for many years. Job had much of the creature in his hand, but he kept it all out of his heart; and when he was furthest from misery, he was far enough from security; he did not think his life safe, because he had sufficient to live upon, nor was he at rest, because he was rich. A believers rest is not in any outward comfort which he receives from God, but in God, from whom he receives all his comforts. So then, Job speaks there of the spiritual frame of his heart, but here he speaks of the temporal frame of his worldly estate, in which he had ease, and the affluence of all good things, no man molesting him: As if he had said, Time was when I was not at all pinched with poverty in my estate, nor blasted with reproach in my credit, nor tortured with pains in my body; I can remember the time when I was at full ease in all these: That's his sense in this Text, and between these two there is no opposition: A man may be at ease in the World, and yet not make the World his ease, nor rest upon the World.

I was at ease.] Such was my former flourishing condition. The word signifies to be peaceable, quiet, or well setled: the Vulgar translates, I was a rich man: the same word in the Hebrew signifies a rich man, and a man at ease, for two reasons.

שלו הייתי Pacificus, tranquillus, quietus erã. Fui opulentus. Vulg.

First, Because riches and ease usually go together; and unless a man live at ease, that is, in outward peace, it is hard to gather riches. Times of War and trouble are scattering and impoverishing times: The rowling Stone gets no Moss. As men have the best opportunity, so they are most active to gather wealth when all is still and quiet: There are but few who know how to fish in troubled waters, though some make their best trade there.

Secondly, The same word signifies, both to be rich, and to be at ease, from the effect; because, men that are rich, usually take their ease: as ease and peace give them opportunity to gather riches, so riches cause them to take their ease, both outward civil ease, and oft-times inward sinful ease; that is, to sit down, and make their riches, and outward accommodations, the very basis of their quiet and contentment. So the rich are expressed (Ezek. 23. 42.) Thou satest upon a stately Bed, and a Table prepared before it, &c. And a voice of a multitude being at ease with her, and with the men of the common sort were brought Sabeans from the Wilderness, which put bracelets upon their hands, and beautiful Crowns upon their heads: Here's the description of a rich people; and what were they? A multitude being at ease, having gotten goodly furniture for their houses, full tables for their bellies, pretious ornaments for their hands and heads; that is, having abundance of all things, they gave themselves up to security, and took their fill in the creature: And by how much the greater a carnal man's worldly felicity is, by so much doth it the more triumph over all jealousies and suspitions of evil (Revel. 18. 7.) Babylon saith, I sit a Queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Babylon is at ease, she feels no evil, and she fears none. Jerusalem was once in such a condition through the favour of God, and so she shall be in due time again (*Zech.*7.7.) Should ye not hear the words which the Lord hath cryed by the former Prophets, when Jerusalem was inhabited, and in prosperity (or at ease) and the Cities thereof round about her, when men inhabited the South of the plain? The South of the plain, was a Region or Countrey, extreamly infested with Enemies, where no man durst dwell or make his habitation, for fear of hostile incursions: yet Jerusalem was in such prosperity, or at such ease, that the South of the plain, the open Countries and unwalled Villages were as safe to the Inhabitants as walled and fortified Cities: At such ease, and in such safety shall Jerusalem be again, when the Lord shall appoint salvation unto her, in stead of Walls and Bulwarks.

Misericordiæ movet à priore statu. Merc. Primus locus misericordiæ est per quæ quibus in bonis fuerit, & nunc quibus in malis sit ostenditur. Cic. de Invent. lib. 1.

I was at ease.] Job makes this report of his former prosperity, that he might move his Friends to pity him in his present misery. It is a rhetorical argument: The Orator gives this rule, when we would stir up compassion towards a man in misery, we must first describe in what heights he hath stood, and then shew how low he is fallen; we are not so much affected with any man's being in a low estate, as with his falling from a high estate. When Lucifer the Son of the morning, falls from Heaven, and falls into Hell, to the sides of the Pit, this sets all men a wondering (*Isa.*14. 11, 12, 15.)

Hence Observe, To have been in prosperity, adds to the burden and bitterness of present adversity.

It is an affliction, never to have been in prosperity; but it is a greater affliction to be cast down from a state of prosperity: for him that hath been great, and rich, and powerful in the World, to become mean, and poor, and powerless, this pinches sore, and goes to the quick. Job aggravates his sorrows at large upon this account (*Chap.*29.*Chap.*30.) The Candle of God shined upon my head, I washed my steps in butter, my glory was fresh in me, &c. But now they that are younger then I have me in derision, &c. So (*Lam.*4.2.) The precious Sons of Sion, comparable to fine Gold, how are they esteemed as earthen Pitchers. And (Vers. 5.) They that did feed delicately, are desolate in the streets; they that were brought up in Scarlet embrace dunghils. From delicate feeding to desolation, from Scarlet to a dunghil is a great change; the dunghil would not be so loathsom, were it not for the Scarlet, nor desolation so grievous were it not for the remaining taste of the late delicate feeding. Every remembrance of the Wormwood and the Gall of their present affliction in Babylon, was made more bitter by the remembrance of the Milk and Honey which flowed in the Land of Canaan. They who have alwayes been in a low condition scarce feel or know the want of great things, because they never knew the meaning of their enjoyment.

Cor dolet, quam scio nunc, ut sum atq; ut fui. Plaut. in Mostel. Cernite sim qualis, qui modo talis eram. Ovid. Fuimus Troes, &c.

Euripides. The Greek Poet tells us of Hecuba, not daring for shame, so much as to lift up her eyes, or look Polymnestor in the face, because she had been a Queen, but was then a poor Captive. Common Captives can easily lift up their eyes and cryes to those that are in prosperity, for relief and help, whereas others who have lived at ease, can with more ease starve then beg.

As a downfal from a seeming height in spirituals into the mire of sin, hath more wickedness in it then a bare continuance in sin; so a downfal from a real height in temporals into the mire of misery, hath more trouble in it, then a bare continuance in misery. They who have made a fair shew, or an outward flourish in the Faith, and afterward fall back, are worse then those who never made any shew at all. It is sad for any one to live openly in sin; but for such as have made an open profession of godliness, to apostatize, and fall back to sin, this is matter of saddest lamentation: For as the Apostle Peter speakes, It had been better for them that they had not known the way of God, then after they have known it to turn from the holy Commandment: It is better (in spiritual respects) never to have been a Professour, then to be an Apostate. Thus also it is better (in civil respects) never to have been high, or great in the World, then after all this to suffer a miserable downfal, and to be numbred among the lowest of the People.

And in this we may see the wonderful love of Jesus Christ to poor sinners, who suffered so great a change for our sakes; he might well say, I was at ease, but he hath broken me asunder. Christ was broken all to pieces for us, he was broken and bruised for us, but he had been at ease: How great was his love who willingly suffered not only for sinners, but as a sinner, having reigned in righteousness from all eternity? The Apostle useth this argument, more then once, to advance the kindness of Christ to sinful man (2 Cor. 8. 9.) Beloved, You know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who though he were rich, yet he became poor for our sakes, that we through his poverty might be made rich: For Christ who was rich to become poor, argues the riches of his love; this shews the great affection he bare to us, because it shews that he bare such great affliction for us.

Again (*Phil.*2.6,7.) Who being in the form of God, thought it no robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a Servant: He emptyed himself, to fill us; and to raise our reputation with his Father, laid down his own.

Now seeing Jesus Christ suffered such a wondrous change, from the form of God to the form of a Servant; from the fulness of God, to the emptiness of the meanest man; this is the highest testimony of his love. The course which Christ did run to save us, declares that there went as much of his love, as of his worthiness to save us: For as no creature had worth enough to save us any way, so no creature had love enough to save us such a way. If one had come out of poverty and misery to die for us, it had shewed wonderful love, but to leave riches and become poor, to leave glory and become base, to leave fulness and become empty, to leave (in regard of visible manifestations) his God-head, and become Man: How unchangable was his heart to us, who yielded himself up to such changes for us? He being at ease was broken asunder that we might not be broken, or rather that we might be made whole for ever.

Hence Observe, All worldly prosperity may quickly be dasht and lost.

Do not think any new thing happens under the Sun, when you see men that were at ease, broken; men that were full, empty; men that were rich, impoverished; men that were in health, sick. The holy Apostle (*1 Cor.*7.30.) at once counsels and commands us, Use the World, as not abusing it, that is, use it well: There is much evil in the World, yet we may, yea we must make a good use of the World: Why? Because the fashion of this World passeth away. As fashions in the World alter and change every day, so doth the fashion of this World; there is a World to come, the fashion whereof shall never go or pass away; but the fashion (or scheme) of this World passeth continually. The word which we translate fashion, signifies a Geometrical figure, or artificial form, habit, vesture, as also any rhetorical fineness or bravery of words: Now all the beauty of this World is but like some of these schemes, which have more shew then substance in them; and the whole World below put together, is but like a Pageant, or Mask, on the scene whereof many persons are represented to act their parts, but they soon disappear, and the stage or scene it self is pulled down.

As thus the whole World passeth away, so doth the state of each man in the World. And as there is in the World an affected varying of fashions, or a voluntary passing from one vain fashion to another, from one proud fashion to another; so there is an inflicted variety of fashion in the World; God makes man pass from one fashion to another, whether he will or no, or much against his will; when his fashion was fulness, he makes it emptiness; when his fashion was riches, he makes it poverty; when his fashion was Peace and quietness, he makes it Warr and confusion; these are the changes which God makes among the fashions of the World. The pride of man changes from one vain fashion to a other; the providence of God changes man from his most delightful, to a mournful fashion: And when the Garments of outward prosperity seem to us so strong, that they will never wear out, how much or how long soever we wear them, he tears and breaks both them and us, as Job complains with his next breath.

He hath broken me asunder.

וַיְפַרְפְּרֵנִי à radice פּוּר contrivit, irritũ fecit. Verba grandia selegit ad exaggerandam mali sui vim. Merc. In conjugatione quadrata auxesin habet. Merc. q. d. Frequentatis ictibus in minutissimas partes contrivit me. Bold.

This sentence is but one word in the Hebrew, yet more then a single word; it is elegantly doubled in construction to imply double affliction. Grammarians tell us, that two words put together, or the same word twice put, increase the sense. Ordinary words will not serve to express an extraordinary condition; he speaks great and compounded words, because his sorrows were great and compounded sorrows. Jobs was not a single, but a double breaking; yea, his was a manifold breaking: He was often broken, and utterly broken; the repeated strokes which fell upon him (by divine dispensation) from all hands, had beaten him to dust and atomes: He hath broken me in sunder.

Further, The root of the word signifies, to make void, to dissipate, to scatter, to bring to nought, or to make nothing of (Psal. 33. 10.) The Lord brings to nought the counsel of the heathen. So again (Isa. 8. 10.) It is used often for breaking the Law, by frequent and wilfull sinning against it. Proud sinners would break the Law in sunder, or pull it all in pieces: They have made void thy Law (Psal. 119.) As if they would not onely sin against the Law, but sin away the Law; not onely withdraw themselves from the obedience of it, but drive it out of the World; they would make void, and repeal the holy acts of God, that their own wicked acts might not be questioned; and lest the Law should have a power to punish them, they will deny it a power to rule them; that's the force of the simple word here used, as applied to highest transgressing against the Law of God.

Now as wicked men by sinning, would batter the Law to pieces, so God by afflicting doth sometimes break good men to pieces. Consider what course usage the holy Law of God hath in the hearts and lives of wicked men; O how they tear it, and vex it, and batter it every day: Thus doth the Lord deal with many of his holy servants, who (had they their wish) would not make the least breach in the Law, and whose hearts are often broken with godly sorrow, because they cannot but break it, yet to these he doth not only give a bruise, or a blow, but breaks them asunder.

Confractus sum velut uvæ aut olivæ in torculari.

There is yet another elegancy in the signification of the word: For, as Hebricians observe, it notes a bruising, like that of Grapes or Olives, which are trodden in a press, to make Wine or Oyl; hence also a Noun from this Verb signifies the Wine-press (Isa. 63. 3.) Now Grapes and Olives being trodden, are broken and bruised in pieces; not only is their form and beauty totally spoiled, but all their sweetness, juyce, and Liquor, is wrought out of them, and they are left as a dry lump.

Now look what Grapes and Olives are, when taken out of the Press; even such a lump was Job; he was broken asunder in the Wine-press, though not of Gods wrath, as his Friends mis-judged, yet in the Wine-press of his chastisements and severest tryals; all his worldly moisture was squeezed out, and his earthly glory was quite defaced, he had nothing left of that, but (as it were) a dry husk; yet his spiritual estate was still juicy, and his soul, by these pressings, treadings, and breakings, had distilled much sweet Oyl and Wine, and much more was still remaining in him. From these heightned significations of the word laid together;

Observe in general: God doth not onely afflict those whom he loves, but afflict them sorely and severely.

He afflicts some, not onely to the impairing and abating, but to the undoing and ruining of their outward comforts, and worldly enjoyments: Nothing can be said to decipher an afflicted state beyond what this word will bear. And that God doth afflict his chosen ones to the utmost rack of this phrase, will appear also from all that follows to the end of the fourteenth Verse; the opening of which will be a continual proof and illustration of this great and often experimented truth, upon, and among the precious Sons of Sion: This I shall hint all along, besides those observations which arise out of them: He hath broken me asunder; and what follows in the same Verse;

He hath also taken me by my neck, and shaken me to pieces.

Is not this to deal severely? A loving Father takes his Son about the neck and kisses him; what a rough salute did the Lord give this Son of his, when he took him by the neck and shook him to pieces? Such a carriage seems not to be after the manner of men, much less after the manner of Fathers; yet this was the manner of God to Job, who was also his Friend and Father.

He hath taken me by my neck. The neck is as the tower and strength of the body; and when a man is taken by the neck, he is assaulted in his chiefest strength, and taken at the greatest advantage.

There is a threefold metaphor, or allusion in these words, which being considered distinctly, will let out their meaning yet more fully.

First, They bear an allusion to Wrestlers, who take one another by the neck, or collar; he that is strongest, not onely takes his Antagonist by the neck, but shakes him, as if he would shake him to pieces. God wrestled with the Patriarch Jacob literally and corporally (though the greatest labour and stress of Jacobs wrestling was spiritual and internal.) And when he saw that he prevailed not (Jacob prevailed with God for so much strength, that now God could not (according to that dispensation) prevail against Jacob, yet) he touched the hollow of Jacobs thigh, and made him halt. God wrestled with Job, not corporally, yet in corporal things; the stress also of his wrestling was spiritual, and he prevailed with God, and over Satan; yet God was pleased not only for the present, to touch a joynt, and make him halt, but even to shake every joynt and limb to pieces.

Secondly, It is an allusion to Serjeants or Bailiffs, that are sent to arrest men for debt, or for their evil deeds: This sort of men are boysterous enough, they having power, will not forbear to lay hold on Persons obnoxious, and take them by the neck, when they attach them. We have that usage expressed (Matth. 18. 28.) The evil Servant, to whom the Lord had forgiven ten thousand Talents (a vast debt) found one of his fellow-servants, who owed him an hundred pence (an inconsiderable sum) and would needs exact the utmost from him: the Text saith, The same servant went out, and found one of his fellow-servants, which ought him an hundred pence, and he laid hands upon him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest: He took him by the throat, the word signifies properly to choak, or to take another so rudely by the throat, as to choak, or (as we say) throttle him. It is translated to choak with water, (Mark 5. 13.) and is appliable to any violent act by which the breath is stopt, especially to taking by the neck, or throat.

"Ἔπνιγε Premebat fauces illius debitoris tanquam suffocaturus: obtorto collo premebat. Eras.

Thirdly, It is an allusion, as some conceive, to Conquerors in War, who, when they have worsted an Adversary, take him by the Neck, and make him their Prisoner: As it is the last act of triumph and insultation over an Enemy, to tread upon his neck (Josh. 10. 24.) Joshua called all the men of Israel, and said unto the Captains of the men of War which went with them, Come neer, and put your feet upon the necks of these Kings: and they came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them. Now as it is (I say) the last act of triumph to tread upon the neck; so it is the first act of triumph to take by the neck. Job thought himself used thus, He hath taken me by the neck, as a Wrestler, as a Sergeant, or as a Victor in War.

And hath shaken me to pieces. I will not let it pass unobserved, that the word which we translate to shake in pieces, is but one in the Hebrew; but as that which we render to break asunder, so this is doubled to heighten the sense, and intimate no ordinary, but a terrible shaking; such a shaking as is followed with scattering, or a shaking, like the breaking of a Potters Vessel with an Iron Rod. The word is used to signifie the irresistable efficacy of the Word of God, whether to convert, or to confound, to break the stony heart into contrition for sin; or to batter the obstinate heart, which continueth in sin. Is not my word a fire? (saith God) The word of God is a fire, to consume the dross and corruption that is in the hearts and lives of men. And is not my word a Hammer? What kind of Hammer? A Hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces? Yes, the word of God is all this, 'tis a Fire, and 'tis a Hammer, it burns, it batters all that stands before it. Now as the Word of God is to the hearts of men, so the Rod of God is to the estates of men; it shakes, shatters, and breaks them to pieces: To shake, or break a man to pieces, is in common speech appliable to the estates of men, as well as to their persons; for of such a man we say, He is broken.

Λαβὼν μὲ τῆς κόμης. Sept.

The Septuagint reads this clause with an expository addition; He hath taken me by the hair of the head, and shaken me. They who follow that reading, interpret it, by a metaphor, He hath taken me by the hair; that is, by my outward estate, by my riches, honour, and greatness (these are to men, as the hair is to the head, ornaments, yet excrements) he hath taken me by these hairs, even all my outward splendour and glory, and shaken them in pieces.

All this diversity, whether of reading, or expounding the Text, meets in the main point, That God deals severely with many whom he loves dearly.

He hath shaken me in pieces, and yet he hath not done with me; as the Lord broke and shook me asunder when I was whole, so he wounds me now I am broken: If he can but find enough of me left together to make a mark of, I shall be sure to feel his Arrows.

Proverbialis locutio quo significamus aliquem esse omnibus telis & injuriis propositum.

And set me up for his mark.] Job was cast down by affliction, and yet he was set up to receive more affliction: 'Tis a Proverbial speech, signifying that a man is made the common receit, or subject of misery. A Mark is purposely set up to receive Arrows, Darts, or Bullets shot at it; so that for a man to be set up as a mark, is to stand as a common object, upon which all calamities center themselves; what Job here complains of, he had expostulated with God about (Chap. 7. 20.) Wherefore hast thou set me up as a mark, so that I am a burden to my self? I shall speak the less to it here, having spoken to it there already.

A נגד servo, quod eum diligenter observent jaculatores ne oberrent.

The same Original word is not used in both places, though the sense be the same: There Job speaks in a Paraphrase, Thou hast set me opposite, or over against thee: Here he uses a single term, which notes a mark, strictly taken; for it comes from a root which signifies to observe; because the mark, or white, is diligently observed by him that shoots; the Archer keeps his eye upon the mark, that he may send his Arrow to the mark. A mark is that to the eye in shooting, which the end is to the mind of man in all his wayes of acting; and therefore our English word Scope from the Greek (σκοπὸς) which properly signifies an Archers mark, is used figuratively, to signifie the end which we design to our selves in every undertaking. And hence the eye with which we take aim, is put for the end (Matth. 6. 22.) If thine eye be single, the whole body is light; that is, if the end, or the thing that thou aimest at be just and right, all thy actions will be right too: Every man is regulated by his end, all he doth looks that way; therefore, if thy end and aim be honest and sincere, all thy wayes and works will be such. So then, as the end is the mark of the mind, so a mark is the end of the eye; it directs all unto it. And while Job saiths He hath set me up as a mark, his meaning is, I am the But or white, at which the Lord aims all his Arrows, he empties his Quiver at my breast. So the Church cries out (Lam. 3. 12, 13.) He hath bent his bow, he hath set me as a mark for the Arrow; he hath caused the Arrows of his Quiver to enter into my reins: The Hebrew is, He hath caused the Sons of his Quiver to enter into my reins. Arrows are the Sons of the Quiver: Sons are called Arrows (Psal. 127. 4, 5.) As Arrows in the hand of the mighty, so are the Children of the youth: blessed is the man that hath his Quiver full of them. Now as Sons are compared to Arrows in a Quiver, so Arrows are compared to Sons; because as Sons are together in their Fathers house, so are Arrows in the Quiver. Christ is described by old Simeon, as a mark set up to shoot at (Luke 2. 34, 35.) This Child is set for the falling and rising of many in Israel; and for a sign to be spoken against. What sign? A But-sign, or a But-mark. A sign to be spoken against; that is, All shall direct the Arrows of their words against him. Bitter words are compared to Arrows; many showers of these were shot against Jesus Christ: He was aimed at on every side, by envious spirits and malevolent tongues: He might say as Job, Thou hast set me up as a mark.

Ego ipse positus fui in scopum ut mille jacula, mille sagittas exciperem.

Significat Christi universi scopum fore, quem omnes certatim figere contendant. Beza.

Observe from this Allusion, First, The Servants of God must expect many afflictions from the hand of God.

A mark is not set up (or it is very rarely set up) for one shot: As God hath more mercies then one in store for his people, so he hath more Arrows then one for them in his Quiver. When thou hast received one shot, prepare for a second, and a third.

Observe, Secondly, God seems to take pleasure in afflicting his people.

This also contributes to the proof of the general Observation before given: For the more pleasure any one takes in afflicting, the more severity he shews in afflicting. A Father chastiseth his Child with tears in his eyes; every stroke which a wise Father gives his Child, is as a wound to himself, and this abates the smart of the blow; but for Fathers to do it, as the Apostle speaks (Heb. 12.) For their pleasure, or when it pleaseth a Father (in that sense) to do it, this encreaseth the smart. The sufferer feels most pain, when it is a pleasure to another to make him suffer. Now, what is shooting at a mark? No man shoots at a mark for toyl, to make a labour, and a business of it, but men shoot at a mark for their recreation and pleasure.

God delights not properly in the sorrows and sufferings of his people; he is not like those cruel Tyrants, who fasten their Captives to a Post, and then shoot them dead for sport: God doth not willingly, much less sportingly, afflict the Children of Men (Lam. 3. 33.) yet it pleaseth him to afflict them; yea, as Job speaks (Chap. 9.) He laughs at the tryal of the innocent; that is, He carries himself (as to their sense) as if he did not regard what they suffered, though indeed he be infinitely tender of them all in their sufferings; yet because they do not alwayes understand the language of this laughter, it makes them cry out as if God had forsaken them, and were either really turned an Enemy against them, or at least, did not use them as his Friends; from which near relation, nothing appears more remote, than to be set up, and shot at as a mark.

There is a great difference between shooting at randome, and shooting at a mark. God doth not draw his bow at a venture (as he who slew Ahab did, 1 Kings 22. 34.) or shoot at the whole host of mankind, let the Arrow light where and on whom it will, but he singles out the particular person whom he intends to hit. Every one of his Arrows goes upon a special errand, and touches no breast but that against which it was sent: And as this speaks the honour of God, who determines as much, upon whom, as what to do; and chuseth out those at whom he means to shoot, as well as the means by which he shoots at them; so it should establish our hearts to receive his shot, and in this sense, to be like a senseless mark, which stirs not from the Arrow, nor withdraws from the deadly Bullet. It is not onely the grace, but the glory of a Believer, when he can stand as a But-mark, and take affliction quietly. The Apostle speaks near this language, and fully this truth (1 Thes. 1. 3.) I would that no man should be moved for these afflictions; for you your selves know that we are appointed thereunto. As if he had said, I would have you stand as Posts, notwithstanding all these afflictions: Not that he would have them careless or secure, but couragious, and full of holy undauntedness: I would have no man flinch, or stir a foot, no more than a mark that is shot at; Why? Knowing that we are appointed thereto: As a mark is appointed to be shot at, and set up on purpose that the Arrow may be directed against it; so the Lord sets up his Saints and Servants on purpose, that he may shoot the Arrows of affliction at them; therefore let us keep our ground, and not be moved. We honour God, yea, it is our honour also, when we are unmoveable in active obedience, as the Apostle exhorts (2 Cor. 15. 58.) Wherefore my Brethren, be stedfast and unmoveable, alway abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord. But as it is our honour, and Gods honour too, when we are unmoveable in doing the will of God; so it is a greater honour both to him and us, when we are so in suffering his will, or in passive obedience; when we stand to it, and move no more in way of cowardise and impatience then a Post when it is shot at. This is the glory of a Christian, and it is his duty; this is the glory of God, and it is his due; though it be put here as an aggravation of the greatness of Jobs affliction, that he was set as a standing mark, yet it is a heightning of our praise contentedly to be so.

God will make wicked men his standing mark to all eternity, against whom he will shoot the Arrows, the poysoned Arrows of his indignation, which shall drink up their spirits, and yet their spirits shall not be consumed. God makes his precious Servants and faithful people, his standing mark for a time, they feel the Arrows of affliction, and are deeply wounded; as Job further prosecutes his sad condition, continuing the Allegory in the next Verse.

Vers. 13. His Archers compass me round about, he cleaveth my reins in sunder, &c.

God hath a Bow, he hath his Arrows, and his Archers, all ready at a call. The decree of God is his Quiver, his Arrows are his purposes, and the Instruments which execute them are his Archers; whether rational or irrational, whether men, or things, any thing which God useth to afflict man by, is his Archer: His Archers have compassed me about: The word is (Rabbi) His Archers from Rab, great; so some read it, His great Ones have compassed me about. The word Rab, doth not only signifie greatness in bulk, or continued quantity, but in number, or discreet quantity. Hence Archers are called, Rabbi, great ones; not from their magnitude, but from their multitude, because Archers go in company; two at the least, and usually many are a set; or they are called many, because every one hath many Arrows. Men carry but one Sword, and one Spear, but they carry many Arrows, therefore the word signifies many. His Archers, or many, compass me round about. Hence note, in prosecution of the same point,

That, God hath variety of means to afflict.

He can make any creature his Archer; and he hath many Quivers full of Arrows. Old Jacob said of Joseph (Gen. 49. 23.) The Archers shot sore at him, and grieved him Joseph was a mark of envy, because God had put so many marks of honour upon him: His own Brethren were the Archers. Job had many Archers shooting at him: I can name you seven eminent Archers that shot at Job.

First, Heaven was an Archer; the Heavens shot fire, which burnt up his flocks of sheep.

Secondly, The Air was an Archer, that shot wind, and down fell the House upon his Children.

Thirdly, The Chaldeans and Sabeans were Archers, and they shot spoyling and plundering; they took away all his Cattel, and slew his Servants with the edge of the Sword.

Fourthly, The Devil was an Archer, he shot diseases, and wounded his body all over with sores.

Fifthly, The earth was an Archer, and that shot Worms, he was cloathed with Worms, and clods of Earth.

Sixthly, His Wife was an Archer, or an Archeress, she shot terrible Arrows, evil and bitter words.

Seventhly, His Friends were Archers, they shot reproofs, and uncomfortable comforts; they pierced him with their salves, and the very means that they used to heal him, grieved him more.

All these shot at him; he must needs have many hurts, who was compassed about with so many Archers. David felt the anguish of these Arrows (Psal. 38. 1.) O Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure: For thine arrows stick fast in me, and thy hand presseth me sore. David was full of Arrows; what those Arrows were, is not determined in the Text. One of the Ancients saith, They were the threatnings of God, with which his conscience was wounded for sin: as for his body and outward estate, they were in a whole skin. 'Tis true, judgments or wrath threatned, wound the spirit deeper then judgments or wrath executed wound the outward man; and as the whole word of God, so that part of it especially which consists of threatnings, is, as the Apostle speaks (Heb. 4. 12.) Quick and powerful, and sharper then any two-edged Sword, piercing, even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, &c. Yet I rather conceive, that Davids Arrows were bodily troubles or diseases already inflicted, the immediate cause of which was the anger of God, and the cause of which was his own sin, both which are expressed at the third Verse, There is no soundness in my flesh, because of thine anger, neither is there any rest in my bones, because of my sin: When sin stirs up the anger of God, the anger of God can quickly send his Arrows abroad; nor is there any thing in this World so near unto us, but he can make an Arrow, or an Archer of it; His Archers compass me round.

And see what kind of Archers his were, they were no bunglers, they were good marks men; like the left-handed Benjamites (Judg. 20. 16.) They could shoot at a hairs breadth and not miss. For it follows:

He cleaveth my reins asunder. They are expert Archers who can cleave the reins: The reins are in the middle of the back. He that shoots at a Butt, and hits the middle of it, shoots exactly; the whole Butt is not the mark, but the White, which is set (according to a Geometrical proportion) in the middle of it. He that hits the mark, hits the middle of the Butt; but he that cleaves the Pin, (that's the Archers Dialect) which fastens the mark to the Butt, That's the Archer, or That's He (as they also use to speak at their sport) he wins the prize: An Archer may hit the man, and not his reins; but to hit his reins, is skilful archery: Jobs Archers were thus cunning in their art, They compass me about, and cleave my reins asunder: That's the first.

Renes sedes sunt affectus & libidinis vehementissimi. Renū nomē in Hebræo à desiderando dicitur.

Further, We may understand it by a metaphor, and so two wayes.

First, The reins being the seat of desire, as Naturalists speak; some interpret, he cleaveth my reins asunder, thus, He smites me in that which is to me most pleasant and desirable: and then the seat of affection is put for the thing which we affect. This holds out a profitable truth.

God can wound us in that upon which we most entirely set our affections.

He knows how to cleave our very reins asunder, and he often doth it; that which we inordinately love, is usually the mark at which he aims his Arrow: The readiest way to lose any comfort, is to over-love it (I add that by way of caution, not of direction.) And indeed, though it be a great deal of smart to us, yet it may prove a great deal of ease to us, to be wounded in that which we over-love. God in much mercy to those he loves, takes that from them which they love too much, that so they may love him the more, to whom all their love, and more if they had it, is but due: He cleaves their reins, that their reins may cleave to him.

Secondly, The reins in a metaphor, signifie that which is most secret and hidden (Psal. 16. 7.) My reins also instruct me in the night season; that is, my most inward thoughts instruct me, I have secret communion with my self, and my heart reads me a curtain Lecture every night. My reins instruct me in the night season. This metaphorical interpretation gives us this plain Note.

God pierceth into our most retired thoughts, and can punish our most secret sins.

Those sins which lye as much out of sight as the reins do, he seeth, and he seeth them as plainly as an Archer doth the white, or mark, which stands open to the eye; for all things are naked and manifest (anatomiz'd, or cut open to the reins of the back, so much the word bears, and so manifest are we) before his eyes with whom we have to do.

Take it literally, and then to cleave the reins, is an expression of putting a man to the greatest sorrow or pain imaginable; if the back were chined (as we speak) and cut quite down through the reins, this would be an exquisite torment; the reins are a very tender part: A deep wound in some other parts of the body, is but a scratch, and such wounding were a kind of embracing, in comparison of that.

Secondly,

Secondly, To cleave the reins, is to weaken, because the reins, or the loyns, are the strength of a man, or of any creature; Loe his strength is in his loyns, saith God of Behemoth, which is as some think the Elephant (Job 40. 16.) And a man of no loyns is a man of no strength, in common language.

Elumbem reddere.

Thirdly, To cleave the reins, is to give a mortal wound. Chyrurgions and Physicians observe, That if the reins be struck through, there is no help for it; cleaving the reins is much like piercing the heart; this is present death, and that leaves no hope of life, the wound of it is incurable.

Mala immedicabilia indicat.

There is a fourth interpretation, He cleaveth my reins, may note the torture of any acute Disease, especially that of the Stone in the Reins or Kidneys; which is as it were the cutting of the back asunder; poor Patients under it are often heard so complaining: Oh, 'tis like a sharp Knife; the Stone is not only a grinding, but a cutting pain.

I shall onely lay in the consideration of these four glosses from the literal sense of the word, to a farther making out of the first general Observation, That God often deals very severely in outward, or present dispensations, with many of his dearest Servants: He doth that which they may call cleaving of the reins; and that, in the easiest of the four senses, is a very severe dispensation; much more (which we may suppose) when the pain of all four meets in one man, as doubtless they did in Job; He cleaveth my reins asunder.

חמל Pepercit, ignovit, propitius fuit. Nullam Domihi in me misericordiam, sed omnigenam sævitiam experior. Merc.

And doth not spare.] He that doth not spare, useth the utmost extremity, and shews no pity or indulgence: to spare, is both an act, and one of the kinds of mercy: Sparing is opposed to severity, it is a doing less against another then we may, and that two wayes.

First, When we do less then we can. We having power, though no right to do more then we do, no nor to do so much as we do: Thus a thief may be said to spare a man, when he doth not take all from him, life and all.

Secondly, When we do less against another then we may, both according to the right of our cause, and the power in our hands: Thus a Magistrate spares a Thief, or a Creditor his Debtor; when the one exacts not the whole punishment, nor the other the whole Sum due. And in this sense God spareth the Sons of men; he hath both power and right to punish sinful man to the utmost, but he spares him: To hold the hand, though but a little, is sparing mercy; but Job found not this mercy, He doth not spare; as if he had said, The Lord layes on, layes on, and doth not forbear.

Hence observe; There is mercy in sparing.

There is a five-fold mercy of God.

First, Rewarding mercy, towards those who have done well.

Secondly, Pardoning mercy, which is exercised towards those who have done ill, or towards past sin.

Thirdly, Preventing mercy, when he keeps us from evil, whether it be the evil of sin, or of punishment.

Fourthly, Delivering mercy, when though he let us fall into the evil of sin or punishment, yet he is pleased to help us up, and take us out again.

Fifthly, There is Sparing mercy; if, while we are in affliction, God deals gently with us, this is sparing mercy: As God was not pleased to prevent Jobs sorrows, nor to deliver him from them, so he did not spare him in them; his hand continued heavy upon him, he had no ease.

There is a four-fold degree of this sparing mercy of God.

First, Not to punish at all: thus God sometimes spares his own people, as a Father spares his Son that serveth him (Mal. 3. 17.) Though they fail, yet he passeth it by, and doth not reckon with them for it. The Lord represented himself to Amos, forming Grass-hoppers, which either in kind, or in a figure (shadowing the Assyrians) threatned to devour the land; this Vision put the Prophet upon that earnest prayer, O Lord God, forgive, by whom shall Jacob arise, for he is small? The Lord repented for this, it shall not be, saith the Lord (Amos 7. 1, 2, 3.) Here was sparing mercy, and this is repeated a second time (Vers. 6.) yet in the third Vision of a Plumb-line (by which God was noted, taking exact notice of all the unevenness and crookedness of that people in that Vision, I say) as the Prophet suspended Prayer, so the Lord being resolved no longer to suspend their punishment, saith, I will not pass by them again any more: that is, I will spare them no more, which is again repeated (Chap. 8. 2.) where by a Basket of Summer fruit the Lord shewed their ripeness in sin, and his readiness to punish, and not to spare.

Secondly, It is sparing mercy, when punishment is deferred, or adjourned to a farther day; thus the Lord spared the old World, a hundred and twenty years, My spirit shall not alway strive: It did a long time, he spared them many years to draw them to repentance, and to leave them inexcusable, because they repented not.

Thirdly, It is sparing mercy, when judgment is moderated: When, though God punish, yet he doth not punish to the full; when, though the cloud break, yet he lets but a few drops fall on us, and doth not pour out showers, or make an inundation to overwhelm us; when, though he strike, yet he gives but few strokes; yea, if he abate but one stroke, it is sparing mercy. The Jews (2 Cor. 11. 24.) gave Paul, forty stripes, save one; and in this they would be thought to be merciful, because they might have given him forty by the Law, (Deut. 25. 3.) therefore to abate one, was sparing mercy. As to punish beyond the Law, though it be but a little beyond, is cruelty; so to punish less, though it be but a little less, is mercy: And this is brought in as an argument of great mercy (Psal. 78. 38.) But he being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath: They felt his wrath, but God did not stir up all his wrath; they were smitten, but not destroyed, Justice did not make an utter end of them, there was mercy in that. The like read (Jer. 30. 11. Jer. 46. 28.) I will not let thee go altogether unpunished (yet I will spare thee, though I punish thee) I will correct thee in measure, I will not make a full end of thee. But are not all the corrections of God, yea, and his judgments too, done in measure? All the judgments of God are done in measure, as measure notes a rule of equity, but not as measure notes a rule of equality. Again, to do a thing by measure, doth not alwayes note the rule by which it is done, but the degree in which it is done. And so to do a thing in measure, is to do it moderately; as when it is said, (John 3. 24.) That God gives not the spirit by measure to Christ: the meaning is onely this, he gives him the spirit abundantly, infinitely, without stint or limit: So when it is said, that he corrects man in measure, the meaning is onely this, that he corrects him moderately, mercifully, with many stints and limits. It is of the Lords mercy, (saith Jeremy, Lam. 3. 22.) What? That we are delivered? That we are crowned with comforts? These are of the Lords mercy indeed: but he speaks not of these, the mercy he speaks of is, That we are not utterly consumed. What kind of mercy is this? Sparing mercy. Suppose God take away many Children, yet if he leave but one, here is sparing mercy to the Parents: Suppose he take many hundreds and thousands of a mans estate, yet if he leave him a little to buy Bread, and to stand between him and Beggary, this is sparing mercy: Suppose we are much consumed, yet if we are not utterly consumed, this is also sparing mercy. In the Prophecy of Daniel, we read of a goodly tree, And behold a watcher, and an holy one came down from Heaven, and cryed aloud, Hew down the Tree, and cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit, &c. Nevertheless, leave the stump of his root in the earth, &c. Though it was judgment to shake off the leaves and fruit, to hew down the boughs and stock, yet it was sparing mercy to leave the root, that gave hopes it might grow again, and not be utterly consumed; 'tis sparing mercy when any thing is reserved: But God did not spare Job, he took all; he did not leave him (as we say) A shirt to his back, nor a sound patch in his skin: Satans power had no limit put to it, but as to life onely (Chap. 2. 6.) Behold, he is in thine hand, but (or onely) save his life: There was indeed somewhat of sparing mercy in that, and that was more than Satan would have spared, yet it was but so much, as without which he could not have groaned out this complaint, as to the loss of all other comforts, He doth not spare.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, There is a sparing mercy of God in the very act of afflicting, when he shews that he is unwilling to afflict, or discovers tenderness to them that are afflicted (*Lam.*3.12.) He doth not willingly afflict, nor grieve the children of men. As there are many who will serve God in an outward form of worship, whom yet they neither serve nor worship with their will: So God will afflict some, whom he doth not afflict with his will; he doth not give out his spirit, or take delight in smiting, while he smites them. Thus the Lord expressed himself towards his ancient people the Jewes; he threatens Israel, That the Assyrian shall be his King; that is, the Assyrian shall carry them Captives to Babylon and exercise a tyrannical power over them (*Hos.*11. 5.) Yea, the Sword shall abide on his Cities, and shall consume his branches (*Vers.*6.) Now though God were resolved to do this, and did also bring it to pass; yet he saith (*Ver.*8.) How shall I give thee up Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? (sc. into the Enemies hand) How shall I make thee as Admah? How shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together: I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not return to destroy Ephraim: that is, I will not destroy him wholly, by redoubling evil upon him: I will destroy once, but I will not return to destroy, a remnant shall be saved. The Lord gave up Ephraim, but he did not make Ephraim as Admah, and Zeboim, he did not utterly ruine him; and what he did against Ephraim, he did it with a secret contest in his own spirit, How shall I do this? I do it not with my heart, and whole mind, my heart is turned within me, while my hand is turned against thee; it grieveth me while thou art grieved, while I kindle this fire of affliction in thy borders, the fire of compassion kindles in my own bowels; My repentings are kindled together, while I punish thee for thine impenitency, and my heart is turned within me, while I must correct thee, for refusing to return (*Vers.*5.)

Nero being desired to sign a Writ for the execution of an Offender, was so pittiful at his first entrance upon the Empire (though he proved a Monster for cruelty after) that he could hardly be perswaded or wrought to subscribe it, and when he did it, in doing it he said, How glad should I be if I could not write my name; which wish occasioned Seneca his Tutour, to write a Book of Clemencie, in which he extols Nero, as the pattern and mirrour of clemencie. When either God or man do acts of severest Justice, with meltings of spirit, and tenderness of affection towards those who fall under their hand, those acts of Justice have a great temperament of sparing mercy in them.

Quam velle nescire literas.

For as it is in sinning, when a Believer falls into a great sin, yet because his heart cannot go fully with it, he cannot delight or take pleasure in it, therefore his may be called Sparing sinfulness: whereas a carnal heart committing only a little sin for the matter, yet, because he delighteth in it, and is pleased with sin, he doth not spare to sin. Now (I say) as it is in sinning, so in punishing; he doth not spare to punish, who doth it with his whole heart, and takes delight in it, though the actual punishment be but little, whereas he whose heart retreats while his hand is stretched out in greater punishments, may be said to spare in punishing.

Hence, to shew that God exacted the utmost of his Justice upon his Son our Lord Jesus Christ, when he stood in our place; the Apostle saith (Rom. 8. 32.) He spared not his Son. How did he not spare him? He did not spare him any of these four wayes. He did not spare him, so, as not to punish him at all; for the Cup could not pass from him. He did not spare him by deferring the time, but when the hour was come that he must suffer, he suffered in that moment. Nor did he spare him in the degree, he suffered to the utmost for our sins, God did not abate one drop out of his Cup, not one dram of the weight of his sorrows: Yea fourthly, God did not spare him, in regard of the affection with which he punished him: The Lord may be said willingly to afflict him for the sins of the Children of men, though he doth not willingly afflict the Children of men; He was pleased to bruise him (*Isa.*53.) and that signifies not only (Voluntatem Dei) that it was the purpose and resolution of God, that his Son should be bruised for our sins; but it signifies also (Voluptatem Dei) the delight and contentment that the Lord had in bruising his Son. He did not spare, but gave him up with his heart, to those punishments which were due to sinners. God shewed no more relenting towards his Son, when he stood suffering in the place of sinners, then he doth to those sinners who stand in their own place to suffer without his Son: Yea, God the Father did not only not relent, or shew any yerning of bowels towards his Son in that suffering condition, but (as to sense and present apprehension) he hardned his heart towards him, which caused that grievous out-cry of Christ upon the Cross, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

Not that God did really withdraw his love in the least, from his Son, but he did infinitely delight to see his Justice satisfied; and his Son as a Conquerour, bearing up under the weight of it. Thus the Lord took pleasure in afflicting his Son, or (as Job speaks, Chap. 9.) He laughed at the tryal of that innocent and Holy one: And indeed, without this, the work of our redemption had not been accomplished by a full satisfaction to divine Justice; for it would have had somewhat of mercy in it towards the Redeemer, as well as it is all mercy towards the redeemed: But as it is all of mercy to us, so it was to be nothing at all of mercy to Jesus Christ, that sinners are redeemed: he was to have no more of his Father then he paid for, and his Father did not spare him, but made him pay the utmost Farthing, that upon the casting up of the account between himself and sinful man appeared a due debt unto his Justice. Job complains, that he was not spared, yet the truth is, that every man, how much soever he suffers on this side Hell, hath somewhat of sparing mercy in his sufferings.

Secondly, Forasmuch as Job being about to shew the extremity of his affliction, tells us, That God did not spare, Observe, Sparing mercy is the lowest degree of mercy: If God deny sparing mercy, he denies all mercy.

It is argument enough that God shewed Christ no mercy, when the Apostle saith, He did not spare him. That we sinners might have all mercy, he that saved us from our sins had none. The Angels who sinned found no mercy, no sacrifice was provided for them, God cast them down to Hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgement: All which punishments are affirmed by the Apostle Peter, as the result of this Negative, God spared not the Angels (*2 Pet.*2.4.) The same Apostle tells us also in the next Verse, that, God spared not the old World, but saved Noah, the eighth person, a Preacher of righteousness, bringing in the Flood upon the world of the ungodly. Neither the Angels who apostatiz'd from God, nor the old ungodly World had any share in sparing mercy. Job looked upon himself (in reference to present peace) as one in their case, He doth not spare; which appears further in the next clause.

He poureth out my Gall upon the ground.

The Original word which we render Gall, signifies properly, bitterness, because the Gall is so. Peter speaking to Simon Magus (Act. 8. 23.) puts these two together, I perceive that thou art in the Gall of bitterness: He that continues in sin, lives in the Gall of spiritual bitterness; and he whose Gall is poured out, is in, or ready to go into the gall of corporal death. For as cleaving of the reins, implyed the receiving of a deadly wound; so pouring out the Gall upon the ground, is a proverbial, speaking present death. When the gall is out, the bowels are out; the gall is affixed to the Liver: So that, it is as much as to say, He kills me dead, or I am now upon the borders of death it self: When the gall is indeed powred out, we cannot live; and he who is afflicted to such a height, that he cryes, my gall is poured out, may well be numbred among the dead. The reason or original of this speech was this (as I conceive) because when a wild Beast, or any other (which are fit for mans eating) are taken and slain, it is usual when the bowels are pulled out, to cut off, and throw away, or pour out the Gall upon the ground, lest the overflowing of it should distrelish the neighbouring parts: So that Job in this doth only prosecute the former theam of his grievous ſufferings, or that he was (as Paul ſpeaks of himſelf (2 *Cor.*1.8.) preſſed out of meaſure, above ſtrength, inſomuch that he deſpaired even of life; which he gives us yet more fully in the next Verſe.

Verſ. 14. He breaketh me with breach upon breach, and runneth on me like a Giant.

Job varies into all manner of inventions and alluſions, to ſet forth both the conſtancy and extremity of his afflictions. As before he compared himſelf to a mark, againſt which Arrows are ſhot; ſo now to a Stone-wall, or fortified Tower, againſt which, battering Rams of old, and Cannons in latter ages, are uſually planted to make a breach, that the Souldiery may come up to the aſſault.

He breaketh me with breach upon breach.

Some men are like fortified Cities, which cannot be eaſily entred; yet when the Lord of Hoſts draws up his Armies and beſiegeth them, he hath Artillery and Ammunition enough to thunder down their higheſt Towers, and to make breach upon breach in their thickeſt walls. Satan complains (*Chap.*1.) Thou haſt made a hedge about him: Job's hedge was the protection of God; that hedge was ſo ſtrong that Satan could not pull up a ſtake of it, nor make a gap in it, till God gave him leave. But though Job (as this ſimilitude implyes) were like a wall or fortified tower, yet God had made breaches in him: God can ſoon break our eſtates, our ſtrength, our health, our comforts, our peace, our all. And when Job ſaith, he breaks me with breach upon breach; he means a multitude of breaches made together, or continual breaches, made one after another: Jeremy laments (*Chap.*4.16.) My bowels, my bowels, I am pained at the very heart, my heart makes a noiſe in me: Why doth he thus double upon theſe words, My bowels, my bowels, my heart, my heart? The twentieth Verſe gives us an account of that, Deſtruction upon deſtruction is cryed, for the whole Land is ſpoiled: Deſtruction upon deſtruction is total deſtruction. Thus Sampſon repeats his Victory over the Philiſtines (*Judg.*15.16.) With the Jaw-bone of an Aſs heaps upon heaps; or (as the letter of the Hebrew) an heap to heaps; that is, I have made a great ſlaughter; or as himſelf explaines it in the cloſe of the Verſe, I have ſlain a thouſand men. We have the Prophet Ezekiels threat in the ſame language (*Chap.*7.26.) Miſchief ſhall come upon miſchief, and rumour ſhall be upon rumour: When the Prophet Iſaiah would convince the Jews of their unteachableneſs, that whereas (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, *Heb.*5.12.) They ought to be teachers; yet they had need to be taught the firſt principles of the Oracles of God, like little Children, who muſt have the ſame precepts and lines often and often inculcated upon them, he gives it us in the form of this Text (*Iſa.*28.10.) For precept muſt be upon precept, line upon line; that is, they muſt be continually followed with precepts, they muſt have many, and yet they ſcarce learn one; or (as others expound that place) the Prophet deſcribes the ſcornfulneſs of that people who jeered the Meſſengers of God for their frequency in Preaching, with a riming ſcoff, Precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little, and there a little; which ſingle tearms the Prophets had often uſed in their Sermons. Now which way ſoever we take the proper ſenſe of that place, yet the common ſenſe of the words reaches this in in Job: for precept upon precept, ſpeaks there a multitude of precepts, even as here, breach upon breach ſpeaks a multitude of breaches, or breaches all over. And the Apoſtle Paul expreſſeth himſelf in this ſtrain, while he gives the reaſon of the recovery of Epaphroditus from a dangerous ſickneſs (*Phil.*2.27.) He was ſick (ſaith Paul) nigh unto death, but God had mercy on him; and not only on him, but on me alſo, leaſt I ſhould have ſorrow upon ſorrow; that is, many ſorrows heaped up together. So then, when Job complains of his breaking with breach upon breach; the plain meaning is, that he had many, very many breaches: His very wounds were wounded, there was nothing in him, or about him to be ſmitten, but what had been ſmitten already. As if he had ſaid, I am ſo full of breaches and afflictions, that there is no whole ſpace or room left for a new breach, for another affliction: As he that lies upon the ground can fall no lower, ſo he that is all broken cannot be broken any more.

Vulnera ipſa vulnerat. Nō habet in nobis jā nova plaga locū.

Job had breach upon breach in his eſtate, his Cattle, and goods were taken away: Job had breach upon breach in his Family, moſt of his Servants, and all his Children were deſtroyed: Job had breach upon breach in his body, that was ſick and ſoar: Job had breach upon breach in his credit, he was called Hypocrite again and again: Job had breach upon breach in his ſoul, that was filled with fear and terrour from the Lord.

Hence Note, The beſt Saints on earth are ſubject, not only to great, but various troubles, to breach upon breach.

God is pleaſed to ſmite them ſundry times, and he ſmites them ſundry wayes: 'Tis no argument that a man ſhall be no more afflicted, becauſe he is afflicted, or that God will not ſmite again, becauſe he hath ſmitten already. God doth not ſtay his hand by looking upon the number, but upon the effect and fruit of our afflictions: Every Child of his, whom he corrects, muſt look for more corrections, till repentance hath had its perfect work; and every Champion of his whom he tryes, muſt look for more tryals, till faith and patience have had their perfect work. God would not give his Children ſo much as one blow, or one breach, not ſo much as a little finger of theirs ſhould ake, were it not for one of theſe ends; and until theſe ends be attained, they ſhall have many blowes and breaches, even till the whole head be ſick, and the whole heart faint, till from the ſole of the foot, even unto the head, there is no ſoundneſs in them, but wounds and bruiſes and putrifying ſoars. As the Vine-dreſſer cuts, and cuts, prunes, and prunes the Vine, this day and the next day, becauſe once cutting or pruning will not ſerve to make it fruitful: So the Lord prunes, and cuts, and pares, and breaks, and breaks, not to deſtroy his people, but to make them (as pleaſant Vines) bring forth abundantly, either the fruits of godly ſorrow for their ſins committed againſt him, or the proofs and experiments of the graces which they have received from him. This latter was Job's caſe, and the chief cauſe why he was broken with breach upon breach. And no ſooner had the Lord by his roaring Cannon, made breaches in him, fair, and aſſaultable, but he preſently takes his advantage, as Job ſhewes elegantly (purſuing the Allegory) in the laſt clauſe, Ut in vineâ labor labori, cura curæ, ſemper additur, &c. Sanct.

He runs upon me as a Giant.

When a breach is made in the wall, the beſiegers run up to aſſault and ſtorm the place. Job keeps to the Souldiers language, the Lord hath made breach upon breach, and and now He runs upon me as a Giant. There are three things in this expreſſion.

גבור Sicut fortis potens idem valet Gigas & ἰσχυρός.

Firſt, The ſpeed which God made to aſſault him, He runs.

Secondly, The ſtrength that God puts forth in aſſaulting him, he runs, not as a Child, not as a weak man, no nor as the ordinary ſort of ſtrong men; but as a Giant, or mighty man, who exceeds other men, as Goliah did David, both in ſtrength and ſtature.

Thirdly, Running as a Giant, notes courage as well as ſtrength. A Giant runs fiercely and fearleſly.

David compares the Sun at his riſing, to a Bridegroom coming out of his Chamber, and to a Giant, or ſtrong man (it is the word of this Text) who rejoyceth to run a race (Pſal. 19.5.) Giants are ſwift, and Giants are ſtrong. Some men are ſtrong but not ſwift of foot, but no man can be ſwift of foot unleſs he be competently ſtrong: Giants are both in exceſs: And therefore Job puts both together, He runs upon me as a Giant. And yet (I conceive) this running doth rather imply the fierceneſs of the Giant, then his ſwiftneſs. Giants are dreadful and terrible to behold; they are called Nephilim in the Hebrew, of diverſe Texts, which coming from the root, Naphal, to fall, ſignifies fallers, and that in a twofold ſenſe.

Quando aliquis dicitur aut currere, aut aliquid agere, ſicut Gigas, nihil aliud denotat, quam magno animo & ſtrenuè rem aliquam aggredi. Bold.

Firſt, Becauſe they Apoſtatiz'd or fell from God, his truth and worſhip, which Moſes ſeems to intimate while he deſcribes the firſt great perſonal defection of the World (*Gen.*6.4.) There were Giants in the earth in theſe dayes: theſe he oppoſeth to the Sons of God, in the ſame Verſe, who had alſo greatly corrupted themſelves, ſo that (Verſ. 5.) God ſaw the wickedneſs of man was great upon the earth: For the Sons of God, they who owned a profeſſion of Religion (being the Poſterity of Seth, they) mingled themſelves with the wicked of the World. As for the Giants, they diſowned God, and were totally departed, or fallen from from his obedience, and were therefore as some apprehend, called Nephilim, or Fallers.

Secondly, They were so called, because either through the vastness of their strength and stature, or through the fierceness of their mindes and spirits, they were men of violence, great oppressours, causing others to fall before them: In so much that the very name of a Giant was dreadful. And when those unbelieving Searchers of Canaan brought up an evil report of that Land, the worst which they could say of it to the discouragement of their Brethren, was this (Numb. 13. 33.) And there we saw the Giants, the Sons of Anak, which came of the Giants: and we were in our own sight as Grass-hoppers, and so we were in theirs. Men of strength and courage were as much afraid at this story of Giants, as Children are of Bugbears and Fairies.

So then, when Job said, That God did run upon him as a Giant, his intent was only to shew, with how much terrour God was pleased to cloath himself, and how much strength he put forth, while he thus contended with him. The truth is, God needs not lay out his strength to afflict man, he can crush the strongest of men as a moth, with the touch of his finger. The weakness of God is stronger then man; yet God in afflicting his people, will sometimes personate a mighty man, exercising his power to the utmost, and arming himself from head to foot, while he combates with an enemy: which still confirms the general Observation, That God doth not only afflict such as he loves, but he afflicts them sorely. Doth he not so, when he shakes them in pieces? Doth he not so, when he sets them as his mark? When a multitude of skilful Archers compass them about; when he cleaves their reins asunder; when he pours out their Gall upon the ground? Doth he not so, when he sets Engines of battery to make breach upon breach, and then runs up as a Giant to the assault? Thus God hath dealt with many precious souls, and thus he dealt (beyond his dealings with many) with his precious Servant Job.

And as no man, either in his estate or health, either in his credit or comforts, is so strong a wall, but God by his Artillery can quickly make a breach upon him; so who is able to stand in the breach, or make it good, when God comes up to the assault? Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong in the dayes that I shall deal with thee? saith the Lord (Ezek. 22. 14.) When the Lord as a Giant runs upon man, the strongest Giant among the sons of men, is but as a Pigmie, yea but as a Pismire, he is but as the Chaff before the wind, or as the potters Vessel before the Iron-Rod. But though flesh and blood cannot stand in the breach when God assaults; yet Faith and patience can. Moses by Faith stood in the breach, and turned away the wrath of God, when he came to destroy Israel (Psal. 106. 23.) Job by patience stood in the breaches which God made upon him, when he seemed utterly to destroy him.

For what did Job to God, when God did all this to him? Did he oppose? Did he strive with his Maker? The two next Verses shew, that prayers and tears were all the Weapons he used in this holy War with God.

VERS. 15, 16, 17.

I have sowed sack-cloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the dust.
My face is foul with weeping, and on my eye-lids is the shadow of death.
Not for any injustice in my hands: also my prayer is pure.

THE former words shewed in what manner Job was afflicted; and because the manner of his afflictions did almost exceed words, therefore he strained himself to the highest pitch of holy rhetorick, to make his unkind Friends sensible of it. And as there he told us what God had done to him, so here he tells what he did, or how he behaved himself under the hand of God; he tells us how he took those tearings, and those wounds; how he received those showrs of Arrows from the Almighties Bow. Eliphaz taxed Job in the fifteenth Chapter, with height and haughtiness of spirit in his low estate (Vers. 12, 13.) Why doth thine heart carry thee away? And what doth thine eyes wink at, that thou turnest thy spirit against God, and lettest such words go out of thy mouth? And (Vers. 25.) he more then intimates that Job stretched out his hand against God, and strengthened himself against the Almighty. In both passages he is severely charged, not only with impatience under the hand of God (which is bad enough) but with opposition against the hand of God, which is far worse.

Job refutes these unfriendly censures, and professeth another kind both of spirit and practice in this Text. As if he had said, I am not so mad as thou takest me to be, to run upon God, or to stretch out my hand against him while he smiteth me; I have learned better, then to shoot the arrows of blasphemy against God, whilst he shoots the arrows of calamity against me; and if you desire to know what I have been doing, seeing I deny that I have been doing what you suggest; This is the account which I give of my self, and of my behaviour.

Vers. 15. I have sowed sack-cloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the dust.

That is, I have humbly submitted my self to receive, and entertain those saddest dispensations.

Hence Observe, That the surest way to confute the censures, and wipe off the aspersions which are cast upon us, is to shew our selves doing contrary to what others are speaking of us.

A practical answer is the strongest answer; we may speak more for our selves by our hands, then we can do by our tongues in many cases. The Papists mouths are stopt (who call us Solifidians) when they see Protestants forward in and zealous for good works: He that is accused of uncharitableness, may best free himself from that charge, by giving freely to the poor; and he that is accused of injustice, may soonest do himself right, by shewing that he hath done right to every man. Bare denials that we have done evil, are nothing; but when our doing of good appears, who can deny it? The old Philosopher answered him that denied motion, by rising up and walking, not by arguing: Job answered Eliphaz, who affirmed that he turned his spirit, and stretched out his hand against God, by falling down and submitting to it. I have sowed sack-cloth upon my skin, &c.

And this Job offers, as to remove, and take away that objection of mis-behaviour towards God; so to move his Friends to better behaviour, even to compassion and pity towards him. He was in a sorrowful case, and he had acted the part of a sorrowful man; God had laid him low, and he laid himself low; this might have taught them moderation; why should they speak so harshly against him, who had dealt but coursely with himself? Sowing sack-cloth upon his skin; and seeing he abased himself, even to the defiling of his horn in the dust, why should they abase him too? It stirs up pity towards a professed adversary to see him in misery, especially, when he submits unto it, and suffers with patience: Much more should the misery of a professed Friend, he also quietly submitting to it, stir up the bowels of pity. So then, the scope of this report which Job makes of himself, was not only to answer what Eliphaz had charged him with, but also that he might obtain from his Friends, a milder answer.

Hoc affert ut ad misericordiam socios moveat, pœnitentiam, &c. suam & humilitatem, quod sese in his afflictionibus non extulerit. Merc.

I have sowed sack-cloth upon my skin.] The word which we render Sack-cloth, is of the same sound in the Hebrew, and almost in all other languages; which is observed as an argument of its antiquity, and that it is the mother of all languages. But how did Job sow sack-cloth upon his Skin? This is a hard piece of Sempstery.

שׂק Saccus, vox quæ hic habetur Sak habet eundem sonum in omni fere lingua, quod unum arguit linguam Hebræam omnium esse matrem.

The Roman Historian reports of cruel Nero, that when he fled out of the City (fearing the sentence of the displeased Senate which quickly pursued him) and had got into a grove or thicket like a wild Beast, he commanded those about him to make a trench in the earth, fitted to the dimensions of his body, which he ordered them to line with such pieces of Marble, as were to be had upon the place; thus as it were, preparing his own Tomb, he wept and often cryed out, See what a workman is here now ready to perish. What that wretch said of himself, I may say of this holy man in the Text, whom I find thus busied at his Needle, as if he were preparing his own grave-clothes, or winding sheet, What a workman have we here ready to perish? Job looked upon himself as a dying man, and behold he is sowing sack-cloth upon his skin. When men of worth die, they are wrapt in fine linnen; so Joseph of Arimathea wrapt the body of Jesus (Mar. 15. 46.)

Qualis artifex pereo.

And

And a living man full of sores needs the finest and softest linnen to wrap him in: Sack-cloth is a course stubborn cloth, grievous to a sound body, painful to those who have never a breach upon their flesh; but for a man (as Job describes himself) full of breaches, having breach upon breach; his body being broken all over, as if it were but one continued breach, to lap up such a one in sack-cloth, is an extream addition to his pains and sorrows. How is it then, that Job was thus severe to his own sores? To clear this, Sack-cloath may be taken two wayes.

First, Properly. Secondly, Improperly.

Properly, so, sack-cloth is that hairy, rough Garment which was very usual among mourners, whether in times of sorrow for sin or judgement. Sack-cloth was the Livery of both these sorrows. The King of Israel was a close-mourner in sack-cloth (2 *King.*6. 30.) The King rent his clothes as he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and behold he had sack-cloth within upon his flesh. There being a terrible Famine in Samaria, that King wore Sack-cloth as an emblem of his sorrow, yet he wore it somewhat concealedly; it was within upon his flesh. And so (2 Kings 20.31.) when the Servants of Benhadad came to Achab, they put Sack-cloth upon them. And (2 *Kin.*21.27.) Achab himself when he heard that sore judgement denounced against him, humbled himself, and put on Sack-cloth, and went softly. In a time of common calamity, the Prophet tells us, Every head shall be bald, and every beard clipt: upon all the hands shall be cuttings, and upon the loyns Sack-cloth (*Jer.*48. 37.) And that it was the usual wear in time of repentance, is taught us in the Prophesie of Jonah(*C.*3.8.)Where Proclamation was made, by the King of Niniveh, That all should fast and put on Sack-cloth. Christ himself describing what Sodom and Gomorrah would have done if the Gospel had been Preached, or the mighty works done in them which were done in Bethsaida and Corazin, saith, They would have repented long ago in sack-cloth and ashes: that is, they would have put on sack cloth, and sate in ashes, in token of deepest humiliation for sin. Thus sack-cloth properly taken was often used in times of great affliction, whether personal, or publick; as also in times of deepest and most professed repentance.

Secondly, We may take Sack-cloth improperly, and so two wayes.

First, As to Job's then present condition, he was full of sores, and those sores were to him as a course covering of sack-cloth; for he was sore all over: In some extraordinary diseases, a scab puts forth all over the body, like the bark of a tree. Job's scabs and sores were like the bark of a tree, or a garment of sack-cloth; he speaks near this language (Chap. 30.18.) By the great force of my disease is my Garment changed: As if he had said, I have another kind of Garment then I was wont to wear; I was wont to wear the best, and the costliest Garments; but now, By the force of my disease is my Garment changed, it bindeth me about as the colour of my coat, that is, My sores bind me about as the colour of my Coat. Thus the Greek Expositors render this Text, affirming, that his Skin was discoloured and black, and began to look like sack-cloth, through the heat and distemper of his inward parts: As health and soundness of constitution put out a fresh and lively tincture, so sickness and diseases deface and darken the beauty of the body.

Secondly, Take it again improperly, as to Job's then present action; and then, I sowed sack-cloth upon my skin, is, as if he had spoken plainly, I have greatly abased, or humbled my self, I have been as one who putteth on sack-cloth. Such was his posture (*Chap.*2.8.) He took a pot-sherd, and scraped his sores, and sate down among the ashes. As he who wore sack cloth did humble himself greatly, or at least would be accounted to have done so; so he that is really humbled, and that greatly, may be said to have put on sack cloth. The sign is often put for the thing signified, in reference both to joy and sorrow. White garments and unctions were signs of joy; and therefore when Solomon exhorts to joyfulness, he saith, Let thy garments be alwayes white, and let thine head lack no oyntment (*Eccles.*9.8.) which we may expound either by that which goes before, Eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy Wine with a merry heart (*Vers.*7.) or by that which follows (*Vers.*9.) Live joyfully with the wife of thy youth: As to bid a man put on white garments, is to bid him rejoyce, so to bid a man put on blacks, or sack-cloth, is to bid him mourn; and he who saith as Job here, that he hath done it, saith, That he hath mourned, though he hath not done it. Job did not sow sack-cloth upon his skin when he spake thus, but his sorrows did truly speak sack-cloth: Such also is his sense of the next clause; where he professeth,

And I defiled my horn in the dust.] Horns are proper to a beast, but they are often by a figure or improperly ascribed to man. The horn imports two things in figure.

First, Strength, and Power.

Secondly, Dignity, and Ornament.

It is often put for strength and power; for the strength and power of good men (1 *Sam.*2.10.) Hannah sings, Thou shalt exalt the horn (that is, the strength and power) of thine annointed.(*Psal.*132.17.) There shall he make the horn of David to flourish. David was a type of Christ, and of him this Psalm is expounded. (*Luk.*1.69.) God hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David: A horn of salvation, is, strong salvation, or strength of salvation: God laid help for us upon one that is mighty, when he laid help for us upon his Son.

The horn, notes also the strength and power of wicked men (*Psal.*75.5.) Lift not your horns on high, speak not with a stiff neck: At the tenth Verse of that Psalm, we have both; All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off, but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted. Those ten Kings, who gave their power and strength to the Antichristian Beast, are shadowed under the title of Ten horns (*Revel.*17.12.) Strength and power are expressed by a horn, in allusion to Beasts, whose strength to defend themselves, and to hurt others, is in their horns; and hence it is that the word by which the Greeks express harmless, signifies properly hornless (Phil. 2.15) That ye may be blameless and harmless, the Sons of God without rebuke, &c.

Metaphoræ ab animalibus ductæ, quorũ vires fere in cornubus existunt. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἔχειν κέρας, Est carens cornu.

Secondly, As the horn is put for strength, so for splendour, and dignity: The Texts before alleadged may be so expounded. And again (*Hab.*3.4.) His brightness was as the light, and he had horns coming out of his hand, and there was the hiding of his power: We in the Margin put, Bright beams out of his side: For the Hebrew word which signifies a horn, signifies to radiate, and shine forth (*Exod.*34.29,30.) When Moses came down from the Mount, the Text saith, He wist not that his face did shine. And when Aaron, and all the people of Israel saw Moses, behold his face shone: The Vulgar translates, The face of Moses was horned, or had horns upon it: that is, beams and rayes of light like horns appeared, or darted from his countenance, so that the eyes of the beholders were dazled: And the reason why Moses is commonly pictured with horns, is, because this word signifies, both beams, and horns. So here, I have defiled my horn in the dust: that is, My dignity, and excellency; thus the Chaldee expresseth it: as if he had said, I have taken off, or laid by all ornaments to put my self into the posture of an humble supplicant; I have defiled my horn in the dust.

Splendorem meum. Chald.

[Dust] also is taken properly, or improperly; properly, dust is light, small, crumbled earth. Christ chargeth his Disciples (*Mat.*10.14.) Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your word, when ye depart out of that City, shake off the dust of your feet: That action was emblematical, and noted one of, or all these three things.

First, That the earth was polluted, where such refusers of the precious Gospel did inhabit, and was therefore to be shaken off as a filthy thing.

Secondly, That they were base and vile as dust, such as God would shake off.

Thirdly, That the dust of the Apostles feet there left, might be as a witness (so the other Gospels express it) against them, that the Gospel had been Preached there.

Dust also in a proper sense, was used in times of humiliation and sorrow among the Jewes; for then, they either sprinkled dust on their heads, or lay down in the dust: Joshua and the Elders of Israel put dust on their heads (*Josh.*7. 6.) and Job professeth (*Chap.*42.6.) Therefore I abhor my self, and repent in dust and ashes: Which we may understand either strictly, that he sate down in the dust, testifying his repentance; or largely, that his was a great and a deep repentance, even like theirs, who are humbled in dust and ashes. That carnal worldly sorrow of the Merchants and Friends of Babylon is thus expressed (*Revel.*18.18,19.) And they cast dust on their heads, and cryed, weeping and wayling, saying, Alas, alas, that great City.

Improperly,

גלד Cutis vox Arabica nõ alibi in Scriptura reperitur. Et Gelad propriè significare cutim & crustã quæ plagæ siccæ superinducitur Rab. Levi. Nigrorẽ nacta est cutis mea propter cruciatum, acerbitatem quasi saccus quidam ex vellis contextis effictus. Sanct.

Improperly, dust signifies any very low condition (Psal. 113. 7. 1 Sam. 2. 8.) He raiseth the poor out of the dust. And again (1 Kings 16. 2.) For as much as I exalted thee out of the dust, and made thee a Prince over my people Israel, &c. To be exalted from the dust, is to be exalted from among the common people to a Princely state, as that parallel place tells us (1 Kings 14. 7.) All men are but level with the dust in their natural constitution; but all Magistrates are above the dust (that is, the common people) by their civil constitution. When Job saith, I have defiled my horn in the dust; it may be understood either properly, that he did sit down in dust and ashes as he speaks (Chap. 10.) or improperly, that as God had brought him into a low condition, so he was willing to submit himself to a low condition, and to be, not only as man, who is dust in his nature, and must return to dust, but as becomes that man, whose power and honour, whose excellency and greatness is laid in the dust: David imprecates (Psal. 7. 5.) If I have done this, if (as some charge and suspect me) there be iniquity in my hands, &c. Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it; yea, let him tread my life down to the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust: That is, Let him totally ruine me, or lay me as low as low can be. The Church is thus excited to rise from her captivity (Isa. 52. 1, 3.) Awake, and shake thy self from the dust, arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem; loose thy self from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion. To lye in captivity, is to lye in the dust; and as to shake off the dust, is to return from captivity; so to defile the horn in the dust, is to lay aside our dignity.

Job gives yet a further description of his self-humiliation.

Verse 16. My face is foul with weeping, and on my eye-lids is the shadow of death.

As Job put on his mourning garments, so he was indeed a mourner; he wept, and he wept plentifully: much eye-water doth not cleanse, but foul the face, My face is foul with weeping; or my face is swoln, and my cheeks blubbered with weeping, saith the Latine Translator.

Facies mea intumuit à fletu. Vulg.

Note here three sorts of tears spoken of in Scripture.

First, There are tears of worldly sorrow.

Secondly, Tears of godly sorrow.

Thirdly, Tears of Hypocrisie.

The last sort is applyable to both the former; it respects sometimes worldly sorrow, and sometimes godly sorrow; for both may be feigned: Such were those tears (Jer. 41.) When Ishmael had killed Gedaliah, the Text saith, Ishmael went to Mizpeh, and met the men, weeping all along as he went; as if he had been greatly troubled for the afflictions of the Land; but they were Crocodiles tears. Ishmael wept only till he had gotten those men (as a prey) in his power, and then he destroyed them. Ishmael was a State-hypocrite, and seemed full of compassion, that he might get an opportunity to vent his malice.

There are many Church-hypocrites, who can foul and disfigure their faces with weeping, as Christ reproves the Pharisees (Matth. 6. 16.) while they have no thought of washing or reforming either their hearts or lives. Job's face was foul with weeping, but his heart and life were clean; he needed not strain for tears, or weep by art; how could he restrain tears, whose troubles were inlarged? The word which we render foul, is doubled in the Original, which speaks thus much, that his face was double-dirtied, or double-dyed in his own tears: Neither yet was this all the argument of his real sorrows; for he had not only quite wept away his beauty, but he had almost wept away his life too, and was even dead with grief, as it follows in the next words.

And on my eye-lids is the shadow of death.

That is, Mine eyes are darkened, and I look like one that's ready to give up the ghost: As if he had said, My sorrow may be seen upon my eyes and eye-lids, which with extremity of grief, and multitudes of tears are even wasted away, and sunk in my head, as when a man is dead, or dying: Much weeping weakens the eye-sight; yea, some are said to weep out their eyes. David gives us that effect of weeping (Psal. 6. 7.) I water my couch with tears: That is, I weep abundantly: Then it follows, Mine eyes are consumed because of my grief: And (Psal. 38. 10.) My heart panteth, my strength faileth, as for the light of mine eyes, it is also gone from me: I am even grown blind with sorrow, or (as the Church bemoans her sad estate, (Lam. 2. 11.) Mine eyes do fail with tears. Abundance of tears bring failing of eyes; and he that useth his eyes to much weeping, shall have little use of them for seeing: we may assign the reason of it from Nature, because continual pouring forth of tears spends the spirits, and so weakeneth the visive power. Now as death is a total privation of sight; so they whose sight is much impaired, look somewhat like the dead: Hence Job's complaint, On my eye-lids is the shadow of death.

Shadow of death.] Notes the clearest appearance, the strongest signs of death: Or this shadow of death upon his eye-lids, together with the fouling of his face, in the former clause, may be an allusion to some fashions or customs of mourners in those times or places. This phrase (which also often occurs in other Scriptures) was opened (Chap. 3. 5.) thither I refer the Reader.

Hos gestus in humiliationibus Orientalis etiam Græcos usurpasse testatur & videt Plutarchus in libello de superstitione. Densissima caligo est oculis meis offusa. Mer.

Thus we have Job's behaviour in his affliction by a twofold act, and a twofold effect of it.

The first act was, Sowing sackcloth on his flesh.
The second was, Defiling his horn in the dust.
The first effect was, Foulness upon his face.
The second was, Death upon his eyes.

Hence Observe, First, They are most sensible of the hand of God, who are most submissive to it.

As Job's afflictions were great, so was his sorrow, and so was his submission: Sorrow is not contrary to patience; Job was the most patient, and the most sorrowful man in the World. There is an immoderate sorrow inconsistent with patience; but great sorrow is not only consistent with patience, but an argument of it; and unless we have some sorrow, we are not patient at all: How can he be called patient, who either feels not, or slights his affliction. It is as ill a symptome of a diseased soul to be unsensible of judgments, as to be unsensible of mercies. Unless we feel the rod, we cannot hear the voice of the rod, nor receive instruction by it. To be as a Trunk, or a Stone, under correction, is not to be patient under it, but to despise it: Humble your selves under the mighty hand of God, is the advice of the Spirit, by the Apostle (1 Pet. 5. 6.) As God humbles us for sin, or for the tryal of grace, so they who have grace receive power to humble themselves; and to humble our selves, is not only an act, but an high act of grace; both the grace of God toward us, and the graces of God in us, are exalted when we are low in our own eyes.

Secondly, From the manner of this sorrowful humiliation, He sowed sackcloth upon his skin, and defiled his horn in the dust.

Observe, That as God letteth out visible tokens of his afflicting hand upon us, so we should let out visible tokens of our humiliation under his hand.

As we are visibly afflicted, so we should be visibly affected. We may make our humblings seen, though we must not do it to be seen. As the light of our active obedience, should so shine before men, that they may see our good works, and glorifie our Father which is in Heaven (Matth. 5. 16.) So also should the light of our passive obedience shine before men, that they may see our holy sufferings, and glorifie our Father which is in Heaven. It is as great a sin to to boast of our poverty, as it is to boast of our riches, and as great a vanity to be proud of a cross, as to be proud of a Crown; yet it is an honour to God, when men see that we are not ashamed either of poverty, or of a cross. The cross should be carried upon our shoulders, not put up in our pockets: God loves to see us own our troubles as well as our comforts; and as he will condemn those who wrap the Talent of their gifts and abilities in a Napkin, and hide it from the use of others; so he doth not approve those who wrap up their crosses and afflictions in a Napkin, and hide them from the sight of others; especially considering, that even these also are Talents for which we stand accountable, how we have used them, both for our own good, and the good of others. I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus (saith the Lord) Thou hast chastised me, and

I was chastised (Jer. 31. 18.) Ephraim's outward moans were as musick in the ears of God; Ephraim did not murmure against God, but he bemoaned himself; Ephraim was not angry at his chastisement, but Ephraim mourned being chastised; God heard this fully; in hearing he heard it, or, it pleased him to hear it. It is our duty to testifie our sorrow by the saddest notes of a troubled spirit, and it is a delight to God when we do so; not that he delights in our sorrows; but he delights in the witness which we bear to his Wisdom, Righteousness, and Faithfulness, in sending those sorrows. I heard Ephraim bemoan himself. Will an Offender that looks for mercy come before the Judge in rich apparel, or in some affected dress? Comes he not rather in his prison clothes? Puts he not on the garments of heaviness? The Messengers of Benhadad, put dust on their heads, and ropes about their necks, and sack-cloath on their loins, when they came to mediate for the life of their Master. And thus the Lord speaks to the Israelites (Exod. 33. 5.) when they had sinned, and he was wrath, Put off your Ornaments that I may know what to do with you: Ornaments are uncomely when God is threatening judgments: It is time for us to lay by our bravery, when God is about to make us naked. Sack-cloath sowed upon the skin, and our horn in the dust, are the best ensigns of an afflicted state. The Prophets counsel indeed is (Joel 2.13.) Rent your hearts, and not your garments. (Rending the garments may be taken, not only strictly for that act, but largely for all outward actings of sorrow.) Yet when he saith, Rent not, this is not a prohibition of, but a caution about the outward acting of their sorrow. Not, in Scripture, is not alwayes totally negative, it is often directive and comparative: So in this place, Rent your hearts, and not your garments; is, your hearts, rather then your garments; or be sure to rend your hearts, as well as your garments: The one must be done, the other ought not to be left undone. See more of this (Chap. 1. Ver. 20.) upon those words, Then Job rent his Mantle.

Thirdly, Observe, Great sorrow produceth great effects, and leaveth such impressions as testifie where it is.

The Apostle saith of the sorrow of the World, That it worketh death (2 Cor. 7. 10.) The sorrow of the World may be taken two wayes.

First, For the sorrow of carnal worldly men, whose sorrow for sin is only a vexing of their hearts, not a breaking or humbling of their hearts; which being separate both from true faith for the pardon of sin, and from any real purpose of leaving their sin, worketh death, both temporal death, often wearing out their natural life lingringly, and sometime destroying their natural life violently, as in Judas, as also hastning them on to eternal death, of which it self is a foretast, or beginning.

Secondly, This sorrow of the World, is a sorrow for the loss of, or disappointments about worldly things. This also worketh both of those deaths in meer worldly men; and when it is excessive (as under a temptation it may be) in a godly man, it may be said to work the death of the body in him; yea, great and continued sorrow, though it be not excessive, worketh towards this death in a godly man, drying his bones, and drawing out his spirits, as is clear in Job, on whose eye-lids the very shadow of death sate, while he wept and sorrowed. 'Tis hard to dissemble a little grief; but a great deal cannot be hid: As godly sorrow manifests it self in excellent effects upon the soul, of which the Apostle numbers up seven at the eleventh Verse of that Chapter, For this self same thing that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you; yea, what clearing of your selves, &c. Now I say, as godly sorrow manifests it self in manifold effects upon the soul, so doth the sorrow of the World set its marks upon the body: As a good mans heart is made clean by weeping the tears of godly sorrow; so every mans face is made foul by weeping the tears of worldly sorrow: and as godly sorrow worketh repentance unto salvation and life eternal; so the sorrow of the World worketh an entrance to temporal death; yea, we may say that godly sorrow doth sometimes work temporal death; Paul was afraid lest the incestuous person, while he was repenting, might be Swallowed up with over much sorrow (2 Cor. 2.7.) which as we are to understand chiefly of a swallowing up in the gulf of despair, so we may take in that also as a consequent of the other, a swallowing of him up in the grave of death: As if he had said, The poor man may both despair and dye under this burden, if you let it lye too long upon him. As soon as Heman had said (in his desertion) My soul is full of troubles; he presently adds, And my life draweth nigh unto the grave; I am counted with them that go down to the pit, free among the dead (Psal. 88. 3, 4, 5.) To which he subjoyns (Ver. 9.) Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction; and then expostulates (Ver. 10.) Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead? Shall the dead arise and praise thee? As if he had said, These sorrows will bring me to my grave; or in the language of Job, On my eye-lids is the shadow of death.

Till we enjoy a life beyond the reach of all sorrows, we shall not be beyond the reach of death. Hence that promise (Revel. 21. 4.) God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain: And as that life which hath no death in it, shall have no sorrow in it; so that life which is a continual death (the life of the damned) is nothing else but sorrow, There shall be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth, for evermore (Mat. 13. 42.) Their eyes shall ever weep, their faces shall ever be foul with weeping, and on their eye-lids the shadow of death shall dwell for ever.

Fourthly, The hand of God being heavy upon Job, He defiled his horn in the dust, and fouled his face with weeping; he regarded neither the beauty of his face, nor the dignity of his condition, all was nothing to him.

Learn from it,

Great afflictions take off our respect to the World, and all worldly things.

What is Honour? What is Gold or Silver? What is a goodly House? What is a beautiful Wife, and pleasant Children? What are fine Clothes, or a fair Face in a day of sorrow, or in the approaches of death? Spirituals are highest prized when we are lowest: Grace shines clearest in worldly darkness; but the light of worldly enjoyments is darkness to us; and that which some esteem as a Sun, is but a Cloud to us in the day of distress: That is best which is good to us in our worst estate. The favour of God, the pardon of sin, the fruits of the Spirit, are alwayes pleasant to the Saints; but then most, when the years or times are upon them, of which they not only say with the Preacher (Eccles. 12. 1.) We have no pleasure in them, but, we have much pain and trouble in them. The face of the new creature is never foul with weeping, nor is the horn of our salvation defiled when we lye in the dust, or on the dunghil.

Job having (according to his manner) accurately described his calamities, and shewed with what deep sense, and self-abasement he had entertained them; he passeth to a refutation of that inference which his Friends drew, and had often pressed upon him from those premises of his affliction. Eliphaz suggested him impious and unjust, because he was thus smitten. Job plainly denyes it (Verse 17.) I have not received these wounds in my body and estate, for any injustice in my hands, no, nor for any impiety in my heart, also my prayer is pure. This Verse takes off both parts of that general assertion, as to Job's personal condition (Chap. 15. Vers. 34.) The Congregation of Hypocrites shall be desolate; fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery. There Eliphaz closely hinted that Job was an unjust man, and an Hypocrite: Job answers, No, my Tabernacle is not the Tabernacle of bribery, there is no injustice in my hands; my Congregation, or those with whom I joyned in worship, were not a Congregation of Hypocrites, My prayer is pure: As if he had said, Though it be a truth, that the Congregation of Hypocrites shall be desolate, yet it doth not follow, that every man is an Hypocrite, whose Congregation is made desolate, for mine is desolate, and yet I know my prayer is pure: And though fire shall consume the Tabernacles of bribery, yet every man is not guilty of bribery, whose Tabernacle is consumed with fire, for so is mine; and yet I avouch it, there is no injustice in my hands.

Verſe 17. Not for any [injuſtice] in my hands.

חָמָס Propriè rapina violentia injuria.

The word that we tranſlate injuſtice, ſignifies rapine, violence, or wrong done by violence, any open tyrannical oppreſſion. The Harpy being a ravenous Fowl, hath his name from this root in Hebrew (as alſo in the Greek from one of the ſame importance) becauſe he doth not ſubtily ſurprize his prey, but openly aſſault it. It ſignifies alſo violence mingled with ſcorn and contempt; as is obſerved upon that of the Prophet (Ezek. 22. 26.) Her Prieſts have violated my Laws: The Prieſts did not go behind the door, they made an open breach upon the Law of God; they did not ſin ſecretly, as if they had been afraid to be ſeen, but avowedly and before the Sun. Hence ſome have rendred that Text, Her Prieſts have contemned my Laws; noting either that it was a violation with contempt; or that Laws which are once contemned cannot be long unviolated. Thus Job profeſſeth, there is no ſuch injuſtice in my hand; Job did not diſclaim all failings in doing juſtice, but all intendments of doing injuſtice; he did not peremptorily deny that there was no injuſtice in his hand ariſing from miſtakes of the Law, but none from the contempt of the Law, Not for any injuſtice.

In my [hand.] Injuſtice is aſcribed to the hand, not becauſe injuſtice is alwayes, though uſually it be done with the hand; with the hand men take away, and with that men detain the right of others. David ſpeaks thus (2 Chron. 12. 17.) Seeing there is no wrong in mine hand; that is, I have done no wrong. The hand is the great inſtrument of action, moſt injuſtice is done by the hand, though much be done by the tongue; and a Judge who gives an unjuſt ſentence with his tongue, may be ſaid to have injuſtice in his hands. Beſides, he may be ſaid to have injuſtice in his hands, who keeps any thing in his hands which was gotten by injuſtice; he alſo may be ſaid to eat injuſtice, who feeds upon what he got unjuſtly (Prov. 4. 17.) They eat the bread of wickedneſs, and drink the wine of violence: That is, They eat bread, and drink wine, gotten by wickedneſs and violence. Job diſclaims injuſtice in all theſe notions, There is no injuſtice in my hands: As if he had ſaid, I have not gotten wealth by injuſtice, nor inricht my ſelf by making others poor; I have not been as an Harpy, to ſcratch and tear from others to feed my ſelf: He gives a full account of this (Chap. 29. and Chap. 30.) wiping off thoſe aſperſions of injuſtice, by a large narrative of his proceedings in that publick capacity, as a Magiſtrate; the breviate of which is ſummed up in this negative, There is no injuſtice in my hand.

Further, Injuſtice may be taken two wayes.

Either ſtrictly, for the act of a Magiſtrate perverting the Law, and going beſides the rules of righteouſneſs.

Or largely, for any wrong that one neighbour in a private capacity, doth another.

To do juſtice is every ones duty as well as the Magiſtrates: We uſe to ſay, Every man is either a Fool, or a Phyſician; we may ſay, Every one is either a doer of juſtice, or a diſhoneſt man: For though to do juſtice is chiefly the Magiſtrates work, yet no man (who hath any thing to do in the World) can live as he ought, without doing juſtice: In this large ſence alſo we may expound Job's diſclaimer of injuſtice: As if he had ſaid, I have not willingly failed in any of thoſe duties which the Law of love towards my neighbour calls for, and obliges me unto: There is no injuſtice in my hands.

Alſo my prayer is pure.

Prayer is taken two wayes, as injuſtice is.

Either largely, for the whole worſhip of God, My houſe ſhall be called the houſe of prayer (Matth. 21. 13.) That is, All kind of publick worſhip ſhall be performed, and tendred to me there: Prayer being ſo principal a part of worſhip, may well comprehend all the parts of worſhip; that which is chief in any kind, often denominates all the reſt. So Love is put for all the duties of the Law, and Faith for all the duties, yea, and for all the Doctrines of the Goſpel; though in both, many other duties and doctrines are contained.

Strictly, Prayer is that part of worſhip which conſiſts in calling upon God: Prayer is the making known of our deſires, or the opening of our hearts to God. It is the aſcent of our ſouls to God. David being about to pray, ſaith, Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my ſoul. In this place we may take prayer in both the notions of it, My prayer

Is pure.] The word ſignifies ſhining, bright, glorious; a gracious prayer ſhines ſo bright that there is a glory in it; My prayer is pure. Zophar charged Job for ſaying, My doctrine is pure (Chap. 12. 4.) Now Job himſelf ſaith, My prayer is pure. The truth of Doctrine is the purity of it; and the ſincerity of prayer is the purity of it: Job did not boaſt his prayer pure without infirmity, but he did profeſs it pure without hypocriſie. Yet beſides this caſting out of hypocriſie, there are divers ingredients to be taken in towards the compoſition of a pure prayer, of which I ſhall touch more diſtinctly by and by. We read in the Inſtitutes of the Ceremonial Law of pure Myrrh, of pure Frankincenſe, of pure Oyl, of pure Incenſe, all which concurred to pure worſhip among the Jews, and typed out all pure worſhip, both among Jews and Gentiles; of the latter the Lord ſaith (Mal. 1. 11.) From the riſing of the Sun unto the going down of the ſame, my Name ſhall be called upon among the Gentiles, and in every place Incenſe ſhall be offered unto my Name, and a pure offering. This pure offering Job intends when he ſaith, My prayer is pure.

Under theſe two, There is no injuſtice in my hand, and my prayer is pure: Job contains the whole duty of man, both to God and to man: Here is Juſtice comprehending the duties of the ſecond Table; and Prayer comprehending the duties of the firſt Table: Thus Job was compleat in all the will of God, and had reſpect to all his Commandments. And thus he verified Gods teſtimony of him (Chap. 1. 1.) and approved himſelf to be A man perfect and upright, fearing God, and eſchewing evil, which is the whole duty of man.

His duobus membris utramque tabulam complexus Iitur. Mere.

From the words in general,

Obſerve, Firſt, Man hath great ſupport in bearing afflictions, from the witneſs which his heart gives of his own integrity.

'Tis matter of wonder that ever Job ſhould bear ſo many burdens, and endure breach upon breach, till we remember, that though he had many breaches upon his body and eſtate, yet he had none upon his conſcience: Indeed his ſpirit had breaches by way of tryal and temptation from God; but it had none by way of diſobedience againſt God. The ſpirit of a man, ſaith Solomon, will ſuſtain his infirmities (Prov. 18. 14.) There are two ſorts of infirmities.

Firſt, ſinful infirmities, ſuch are impatience, doubtings, deadneſs of heart, and vanity of thoughts.

Secondly, Penal, or painful infirmities, ſuch as are poverty, ſickneſs, diſeaſes, or any outward croſs whatſoever.

Theſe latter are the infirmities which Solomon means; and theſe the ſpirit of a man will ſuſtain, even while his fleſh or body ſinks under them: Yet here ſpirit is not taken meerly in oppoſition to bodily, or material fleſh (though the ſpirit under that phyſical notion is able to bear much more then the body can) but as ſpirit is oppoſed to ſpiritual and ſinful fleſh; that is, to a carnal corrupt mind: The ſpirit of a man furniſhed with grace, ſupported with the favour of God, and the teſtimony of a good conſcience, will ſuſtain all his infirmities; that is, cauſe him to bear with much, not only patience, but courage and chearfulneſs, the heavieſt burdens of affliction, which either the wiſdom of God doth, or the malice of man can lay upon him. Holineſs makes the weak ſtrong, and the ſtrong like Giants, to endure all ſhocks of trouble and hardſhip. A whole skin feels no ſmart, though you bath it with brine; and if a man have a ſound conſcience, if his ſpirit be not galled and raw, he is able to ſtand at any time, and ſometimes to rejoyce in the ſalteſt waters of worldly ſorrow. For though he be not (as was ſhewed before) ſenſleſs of, or without outward ſmart; yet having no inward ſmart (which is the worſt ſmart) he is above it: The pains and wants of the body are almoſt loſt and ſwallowed up in the comforts and enjoyments of the mind. A wounded ſpirit who can bear? A ſpirit unwounded what can it not bear? He that hath no injuſtice in his hands, hath much peace in his heart; and while our prayer is pure, our ſpirits will not be much troubled in any of our troubles.

Secondly, Observe, It is possible to live without any known sin.

Job knew of no injustice in his hand, nor was he conscious of any impurity in his prayer. The Apostle John writes to all Saints of all Ages and Statures, under the title of His little Children, not to sin (1 John 2. 1.) And in that he doth not only admonish them of what they ought not to do, but of what they might attain not to do: For though, He that saith he hath no sin, deceives himself, and sins in saying so (1 John 1. 9.) yet it may be said of some without sin, and they (in Job's case) may say it of themselves without sin, that they sin not. The best Saints have, and know they have sin in their natures, and sin in their lives; yea, and sometimes they fall into great sins; yet such a degree of holiness is attainable in this life, that a man may be said, not to sin: For then (in a Gospel-sence) we are said not to sin, when we cast off and are free from all gross and scandalous sins, and do both carefully avoid and make conscience of the least and the most secret sin. Zachary and Elizabeth (Luke 1. 16.) were both righteous before God, walking in all the Commandments and Ordinances of the Lord blameless: That is, They did not live in any open or known sin; they lived so, that no man could blame them, or bring any just complaint against them, either in matters of morality, which seem to be meant in the word Commandment; or in matters of worship, which seem to be meant by the word Ordinance. And when I speak of not living in any known sin, I mean not only, that Saints may rise so high as not to live in any sin which the World takes notice of; but they may, yea, and often do arrive at that height of holiness, not to live in any sin known to themselves; if once a true Believer discovers sin, he cannot own it, much less live in it; be it injustice or wrong towards men; be it any failing in the worship and service of God he will not suffer it to lodge with him. He that hath grace in his heart, cannot live with injustice in his hand; there is an inconsistence between these two, a life of grace, and to live in sin. Sin may be much alive in him that hath grace; but he cannot live in sin; he may be often tempted to the act of it, and sometimes possibly overtaken with it, yet he cannot live in it: He cannot keep injustice in his hand, nor frame an impure prayer in his heart. A good man may do an act of injustice, but he continues not unjust; he restores what he hath taken unjustly from men, and repents before the Lord; but usually he is not conscious to himself of doing unjustly towards men. If a Laban (one with whom he hath had converse and dealing twenty years together) should come and search his house, he is able to say to him as honest Jacob did to his Uncle Laban (Gen. 31. 37.) Whereas thou hast searched all my stuff, what hast thou found of all thy houshold-stuff, set it here before my brethren and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both: As if he had said, Is there any injustice in my hand? Let it come to tryal. Or as upright Samuel to all Israel (1 Sam. 12. 3.) Behold, here I am, witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed, whose Ox have I taken? Or whose Ass have I taken? Or whom have I defrauded? Whom have I oppressed? Samuel had been long a Judge, yet he knew of no injustice in his hand, neither did any man know of any; and therefore all acquit him from the least blemish of unfaithfulness in his Office (Vers. 4.) Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken ought (as a bribe) of any mans hand. And he said unto them (Vers. 5.) The Lord is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that ye have not found ought (that is, ought gotten unjustly) in my hand: That man hath reacht the perfection of justice, who neither takes out of the hand of others violently, nor of the hands of others covetously to byas his spirit when he sits in judgment. Such a perfect Justicer was Samuel, all Israel could not find ought (so come by) in his hand: He might say (and he did say as much in effect) with Job, Not for any injustice in my hand.

And as a Believer may arrive at such a blameless walking towards men, that they cannot say, He hath sinned; so at such a holy walking before God, that God himself will not say, He hath sinned. And this God will not say, when he sees a soul labouring (as Paul was once praying that the Colossians might) to walk worthy of the Lord, unto all pleasing; being fruitful in every good work, Colos. 1. 10. And when he sees, that his prayer is pure, and his worship tendered with a perfect or sincere heart.

When a soul doth not wilfully neglect any duty towards God, God will say he hath performed all duty; and though there may be many failings in prayer, yet God will say, that mans prayer is pure. So then, we grant that no man lives and sins not, yet we affirm, that no godly man lives in sin; and that some godly men are so far from living in any sin, that others cannot tax them, nor can they tax themselves of acting any gross sins; yea, though the best of Saints here know they sin, and know their sins, yet they may be said not to commit known sins, that is, not to sin knowingly: He is not properly said to sin knowingly, who knows he sins, but he who sins against his knowledge.

Thirdly, Observe, Holiness consists in a compleat uniformity, or in conformity to the whole will of God.

Job draws the picture of a holy man, in all his limbs and lineaments; equity and purity contain all; Some are First Table Christians; others are Second Table Christians. Some are zealous for prayer, who are extream cold in doing justice; some are extream honest and just to men, righteous in all their dealings, but they care not for prayer, nor have they any delight in communion with God: The Law of God is one entire thing, and so must mans obedience be; He that offends in one point is guilty of all, James 2. 10. For though he that commits adultery cannot properly be said to break that Law, Thou shalt do no murder; yet whosoever commits adultery, may properly be said to break the whole Law: the reason is given by that Apostle in the next Verse: For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill: Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the Law. He that breaks any one link of a chain, breaks the chain, though he break not a second link: 'tis so here, the whole Law is copulative: and as in this sence, the Law is one; so the Law-maker is altogether one: This the Apostle James hints, as the reason of it, For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill: As if he had said, There is one and the same Legislative power commanding all, and therefore, if ye transgress one, ye transgress all. And how can there be a state of holiness, without an equal respect to both Tables of the Law, seeing the breach of any one Law of either Table, is, though not formally, yet reductively a breach of every Law in both Tables. And therefore 'tis the aim of a Believer to fulfil both Tables of the Law, though he fail in every Law of both: He gives up his will wholly to God; yea, he may be said to lose his will in the will of God; and this is his doing the whole will of God. And indeed we do nothing, unless we be found doing all.

Fourthly, Observe, We may without hypocrisie make report of our own integrity.

Job doth it here, and had done it before, and we find holy men doing it often in Scripture; I (saith Paul, 2 Tim. 4. 7.) have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the Faith: This he speaks of himself, but not for himself; not out of vain glory, or a desire of esteem with men, as the Pharisees, but that others might be encouraged by his example, and that God might have the glory of his free and powerful grace, enabling him to give and hold out such an example. Other passages in this Book have led me to this note before, and therefore I only mention it here.

More particularly, Observe, Injustice towards men, and impurities in the worship of God, are great and provoking sins.

Job disclaims these by name: It is as if Job had said, Were there injustice in my hands, or were I false in the worship of God, it were no wonder though all these judgments should seize upon me; yea, though my burden were heavier, I had no reason to complain, I must thank my self: Injustice and false worship, will certainly bring breach upon breach; they break not only single persons, but King-

Non ad jactantiam sed ad divinæ veritatis assertionem commemorat.

Kingdoms and Nations. Oppreſſion and Superſtition are Kingdom-ſhaking ſins; much more will they ſhake the walls and foundations of a private Houſe, or Family.

Again Obſerve, If God afflict where there is no injuſtice, how juſtly doth he deſtroy thoſe who are unjuſt?

Shall they complain who are beaten for their faults, when ſome are beaten who have no fault? The Apoſtle Peter argues (1 Pet. 4. 18.) If the righteous ſcarcely be ſaved, where ſhall the ungodly and ſinners appear? I may alſo argue, if the righteous be not ſaved (from outward afflictions) if the godly are ſmitten, how ſhall the ungodly and ſinners eſcape unſmitten? Many are ſmitten, not for any injuſtice in their hand (there is ſome other end, and that a juſt one, why they are ſmitten) nor is God unjuſt in ſmiting them. Now, if juſt ones are (without any injuſtice) thus ſmitten; how juſt is it with God to ſmite thoſe who are unjuſt? The repenting Thief rebuked him that blaſphemed, and ſpake evil of Chriſt, upon this conſideration, Doſt thou not fear God, ſeeing thou art in the ſame condemnation? and we juſtly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: This man and we are in the ſame condemnation, but not in the ſame fault; we are all condemned to dye, but we juſtly, and he unjuſtly; This man hath done nothing amiſs, but we have done much amiſs (Luke 22. 40, 41.) Now as this Thief was patient under his own juſt ſufferings, ſeeing another ſuffer who was juſt; ſo when we hear that the Lord afflicts thoſe who have done no evil, how ought ſuch to lay their hands upon their mouthes, who are afflicted for the evil which they have done. We know (ſaith the Apoſtle, Rom. 3. 19.) that whatſoever the Law ſaith (in a way of threatening) it ſaith to them who are under the Law (that is, who are not only under it, as having heard the precept of the Law, but are under it alſo, as having by ſin deſerved the penalty of it) That every mouth may be ſtopped, and all the World become guilty before God; or, ſubject to the judgment of God, not having a word to object why ſentence ſhould not be executed, becauſe they have tranſgreſſed.

My prayer is pure.] Taking prayer either for the worſhip of God in general, or for that ſpecial duty of calling upon the Name of God,

Note from it, That, Only pure prayer is acceptable prayer.

Cain brought an offering to God as well as Abel; But unto Cain and his offering God had not reſpect (Gen. 4. 5.) It is not what we do, but how we do it, which is acceptable to God.

Pure prayer is pleaſing to the pure God, and no other can pleaſe him. Heathens have told us, that their Gods require pure worſhippers, and pure worſhip: The impure ſpirit imitates God, he will be worſhipped, and he will have (according to mans opinion) a pure worſhip; How much more doth the holy God require pure worſhip?

Omnis præfatio ſacrorum, eos, quibus non ſunt puræ manus ſacris arcet. Liv. lib. 41. Præcipuum eſt non admittere in animum mala conſilia, puras ad cœlum manus tollere. Sen. li. 3. Nat. Qu.

But what is it which denominates prayer pure? Or when is prayer pure?

Prayer is pure:

First, When it is directed to a right object, when we pray to God, and to God only: It is the ſole priviledge of God to receive prayer; O thou that heareſt prayer, to thee ſhall all fleſh come: There is but one hearer of prayer, and that is God. Daniel withſtood the Decree of the King, when he forbad him to make his prayers to God; he would rather be caſt to the Lyons, then not to pray, or pray to any beſides God; therefore he opened his window (to let them ſee his reſolution) and prayed to God thrice a day openly. We may petition living men, but we muſt pray only to the living God. All men (except ſuch as have ſinned unto death) are to be prayed for, but no man muſt be prayed unto: Neither Saint, nor Angel, nor any Creature, are the object of prayer, but God alone.

Secondly, Pure prayer muſt be right in the matter of it, as well as the object; if we pray for that which is unlawful, our prayer muſt needs be unlawful; as it is a ſin to do any thing which God commands not, ſo it is a ſin to ask any thing which God allows not. God hath ſet ſpecial bounds to three things.

First, To our Faith, he teacheth us what to believe.

Secondly, To our actions, he teacheth us what to do.

Thirdly, To our prayers, he teacheth us what to deſire.

We may make enlarged prayers, but we are not left at large in prayer. The ſquare or rule of prayer is the will of God (1 John 5. 14.) And this is the confidence that we have in him, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us. The will of God is the rule, not only of things to be done by us, but of things which we are to ask God to do for us: As man naturally would rather do, ſo he would rather have his own will, then the will of God. Man would fain be his own carver, but God will not let him: It pleaſes man better to go two miles upon his own errand, then one upon Gods errand; and it pleaſes man better to have any one thing of his own chuſing, then two of Gods chuſing; but it ſhould not. The will of God under a threefold revelation is the rule and matter of prayer.

First, The will of God in Commandments; whatſoever God hath charged upon us to do, we may pray for power and ſtrength to do it, or that it may be done.

Secondly, The will of God in Promiſes; what God hath ſaid he will give, we may pray to receive.

Thirdly, The will of God in Propheſies; what God hath foreſhewed ſhall come to paſs, we muſt pray that it may come to paſs. The prayer of man gives birth to the Propheſies of God. Thus ſaith the Lord, I will yet for this be enquired of by the Houſe of Iſrael, to do it for them, (Ezek. 36. 37.) God is a ſure pay-maſter, yet he expects we ſhould ſue him, before he payes. Daniel found by Books, that the time drew nigh, for the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon; and then (ſaith he) I ſet my face unto the Lord God, to ſeek by prayer and ſupplications, with faſting, ſack-cloath, and aſhes (Dan. 9. 1, 2.) The manifeſtation of the will of God in a Propheſie, is a ſtrong ground of prayer: Thus the matter of prayer is the will of God under one of thoſe three manifeſtations, a Command, a Promiſe, or a Propheſie.

A third thing in pure prayer, is the form of it. There is a twofold form of prayer.

First, The internal, or eſſential form.

Secondly, The external, or accidental form of prayer.

The external form, is that habit of words and expreſſions with which we cloath our deſires, when we preſent them unto God: This form varies, not only according to the ſeveral occaſions and emergencies of this life, which call us to the duty of prayer; but alſo according to the ſeveral gifts and abilities of thoſe who pray. We are free as to this form, from all tyes and preſcriptions, except this, that we utter our minds to God ſoberly, gravely, ſpiritually, with an eye to thoſe forms and patterns of wholeſome words delivered to us in the Word of God; and eſpecially to that part of the word which Chriſt gave both as a compendium, and a copy of holy prayer.

But as for the eſſential and internal form of prayer, that is unchangeable, and muſt ever be one and the ſame; Namely, That we pray in the Name of Chriſt. One of the Ancients was much delighted in reading Tully's Hortenſius, yet this at laſt abated the edge of his delight in it, That he did not find the Name of Chriſt in it. As the Name of Chriſt is the greateſt ornament of all Books where it is; ſo the name of Chriſt is the eſſence of all prayers; and that is no prayer, where his Name is not. (John 14. 13.) Whatſoever ye ask in my Name, I will do it, that the Father may be glorified in the Son: whatſoever ye do, do all in the Name of Chriſt, giving thanks to God, through him, Col. 3. 17. To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is more then to name Chriſt in prayer: It is eaſie to name Chriſt in prayer; but it is a hard thing to pray in the Name of Chriſt. To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is, Auguſt. l. 3. Confeſſ. c. 4.

First, To look up to Chriſt, as having purchaſed us this priviledge, that we may pray; for it is by the blood of Chriſt that we draw near to God, and that a Throne of grace is open for us.

Secondly, To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is to pray in the ſtrength of Chriſt.

Thirdly, To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is to pray in the vertue of the preſent mediation of Chriſt, which carries this acknowledgment in it, That what we ask on earth, Chriſt obtains in Heaven.

To pray thus is no easie matter, and unless we pray thus, we do not pray at all. (John 16. 23, 24.) In that day ye shall ask me nothing: Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my Name, he will give it you. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my Name, ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full. But how do these parts of the Text consist? Why doth Christ tell them, that they shall ask nothing in that day, and yet promise, that what they ask he will give? There is a twofold asking:

First, By way of Question.

Secondly, By way of Petition.

The former is, asking, that we may know, or be informed in what we doubt; the latter, is asking, that we may receive and be supplied with what we want. Now, when Christ saith, In that day ye shall ask me nothing: he had a little before promised such a manifestation of the mind of God to them, by the Spirit, that they should not need to come and ask him: As if he had said, Now ye put questions (as we read they did) about many things, ye understand little of the mystery of the Gospel; but in that day ye shall have so clear a revelation about the things of Heaven, that ye shall not need to propose your doubts; and desire resolution, for you shall be able to resolve your selves by the light within you. This the Apostle John (1 Epist. 2. 20.) tells the Saints, But ye have an Unction from the holy One, and and ye know all things: And again (Vers. 27.) But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you; and ye need not that any man should teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth you all things, and is truth, and is no lye; and even as it hath taught, ye shall abide in him. These Scriptures are both a clear exposition, and an illustrious verification of that Promise of Christ, In that day ye shall ask me nothing: That is, After my resurrection.

But when he saith, Whatsoever ye ask the Father in my Name, he will give it: The meaning is, Your prayers shall be heard, while you keep close to this essential form, Asking in my Name. Besides this essential form of prayer, there is also another form, which we may call in a qualified sence, essential: As when the matter we pray about is spiritual, and absolutely necessary to salvation, then to pray in an absolute form. If it be temporal, and outward, or if it be of a spiritual nature, yet such as is only necessary to the well-being of a Believer, as spiritual gifts, yea, and the degrees of grace are, then to pray in a conditional form, as submitting it to the will of God, not only for the time, and manner, and means, and measure, wherein, or by which we shall receive those things, but also submitting the very things themselves to his good pleasure, whether we shall receive them at all, or no. Nor doth conditional prayer hinder Faith, but looks to the rule. We may pray without doubting, though we pray with a condition; and when we are fullest of submission, we may be fullest of confidence; yea, without submission in those cases there can be no true confidence.

Fourthly, Prayer is pure, when the end which we aim at is pure: The end denominates every action, as to the quality or goodness of it. The great end of prayer, as of all other actions, and without which, neither those, nor this, can be called pure, is, the glory of God. Hallowed be thy Name, is the first prayer, and that hath influence into all our prayers: we must pray for all, that God may be glorified, and pray for nothing, that our lusts may be satified. Though we may pray that our wants may be supplyed (that may be an end) yet never that our lusts may be satisfied (James 4. 3.) Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss: Where was the fault which the Apostle found, and specified in those prayers? Not in the object, they prayed to God; not in the matter, they prayed for things lawful; not in the form, they prayed in the Name of Christ; but the fault was in the end, Ye ask amiss, that ye may bestow it on your lusts. It is possible for a man to pray, not only for evil things, but for good things; and not only for outward good things, but for spiritual good things, to bestow upon his lusts; some pray for spiritual gifts, to bestow them on their lusts, pride, vain-glory, and covetousness; yea, it is possible for a man to pray for grace, to bestow it on his lust (so Hypocrites do) though it be impossible for any man, who indeed receives grace, to bestow it upon his lust: Let your end be pure, that your prayers may be pure also.

Fifthly, Prayer is pure when it is mingled with, and put up in Faith. By Faith Abel offered a more excellent sacrifice then Cain (Heb. 11. 4.) and without Faith it is impossible to please God (Vers. 6.) Prayer is our coming to God, He that comes to God, must believe that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. Faith takes hold of Christ, by whom only our prayers are purified; and therefore there can be no pure prayer without Faith. As God purifies our hearts by Faith, so our prayers are purified by Faith. Faith doth not only take hold of God for the granting of our prayer, in which sence 'tis said (James 1. 6.) If any one ask, let him ask in Faith; that is, That he shall receive: But Faith takes hold of Christ for the purifying of our prayer, that so it may come up with acceptance before God. He is of purer eyes then to behold evil, he cannot look on iniquity (to approve of it, or to like it, Hab. 1. 13.) Seeing then there is much iniquity in our holy things; we must do all by our High Priest, who (as the typical High Priest did for the Children of Israel, Exod. 28. 38.) bears the iniquity of our holy things, that we (as they) may be accepted before the Lord.

Sixthly, That, and only that, is pure prayer, which is breathed in, and breathed out, by the Spirit of God. Edifie your selves in your most holy Faith, pray in the holy Ghost (Jude, vers. 20.) Or, Praying by the holy Ghost (as some translate) that is, by the strength and help of the holy Ghost. We cannot make pure prayer with our own breath, parts, and gifts; the holy Spirit breaths holy prayer into, and draws it out of our hearts: As we know not what to believe or do aright, till the Spirit teacheth us; so we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit it self maketh intercession for us (Rom. 8. 26.) The Spirit maketh intercession, not as Christ doth; the Spirit doth not mediate between God and us; but as it is the office of Christ to intercede for us with God; so it is the office of the holy Ghost to make those intercessions in us, which we put up to God: So that the Spirit is said to make intercession for us, because the intercessions and prayers which we make, are made by the Spirit; the Spirit forms them in us. As some duller Scholars in a School, who cannot make their Exercises, get their Exercises made for them by those that are more pregnant; so the Spirit makes intercession for us. We are dull, and low, and straitened, we cannot make a prayer, the Spirit makes them for us in our hearts: Hence it is said in the beginning of the Verse, The Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: The Greek word signifieth to help, as a Nurse helpeth a little Child to go, or as a weak decripid old man is upholden by a staff, or rather (as the compostion of the word implyes) The Spirit helpeth together: And then it is a Metaphor taken from those who lift a weight, or a piece of Timber (too heavy for one) together: The Spirit lends us his hand in this duty; and they who have received grace, act also with the Spirit: Thus, the Spirit helpeth together: The Spirit and a Believer are both at it, to carry on this praying work; yet all that strength which we put to the work flowes from the Spirit; who as he raiseth us when we are quite fallen, so he assists us when we are raised, and then we make good work, pure work of it in prayer.

συναντιλαμβάνεται, particula συν, ad nos laborantes refertur, quorum tamen vis omnis ab eo Spiritu proficiscitur, qui sicut nos penitus collapsos erexit ita etiam erectos regit; ideoque dicitur ipse vicissim onus attollere ne sub eo fatiscamus. Bez. in Epist. ad Rom.

Lastly, That is a pure prayer which comes from a pure person: And there is a double purity of the person necessary to a pure prayer.

First, There is the purity of his state; he must be a converted, and regenerated person, otherwise his prayer is abominable, though he should be right in as many of the forementioned requisites, as it is possible for an unregenerate man to be; as suppose he not only prayeth to God, and for such things as are agreeable to the will of God, but also (as he thinks) for the glory of God; yet the mans prayer is impure, because himself is impure: God hath respect to the person, before he hath respect to his supplication. (Prov. 15. 8.) The prayer of the wicked is an abomination to God; but the prayer of the upright is his delight: And again, He that turns away his ear from hearing the Law, even his prayer shall be abomination (Prov. 28. 9.)

Secondly, As there must be purity of state, before there can be a pure prayer; so also purity of life; that is, he must be renewed in purity, not lying or continuing in any sin (1 Tim. 2. 8.) I will that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubtings. Holy hands, note the purity of our actions, as a holy heart notes the purity of our state: To lift up the hands is to pray, the sign being put for the thing signified: The meaning is, let your prayers be holy. First, Without wrath to men; come not to seek the favour of God, with anger and revenge in thy heart against man. Secondly, Pray without doubting; that respects God, and is opposed to Faith: As if the Apostle had said, Pray both in actual Faith and Love. Yet the Greek word (διαλογισμῶν) there used, is rendered by some, disceptation, or wrangling; as if the Apostle had in that specified one effect of wrath. 'Tis expounded also by others, for any internal distraction, or distemper of the mind; for the mind of man is often carryed away from God in prayer, and maintains secret Dialogismes, Discourses, and Conferences, in, and with it self, when it should be wholly taken up with God.

The covetous mans heart talks of gold, and the voluptuous mans heart talks of pleasures, when he seems to pray: yea, these Fowls will often come down upon the Sacrifice of an Abraham, only as soon as he espies them, he drives them away; yet by these interruptions in prayer, as well as by any sinful action unrepented of before prayer, the holiness of prayer, or the lifting up of holy hands in prayer, is hindered and defaced, even in those, whose persons are holy. David was a man that was pure in state, he was a converted person; yet he saith (Psal. 66. 18.) If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayers. Though I am pure in state, yet if I am impure in life, the ear of God will shut against my suits (Isa. 1. 14, 15.) God rejects the prayers of his own people, because their hands were full of blood; and hence his counsel, Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes, &c. Come now let us reason together, saith the Lord (Vers. 18.) As if he had said, While I see your sins, I cannot hear your prayers; while your iniquities are before mine eyes, your supplications cannot enter into mine ear, nor will I answer them. How can any soul expect with Faith, that God should do what he requests, when he will not do what God commands? Or that God should fulfil our desires, while we in any thing neglect his rules?

As the prayer of an unholy person is turned into sin; so the sin of a holy person may cause the Lord to turn away his prayer: Then take that counsel of the Apostle, writing to, and of Saints (Heb. 10. 22.) Let us draw nigh to God with a true heart, in full assurance of Faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water: There is a twofold evil conscience.

First, That which lives in any known sin unrepented of.

Secondly, That which is unquiet and unsetled about the pardon of those sins which we have repented of.

We should get both these evil consciences, but especially the first, cured and removed by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ, before we draw nigh to God in prayer; as also our bodies washed in pure water, which is either an allusion to the old Ceremonies among the Jews, who before they came to worship at the Tabernacle, purged themselves with divers outward washings, leading them to the consideration of that moral purity, both of heart and life, in which God is to be worshipped; or it is an allusion to Baptism in special, in which there is an external washing of the body, signifying the washing of the soul by the blood of Christ, and by the effectual working of the Spirit: The sum of all is, unless the person be pure, his prayer is not pure. These are the ingredients which constitute pure prayer; all these met in Job, and therefore he concluded, not only confidently, but truly, My prayer is pure.

And as these are the ingredients of prayer, so they are all necessary ingredients; so necessary, that if any one of them be wanting, the whole prayer is impure: They are necessary by a double necessity.

First, As commanded by God in prayer.

Secondly, As means without which man cannot attain his end in prayer.

The general end of prayer, is, that prayer may be heard, accepted, and answered; God hears, accepts, answers, no one prayer, without some concurrence of all these. The Incense of the Ceremonial Law was a shadow of prayer, which is so great a duty of the Moral Law: But if this Incense had not been made exactly according to the will of God, both for the matter and the manner of the composition, prescribed (Exod. 30. 34, 35, 36.) If after it had been thus made, it had not also been offered according to those rules given (Levit. 16. 12, 13.) it had been an abomination to the Lord; or as the Prophet Isaiah speaks (Chap. 66. 3.) Such a burning of Incense had been but as the blessing of an Idol. We may conclude also, That, if prayer be either composed, or presented in any other way then God himself hath directed, it is not only turned away, but turned into sin. That man hath spoken a great word, who can say (in Job's sence) My prayer is pure.

Thus Job justifies the prayer he made to God, and maintains his justice towards men. There is no injustice in my hands, also my prayer is pure: A high profession, yet in the next words he goes higher, and makes both an imprecation against himself, if it were not thus with him, and an appeal to God for his testimony, that it was thus with him.

VERS. 18, 19.

O Earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

Also now behold my witness is in Heaven, and my record is on high.

JOB having (with much confidence) asserted the integrity of his heart, and the righteousness of his way, both towards God and Man, confirms what he had thus confidently asserted, by a double Argument.

First, By a vehement imprecation (Vers. 18,) O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

Secondly, By a free appeal, an appeal to God himself (Vers. 19.) Also now behold my witness is in Heaven, and my record is on high: He shews the necessity of this appeal (Vers. 20.) My Friends scorn me; therefore I am constrained to go to God. When men have done us wrong, and will not do us right, it is both time and duty to appeal to God. Upon this ground Job appeals, and he concludes (according to our translation) his appeal with a passionate, yet holy wish (Vers. 21.) O that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his Neighbour. The reason both of his appeal and wish, is given further (Vers. 22.) he looked on himself, as a man standing upon the very confines of death, the grave was ready for him; therefore he begs, that this business might be dispatched, and his integrity cleared before he dyed. He was loth to go out of the world, like a candle, burnt down to the socket, with an ill savour. He that hath lived unstained in his reputation, cannot well bear it, to dye with a blot; and therefore he will be diligent by all due means to maintain the credit which he hath got, and to recover what he hath lost: This was the reason of Job's importunity discovered in these two Verses, now further to be opened.

Est juramenti deprecatorii forma, quo asseverat nullius sibi iniquitatis conscium esse. Aben. Ezra.

Verse 18. O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

There are two branches of this imprecation, or rather these make two distinct imprecations.

The first in these words, O earth, cover not thou my blood.

The second in these, Let my cry have no place.

Job engages all upon the truth of what he had said, being willing that his worst might be seen, and his best not heard, if he had not spoken truth.

O earth, cover not thou my blood.] Job speaks pathetically, or as some render him, Poetically, while he bespeaks the earth, and makes the inanimate creature his hearer. The sacred Pen-men do often turn their speech to the Heavens, and to the Earth: Thus Moses (Deut. 32. 2.) in the Preface of his Sermon, his last Sermon to that people, Give ear O ye Heavens, and I will speak, and hear O earth the words of my mouth. So the Prophet Isaiah (Chap. 1. 2.) Hear, O Heavens, and give ear, O Earth, I have nourished and brought up Children, and they have rebelled against me: God speaks to that which hath no ears to hear, either to reprove those who have ears, but hear not; or to raise up and provoke their attention in hearing. Thus Job, O earth, &c. as if the earth were able to take his complaint, and return an an anſwer; as if the earth were able to make inquiſition, and bring in a verdict about his blood.

O earth [cover] not thou my blood.] The word ſignifies not only common, but a twofold metaphorical covering.

First, Covering by way of diſſimulation; to diſſemble a matter, is to cover a matter: In that ſence Solomon ſpeaks (Prov. 12. 16.) A fools wrath is preſently known, but a prudent man covereth ſhame: That is, He diſſembleth his wrath, or his anger, he will not let it alway break forth, for that would be a ſhame to him.

Secondly, The word ſignifies to cover by forgetfulneſs; That which is not remembred, is hid or covered. (Eccleſ. 6. 4.) He cometh in with vanity (ſpeaking of man) and departeth in darkneſs, and his name ſhall be covered with darkneſs: That is, He ſhall be forgotten, he ſhall be as if he had not been. And thus it is applyed to the pardon of ſin (Pſal. 32. 1.) Sin is vailed with the worthineſs and obedience of Chriſt, as with a garment, and is to God as a thing forgotten, or out of mind, when once it is forgiven: In both theſe ſences Job ſeems to beſpeak the earth, O earth, cover not my blood: That is, If thou haſt any of my blood, do not diſſemble it, bring it forth, be not as if thou kneweſt of no ſuch matter. As ſimulation makes that to be, which is not; ſo diſſimulation makes that not to be, which is.

Sanguis terra tegitur quando facinus diſſimulatur, nec vindictam expoſcit.

Again, Cover not my blood: That is, Forget it not, if thou haſt ſuch a record upon thy File, let it be continued and remembred, that the Generations to come may judge how I have been dealt with by this preſent Age, or how I have dealt in it.

O earth, cover not my [blood.] But what is his [blood] which he would not have covered? His blood may be taken two wayes.

First, Paſſively, for his ſufferings and grievous afflictions, which were even to blood: The Apoſtle tells the Hebrews, Ye have not reſiſted to blood, ſtriving againſt ſin (Heb. 12. 4.) There is a threefold ſtrife againſt ſin.

First, Againſt ſin already acting and moving in our ſelves.

Secondly, There is a ſtriving againſt that ſin which others move us to act, whether by promiſes, or by threatenings.

Thirdly, There is a ſtriving againſt that ſin which others act.

The Apoſtle (as I conceive) intends one of, or both the latter ſorts of ſtriving againſt ſin, which is indeed a ſtriving againſt ſinners; and in this ſtrife he ſaith, Ye have not reſiſted unto blood; ye have (I grant) reſiſted, to the loſs of your goods, yea, and to the loſs of your credit and reputaon in the World (Chap. 10. 33, 34.) but know, ye are not come to the heat of the Battel, till your bodies bleed; ye have loſt no blood yet, ſtriving againſt ſin. Job reſiſted, or rather ſubmitted to blood; he had loſt blood, in the great fight of affliction which he indured; he was wounded all over. Now, ſay ſome, he cryes, O earth, cover not my blood: That is, Theſe my bloody ſufferings; what I have endured, let it be remembred. But we cannot well accommodate this interpretation to the Text: For, firſt, there may be as much vanity in deſiring the evils we have ſuffered, as the good we have done, ſhould be known: We muſt let God alone to erect the monument of our ſufferings; that muſt be none of our care.

Ne tegas ſanguinem meum. i. e. injuriam mihi latam qua innocens pereo. Merc.

Secondly, We cannot ſo much as ſuſpect that Job would maintain the memory of his ſufferings againſt God; yet it was he who ſmote Job, though by the hand of Satan, and wicked men: This Job had acknowledged more then once, with much humble ſubmiſſion, and therefore he doth not deſire that his blood might be forth-coming in a way of conteſtation with him. Further, If we look only to thoſe inſtruments of his affliction, who had indeed done him wrong: Surely the ſpirit of this good man, as it was far from meditating revenge, ſo his ſcope and buſineſs here, was rather to bring himſelf to a tryal then them, rather to have his own innocency cleared, then their guilt proved: And therefore we have called theſe words, an imprecation upon himſelf, in caſe he were guilty, not an accuſation of their guiltineſs. In purſuance of which general ſence, we muſt expound blood under another notion. And therefore,

Secondly, Blood may be taken actively, and ſo it falls under a threefold conſideration.

First, Blood is put for the general ſinfulneſs or corruption of mans nature, as alſo for any particular ſin, as it is wrapt up in mans natural corruption. One of the Ancients interprets David's prayer (Pſal. 51. 14.) Deliver me from blood, or bloods, or (as we render) from blood-guiltineſs, O God; not of that ſpecial ſin, or not of that only, the death of Uriah, but of all ſin, which (ſaith he) therefore bears that title, becauſe it flows from the polluted nature of man, which the Scripture calls fleſh and blood. That of the Prophet is more proper to this point (Ezek. 16. 6.) When thou waſt in thy blood, I ſaid unto thee live: That is, When thou was wrapt in, and defiled with thy ſin and miſery, then I had pity on thee, and ſpake life into thee. Every ſoul tumbles in blood till it is ſprinkled with blood; our blood is our filthineſs, and the blood of Chriſt is our holineſs, freeing us at once from the guilt, and from the ſtain of ſin. This corruption of nature, together with that iſſue of it, the tranſgreſſions of life, may be called blood, for two reaſons. Auguſtine.

First, Becauſe it deſerves death, and is a ſtate of death; we are dead in ſin, and the wages of ſin is death; and as any kind of death may be expreſſed by blood, ſo a violent death is the pouring out of blood.

Secondly, It may be called blood, becauſe ſin is expiated by blood, and without ſhedding of blood there is no remiſſion, no not of the leaſt ſin.

Secondly, Blood ſignifies ſome notorious ſin or ſins. Great ſins are not only bloody ſins, but (in Scripture language) blood. (Iſa. 1. 15.) When ye make many prayers, I will not hear: Why? For your hands are full of blood: That is, Of great and foul crimes: For ſhould we take blood there, for any ſin, according to the former interpretation, then whoſe prayer ſhall be heard? Who is it that ſins not? Yea, who is not full of ſin? So that by hands full of blood, he means hands ſtained with great ſins; or with ſins, if ſmall in themſelves, yet (which greatens the leaſt ſin) loved and unrepented of (Ezek. 9. 9.) Thus ſaith the Lord, The iniquity of the Houſe of Iſrael and Judah is exceeding great, and the Land is full of blood: That is, Of all kind of wickedneſs (Ezek. 24. 7.) For her blood is in the midſt of her; ſhe ſet it upon the top of a rock; ſhe poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with duſt: Which words deſcribe, as the ſin of Jeruſalem, ſo her impudence in ſinning. Her blood was in the midſt of her; it was not caſt behind the door, or put into a corner, She ſet it upon a rock; and not only ſo, but upon the top of a rock; as if ſhe not only cared who ſaw it, but had taken care that all might ſee it; She poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with duſt: In which words the Prophet alludes to that Law (Levit. 17. 13.) commanding that the blood of a beaſt ſhould be poured out, and covered with duſt. And Again (Hoſ. 4. 2.) By ſwearing, and killing, and ſtealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood: That is, One wickedneſs is heaped upon another. There is an aggregation, or a combination of many ſins together; their ſins are ſo thick ſet, that there is not the leaſt ſpace, either of time or place between them; they ſin continually; and they ſin contiguouſly; ſin toucheth ſin. Sanguinis nomine intelligitur peccatum graviſſimum, ac deteſtandum facinus. Aggregant peccata, peccatis. Chald.

Thirdly, By blood in this active ſence, we may underſtand thoſe ſpecial ſins which draw blood; the ſin of oppreſſion, and the ſin of murder. The Scriptures laſt cited include theſe principally, though not theſe alone, or not theſe excluſively to other ſins. Sins of cruelty are often called blood by name; and ſuch are named bloody men, who commit ſuch things (Pſal. 55. 24.) Blood-thirſty and deceitful men ſhall not live out half their dayes: That is, Murderers and Oppreſſors ſhall not. When Shimei curſed David, he ſaid, Go thou bloody man, thou Son of Belial (2 Sam. 16. 7, 8.) He calls him bloody man, in reference to that particular act, with which David had ſtained his hands, the murder of Uriah. Hab. 2. 12. Woe to him that buildeth a Town with blood, that ſtabliſheth a City with iniquity: That is, By the iniquity of oppreſſion: He builds with blood, who, to ſet his own neſt on high, throws down the right, or takes away the lives of others. Under this third, as alſo the ſecond notion of blood, we may beſt interpret Job's imprecation, O earth, cover not thou my blood: That is, The oppreſſions and cruelties which I have committed, if I have committed any. Some conceive that Job refers to the story of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4. 10.) The earth would not cover Cain's blood; that is, the blood of Abel which Cain had spilt. Eliphaz told Job before in a third person, that his Tabernacle was a Tabernacle of bribery; as much as to say, That he had done wrong in his place, and had been a grinder of the faces of the poor. Now saith Job, O earth, cover not my blood; if I have been an oppressor, if I have drank the blood of the poor, or am guilty of such like abominations, I desire that the earth would not cover, or dissemble it, but let it be published to my shame, and brought forth to my judgment. Mr. Broughton's note is full to this sence, If there be any injury in my hands, let the earth reveal it. And the Tygurine, O earth, do not conceal my capital crimes.

Si quam eædem maleficiumvè quod objicitis patravi, illud revelet & testificetur terra. Jun.

O Tellus ne celes scelera mea capitalia. Tygur.

The second branch of the imprecation falls cross to this; for in this Job prayes, that his evil deeds might be discovered; in that he prays, that his very prayers (which were his best deeds) might not be accepted, if he had either been, or done, as was suspected.

And let my cry have no place. The word signifies a loud cry, a grievous cry, the cry of a man extreamly pressed; yea, even utterly oppress: This cry is expounded three wayes.

First, For the very cry of grief, or for a cry caused meerly by grief. Let my cry have no place: That is, Let not my pains and sorrows, my groans and sighs, in midst of all these evils be regarded, either by God or Men, if I have done such evils as I am accused of. 'Tis a great affliction which puts a man to his cry, whether to God or Man; but it is a greater affliction to cry and not to be heard, neither by God nor man: The cry of a poor man is then said to have no place with a Judge, when he will not hear it, or take notice of it.

Secondly, Others expound this for the cry of sin. Great sins are called a cry, not only because they make others cry, but because themselves are very clamorous and crying. Sin hath a tongue to speak, and it hath teeth to bite: Every sin speaks, but some sins have a loud voice, they cry, The blood of thy Brother, which thou hast spilt, cryes unto me (saith God to Cain, Gen. 4. 10.) The sin of Sodom cryed up to Heaven (Gen. 18. 20.) Oppression causeth a cry; so here, Let my cry, that is, my crying sins, or the cry of my sins, have no place; that is, none to hide, or shelter themselves in: And then this clause of the imprecation is of the same sence with the former, O earth, cover not thou my blood.

Clamat quia innocens effusus est, & dicitur interpellare dominum, non prosecutione Eloquii sed indignitate commissi Ambros.

Thirdly, By this cry we may understand Job's prayer, and that of two sorts: First, Prayers, Petitions, or complaints to men; let not any Friend regard my cry. Secondly, Prayers to God; for as there are crying sins, so there are crying prayers; The Lord said to Moses, Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Exod. 14. 15. Asa cryed unto the Lord (2 Chron. 14.) The Ninevites were commanded to cry mightily to God (Jonah 3. 8.) and Christ himself prayed with strong cryes (Heb. 5. 7.) As there are two things especially which make sins crying sins.

First, When they are earnestly committed.
Secondly, When they are constantly committed.

So two things make prayers crying prayers:

First, When we pray with earnestness.
Secondly, When we pray with continuance, or perseverance.

Ne in cælũ efferatur suscipiaturve clamor meus si sim ejusmodi. Jun.

We find David often crying to God in prayer; so that when Job saith, Let my cry have no place; his meaning is, Let not God hear my most earnest prayer: A dreadful imprecation! When we, who have no help on earth, shall wish that we may have none in Heaven neither; What can we wish worse to our selves then this?

From the words in general Observe, It is lawful to use imprecations.

Job did not sin in this: There are imprecations of two sorts.

First, Upon others, when we wish them evil, or curse them; this in some rare cases may be done; David useth imprecations against the incorrigible enemies of the Church, and so may we; but in reference to personal injuries, the Gospel-rule is; Bless them that curse you, pray for them that despitefully use you, Matth. 5. 44.

Secondly, Upon our selves; such are the imprecations intended in this point. Job calls down mischief upon his own head, in both parts of the Verse, Let all my sins be discovered, let all my prayers be refused, if ever I have done this thing. Imprecations, or wishes of evil upon our selves may proceed upon a double ground.

First, For the assuring of what we promise, or engage our selves to do: As to say, I will do such a thing, or I promise to do it; if I do it not, I wish evil may befal me: This is to put our selves under a curse, which we do at least implicitely in taking any promissory Oath. There are two sorts of Oaths.

First, Assertory Oaths, when we affirm such a thing to be true.

Secondly, Promissory Oaths, when we promise to do such a thing, calling God to witness, and laying our selves under a penalty, if we do it not. This is expressed in some, and implyed in all solemn Oaths and Covenants. The present point extends not to this sort of imprecations.

Secondly, Imprecations of penal evils may be used for the stronger denial, or disavowing of any sinful evil, of which we are suspected, or with which we are directly charged. To this sort of imprecations the present point is confined: This was Job's case, he was deeply charged to have done wickedly; and he as deeply denied that he had done so. Thus David imprecates evil upon himself (Psal. 7. 3, 4, 5.) The title of the Psalm shews the occasion of it. Shiggaion of David (that is, David's variable, or delightful song, or David's solace) concerning the words of Cush the Benjamite: That is, Either of Saul himself, whose ill disposition towards him he closely taxeth under the word Cush, which signifies a Blackmoor, or Æthiopian; or it may design some of Saul's Courtiers, who had done ill offices to David, and accused him of a conspiracy, to take away Saul's life, as appears (1 Sam. 24. 9.) And David said to Saul, Wherefore heareſt thou mens words, saying, Behold David seeketh thy hurt. Now David composed this Psalm in his own vindication, and fears not to call down vengeance upon his own head, if he were guilty. O Lord my God, if I have done this, if there be iniquity in my hands (that is, this iniquity, if I have done this) If I have rewarded evil to him that was at peace with me (what then? He imprecates) Let mine enemy persecute my soul and take it, yea, let him tread my life down to the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. David layes all at stake, soul, and life, and honour, in the highest actings of holiness towards God, and integrity towards man. He that is in David's case, and hath David's conscience, may do the like, and fear no hurt. The Woman suspected of adultery was by the Law (Num. 5.) to imprecate, and wish evil on her self, if she did not speak true in denying it: For the Priest was commanded to bring the Woman, and to put the offering on her head, and then to give her the water of jealousie to drink, saying, This water which causeth the curse, shall go into thy bowels, to make thy belly to swell, and thy thigh to rot; and the Woman was to answer, Amen, Amen; As if she had said, I pray God this misery may come upon me, in case I have been false, or unfaithful to my Husband. Thus the Woman confirmed the curse, and took it upon her self, if she were defiled; or testified her Faith in God, that he would clear her innocency, she being not defiled; and therefore the word Amen was doubled.

And here it will not be impertinent to remember how the superstitious heart of man hath in times of former ignorance and darkness invented and adventured upon wayes of tryal in doubtful cases, with some resemblance to (possibly in imitation of) this appointment of God among the Jews.

The old Saxons had their Ordeal, which word signifies, Due part, or Dome and Judgment: There were four sorts of Ordeal, by which when manifest proofs were wanting, they attempted (or indeed tempted God) to find out whether the party accused were guilty, or guiltless.

Verstег. Restitut. of decayed Intel. in Antiquit. Chap: 3.

The first was by Combat, in which the person accusing offered with the peril of his life at any weapon, to prove his accusation: And if the person accused did refuse the challenge, or did either yield, or was slain in the fight, he was without further evidence adjudged culpable.

The second was by Fire, in which the persons accused were were to take red hot iron in their bare hands, or to go bare-foot and blindfold where red hot Irons were laid, and if they did either step between them, or stepping upon them, felt no harm; this was a declaration of innocency.

The third tryal was made by Hot boyling water, into which if the person suspected thrusting his naked Arm, found no evil effects, he was pronounced guiltless.

The fourth was by cold water; into which persons accused, having a cord tyed about them, were cast, and if they sunk to the bottom, and continued a little there, till they were drawn up, they were held faultless; all these tryals were made with prayer and invocation upon the Name of God, that the truth might be made known.

These customs drew their first breath from Paganism, and were continued by some who professed Christianity, till clearer light convinced them of their vanity, and unwarrantable boldness with the Name of God.

Now, as all imprecations used with these or the like Ceremonies and circumstances invented by man are wicked and unlawful; so those which are in themselves lawful, are used by most unlawfully. And therefore I shall give some rules and bounds, beyond which we may not pass, without sinful presumption.

First, An imprecation must be used only in very great, serious, and weighty matters: Woe to those who wish evil on, or curse themselves about trifles; some have been heard to wish themselves hanged, yea damned, upon small occasions.

Secondly, It is not enough that the matter be great, and serious, unless it be done with serious deliberation, and self examination, as also with highest reverence of God, who knows our hearts, and will judge both our wayes and words.

Thirdly, It must be done with a desire to honour God, as much as to exonerate our selves. David knew Gods Name was blasphemed by those who misjudged him; Here's a man that would be thought so holy, and religious before God; see how perfidious and disloyal he is to his King. When David saw the honour of God concerned in him, he was bold to say, Lord, if I have done this thing, let him persecute my life and take it; he hath persecuted my life, but he could not take it hitherto; but let him take it, if this be so.

Fourthly, Be sure that you are clear in the matter, and that you imprecate in truth; God is an avenger of falshood, much more of studied falshood. It is hard to deprecate his wrath, when we have spoken falsly; surely then he will pour out his wrath upon their heads, who imprecate it, to cover their falshood. The Jews accused Christ falsly, and as earnestly prayed judgment against him, crying out to the Judge, Let him be crucified: But when they saw they could not prevail with importunity, and that Pilate (who was doubtful of the justice of their clamour) took water, and washed his hands, and said, Behold I am free from the blood of this man; then in a rage they imprecate, Let his blood be upon us, and upon our children (Matth. 27. 25.) As if they had said, Be not thou so scrupulous to condemn him, if thou thinkest him innocent, let the vengeance of his innocent blood fall upon us and our posterity. When a man is accused rightly, and the Judge rests unsatisfied, the Accuser may say to satisfie the Judge. Let his blood be upon my head; I have spoke my conscience, and the truth. The Jews accused Christ falsly, yet called for his blood upon their heads; therefore God gave them their wicked wish, and they lye under the weight of this imprecation to this very day. They prayed that the blood of Christ might be upon them, and it is upon them. As God pours the blood of Christ upon some in mercy, so upon others in wrath. The blood of Christ is upon Believers, to wash and cleanse them from their sins; but the blood of Christ hath been upon the Jews to condemn and scatter them, as a vile people, all the World over for their sin: The Lord hath been most exact in answering this cry, even in the very place where they made it. The History of the Jews reports, that about thirty eight years after this dreadful curse upon themselves, Herod called the Jews together, and demanded a sum of Money of them for making a Water-course, which they refusing to give, he sent for Souldiers to come secretly armed, who slew great multitudes of them in that place, where they cryed, Let his blood be upon us, &c. At another time Florus, who was General of the Common Souldiers, made a second, and that a more bloody massacre of them there. And when Jerusalem was taken by Vespasian, the blood of Christ was poured upon the heads of many hundred thousands, who were slain by Fire and Sword, Famine and Pestilence; besides more then seven thousand of them, who were led captive: And the Story informs us further, that Cæsar sold the younger and common sort of those Captives at that contemptible rate of thirty a penny; as they or their Fathers sold Christ for thirty pence, so by the just judgment of God thirty of them were sold for a penny. There was never any people in the World, who tasted more justly, or more deeply of that cup of self-cursing then the Jews have done; yet many persons have tasted deeply of it too besides the Jews. This sin hath so much, not only of wickedness, but boldness in it, that God never lets it go altogether unpunished, though (being repented of) it may be pardoned. Master Perkins, in his Book Of the right government of the Tongue, touching upon this point, tells of certain English Souldiers in the time of King Edward the sixth, who were cast upon the French shore by a storm; in which stress they went to prayer, that they might be delivered; but one Souldier, instead of prayer, cryed out, Gallows take thy right, or claim thy due; and when he came home he was hanged indeed. Mr. Fox, in his Book of Acts and Monuments, hath a notable example to this purpose, of one John Peters, Keeper of Newgate, who was wont to at every ordinary thing he spoke (whether it were true or false, it made (with him) no great matter) to averr it with this imprecation, if it be not so, I pray God I may rot before I dye; and so it came to pass. I might give many instances of such imprecations which God hath followed with severest vengeance: I shall add one more which is fresh in the memory of many yet living, of a Gentleman of quality, a Knight, that suffered at the Tower-hill, about the death of Sir Thomas Overbury, who confessed it was just with God that he should undergo that ignominious death; for oft in gaming (said he) I have used this wish, I pray God I be hanged if it be not so. I will conclude this point with a nearer instance, A Woman who accidentally came into the Congregation while this word was preached, did afterwards by writing certifie me, that she being convinced in conscience of her sin in wishing evil upon her self, thereby to cover a sin, which she had committed, but denyed, did feel the sad effects of it according to her wish, begging earnest prayers that it might be forgiven her, and that God would be entreated to take off his hand. Sir Gervaise Ellowayes.

Let those wretches hear and fear, and do no more so presumptuously, who fear not to wish, The Devil take them, and God damn them, lest indeed God let the Devil loose upon them, and take them at their word. And here it may be observed, that such as are most guilty are most apt to imprecate vengeance upon themselves, that they may appear guiltless. They have no way left to perswade others, that they are good, or have not done evil, but by wishing evil to themselves. Such is the stupidity of a misled conscience, that when it is deepest in sin, it dares defie Gods justice to gain an opinion among men, of its own innocency.

O earth, cover not thou my blood.

More particularly, Observe,

Great sins, bloody sins, especially this sin of shedding innocent blood, shall not pass undiscovered.

God will give a tongue to the earth, he will make speechless creatures speak, rather then blood shall be concealed. Blood may be concealed a long time, but blood shall not alwayes be concealed (Gen. 4. 7.) What hast thou done? The voice of thy Brothers Blood cryeth to me from the ground: The blood had no voice, and the ground was silent; blood hath no more voice of its own, then water hath, or then a Fish that lives in the water hath; these did not speak formally: but the Lord speaks thus to shew that he will certainly bring bloody sins, chiefly the sin of blood, to light. The justice of God in all Ages hath sent out his Writ of enquiry after bloody men, and for the blood of the innocent (Psal. 9. 12.) When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembreth them, he forgetteth not the cry of the poor.

But doth not the Lord make inquisition for all sin? Or is there any sin that God doth not enquire after?

Surely

Surely no, there was never any sin committed in the World, but the Lord hath inquired after it; sin shall not be lost, God will find it out, and keep it upon record: But when it is said, God makes inquisition for blood, it argues the greatness of that sin: For while that act of God, which extendeth to every sin, is appropriated to some one particular sin, it is an argument that God takes special notice of it, or that it is a very provoking sin: Though God makes inquisition for all sin, yet as if he would let all other sins pass unsought, and un-enquired after, it is said only of this sin, that he makes inquisition for it. We find not the like expression about any other particular sin in all the Book of God; though it be a truth, that he inquires for all sin.

Thirdly, Observe, Innocency fears no discovery.

Come who will, Angels from Heaven, Devils from Hell, Men on Earth, let all Creatures be summoned into one Jury of grand Inquest, an innocent person will neither run nor hide his head for it: He whose heart bears witness with him, fears no witness that can be brought against him. While Conscience acquits, the matter is not much who accuseth, or condemns: He that is righteous knows that all his sins are covered by the free grace of God in the righteousness of Jesus Christ; and he knows that he hath not covered his sin as Adam by excuses; nor sewed the Fig-leaves of carnal reasonings together, to hide his nakedness; he knows also that he lives not in any known sin, nor hath wickedly departed from the Lord. Now because in all these respects he knows nothing by himself, therefore he cares not who knows him; he calls not for Masks, or Visors, for Curtains, or coverings, to obscure or disguise himself, or his actions under, either from the sight of God or Man, but is willing to stand forth in the open light. For though the best of men may have done some act, which is not fit for the open light, yet considering the whole frame of their hearts and lives towards God, together with what hath past between God and their souls about that act; they are not afraid that the worst act which ever they have done should stand forth in the open light; and as for those crimes which men uncharitably charge upon them, every honest heart speaks boldly the sence of this first part of Job's imprecation, O earth, cover not thou my blood.

From the second branch of Job's imprecation, Let my cry have no place, Observe, Not to have prayer heard and accepted by God, is the greatest misery that can befal man.

God is the last refuge of a distressed soul; and the means by which we make God our refuge, or fly to him for refuge, is believing, and fervent prayer: Prayer is a duty, and yet it is a priviledge; it is a priviledge, not only to receive an answer of prayer, but to put up our requests in prayer; he therefore that asks a stop upon his own prayers, hath at once asked a stop upon all his mercies; he cannot look to be relieved, who tells God he doth not look to be heard; and when prayer hath no place of acceptance in Heaven, we can have no place of contentment on the Earth: Upon this account we may conclude,

That, Man cannot bespeak any thing worse for himself, then not to be heard when he speaks to God.

As it is one of the highest honours done to God, that men make prayers to him; so it is one of the deepest afflictions of man, for God not to hear his prayers: Such was Saul's condition (2 Sam. 28.) God doth not answer me, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by Prophets: He could get no answer from God, his cry had no place: This troubled him more then the invasion of the Philistims. I am sore distressed (saith he) the Philistims make war upon me, and God is departed from me. When trouble comes, and God goes away, man is in a woful estate. We have no promise to receive unless we ask; and though we do ask, we cannot receive, unless our prayer be received: God receives the prayer of man, before man receives any thing from God in prayer. All our treasure lyes in Heaven; our comfort is in Heaven, our protection is in Heaven; and prayer is the messenger which we send to Heaven in the Name of Christ for all things, or, for whatsoever else we need on earth. Now if prayer cannot get in, if God will not hear prayer, if he send back our messenger without audience, what can we receive?

The sinfulness of man appears in nothing more then in this, That he calleth not upon God (Psal. 14. 4.) Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? Who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the Lord: Now as the sin of man appears exceedingly in not calling upon God; so the wrath of God appears exceedingly in not hearing man when he calls (Prov. 1. 20.) Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me. God will pour out wrath upon the Families that call not upon his Name (Jer. 10. 25.) but he pours out most wrath upon those Families whom he hears not, when they call upon his Name. All our mercies are shut out at once, when prayer is shut out: nor shall that person have place or room in Gods heart, whose cry hath no place in his ear.

Holy Job was sensible enough of this, nor durst he have imprecated, that his cry should have no place, but that (being conscious of no evil) he was assured that his cry had place; and therefore as in the sincerity of his soul he made that imprecation; so in the confidence of his soul, he proceeds to make his Appeal to God in the next words.

Verse 19. Also now, behold my witness is in Heaven, and my record is on high.

As if he had said, I fear no evidence that can be brought against me on earth, and I rejoyce in the witness I have in Heaven: though I have none to testifie for me here, yet I have one that will testifie for me above: My witness is in Heaven, and my record is on high.

Some conceive, that as Job had spoken to the earth before, so now he speaks to Heaven, O earth, cover not my blood: O Heaven, witness for me. But he saith not, my witness is Heaven, but my witness is in Heaven; nor doth he call the Heavens to witness for him; but he calls him who is in Heaven to witness, and that is God.

Utitur testificatione cœli postquam terræ testimonium produxit. Eugub.

There are two branches of this Appeal, and they both intend the same thing. My witness is in Heaven, and my record is on high. The words witness and record, are of the same signification; though they differ in the letter: The one is properly an Hebrew word, and the other Syriack: When Jacob and Laban were in that contest (Gen. 31. 47.) Jacob took a Stone, and set up a Pillar for a witness, And Jacob said to his Brethren, Gather stones, and they made an heap, and they did eat there upon the heap, and Laban called it Jegar-sahadatha, that is, a heap of witnesses (as it is in the Margin.) but Jacob called it Galeed, or Gilead: Jacob speaking the pure Hebrew, and Laban the Syriack language, they take in both the words of Job's Appeal, My witness is in Heaven, my record is on high.

Idem bis dicit conscientiæ suæ integræ declarandæ causa. Lav.

מֵיחָד Synonymum est שֵׂד Hieron. in Trad.

Job speaks the same thing twice, to shew how strongly he believed that the Lord would be witness for him, My witness is in Heaven, my record is on high.

Est forma juramenti, quo deũ invocat innocentiæ suæ testem atque conscientiæ spectatorem: Cajet.

Heaven and high are the same, as witness and record are. And when he saith, on high, or in the high place; he useth not the word Bamoth by which those high places are expressed, wherein the false gods were worshipped, or the true God falsely: Job puts that word into his Appeal, which belongs properly to God, and signifies in Scripture, the place of his glorious residence. Job's record was not only on high, but (Bemerumim, the Hebrew is Plural) in the heights: Some translate it in the Superlative, not (in excelsis) on high, but (in altissimis) in the highests: As if he had said, My witness is above all witnesses, and therefore he is a witness above all exception. And Job did well, for his purpose, to say his record was on high; not only because of the dignity of that which is high, but for the advantage which he hath, who is on high, or in the highest, to be a witness. God is said to be a witness in Heaven, or on high, to shew how easily he can observe and take notice of those things which are below: God hath eyes infinitely pure and piercing, he beholds all things, and he beholds them from on high, as from a watch-tower, which renders the object more obvious to the eye: The sight is soon intercepted upon a level: but, The Lord (saith David, Psal. 14. 2.) looked down from Heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand and seek God: If but one had sought God, God had found him out; but the report which he makes upon that survey, tells us, They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy, there is none that doth good, no not one (Ver. 3.)

בְּמְרוֹמִים In excelsis, malim in altissimis, quia excelsa vocantur quæ Ebræis בְּמוֹת in quibus sacrificabant idolis: Cæterum מָרוֹם proprie de Deo usurpatur & de cœlo, de Deo in singulari numero, de cœlo in utroque. Drus. Dicitur Deus testis in excelsis propter locum aptissimũ ad contemplandum tanquã in sublimi speculaquicquid agitur. Pined.

Further

Further he saith, My witness is in Heaven, or on high; implying, that he was such a witness as was able to protect him; a witness who is above all fear, and who needs no favour. Some witnesses are not only men of no state, but of no conscience. Such underlings will be hirelings upon Oath against the truth, and are ready to testifie any thing for hope of gain, or for fear of a frown: My witness (saith Job) is in Heaven, my record is on high; such a witness he is as cannot be corrupted by gifts, such as hath no need of any mans gifts, seeing he gives to all men life and breath, and all things.

Hence Observe, First, That as God is the Judge of all men, so he is their witness.

God is the Judge of all the earth, and God is the witness of all the earth too (Jer. 29. 23.) Because they have committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours Wives, and have spoken lying words in my name, that I have not commanded them; even I know, and am a witness, saith the Lord: He saith not, I know, and am Judge; but I know, and am Witness.

Let no man hope to escape the judgment of God, because there is none to witness against him: for if God hath not the witness of man, if our sin be a secret to all the World, yet God hath alwayes two Witnesses.

First, Our own conscience.

Secondly, Himself.

An earthly Judge must not be a Witness; his duty is to give sentence, not to give evidence; he must determine according to what is alledged, and proved upon testimony given; but he cannot give testimony; he cannot be Judge and Party too: But God is so transcendently Soveraign, that he is both Judge and Party, he pronounceth sentence, and gives in evidence; Christ is called, The faithful, and the true Witness (Rev. 3. 14.) And yet, All judgment is given into his hand (John 5. 22. 27.) God judgeth upon his own knowledge, not upon the knowledge of others, and therefore as there can be no failing in, so no avoiding of his judgment.

Secondly, Observe, It is lawful to appeal to God, or to take God to witness.

An Oath is the calling of God to witness, and whensoever we appeal to God, or call him to witness, it is an Oath. The Apostle Paul took an Oath, when he said (Rom. 1. 9.) God is my witness, whom I serve with my spirit in the Gospel of his Son, that without ceasing I make mention of you in my prayers. Thus in highest holiness he sware that he prayed for the Romans spiritual good, while he was absent from them, and had never so much as seen them; and that he passionately desired to be present with them, and see them, that he might impart unto them some spiritual gift: Because being a meer stranger, he had not yet made his actions a witness of his love to them, and because no man can be an unerring witness of another mans heart, or of the moving of his affections, therefore he calls God to witness, who alone knows the heart, and can tell how much we love either himself, or one another.

He speaks as much (though in another case) to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1. 23.) Moreover I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you, I came not as yet unto Corinth. As if he had said, By this my earnest adjuration, I assure you, that the reason why I have deferred my coming to you, was not from any levity of mind, or change of purpose in me, but only because I was unwilling to use such severity as the distempers among you call for, and would have pressed me unto being present. We find him in the same tenour of speech towards the Philippians (Chap. 1. 8.) For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Christ: That is, I call God to witness, I love you: And again (1 Thes. 2. 5.) Neither at any time used we flattering words, as you know, nor a cloak of covetousness, God is witness: As if he had said, Had I used flattering words, you might witness it; and that I have not used a cloak of covetousness, God is witness. I might have worn a cloak of covetousness so closely, that you could not have seen it, but God could; he can judge through the darkest clouds, and see through the thickest cloaks and coverings; but I appeal to him whether I have put on such a cloak, or no. As Paul by Oath purged himself from covetousness of spirit; so Abraham protested by Oath against all covetous practices (Gen. 14. 22.) I have lifted up mine hand to the most high God, the possessor of Heaven and Earth, that I will not take any thing that is thine. This gesture of lifting up the hand when an Oath is taken, is there put for an Oath it self; by which Abraham appealed to God, as a witness of his sincere intentions in taking up those Armes for the rescue of his Nephew Lot; and that as he had overcome his Enemies, so he had overcome covetousness, which was, of the two, the far more noble victory.

This calling of God to witness is of two sorts.

First, When we are called by others, who have lawful power, to testifie the truth; such is swearing before a Magistrate.

Secondly, When we offer it our selves, for the removal of such jealousies as are cast upon us, and we have no other way left, to free, or vindicate our selves from them.

This latter was the occasion of Job's Oath, as also of those alledged concerning Paul and Abraham: but whether it be an Oath of the one sort, or of the other, both meet in this, that God is appealed to, and called to witness by such as use them: And seeing he is a jealous God, who will not hold them guiltless that take his Name in vain, I shall add some cautions for the bounding and directing of our practice.

First, We may call God to witness in weighty matters; and unless the matter be weighty, either in it self, or in the consequents of it, we may not: God is my Witness, and God is my Judge, are not for common, much less for vain things. There are two things in every Oath or Appeal to God, which shew this.

First, An Oath is for confirmation (Heb. 6. 16.) Vain things are not worthy the mentioning, much less are they worthy the confirming: We ought not to strive at all about them, much less ought we to swear about them, which is an end of all strife.

Secondly, In every Oath or Appeal to God, there is an invocation of the Name of God; but the Name of God must not be taken in vain; which it cannot but be, when it is taken into our mouthes about a vain thing,

Secondly, We may call God to witness when men give a wrong witness of us, or will not give a right witness for us; but if we can have testimony upon earth, we must not go to Heaven for it; God must be our last resort. Job found none on earth to witness for him, and his afflictions were looked upon as sufficient witnesses against him, and therefore he was necessitated to make his address to God.

Thirdly, When the matter is not only such as others will not testifie, when they might, but such as no man can testifie (none being privy to it, but only God and our own souls) then we have a just ground of appeal to God; who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart: Job's sincerity was suspected; and that is such a secret as man hath no access unto, and therefore can give no witness to it: Who is sincere, and who is an hypocrite, is resolved only by the testimony of God, and of our own souls.

Fourthly, We must be sure to call God to witness in truth; Thou shalt swear the Lord liveth in truth, in righteousness, and in judgment (Jer. 4. 2.) Unless we have a witness within us, we must not call God to witness who is above us. God is ready to witness with our Consciences; but woe to those who call God to witness against their Consciences. Holy Paul called God to record upon his soul (2 Cor. 1. 23.) That is, He did as it were (which is also done in every Oath) engage, or pawn his soul and salvation upon it, that he spake the truth: When our souls bear record with us, we may venture to call God to record upon our souls. But some, when they have no witness from their souls, yea, when their souls witness against them, will yet venture to call God to record upon their souls. They will needs be tryed by God, who dare not abide the just tryal of men; such would make God (who cannot lye) witness to a lye: They use the glorious God, as some do a sort of miscreants, called Knights of the Post, who for a Fee, will not only say, but swear what you will. This is highest profanation of the Name of God: For as he that believes not the truth of God, makes him a lyar; so also doth he that appeals to God for the witness of an untruth.

More

More particularly, My witness is in Heaven, my record is on high. Job speaks this, not only because he wanted the witness of men, but because of the high esteem he had of the witness of God.

Hence Observe, The witness of God is the most desireable witness.

The witness we have on earth is nothing worth, unless we have a witness in Heaven: If we have not the inward witness of our own conscience, it is little advantage though we have a thousand outward witnesses: Conscience is more then a thousand witnesses; but God is more then ten thousand Consciences: Therefore never rest in any witnesses, till you have the witness of God. We labour (saith the Apostle (2 Cor. 5.9.) and that word signifies not only an earnest, or an industrious, but an ambitious labour) that whether present, or absent, we may be accepted of him: As if he had said, Possibly we might gain acceptation and applause among men, would we but study to please and apply our selves to them; but the favour of men will not serve our turn, nor can we sit down and rest our selves under their shadow. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, was David's prayer (Psal. 19.14.) David could not bear it, that a word, or a thought of his should miss acceptation with God: It did not satisfie him that his actions were well witnessed unto by men on earth, unless his very thoughts were witnessed to by the Lord in Heaven.

Some, as it is said of those Rulers (John 12. 42.) Love the praise of men more then the praise of God: So long as they have a record here below, they little regard his record who is on high. There is no greater argument of a carnal mind, then this: He that loves the praise or testimony of men as much as he loves the praise or testimony of God, doth indeed love it more: Seeing there is nothing more unequal then an equal partition of our esteem between God and Man. Where our obligation unto two is unequal, we can never be discharged by paying each of them an equal sum. We have cause to bless God when we have witness among men; but the witness of men should be of no price with us in comparison of the witness of God: Not only may we have recourse to the witness of God, when we cannot obtain the witness of men; but we must prefer the single witness of God before a throng of humane witnesses; and when we have enough on earth, yet say with Job, My witness is in Heaven. The witness of the men of this world, or of evil men (while we keep a good conscience) is a mercy. But as the witness of good men is more desireable, then the witness of all other men, and the witness of a good conscience is more desireable then the witness of good men; so the witness of God is more desireable then (without which we cannot have it, and with which we shall have it) the witness of a good conscience.

For as the testimony of God against us, is more terrible then that of our own hearts (1 John 3.20.) If our heart condemn us, God is greater then our hearts, and knoweth all things; and therefore knoweth more evil by us, and every evil more then our own hearts do; so the testimony of God for us is more comfortable, then that of our own hearts. If our hearts acquit us, God is greater then our hearts, and knowing all things; he knoweth more good by us, and every good more then our own hearts do. Who can express or tell how pleasant it is to receive this testimony from God, that we please God? Behold (saith David Psal. 133. 1.) how good and pleasant a thing it is for Brethren to dwell together in unity: But O how good and pleasant a thing it is for God and man to dwell together in unity; for man to be alwayes giving witness to God, that he is good and gracious, and for God to be alwayes giving witness to man, that he is upright and righteous. When Conscience speaks us fair, we have peace, and a continual feast; but when God speaks us fair, and gives us an euge from Heaven, Well done good and faithful Servants, we have peace which passeth all understanding, and not only a joyful feast, but a feast of joyes which are unspeakable, and full of glory. Yea, when we are at the fullest tables of this world, this is the sauce in our dish, and the sugar in our cup: Go thy way (saith the Preacher, Eccles. 9. 7.) eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; (Why? what's the matter now?) For now God accepteth thy works. Thou hast a witness in Heaven.

A wicked man will sometimes appeal, and put his cause to God out of presumption, and impudence: but a good man appeals to God in faith, and holy confidence.

As it is an act of grace or favour in God to receive an appeal from man; so it is an act not only of grace, but of courage in man, to make an appeal to God. It is an act of grace, as it is part of the worship of God; but it is an act of courage, or as I may call it, a daring work, as it is a putting our selves under the justice of God, yea, an implicit imprecating of the vengeance of God, in case we speak untrue: Thus to appeal, or swear, is a daring work, and such as no man durst do (if he knew what he did) but in a good cause. It is a fearful thing thus to fall into the hands of the living God. Some have ventured upon false Oaths and Appeals to God, only for fear of men: Such say commonly, They had rather trust God with their souls (by swearing falsly) then man with their estates, lives, or liberties, by confessing the truth. Which is not only as if a man should flee from a Lyon, and a Bear should meet him; but infinitely more then if a man for fear of the biting of a Whippet, or of the stinging of a Bee, should willingly offer himself to the mouth of a Lyon, and to the sting of a Serpent. To swear is not only to set our naked breasts before the Cannons mouth, but with our own mouths to give fire to it, if we utter falshood.

Fourthly, Observe, It is the joy and comfort of an upright heart, that there is a God in Heaven who knows his heart, and bears witness of all his wayes.

It is the terror of wicked men to think that there is a witness in Heaven, and a record on high. Hypocrites may pretend they rejoyce, that God is their witness, but its only a joy of the tongue, and from the teeth outwards, or to serve their turn; but an upright heart rejoyceth indeed at this, he riseth every morning, and walks all the day long, and at night lyes down and rests upon this thought, God is my record, God is my witness, he hath searched me, and known me, he knoweth my down-sitting and my up-rising, he understands my thoughts afar off, he compasseth my path, and my lying down, and is acquainted with all my wayes. In the midst of all the clamours, misapprehensions, and mis-judgings of men, it is an abundant refreshing and consolation to the Saints, that there sits one in Heaven, who as he knows them fully, so he judgeth all men rightly, and will render to every man according to his works.

Lastly, Consider the place into which Job's faith ascended while he speaks of God. My witness is in Heaven, my record is on high. Who is in Heaven? Who is on high? You may know whom he means when he saith, He that is in Heaven, he that is on high, though his name be not expresst. There are Angels in Heaven, but they are nothing compared to God; there are the souls of just men departed, and made perfect, in Heaven, but they are nothing compared to God: There's no name in Heaven but God; God is all in all in Heaven; and he should take up all our hearts and thoughts while we are on Earth, especially when we discourse of Heaven.

Hence Observe, Though God be every where, yet he is especially in Heaven.

God is upon the Earth, yea, God is in Hell, If I make my Bed in Hell thou art there (Psal. 139. 8.) Yet when Job acts faith upon God, he saith not, I have a witness on Earth, but my witness is in Heaven (Psal. 2.4.) He that sitteth in Heaven shall laugh, the Lord shall have them in derision. God doth not sit as circumscribed in Heaven; but there the Scripture describes him sitting (Psal. 123.1.) Unto thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the Heavens. Christ teacheth us to pray (Matth. 6.) Our Father which art in Heaven; and when he himself prayed, He lift up his eyes to Heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come, glorifie thy Son, &c. (John 17. 1.) Jesus Christ speaks to God as in that place, and he speaks of Heaven as of a place, as of a special and distinct place, to which he lifted up his eyes, when he prayed to his Father.

There is a new Divinity, which tells us, that Heaven is every place, and every place is Heaven: But why did Chriſt aſcend? Why was he carryed up (Luke 24. 51.) when he went to Heaven? If Heaven be every where, there's no need of aſcending to get into Heaven; and we may as properly deſcend into Heaven as aſcend up to Heaven, if Heaven be every where.

Non in Cœlo Brentii, quod nuſquam eſt. Vit. P. Mar.

Peter Martyr lying upon his death-bed, and having many Friends about him, diſcourſed ſweetly of Heaven and heavenly things: Bullinger ſtanding by, alledged that of the Apoſtle (Phil. 3. 20.) Our converſation is in Heaven: True, ſaid the ſick man, it is in Heaven, but not in the Heaven of Brentius, which is no where. He that makes Heaven every where, makes it no where: Though God be in all places, and whereſoever God is, Heaven is; yet there is more in Heaven, then is common to all places. That's Heaven properly, where the glory of God ſhines moſt, and where there is the ſpecial revealings of his honour and power; therefore it is called, The habitation of his holineſs, and of his glory (Iſa. 63. 15.) Heaven is (as we may ſpeak) the place of Gods glorious reſidence: This Heaven is not every where, for though God be every where, yet he doth not manifeſt himſelf equally every where. God hath built Heaven (as that great Monarch, Dan. 4. 3.) ſpake boaſtingly of Babylon, For the houſe of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majeſty. A meer Naturaliſt hath told us, That this principle is ſtampt upon the nature of man, that God hath his dwelling place on high, or in Heaven. Heaven is ſo proper to God, that God is often (by a Metonimy) called Heaven in the holy Scriptures. Thy Kingdom (ſaith Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 4. 26. ſhall be ſure unto thee, after that thou ſhalt have known, that the Heavens do rule: That is, When thou ſhalt be humbled and brought to this acknowledgment, that the God whoſe Throne and dwelling place is in Heaven, ſits alſo upon all earthly Thrones, and is King in all the Kingdoms of Men. Chriſt puts the Queſtion to the Jews (Matth. 21. 25.) The baptiſm of John, whence was it, from Heaven, or of Men? That is, Was it from God, or from Men? Was it a humane invention, or a divine inſtitution? The prodigal Son cryes out, Father, I have ſinned againſt Heaven, and in thy ſight: That is, Both againſt my earthly and heavenly Father. Some, becauſe theſe and the like Scriptures call God Heaven; and becauſe it is ſaid after the reſurrection (when all the Saints ſhall be gathered into Heaven) That God ſhall be all in all; upon theſe miſtakes, I ſay, they have run into that groſs error, That Heaven is God. But when the Scripture calls Heaven the habitation of God, the Throne of God, the City of God, the building of God, an houſe not made with hands; it cannot be but a perverting of Scripture, and a throwing up of Reaſon, to call it God, or to ſay that God and Heaven are the ſame. Nor doth it at all follow, that God is Heaven, becauſe God ſhall be all in all to us in Heaven. Paul was not teaching the Corinthians there what Heaven is, but wherein the happineſs of the Saints ſhall conſiſt, when they ſhall all be called up to Heaven, after the general reſurrection from the dead: Then Chriſt ſhall reſign up his Kingdom (as Mediator) to his Father, then God ſhall be all in all: In All, that is, There will be no more need of a Mediator between God and Man; there will be no more need of Preaching, nor of making Prayers, nor of uſing Seals. All the glaſſes through which we ſaw God, and the outward Ordinances, in which we enjoyed God in this life, ſhall be laid aſide, when we ſee him face to face; and then God will be King, and Teacher, light and life, glory and happineſs, to his Saints, immediately, and for ever.

Quaſi à natura inſtam ſuiſſe opinionem Deum in Cœlo habitare aſſerit Ariſtoteles. lib. 1. de Anima, cap. 3.

'Tis granted, That Heaven is nothing to us without God, yet God is ſomething, yea, he is infinitely more then Heaven. Solomon beſpeaks God thus in his prayer at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings 8. 27.) Behold the Heaven, and the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain thee; how much leſs this houſe that I have builded: If Heaven, even the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain God, then, it is not God. That which doth contain a thing, is not the thing contained; much leſs is that which cannot contain a thing, the thing which it cannot contain.

Again, that which Job calls Heaven in one part of the Verſe, he calls high in the other, My witneſs is in Heaven, my record is on high. God dwells in the high and holy place (Iſai. 57. 15.) And Chriſt, after he had finiſhed the work of mans redemption, is ſaid, To ſit down on the right hand of the Majeſty on high (Heb. 1. 3.) This high place is the higheſt place; all that we call Heaven is high; but all that we call Heaven is not alike high. Heaven is a building of three Stories. The Air is called Heaven: The Fowls of the Air are ſaid to fly above the Earth in the Firmament of Heaven (Gen. 1. 20.) The Clouds are called Heaven (Lev. 2. 19.) I will make your Heaven as Iron, and your Earth as Braſs: That is, I will make the Clouds, which are ſoft like Spunges, hard like Iron, they ſhall not yield a drop of water, to refreſh the wearied Earth.

The ſecond Story is the Starry Heaven, where the Sun and Moon move, and where thoſe other glorious Lights are ſet like golden ſtuds to adorn, comfort, and direct the World. His going forth is from the end of Heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it (Pſal. 19. 6.)

The third is called, The habitation of God, the Heaven of Heavens, the third Heaven, the higheſt Heaven. The Apoſtle ſaith of Chriſt, that He aſcended far above all Heavens (Epheſ. 4. 10.) And yet he then aſcended into Heaven; the meaning is, Chriſt aſcended above all the viſible Heavens, into that, which is inviſible to us who are on earth. This Heaven. Job pointed at while he ſaid, My record is on high. Take four deductions from it.

Firſt, If Heaven be higheſt, then there is nothing but ſerenity in Heaven. The higheſt places in a civil ſence, are full of ſtorms, and ſo are high places in a natural ſence; but the higheſt places in nature are free from clouds, ſtorms, and vapours. Naturaliſts tell us of Olympus, a very high Mountain, lifting up its head beyond the middle Region, whither no breath of wind ever comes: You may draw Letters and Figures in the Sand, and come many years after, and find them no more ſtirred, then if they had been written in Marble; and if the higheſt places in nature are alwayes ſerene, how ſerene is the high place of glory? When you are once in Heaven, you are beyond, not only proper, but figurative ſtorms and winds for ever.

Secondly, Heaven is high, therefore it is a pure place. Every thing in nature, the more high it is, the more pure it is. Earth is the loweſt, and the groſſeſt of the Elements; the Water next to that, is more groſs then the Air; the Air is more groſs then the Fire, which Philoſophers call the higheſt of the Elements: The higher we go, the more purity we find; and when we are (in altiſſimis) at the higheſt, there is nothing but purity, perfect purity; there is not the leaſt mixture of droſs, nor the leaſt ſpot of dirt in Heaven: Heaven is all pure, and none ſhall come thither but ſuch as are pure. Pure perſons are fit for a pure place, and only they are fit: No unclean thing ſhall enter there; and he that hath this hope (of entring there) purifies himſelf, not only as Heaven is pure, but as God is pure, in whoſe ſight Heaven it ſelf is impure (Chap. 15. 15.)

Thirdly, Heaven is high, Then Heaven is a ſafe place. High places are ſecure places; the high places of the earth are ſo accounted; and when God promiſes ſafety to his people, he tells them they ſhall dwell on high, while they are here below. (Iſa. 33. 16.) He ſhall dwell on high, his place of defence ſhall be the munition of rocks; and I will cauſe thee to ride upon the high places of the earth (Iſa. 58. 14.) When thoſe builders of the Tower of Babel thought to make themſelves ſafe, they ſaid, Let us build a Tower, whoſe top may reach to Heaven: If there ſhould come another flood, they hoped to be dry, and to get above the danger. Once in Heaven, and we are out of Gun-ſhot; not only beyond the reach of man, but of Devils too: They who are got into that high place, ſhall neither feel, nor fear the Deſtroyer any more.

Fourthly, Heaven is a high place, then it is a large and capacious place: As a Spherical, or round Figure, is the moſt capacious, ſo the utmoſt round of that Figure is the moſt capacious round; in Heaven there is room enough; though we are crouded here, yet there we ſhall not. We may call Heaven (as Iſaac did the Well, about which there was no contention between his Herdmen, and the Herdmen of Gerar) Rehoboth, room (Gen. 26. 22.) In Heaven we ſhall not contend for room; Chriſt aſſures us, that in his Fathers Houſe are many Manſions (John 14. 2.) He had ſaid before to his Diſciples (Chap. 13. 33.) Whither I go ye cannot come: And when Peter, troubled at this speech, put the Question (Vers. 36.) Lord, whither goest thou? Jesus answered him, Whither I go thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterwards. Christ perceived his Disciples more plunged in their spirits with this answer and promise to Peter; and therefore adds a prohibition of their fears, at the beginning of this Chapter, Let not your hearts be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me: in my Fathers house are many mansions: As if he had said, Do not think that I told you, ye cannot follow me now, and that Peter shall follow me afterwards, as if the place I go to were only large enough for me and Peter; for believe me, there are many mansions; I tell you not how many, neither can they be told, but there are enough, not only for my self and Peter, but for you all; yea, for all those, who either have, or shall believe on my Name; if it were not so, I would have told you, I would not delude you with vain hopes, I am well acquainted with all the rooms in my Fathers house: and though when I came into the World for your sakes, there was no room in the Inn for me to be born in, but a Stable among Beasts, yet I will take care that when you come to my Fathers house, you shall not be straitened for Quarters, I who am your Redeemer, will also be your Harbinger, I go to prepare a place for you, and I am certain my Fathers house will hold all his houshold.

Tophet is prepared of old, it is deep and large (Isa. 30. 33.) Hell is large enough for a Prison; there's room for all the Children of disobedience to lye bound for ever: But Heaven is large, as a Pallace, or as a Paradise; there's room enough for all the Heirs of promise, to walk at liberty for ever.

VERS. 20, 21, 22.

My Friends scorn me; but mine eye poureth out tears unto God.
O that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his neighbour.
When a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return.

JOB having strongly asserted his own integrity, at the seventeenth Verse of this Chapter; and thereupon as strongly imprecated the heaviest vengeance upon his own head, in case he had not spoken truth (Vers. 18.) Having also made his appeal to Heaven, calling God to witness, that it was truth which he had spoken (Vers. 19.) Here at the twentieth Verse, he gives us a reason why he made that appeal; and the reason was, he found no comfort in the creature, he had no hope of help on earth, and therefore he resorts to Heaven.

Verse 20. My Friends scorn me; but mine eye poureth out tears to God.

There is some variety in the translation, but the sence of all meets in one, My Friends scorn me; or, Scorners are my Friends: The word signifies to deride, or scorn, not in a rude homely way, but to do it with quaintness of speech, or in refined language, to do it wittily, and cunningly, close and home. Hence the word signifies a Rhetorician, or an Orator, and is so translated here, by divers of the Learned, My Friends play the Rhetoricians, they speak eloquently, they compose fine orations, and set speeches against me; but alas! I only speak tears.

Yet further, it signifies to interpret (Gen. 42. 23.) Joseph spake unto his Brethren by an Interpreter, it is this word. That's the interlineal reading of this Text, My Friends are Interpreters, or rather (for that must be the meaning) Misinterpreters; they put wrong expositions upon all my speeches, and corrupt my Text with their unfriendly glosses.

We read in the ordinary acception of the word, My Friends scorn me; or, My Friends are scorners: As if Job had said, These my Friends, whose profession and relation call them to administer serious and wholesome counsel to my troubled mind, even they break forth into scorn; they pour the vinegar of their sharpest censures into my already rankled wounds, instead of the suppling, skinning Oyl of comfort and consolation; and therefore mine eye is pressed to pour out tears to God: Who can forbear weeping, while he is but reporting my sufferings? How then should I who suffer? My Friends scorn me, &c.

Hence Observe, The best of Friends may prove unfriendly.

Men are but men, and so they act: There is no repose, either upon the wisdom, or strength, or affection of the creature, they are all mutable, and may do that which is most opposite, both to their profession and relation: A Friend, a Scorner! What more unsutable? And that may be a second Note.

Scorn is wholly opposite to the Law of Love.

He departs far enough from the rules of friendship, who doth not pity and assist his afflicted Friend: How far is he gone from it, who scorns and derides his Friend in affliction?

Thirdly, Considering the Person who was thus scorned; Job, a man beloved of God, the great Favourite of that Age to the King of Heaven,

Hence Observe, They who are highly approved and honoured of God, may fall under the contempt and scorn of men.

As they who are applauded and flattered, yea, adored by men, may be the scorn and contempt of God. What Christ speaks of things is true of persons (Luke 16. 15.) That which is highly esteemed amongst men, is abomination in the sight of God: So they who are highly esteemed of God are often an abomination to men. God seeth not as man seeth, no not as good men see; God and good men are not alwayes of an opinion, either about things or persons; and as the worst of men find some to flatter and applaud them, so the best of men find some to undervalue and deride them, and they sometimes find good men doing so. There is no judging either of men or of matters, by what is said of them: In this sence all men are, or may be lyars, carrying a false report in their mouths: Should we judge concludingly of men by the opinion of man, how base and contemptible would many precious souls appear to us? And how precious would many appear to us, who are only worthy to be contemned? Christ gives the rule (John 7. 24.) Judge not according to appearance (or by the face) but judge righteous judgment: We must not judge either of things or persons, till they appear, nor may we judge of them by appearances, especially not by those appearances which the tongues of men put upon them. The Greek, in that Text of John, saith, Judge not according to the face: For though the face in its natural frame be the Index or discovery of the mind; yet as a man may artificially set his face to a look altogether unlike his mind; so others may set a face upon the wayes and actions of a man altogether unlike both the man and his actions. He that had judged Job by the face, which God had put upon his outward condition, or by that which Satan and his Friends put upon his wayes and actions, must have judged him either an Hypocrite, serving God only to serve his own turn; or else prophane, casting off the service of God. All the morally illfavoured faces in the World are of one of these two features or complexions; the opinions that went abroad of Job made him appear like both, and yet he was a man most beautiful in the eye of God; a man that had received the fairest Letters commendatory under Gods own hand, that ever man had to that day, My Friends scorn me: What then?

But mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

As before he had appealed to God; so now his eye poureth out tears unto God.

The Hebrew is, Mine eye poureth out: The word signifies to flow forth like water, and to wast in flowing forth; his eyes were as a Fountain, which flows continually, yet retains a perpetual stock of water; but his strength abated, and his spirits issued with those waters. Mine eye poureth out; we add the word Tears, because tears are the only eye-waters, or all the waters which flow from the eye, Mine eye poureth out tears.

The word signifieth sometimes only to drop, either as a Limbeck drops down the water which is raised up by the heat into fumes, or as the Eaves of a house drop in a time of rain; so mine eye distilleth or droppeth tears. Job had a heat within him which might well cause those distillations, and and showers without him, which might well cause those droppings.

This distilling, dropping, or pouring out of tears, was the pouring out of his sorrows, and there was more in it then silent sorrow; there was a voice in his sorrows, or a voice of mourning was mingled with his weeping; yea, this word implyes speaking, in many places of the old Testament, where to drop is to Prophesie, and Prophecying is a vocal act (Micah 2.6.) Prophesie ye not, say they to them that prophesie; the word is, Drop not: Both are expressed (Amos 7.16.) Prophesie not against Israel, and drop not thy word against the house of Isaac. So (Ezek. 21.2.) Drop thy words towards the holy places, and prophesie against the Land of Israel. And the reason of it is, because words fall into the ear of the hearers, as drops of rain upon the dry and thirsty ground, both to soften and make fruitful. Job's tears preacht; the dropping of his eye was a kind of prophecying: Tears are not words formally, but they are virtually. Weeping is inarticulate speaking: And though God (by reason of his infinite and unchangeable happiness) never spake that language, yet he understands it fully. There are (saith the Apostle, arguing against speaking in an unknown tongue) it may be, so many kinds of voices in the World, and none of them are without signification (1 Cor. 14.10.) The voice of tears is very significant, yet God only knows the special signification of it; man knows only the general, that it signifies sorrow. Possibly words went with Job's tears; but if not, yet his tears had the force of words: Weeping speaks, though the weeper speak not: Mine eye poureth out (or speaketh) tears.

Phrasi Hebraica stillare sæpe pro loqui sumitur.

There are seven or eight sorts of tears spoken of in Scripture, and every one speaks.

First, Tears of worldly sorrow. Esau had enough of them; he found store of tears when he lost the blessing: He for one morsel of meat sold his birthright, but he could not purchase it again with floods of sorrow, For he found no place of repentance; that is, he could not prevail with his Father Isaac to change his mind, though he sought it carefully with tears (Heb. 12.17.) Esau's tears spake his hunger after that which he had sold to buy off hunger, or to pay a debt to Nature.

Secondly, There are the tears of repentance and godly sorrow; such were those of Mary (Luke 7.83.) who wept, and washed Christ's feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head: She had been a sinner, such a sinner as bore away the name from all the sinners in the City; and she mourned so for sin, that she bare away the name from all the mourners in the City: Mary's tears spake her tender respect to Christ who saveth sinners, and her abhorrence of her self for sin.

Thirdly, There are tears of craft and wicked dissimulation (Jer. 41.6.) Ishmael goes forth to meet the men that came towards Jerusalem, weeping all along as he went: his were made tears; he shed tears that he might shed blood, and weep himself into an opportunity of doing mischief unsuspected. Ishmael's tears spake treachery, but because those plain-hearted men could not interpret them, they perished.

Fourthly, There are tears of love unfeigned and strong affection: Thus David and Jonathan kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded (1 *Sam.*20.41.) When Jesus Christ wept at the Sepulcher of Lazarus, The Jews said, Behold how he loved him (John 11. 35,36.) They saw his heart at his eyes: These tears spake mutual and real endearments.

Fifthly, There are the tears of holy prayers, and fervent desires. Jacob wept and made supplication (Hos. 12. 4.) He cryed and prayed: The voice of his tears was lowder then the voice of his supplication; and his prayers were (in this sence) even drowned in tears: Jacob's tears spake the fervency of his spirit, and his faith in prayer: The Angel understood them so, and he prevailed.

Sixthly, There are tears of compassion for the miseries of others. Weep with them that weep, is the Apostles rule (Rom. 12.15.) When Nehemiah heard the report of Jerusalems ruine, and of the sad condition of his Brethren there, He sate down and wept (Nehem. 1.4.) His tears spake pity to his Country-men, and zeal for God.

Seventhly, There are the tears of passion, in reference to our own afflictions: Such tears speak humane frailty, or the common infirmity of the flesh.

Eighthly, There are the tears of damnation: Hypocrites and their associates in Hell are described, Weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth for evermore: Their tears speak despair, or misery without hope of remedy.

The tears which Job poured forth, were of the seventh sort, tears of passion, or sorrow, caused by the afflicting hand of God, but especially by the unkindnesses of his Friends; My Friends scorn me, but mine eye poureth out tears unto God. Job knew that as God had a Book for his prayers, so a Bottle for his tears; yea, he knew tears should be heard as well as prayers. Tears are powerful Orators: God reads our hearts in those lines which tears draw on our faces. One of the Ancient Philosophers hath adjudged weeping unworthy a man, and tells us it is only for Women and Children to weep: But as there are tears of effeminate and childish pusillanimity, so there are tears of heroical and holy importunity. To weep for fear of sufferings from man, is indeed below man; but to weep to God when we suffer, either under the hand of God or man, doth well become the best of men; not to weep to God, when we either suffer, or have sinned, proceeds not from courage, but from sullenness, and is not the argument of a noble spirit, but of a hard heart. Who so couragious as David? who feared not a Lyon, nor a Bear, who would not be afraid though an Hoast of men encamped against him, and though he walked in the valley of the shadow of death; yet how often do we read him weeping and crying to God (Psal. 39.12.) Hold not thy peace (saith he) at my tears: David in that case could not hold his peace from crying to God, and he was perswaded that God would not hold his peace at his cry; he expected to have his tears answered: He did not say, Hold not thy peace at my words, or at my prayer, but as importing that his very tears had a voice and language in them, he desired that they might be answered. David did not weep for fear of men, but in faith to God. And so did Job: Mine eye poureth out tears unto God: God was the object of his tears, as much as of his prayers. God is above, and yet our tears fall into his bosom: These waters ascend; this rain doth not fall but rise; these showers do not come from the Clouds, but they pierce the Clouds. As the heat of the Sun draws the water upward, so doth the heat of Gods love. Some of the Ancients use strange Hyperbolies about the power and motion of tears, I will not stay upon them, we may say too much of them; but thus much we may safely say, that from a heart rightly affected, and touched with the sense, either of sin, or suffering, they have much weight in them, and are pressing upon God: Mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

Lachryma à viris claris auferendæ sunt, mulieribus autem relinquendæ. Plat. de rep. Dial. 3.

From the connexion of this latter part of the Verse with the former,

Observe, When we are scorned by men, it is good for us to mourn to God.

My Friends scorn me, now I weep and pray: It is best for us to apply our selves to God when we live in the embraces of men; when all men speak well of us, and applaud us, what is all this, if we have not the good word and the good will of God? Unless we have an applause in Heaven, it will do us no good to have the true applause, much less the flatteries of men on Earth. Suppose they speak right, and give us but our due, yet we must not rest in that, but go to God. The good word of God is better to us infinitely, then the best word of the best men; to him let us have recourse when we have the greatest favour, and fairest Quarter in the World: but when the World scorns and rejects us, then is a special season for us to hasten into the presence of God; we should live neareſt and closest to God, when men cast us off, or throw us out of their societies and affections.

There is a twofold recourse to God; whereof the first is from choice, the second from necessity. It is best to make our recourse to God upon choice; but he will not refuse us if necessity drive us to him: God is most worthy to be our choice, but he is willing to be our refuge; yet he is indeed a refuge to those only in evil times, who have made him their choice in the best times. When all goes well with us in the World, we should not think our selves well till we enjoy God: It is good for me to draw near to God, ſaith David (Pſal. 73. 28.) It is good for me to do it in good times, in the beſt times, this I make my election: And when David ſaith, It is good; he means, it is beſt; that poſitive bears the ſence of a Superlative; and therefore he had ſaid a little before (Verſ. 25.) Whom have I in Heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that I deſire beſides thee: But in an evil time, God is both the choice and the refuge of his people. He is our refuge properly to whom we come when others caſt us off; and he is our choice to whom we come, when others call for us, and ſeem ambitious to be kind unto us. It is not thank-worthy to make God barely a refuge, to come to him becauſe we can go no where elſe; we ſhould think our ſelves no where till we are in his preſence, whereſoever we are; and that we have nothing till we have him, whatſoever we have. Not to prefer the leaſt of God before all the World, is not only uningenuous in us, but ſinful againſt, and diſhonourable unto God. Job, who here wept to God in his low eſtate, had often rejoyced in God in his beſt eſtate, and preferred him before his chiefeſt joy: They may confidently weep to God in ſad times, who have delighted themſelves with God in comfortable times.

Secondly, Obſerve, Liberty of addreſs to God, when men ſcorn and reject us, is the great priviledge of the Saints.

Every man cannot do this: Can the men of the world pour out tears to God when they are ſcorned by the world? Can they pour out prayers to God, when they are ill intreated by the world? Can they go into the imbraces of God, when they are caſt out by men? They cannot. They can vex themſelves, when they are vexed by others, and perhaps vex thoſe that vex them; they can be angry when they are ſcorned, and perhaps ſcorn their ſcorners; but how to ſpread their condition before God, or to pour out tears to him, they know not: They who can do thus are honoured by God, when ſcorned by men, and God will pour out comforts into their boſomes who can pour their tears into his; they can never be at any loſs, who find out God to weep to.

Job having thus given the reaſon of his appeal to Heaven, enforceth it farther with a ſtrong wiſh, according to our tranſlation, which is alſo confirmed by the concurring vote of divers other tranſlations.

Verſe 21. O that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his Neighbour.

ויוכח לגבר Utinam diſputare poſſet vir cum deo & filius hominis ſodali ſuo. Pagn. Optat ex æquari hæc duo, hominis cum Deo, & hominis cum homine diſceptationem. Mere. Certè hic aliquid ſubauditur ut, & quis det viro, vel ut faciat ac concedat Deus ſc. hoc viro. Merc.

The ſum of his deſire may be drawn up into this Brief, That he might argue his caſe as freely with God, as men of the ſame rank and degree argue out their caſes with one another. Some expound it as a correction of his boldneſs in appealing to God. As if he had ſaid, I have indeed called God to witneſs: But what am I, or what is my Fathers houſe, that God ſhould deſcend to my concernments? The infinite diſtance which is between the Creator and the creature ſeems to forbid and check my motion, bidding me keep within my own line, or ſphere, and meddle with my equals; But O that I might ſpeak with God, as man with man, or man for man, I doubt not but I ſhould carry the day, and prove my ſelf innocent: not that Job intended a controverſie with God, or would ſtand upon his defence with the moſt High.

Utinam mihi concederetur cauſam meam adverſum vos apud Dei Tribunal diſceptare ſicut agere homines cũ hominibus conſueverũt. Bez.

I have before ſhewed how far this was from the temper of his broken ſpirit. All that he intends by the propoſal of this deſire, is the gaining of an opportunity to ſet himſelf right in the opinion of men, by that impartial deciſion of his cauſe, which he was well aſſured God would give upon the whole matter in queſtion between him and his Friends, if once he would be pleaſed to vouchſafe him a free and familiar hearing of it. As if he had further ſaid, I have not appealed to Heaven, becauſe I am unwilling to have my condition known on earth, that men ſhould ſee the worſt of me; for my deſire is, that I might plead before God, as a man for his Neighbour, and that I might be laid open in open Court, by the evidence of witneſſes, and a full examination of my cauſe. Taking theſe explications of the Text, in the form of a wiſh, the ſcope of it ſeems to be the ſame with what he ſpake before (Chap. 9. 33, 34, 35.) God is not a man as I am, that I ſhould anſwer him, and we ſhould come together in judgment, neither is there any Dayes-man betwixt us, &c. In which words, as in theſe before us, while Job lifts up the Majeſty of God, and humbleth himſelf, as unworthy to have to do with God, yet he diſcovers the vehement longings of his ſoul to receive a judgment or determination from God in this ſuit or controverſie, which had depended ſo long between him and his Friends.

The Obſervations which ariſe from this reading and ſence of the Text, are of the ſame ſtrain with thoſe formerly given upon that, and ſome other paſſages, where Job knowing his own uprightneſs and integrity, declares not only willingneſs, but extream earneſtneſs, to have his cauſe tryed at the Bar, and before the Tribunal of God, who both ſaw his wayes, and ſearched his heart; who as he had juſtified him from all guilt in reference to himſelf, by not imputing ſin unto him, ſo he would juſtifie him againſt the ſins, which men imputed to him, by ſaying he was not at all guilty.

Theſe points having been more then once hinted already, I ſhall not inſiſt upon them here.

Secondly, The words are rendred as noting the deſign which Job had in pouring out tears to God, and then the connection between this and the former verſe ſtands thus, I pour out tears to God, that he would be pleaſed to plead the cauſe of a man with God, as the Son of man pleads the cauſe of his friend. Mr. Broughton joyns fully with this, Unto the puiſſant doth mine eye drop, that he would decide the cauſe for earthly-wight before the puiſſant, as the Son of Adam doth with his Neighbour.

Apud Deum ſtillat oculus meus ut diſceptet cauſam viri cum deo, ſicut filius hominis cauſam amici ſui. Jun.

Our tranſlation carries the ſence of a wiſh; that a man might have liberty to plead with God, as man with man; this carries the ſence of a wiſh, that God would plead the cauſe of a man with God, as a man pleads the cauſe of his friend; which is indeed to deſire God to be his Advocate. How God is an Advocate with God, will appear further in the proſecution of the Text.

Ad Deum ſtillat oculus meus ut judicet viro cum Deo, & filium hominis reſpectu proximi ſui. Coc.

A third reading keeps to this dependance upon the former Verſe, and to the ſame ſcope of this, yet varies the tranſlation, Thus, Mine eye poureth out tears to God, that he would judge for a man with God (and that he would judge) the Son of man in reſpect of his Neighbour.

The firſt reading makes the latter branch of the words a deſcription of the manner how Job deſired to plead with God even as man doth with man. The ſecond makes it a deſcription of the manner how Job deſired God to plead the cauſe of man with God, even as man pleads with man. This third makes it a ſecond diſtinct deſire, and the whole Verſe to conſiſt of two diſtinct deſires.

Firſt, That God would judge for a man with God.

Secondly, That God would judge the Son of man in reſpect of his Neighbour.

In the former he petitions for mercy with God; in the latter for right againſt man; or in the former he ſues for a judgment of acceptation for himſelf, and in the latter for a judgment of reproof and redargution upon his Friends.

This difference is grounded upon the different conſtruction of the words in the Original. For the word which is rendred to plead or judge, is conſtrued with, or governs (as Grammarians ſpeak) the Dative caſe in the firſt, and the Accuſative caſe in the latter clauſe of the Verſe.

Hence the former is rendred,

That he would judge or plead for a man with God, which notes favour, and a benign defence or patronage of his cauſe with God; ſo this is uſed by the Prophet (Iſa. 11. 4.) He ſhall reprove (argue, judge, or plead) with equity for the meek of the earth: That is, He ſhall reprove or plead in favour of the meek, or on their ſide; he ſhall undertake their cauſe, and make their defence for them. And thus at laſt God did judge or plead for Job, giving ſentence in his behalf, and caſting the ſcales on his ſide againſt his Friends, and therefore the latter clauſe is rendred thus,

That he would judge the Son of man in reſpect of his Neighbour: That is, That he would reprehend and reprove him for the wrongs which he hath done to, and for the uncharitable cenſures which he hath laid upon his Neighbour. The meaning of the whole Verſe, according to this tranſlation, may be repreſented and paralleld in that prayer of David (Pſal. 35. 1, 2, 3.) Plead my cauſe, O Lord, with them that ſtrive with me; fight againſt them that fight againſt me, &c. ſay unto my ſoul, I am thy ſalvation. Thus Job, as David, deſires the Lord to ſpeak a word of comfort to him, and to tell his enemies, or his uncomfortable friends, their own.

I shall only leave one Observation upon this Exposition,

When Christ comes graciously to assert the innocency of his own people, he will severely rebuke those who have done them wrong.

Laban had given Jacob hard usage, while he was a Servant in his house; and when he was gone, Laban pursued him with hard thoughts: but God pleaded for Jacob, and rebuked Laban (Gen. 31.42.) The Prophet foretels, That the mountain of the Lords house shall be established in the top of the mountains; that is, he will not only deliver, but advance his oppressed Church, The house of the God of Jacob (Isa. 21. 2, 3.) and when he doth this, He shall judge among the Nations, and shall rebuke many people (Vers. 4.) Some have observed the same difference in these latter words of Isay, which hath been noted in the Text of Job, and render it thus, He shall judge among the Nations; that is, the Heathen Nations, who have vexed his Church, And he shall rebuke or plead (it is the same word in the Grammatical construction, as here in Job) For, (or in the behalf of) many people; that is, for many of his own people, who have been opposed by those Nations; the effect whereof we have in the next words, And they shall beat their swords into plow-shares; that is, God will so judge those Nations, that his people shall not need to stand upon their guard, or learn war any more; because their enemies shall either be turned to them, or be totally overturned. Woe to the Nations, when God stands up for his people; he will certainly ruine Babylon, when he undertakes the controversie, and pleads the cause of Zion. Yea, the day hastens when he will Convince all that are ungodly, of all the hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him (Jude v. 15.) that is, against his people, for his sake.

Fourthly, Besides these three expositions of the Text, I find another which is more literal, and yet more spiritual then any of the three; and it is that which our late learned Annotators have given us, Mine eye pours out tears unto God.

And he will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend. The mind of which translation is this, He, that is, Christ Jesus the Mediator between God and man will plead for a man; that is, for me; he speaks in the third person for modesties sake, though he means himself; he will plead for me (though you plead never so much against me) for me (I say) he will plead with God; that is, with God his Father: The Hebrew word here used for God, is in the singular number, Eloah, not Elohim, and so it is in the close of the former verse, Mine eye poureth out tears to (Eloah) God, and he will plead with God, which more then intimates a distinct personality, or subsistence in the Divine Nature. One, who is, and is called God acting towards another, who is, and is called God, though God be but one, or (unissimus) One-most in nature. Job weeps to God the Son, in assurance that he will plead for him with God the Father, He will plead for a man with God.

And the Son of man; that is, Jesus Christ. whom he called God before, he calls now, The Son of man; this Title is frequently attributed unto Christ in the New Testament (Matth. 8. 20.) The Foxes have holes, &c. but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. So (Mat. 10.23. & 11.19. & 12.8, &c.) Jesus Christ is called the Son of man.

First, To shew the truth of his humane nature, he being lineally descended from David, according to the flesh, and is therefore stiled, The Son of David.

Secondly, To shew the depth of his abasement, Christ humbled, yea, emptied, and nothing'd himself, when Being in the form of God, he was made in the likeness of men (Phil. 2.) when being the Son of God, he submitted to so mean a stile, The Son of man. Ezekiel amongst all the Prophets is oftenest called, Son of man. The reason which some assign is very probable, That God spake to him under that Title, to keep him humble in the midst of his many visions and revelations; for which end, Paul in the same case had A Thorn in the flesh, the Messenger of Satan to buffet him (2 Cor. 12.) And though Jesus Christ needed nothing either to make or keep him humble (he being infinitely beyond the reach of pride) yet he needed much to shew and give proof how humble he was: Nor could there be any greater evidence of it, then this, that he was pleased to be The Son of man. Yet I conceive, Son of man may be here only an Hebraism denoting man, which kind of speaking is also usual among the Greeks. And that Job might speak of Christ under this notion, is clear from that faith which he discovered in the mystery of his incarnation, that great mystery of godliness, God manifested in the flesh, of which he spake so confidently (Chap. 19. 25, 26, 27.) I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, whom I shall see for my self, and mine eyes shall behold, &c. Job believed that he should see this Redeemer with humane eyes, and therefore he did believe, that his Redeemer should have a humane Nature, or be The Son of man. Jesus Christ, was A Son of man, in reference to his participation with us in all things, which concern created Nature: And he was The Son of man, by way of Eminency in reference to his freedom from any participation with us in corrupted nature, otherwise then in the penal effects of that corruption, as the Apostle states it (Heb. 2. 17. chap. 4. 15.) In all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, and he was tempted in all points, like as we are, yet without sin. He that is in all things like man, except sin, is rightly called, The Son of man; for sin is not at all the form, but all the deformity of man: Hence Job's faith prophesied, The Son of man will plead

For his friend. The word in the Hebrew comes from a root, which signifies to feed either our selves or others, because friends use often to feed together, and sometimes one friend feeds or provides, and offers food to another. It is taken sometimes largely for a Neighbor, and not seldom strictly for a special friend (Deut. 13. 6.) If thy friend who is as thine own soul entice thee, &c. that is, if the nearest friend that thou hast in the world entice thee, &c. In this strict sence the word is to be taken here; Job was not one of Christs friends at large, he was a special Bosom-friend, Job was not (according to the known use of that word among us) A friend of Christ extraordinary, but he was Christs friend in ordinary, a man who dayly convers'd with Christ, and Christ with him; a man who daily performed Offices of dutiful love to Christ, and a man to whom Christ daily performed the Offices of bountiful and merciful love. Hence his holy assurance that Christ would perform that office of mercy for him, The Son of man will plead for his friend.

The words thus opened are (as I may say) An Epitome of the Gospel, a little Gospel, yea, I may call them, the whole Gospel; what is the Gospel but this good news, that Christ, God-man, mediates for his people. All that Christ was, is expressed in this; whatsoever Christ did more then this on earth, is implyed in this, and this is all Christ now doth for us in Heaven, He ever lives to make intercession for us, saith St. Paul, (Heb. 7. 25.) which is the same in effect, with what holy Job professeth in this Text, He will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend.

There is one thing further to be noted, for the clearing of this Text; For possibly the Reader may scruple how the same words should be rendred by some, as a wish, O that one might plead for a man with God; and by others as a conclusion, He will plead with God for a man. Again, how the latter branch should be rendred by some in the form of a similitude, As a man for his neighbour, and by others as a direct assertion, And the Son of man for his friend.

I answer to the first, That the same word may be thus diversly rendred according to differing Moods of Grammar; and so the sign of the Optative Mood which is in the form of a wish, is by some judged most sutable to the scope of this place. So that a wish may here be understood and safely supplied, though it be not expressed.

To the second scruple I answer, that the particle Vau, in the Hebrew, placed at the beginning of a word, though it be usually taken as a Conjunction, knitting one sentence to another, yet according to the exigence and scope of the Scripture, it undergoes divers other significations.

As first, A disjunctive (Exod. 12. 15.) Ye shall take it out from the Sheep, or from the Goats: The Hebrew is, And from the Goats; but because the Law did not command both, but gave a liberty to chuse either of the two; therefore we render not And, but Or, from the Goats: So (Judg. 11. 31.) See the Margin of our Bibles; which shews that

Jephtah

Jepthah did not bind himself to offer up whatsoever should meet him, in Sacrifice; but one of the two he did bind himself to, either to dedicate that to the Lord, or to offer it up for a burnt-offering.

Secondly, It is often used Adversatively, and is rendred, But (Gen. 42. 10. Psal. 44. 17, &c.)

Thirdly, Casually, and it is rendred For (Psal. 60. 11. Isa. 64. 5, &c.)

Fourthly, (Besides divers other acceptions of it, which I shall omit.) it is used Comparatively, or as a Note of likeness (Prov. 25. 25.) As cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far Countrey: The Hebrew is, And good news. So (Prov. 26. 7.) and very frequently in that Book. Thus in the Text the particle (Vau) is taken by some as a note of likeness; comparing the two parts of the Verse with each other; but by others it is taken only as a conjunction copulative, knitting both parts of the Verse together: He will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend.

From the words according to this latter reading,

Observe, First, There is an Advocate between God and Man.

Sin hath made a breach, there needs a Mediator to heal it. God and sinful man are (as we speak) Two, and they cannot be made One but by a Third. Man was created in a state of amity with God, that state needed no Mediator; man being restored is in a state of reconciliation unto God, that state needs a Mediator, both to settle and continue it: And he who is the Mediator between both parties, is an Advocate, a Pleader, a Patron for the one party. There was need of a Mediator, even in regard of God himself, that both his State might be preserved, and his Justice satisfied: But there was need of an Advocate, only in regard of man, that so his wants and miseries might be declared, and that mercy, together with help in the time of need, might be obtained. The Apostle (Gal. 3. 20.) describing the nature of a Mediator, saith, A Mediator is not of one, or (as we supply) not a Mediator of one. A Mediator is of two, yea, and for two. But an Advocate, though he be between two, yet he is but for one, or of one, either of one individually taken, or of one specifically taken, either of one man, or of one sort or company of men, who though they are many in number, yet their state or case is one. Thus Christ is an Advocate for one, or of one; all that he is an Advocate for, being in one and the same condition for the main, though some particulars in every mans case may vary.

The Greek word which is rendred Advocate in the New Testament, is applyed to the holy Ghost: But there is a great difference between Christ his being a Paraclete, or an Advocate, and the Spirit's being an Advocate (John 16. 7.) If I go not away (saith Christ) the Comforter (or the Advocate) will not come unto you: That is, The holy Ghost will not come unto you. One Advocate goeth away, that the other Advocate may come. Christ is an Advocate by way of impetration; the Spirit is Advocate by way of application: Christ is an Advocate with God, to get mercy for us; the Spirit is an Advocate with us, to prevail on our hearts to receive that mercy: Though Christ be our Advocate in Heaven, pleading for us with the Father, yet if we had not the Spirit to plead in our hearts on earth, we should never receive the good that Christ hath purchased for us of his Father. Christ appears for us in Heaven (Heb. 9. 24.) He appears as an Attorney in Court for his Client; he is gone to Heaven to appear for us: the Spirit comes from Heaven and appears in us. Christ began the work of his intercession here (John 17.) He is gone into Heaven to continue and perfect it. The Spirit doth both begin and perfect his intercession here; he doth not plead for us, but in us; or the Spirit makes intercession for us by stirring us up to prayer, by teaching us how to word and mould, or rather how to sigh and groan our prayers; Christ makes intercession for us, by presenting, and tendering those prayers to the Father which the Spirit helps to make, or by making prayers for us himself to the Father.

Some dispute how, they inquire much after the manner how Christ makes intercession, or performs the office of an Advocate for us; but it is enough for us to know that he is an Advocate, or that he makes intercession for us; though we are not able to describe the manner how: Whether it be,

First, Only by presenting himself to the Father, and his appearing for us, which is an equivalent, if not a formal intercession.

Or secondly, By the tendring of his righteousness, and merits, as satisfaction to the Father.

Or thirdly, By expressing our wants and his desires for us: Whether by all these, or by which of these, or whether by some other way, is not determinable by us; yet this is clear, that he performs the office of an Advocate for us, and that we receive every good thing from the hand of God through his hand.

Further, Christ may be considered:

First, As an Advocate for the whole Church: There are some causes of common concernment to all the people of God. Thus he was an Advocate for Jerusalem, when under bonds and captivity in Babylon (Zech. 1. 12.) Then the Angel of the Lord (not a created, but the creating Angel, or the Angel of the Covenant, who is the Son of God) answered and said, O Lord of Hosts, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem, and on the Cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years.

And as Christ pleads for the whole Church, so for every particular Member of the Church, and that also under a twofold notion.

He is Advocate, first, to take away our sins. If any man sin (saith the Apostle John, 1 Epist. 2. 1.) we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, &c.

Secondly, Christ is an Advocate for us with the Father in our sufferings and troubles, to get them taken off from us, or sanctified to us. Doubtless Job made use of Christ continually as an Advocate, to take off the guilt of sin; yet here he makes use of Christ as an Advocate to get off his sufferings, especially these mis-judgings of his Friends, who deeply censured and aspersed him, because of his sufferings; yea, a Believer makes use of Christ as an Advocate, to get any good thing, whether little or great, whether for soul or for body, as much as he doth for the removing of any evil, whether of sin or trouble.

Secondly, Observe, The Doctrine of a Mediator between God and Man was known and believed in the World, long before Christ came into the World.

Many saw Christ by Faith before he was seen in the flesh: Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen (Heb. 1. 1.) And as it is the evidence of things, so of persons that are not seen. Christ tells the Jews (John 8. 56.) Your Father Abraham rejoyced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad: And when the Jews quarrelled at this, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am. As Abraham saw his day by Faith, so David in spirit called him Lord (Matth. 22. 43.) And as these persons, with all the holy Elders, saw Christ by Faith in the Promise, so the whole Ceremonial Law was a representation of Christ to faith by sense: Every slain Sacrifice spake the death of Christ; and the sprinkling of that blood, the sprinkling of their consciences and ours for the remission of sins: Yea, They did all eat the same spiritual meat (that is, the same which we now eat) and did all drink the same spiritual drink; for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them (and least we should mistake what was meant by that Rock, the Apostle expounds it himself) And that Rock was Christ. The Rock did not follow them, but Christ who was signified by that Rock did follow them. They who are built upon Christ the Rock, shall never be moved; yet Christ is a moving, as well as a living Rock, to those who are built upon him; whithersoever they move, he follows them. Thus Jesus Christ was meat and drink to the Jews, as well as to us; for he is the Lamb slain from the foundation of the World (Revel. 13. 8.) That is, The vertue of his death sayed all who have been saved from the foundation of the World. As Christ was slain from Eternity in the counsel of God; so he was slain from the beginning of time in the promise of God (Gen. 3. 15.) which was the publication of his death; he was then also slain as to the heart of Believers, whose Faith (having once a word for it) makes that which is absent, in regard of place, spiritually present; and that which is not, in regard of time, truly to be.

Thirdly, Observe, The Mediator between God and man hath been known and believed in all Ages under a two-fold nature, both God and Man.

We have both in this profession of Job's Faith: He believed the Mediator to be God, for he saith, Mine eye poureth tears to God. There is the Divine nature. He believed that the Mediator should be man, and therefore adds, The Son of man for his friend; there is his humane nature; so that not only the general Doctrine of the Mediatorship of Christ, but this particular about the constitution of his person as Mediator, was also known. Had not our Advocate been man he could not have suffered for us; and had he not been God he could not have satisfied for us. These points of Gospel Catechism are so necessary and fundamental, that in every Age Believers have in some measure been instructed about them. And whereas the Apostle saith (1 Tim. 2.5.) There is one Mediator between God and men, or, of God and men, the man Christ Jesus: He doth not add man, to exclude the Divine nature from the Mediatorship, but emphatically to demonstrate that nature, in which he gave himself a ransom for us, of which he speaks in the next Verse. For though the ransome was paid by him who is God, or had a Divine nature, yet it was paid in the Manhood, or humane Nature only. The humane Nature was the matter of our ransome; but the Divine nature gave worth and value to it.

Further, Job speaks with much confidence and assurance, both of Christs willingness to undertake his cause, and of the success or good issue of his cause, if once Christ did but undertake it: He will plead for a man with God.

Hence Observe, Fourthly, Christ is very ready to speak for, and plead the cause of poor sinners before God his Father.

He will do it, saith Job; Christ is easie to be intreated, he is found of those that seek him not, then surely he will be found of those that seek him. His promise is (John 6. 37.) Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out: As if he had said, Whatsoever I do, I will not do this: And when he saith, he will not do this, his meaning is, that he will do much more for them, then the not doing of this comes to; he will readily receive their persons, and undertake their suits, though they have no fee to give him, nothing to move him, but the need they have of him.

Fifthly, Observe, Christ is a powerful, and an effectual Mediator with the Father.

He carries the day; he is a prevailing Mediator. Christ is such a Physitian, that no man ever dyed under his hand; and he is such an Advocate, that no mans cause ever miscarried under his hand. The Arminians maintain a propitiation made, or a Sacrifice offered by Christ for all; yet they dare not say, it is effectual for all; but the intercession of Christ (in their opinion) is effectual for all. Christ dyed (say they) for those that he doth not save; but Christ prayeth for none but those that shall be saved. They are not for universal Intercession, though they are for an universal Sacrifice, or propitiation; and their reason is, Because they cannot deny, but many shall perish for ever, which yet they could not, did Christ but pray for them. We believe that his Sacrifice is as effectual as his Intercession; and that therefore he dyed for none but those for whom he prayes, his Intercession being for the drawing out, and bringing home the benefit of his Sacrifice to those, and to all those for whom he offered himself to God. But to the point in hand, The Arminian who leaves the death of Christ in the hand of mans free will, assisted only by general Grace, to make it effectual to himself, or not, he (I say) asserts the Intercession of Christ not only sufficient, but effectual for all, in whose behalf he intercedes: So that we are sure all shall go well with us in the Court of Heaven while we have Christ our Advocate with the Father.

And that we may have fulness of confidence to come to God by Christ, let us consider these five things.

First, Christ is most wise to mannage our cause; so wise, that he is the Wisdom of the Father: If we had an Advocate at the Bar furnisht with as much wisdom as the Judge, it were a great step to obtain in a right suit.

Secondly, Christ is an eloquent Advocate, a powerful Orator. As the Lord hath given him the tongue of the learned, that he should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary (Isa. 54.4.) So he hath a learned tongue to speak a word for him that is weary: Christ is the Essential word, and the flower of all declarative words is with him; when he spake on earth, he spake with authority (Matth. 7. 29.) All wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth (Luke 4. 24.) Yea, his hearers somewhere testifie, never spake man as this man speaketh: And as no man ever spake like him to man; so no man ever spake like him to God.

Thirdly, Christ is a faithful Advocate; his intercession is a part of his Priestly office; we have a faithful high Priest, saith the Apostle, therefore a faithful Advocate: He will never either desert our cause, or betray it; he is as sure to us as our own souls; yea, he and the souls of his are one.

Fourthly, Christ is a merciful Advocate, he layes our cause to heart, our cause is his cause: He hath espoused the Interests of his people, and doth all for us upon his own account. When Saints are persecuted, we may tell him that he is persecuted, and that he is afflicted when they are: The Church may plead with Christ to plead for the removing of her sufferings, under the title of his sufferings, he being the head of the Church, and the Church being his body. Christ is, as a faithful, so a merciful high Priest (Heb. 2. 17.) and the Apostle saith, That in all things it behoved him to be like his brethren, that he might be so. Christ had an ability of sufficiency to be merciful to us, as God, though he had never been made like unto us by becoming man; but he had not that ability (as some speak) of Idoneity, or fitness to be merciful. His being made like unto us, hath given him a double Idoneity, for the tenderness of his heart towards us.

First, In that he himself hath suffered being tempted (Heb. 2. 18.) His passions in the flesh were great.

Secondly, In that himself suffers still in all our temptations, his compassions with our flesh are great.

Now an Advocate, who either hath had an experience of trouble in his own person, or is full of the sense of his Clients trouble, and feels his smart, will certainly do his utmost to relieve him; because in his relief himself is relieved also.

Fifthly, Christ is the Favourite of the Judge; it is a great advantage to have one pleading for us at the Bar, who is in favour with the Bench: Christ is highly in favour with the Bench: God hath testified from Heaven, This is my well-beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased (Matth. 3. 17.) The Judge is our Advocates Friend and Father.

Lastly, That we may be further assured that he will do his utmost for us, our Advocate calls us his Friends: As the Judge is his Friend, before whom he pleads; so every Saint is his Friend, for whom he pleads. Some will do more for friendship then for a fee. We know it is so with Jesus Christ, he pleads for his people, because they are his Friends: This Job makes use of here, He will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend. As if Job had said, I know I have a Friend of Christ, and Christ looks on me as his friend, and therefore I have highest confidence that he will plead my cause, and take off this scandal. So much for Job's earnest desire upon his appeal, that his cause might come to a hearing, and that Christ would undertake the pleading of it before his Father.

He gives a reason in the last Verse, why he was thus pressing to have the business brought to an issue; why he did thus appeal to God as his witness, why he did pour out tears to Christ, that he would plead for him? Why all this?

Verse 22. When a few years are come, then shall I go the way whence I shall not return.

Deum vellem jamjam in præsentia disceptationem in se recipere quia ad mortem propero. Jun.

As if he had said, For as much as I must dye shortly, I desire to have this difference taken up before I dye: I cannot live long in this world, and I would not go out of the world, under such a cloud as is now upon me: Is it not time for me to hasten my cause to an end when mine end hastens? and to get my business determined before my years are?

When

Anni numeri. Heb. i. e. qui numerati ſunt adeo & breviſſimâ periodo circumſcripti.

When a few years are come.] The Hebrew is, years of number, that is, Years which may eaſily be numbred (*Iſa.*10.19.) The trees that remain ſhall be few that a Child may write them, they ſhall be trees of number, that is, a ſmall number: and (*Gen.*34.29.) Jacob ſaith, We are but few, the Hebrew is, We are men of number, we may ſoon be told, a Child may tell us, and yet you provoke City and Country againſt us. We very well tranſlate according to the Hebraiſm, years of number, a few years. When a few years are come,

I ſhall go the way whence I ſhall not return.] What way is that (which hath Vestigia nulla retrorſum) where all ſteps are forwards, and none backward: this is ſuch a way as we meet not with in all our earthly travels, yet every man on earth is travelling towards ſuch a way: travel which way you will, you have as many ſteps backwards as forwards, men coming, and going: but (ſaith Job) I ſhall go the way I ſhall not return.

What way is this? This is the way of all fleſh (*Joſh.*23. 15. 1 *King.*2.2.) This is the way to the grave, that way hath no ſteps backwards.

But is there no return from the grave?

It is true, ſome have riſen; there have been ſome firſt-fruits of a reſurrection: but they who have come from the grave are ſo few, that their foot-ſteps are worn out by thoſe many and many thouſands of thouſands who have gone to the grave. What multitudes have gone the way to the grave, and are not returned? ſome few have returned, but theſe ſo few, that we may ſtill affirm, the way to the grave knows no returning. That which is very rarely done (the contrary being very frequently done) is ſaid not to be done at all, or never to be done.

But Job ſeems to deny his own return; he ſpeaks as if he ſhould not be only lodged for a while, but loſt for ever in the grave; I ſhall go the way, whence I ſhall not return.

I anſwer, That Job's faith was clear in the point of the reſurrection of the body appears by the confeſſion which he makes (Chap. 19. 25, 26.) and therefore when he ſaith, I ſhall not return, his meaning is (as was ſhewed upon a like paſſage *Chap.*10.21.)

Firſt, That he ſhould not return by any power of nature.

Secondly, That he ſhould not return to a ſtate of nature; he believed fully that he ſhould return by the power of God, to an eſtate of glory. Our bodies which are ſown natural bodies, ſhall be raiſed ſpiritual bodies. Though that which was ſowed ſhall return, yet when it returns it ſhall not be as it was ſowed.

Laſtly, whereas Job ſaith, I ſhall not return, his meaning is, when I die, or if I die, I ſhall no more return to my houſe and dwelling in the world, I muſt take my leave of all thoſe things for ever. My place ſhall know me no more, as he ſpeaks to the ſame ſubject (Chap. 7. 10.)

From the firſt branch of the verſe Note, The years of man's life are few, You may quickly number them.

Secondly, As the years of man's life come aboue quickly, ſo when they are come, we muſt go certainly, we muſt go with death.

I ſhall go (ſaith Job) there is no hindring, no ſtopping of that journey. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, He hath no mind to go; he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, He is not at leiſure to go; he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, he is not fit to go, He is not prepared to go; he muſt go as he is, fit or unfit, prepared or unprepared, he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, he will give all the treaſure in his houſe, all the money in his purſe, to be ſpared this journey; he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, he will get another to go for him, or he will ſend one in his room; There is no dying by proxie; every man when his few years are come muſt go in perſon.

Thirdly Obſerve, A Believer can ſpeak of death familiarly.

It is a comfort to him in his ſorrows, to think that he ſhall die ſhortly, When a few years are come, I ſhall go the way, &c. he ſpeaks pleaſantly, the mention of death was a life to him. Job's life was a kind of death, and therefore to him eſpecially death would be a kind of life; were our hearts rightly affected, they that have the moſt lively life, would think death better then this life, I deſire (ſaith Paul) to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt, which is beſt of all: Death was better to him then life; and leſt any ſhould ſay, no marvel if Paul deſired to die, who could ſcarce tell where to live; and no marvel if he would die once for all, who was in deaths often: to prevent this cavil, he adds, Which is beſt of all. Barely to die is better to ſome then a troubleſome life; but to die and be with Chriſt, is better then the beſt life, much more is it better then that life in this world, which is a continual death, as Job's was. How ſhould ſuch a man ſing out Job's verſe, When a few dayes are come, I ſhall go the way, whence I ſhall not return.

Fourthly Obſerve, It is good to put death before us under the eaſieſt notions.

Here Job calls it only a going, a going out of the world, that is all; he elſewhere calls it a ſleep, and the Spirit of God every where (in reference to Saints) ſpeaks of it in the moſt comfortable expreſſions. Death it ſelf is ſo embalmed, yea and cloathed in the holy language, that there is even a ſweetneſs and a beauty in it. When a man hath worn a ſuit of Apparel a great while, and hath even worn it out, or it becomes foul and naſty, would he not be glad to put that off, and get a new one upon his back? therefore death is called an uncloathing, a putting off the fleſh; there is no hurt in that; when a man hath tired himſelf all the day at his work, would he not gladly go to bed? therefore death is called reſt or ſleep. Under theſe or the like conſiderations held forth in Scripture, we may (as it were) bury all hard thoughts of death, as was further ſhewed (*Chap.*14.12.) eſpecially while we remember that as now life is by many degrees, bits or morſels, ſwallowed up of mortallity, ſo then death ſhall (at one bit or morſel) be ſwallowed up of life (2 *Cor.*5.4.) For Chriſt hath not only conquered, but aboliſhed death, and hath brought, not only life, but immortality to light through the Goſpel (2 *Tim.*1.10.) Life is good; yet when it may be ſaid of a life, it ſhall die, that puts an evil into life: But if life be good, how good is immortality, which is a life that cannot die?

Sixthly, Note, Job is very importunate to have a blot upon his good name wiped out; his conſcience was clear, his ſoul was well, he could ſay (*Chap.*13.) He is my Saviour, and I know that I ſhall be juſtified; yet becauſe he was under aſperſions and harſh cenſures, he haſtens to have theſe taken off, becauſe he was to die ſhortly.

If we ſhould on this ground, be careful to ſettle our outward eſtates and credits; how much more ſhould we be careful upon this ground to ſee that our ſouls be well ſetled? How ſhould each one ſay, I will haſten to get my ſins pardoned, my perſon juſtified; I will haſten to have all clear between God and my ſoul; For when a few years are come, I ſhall go the way whence I ſhall not return: And if I do not ſee theſe things done, while I am here, I ſhall never come back to ſee them done, nor can they be done at all in the place whither I am going. There is no repenting, no reforming, no believing in the grave: if our ſpiritual change be not before our natural change, it will never be. This argument ſhould provoke us to ſettle the affairs of our ſouls ſpeedily. It is not unlawful, nay, it is a duty to vindicate our credit, and to order the affairs that concern this life, becauſe we have not long to live: The haſt of death ſhould make us haſt our work, even the work of this life; much more upon this ground ſhould we ſee that our hearts be ſetled, that our eternal peace be ſetled; how ſhould the haſt of death make us haſt the work of the life which is to come? But as it ſhould make us haſten that work, ſo it muſt not make us huddle that work, or ſlubber it over, or do it to halves. Such haſt is waſt indeed: For, if we leave our ſouls half ſetled, and our peace half made, and our repentance and turning to God in the mid way, we ſhall never come again to finiſh and perfect them, no more then we ſhall to begin them. Therefore ſet ſpeedily about the work, and give your ſelves no reſt till the work be perfected; for when a few dayes are come, you ſhall go the way where ye ſhall not return.

Laſtly, Which was Job's ſpecial caſe,

It is an affliction for any man to die under a blot of diſgrace.

Our credit and good name ſhould be precious to us while we live; eſpecially we ſhould be careful to die with good credit, and not to let a blot lie on us when we are going out of the World. Job would not die under the name of an

Hypocrite;

Hypocrite, or an Oppressour, with which black titles he had been charged by his Friends. It is a mercy to go to the grave with honour among men, and to die desired; though it be enough that we go to our Grave having honour with God, and being desired of him. A good name is a Box of ointment powred forth; and a good report (especially among those that are good) is as the embalming of our memories to posterity. And yet the Saints are not so sollicitous for repairs in honour, because of that esteem which they have of their own esteem (that's the strain of ambition) and they have learned to go through good report and evil report, through honour and dishonour; they know how to go forth without the Camp, bearing the reproach of Christ: But they are unwilling that Christ should bear their reproach, or that his name should be dishonoured through them. And therefore seeing they desire while they live, to adorn the Doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in all things, they cannot but be careful before they die, to remove from their own names whatsoever might reflect dishonour upon his. How near Job was (in his own opinion) to the valley of the shadow of death, is yet more evident in the first words of the next Chapter: Here he only tells us, he must die shortly, there he tells us, upon the matter, that he was dead already; here he saith, When a few years are come, I shall go; there he saith not only that he had no more years to come, but no more dayes, my dayes are extinct, &c.

CHAP. XVII. Vers. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct, the Graves are ready for me.
Are there not mockers with me? And doth not mine eyes continue in their provocation.
Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee, who is he that will strike hands with me?
For thou hast hid their heart from understanding: therefore shalt thou not exalt them.
He that speaketh flattery to his friends, even the eyes of his Children shall fail.

Hoc capite intendit inani nave præmissa. Aquin.

THE beginning of this Chapter pursues the Argument laid down in the close of the former: Or as a learned Expositour speaks, Job in this doth enliven the premises, and (as it were) put fresh spirits into what he had spoken before. For whereas he had before desired the Lord to hasten his cause to a day of hearing, because his day of death hastned (Chap. 16. Vers. 22.) When a few years are come, I shall go the way, whence I shall not return: Here to shew that he was a dying man, he describes himself as a dead man; My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct, the graves are ready for me.

Secondly, There Job made an appeal to God, O that a man might plead with God, as a man pleads with his Neighbour. (Vers. 21.) And he gives the reason why, My Friends scorn me. (Vers. 20.) He doth the same here in other language (Vers. 2.) Are there not mockers with me? And doth not mine eye continue in their provocation? And therefore he renews his appeal to God, and begs to be heard before indifferent Judges, or Umpires, Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee, who is he that will strike hands with me? In the fourth and fifth Verses he further urgeth the reasons of his appeal, or he backs his motion, that God would do him right, from the insufficiency of his Friends to do him right: Thou hast hid their heart from understanding: As if he should say, Who would stand to the judgement of those, who want understanding? Thou hast hid their heart from understanding: therefore shalt thou not exalt them, &c. To this honour of judging my cause, and deciding this controversie, yea, I find them so unfit to be either my Judges, or my Arbitratours, that they are indeed but Flatterers; and therefore they may rather expect some sudden judgement upon themselves, or their Children, then that God should do them this honour to judge for me: He that speaks flattery to his Friends, even the eyes of his Children shall fail, (Vers. 5.)

Thus I have opened Job's scope in the context of these five Verses; which I have put together, because the matter runs in a continued dependence. And though for the main it be the same with which he concluded in the sixteenth Chapter, yet the variety of reading and expression will yield us variety of meditation; I descend to particulars.

Vers. 1. My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct; the graves are ready for me.

Here are three things, every of which speaks a dying man.

First, Corrupt breath.
Secondly, Extinguished dayes.
Thirdly, A grave made ready.

First, My breath is corrupt: Ruach. There are three interpretations given of that word [My breath] Some understand it of his mind, or whole inward man: As if he said, My thoughts are, or my mind is exceedingly troubled; and so most of the Greek Interpreters read it; and then the word which we translate Corrupt, may signifie grieved, pained, or afflicted, and it is often applyed to those pains which are most painful, even the pain of a Woman in travel. And so the sense is made out thus, as if Job had said, I am extreamly troubled, or I am pained, like a Woman in the hour of travel; as she is in bodily pain, so I am pained in mind; I have felt many inward pangs, and throwes, and yet I am not delivered: But I conceive this exposition unsuitable to the scope of the place, Job being about to describe the state of his body, or of his outward man, and not the affliction and trouble of his mind.

Pereò spiritu agitatus. Sept. רוחי חבלה Vox חבל ligavit, constrinxit per antiphrasin significat solutus, ruptus, corruptus, accommodatur etiam ad dolores intensissimos quales sunt parturientium, quia cor valde constringunt. Spiritus vitales qui animæ instrumentum sunt ad vitæ functiones. Aquin.

Secondly, The word (Ruach) signifieth the vital powers or spirits, which support man, and serve him in all the functions of life; spirits are the promoters of action, and when the vital spirits are corrupted, man is unable, not only to act, but to live. The expence of spirits, is the most chargeable expence to the life of man, and when a mans spirits are much spent, he is like a dead man, though he be alive: We say ordinarily when we are weary, Our spirits are spent; that is, Our vital spirits which give activity and strength to the whole body.

Thirdly, Rather understand it literally, and strictly for the breath, which comes forth by respiration, My breath is corrupt: and then the corrupting here spoken of, is not to be taken for any illsavour in his breath: they who have corrupt breath are offensive to others in breathing. The breath is said to be corrupt, because it smells of the corruption of those parts from whence it is drawn; we must not understand Job so: But when he saith, My breath is corrupt, his meaning is, that either he had obstructions and stoppings of breath, which distemper Physitians call the Tissick; a man under that infirmity may be said to have his breath corrupted, because he breathes difficultly. And as it is so in some diseases, so it is alway so in the approaches of death; a little before a man dies, his breath shortens, he breathes hardly, or he hardly breathes, he lies gasping for life, and catching for breath: Such a state Job here intends. The Tygurine translation takes that sense, My life is departing, or I am giving up the ghost.

Corruptio non hic denotat spiritum graveolentum, sed spiritum qui cum ingentiori nisu & dolore emittitur. Pined. Medici Asthma vocant; & quia Asthmaticus suffocari videtur, ideo legitur hic; jam quidem ago animam. Tygur.

These

These two are very distinct: Some make the soul and breath one thing, and argue the corruptibility of the soul from such Texts as this. But the breath differs, not only from the soul, but from the life: The soul hath a life of its own, and the life of the body is it union with the soul; breathing is the acting of life, proceeding from that union, and ending when that union is dissolved. Breath may be corrupt, and life may vanish, but the soul continues; the breath is so vanishing, that the Prophet gives caution (Isa. 2.22.) Cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils. The breath of man is so ready to cease, that it is our wisdom to cease from man; for when breath goes, man is gone, and all goes with him, in that day his thoughts perish; and therefore Job had no sooner said, My breath is corrupt, but he adds,

My dayes are extinct.

[My dayes] that is, The time appointed for my life, which is measured by dayes, by natural dayes, or by artificial dayes: Our dayes come and go continually; and when our tale of dayes is come and gone, our dayes are [extinct.] The word which here we translate extinct, is found no where else in the Hebrew of the Old Testament: it is rendered three wayes.

Excisi sunt. Pagn.

First, Thus, my dayes are cut off; which metaphor is often used in reference to life; our dayes are (as it were) so many threads, and our life is like a piece of cloth woven together by many dayes; when the Web, be it more or less, longer or shorter, is finished, the thred is cut: My dayes are cut off.

præviabuntur dies mei. Vulg.

Secondly, The Vulgar reads it, my dayes will be shortned; they shall be put in a narrow room, into a little compendium, I shall soon be able to read over the volume of my dayes, they are but short, a meer Epitome.

Thirdly, We read, my dayes are extinct, or put out. Which is a metaphor taken from fire, from a Torch, or Candle, which is the sense of the Tygurine translation.

Deus mei ritu lucernæ deficiunt. Tygur.

My dayes fail, as a Candle, or as a Lamp, which, when the oyl is consumed, goes out: Mr. Broughton keeps to the metaphor of fire, My dayes are quenched. There is a flame of life in the body, the natural heat is preserved by the natural moysture; these two, Radical heat, and Radical moisture, work upon each other; and as long as Radical moisture holds out to feed the Radical heat, life holds out; but when the heat hath once sucked and drunk up all the moisture (in some acute diseases it drinks all at a draught) as the flame drinks up the Oyl of the Lamp, then we go out, or as Job speakes here, Our dayes are extinct. Excessive moisture puts out the fire, and for want of moisture it goeth out.

Vita extinguitur quãdo humor nativus in quo vita consistit extinguitur.

Hence Note, First, Man's life, as a Fire, or Lamp, consumes it self continually.

There is a special disease called a Consumption, of which many die; but the truth is, every man who dies, dies of a Consumption; he that dies of a Surfet, may be said (in this sense) to die of a Consumption. The fewel and food of man's life is wasted sometimes more sparingly and gradually, but 'tis alwayes consumed (except in those deaths which are meerly occasional, or violent) before man dies.

Again, Job speaks peremptorily, My dayes are extinct. He was not then dead; but because he saw all things in a tendency to death, and was himself in a dying posture; therefore he concludes, My dayes are extinct.

Hence Note, Secondly, What we see in regard of all preparatory means and wayes ready to be done, we may speak of as already done.

The Scripture speakes often of those things which are shortly and certainly to come to pass, as come to pass. And as the Apostle argues in spirituals, We know that we are translated from death to life, because we love the Brethren, and he that believeth hath eternal life: So we may argue about naturals, he that is sick beyond the help of means, and the skill of the Physician, is translated from life to death, and we may conclude of a man in this case, he hath temporal death; or he may say of himself, as Job doth in the next words,

The graves are ready for me.] The Original is very concise, it is only there, The graves for me; we supply those words are ready. And because of that shortness of the Language, there have been many conjectures for the supply or filling up of the sence. Some thus, The graves for me; that is, there is nothing for me to think of now but only a grave, I may lay aside all other business, and attend that alone, how I may lie down in the dust with peace. I am not a man for this world, it is best for me to retire or withdraw my soul quite from the earth, seeing I have no hope to keep my body long out of it; or if I do let out my soul to the earth, it shall be only to so much of it, as will hold my body, or serve to make me a grave. The graves for me.

Secondly, The graves for me; that is, I desire or wish for nothing but a grave, A grave for my money, as we say of a thing that we greatly desire: so saith Job, A grave for me:

As if he had more largely spoken, thus,

Sepulchra mihi; supple opto, quæro, cogito, aut quid simile.

As I perceive I am going to the grave, so I desire to go thither; I have (as to this sence) made a covenant with death, and an agreement with the grave. The grave and I shall not fall out, now that I am ready to fall into it. For if I had my vote, or might put down in writing what I would have, I would write, A Grave, A Grave for me; as I am declining, and decaying in my body, so my spirit, and my mind are as willing that my body should decay: I am as ready for the grave as that is for me. A grave for me: So the words carry a reciprocation of readiness between Job and the Grave, The grave gapes for me, and I gape for the grave: We may parallel this kind of speaking with that in the Book of Canticles (Chap. 2.16.) where the Spouse saith, My beloved is mine, and I am his: The Original is, My beloved to me, and I to him: There are no more words then needs must be. The largness of their affection, bred this conciseness in language, My beloved to me, and I to him:

Sepulchra mihi inhiat, ego sepulchris. q.d. Aliis omnibus rebus valedico atque renuncio. Jun.

The expression Notes two things.

First, Propriety, My beloved to me, or, my beloved is mine; that is, I have a propriety in him.

Secondly, It Notes possession, I have him, I have not only a right to him, but I enjoy him; I have not only a title, but a tenure; God hath given me Livery and Seisin (as our Law speaks) he hath put me into possession of Jesus Christ, and I have given Jesus Christ full possession of me, I am no longer my own, but his, and at his dispose. So here, The grave for me, and I for the grave: The grave is my right; yea, the grave is my possession. The grave is a house that every one hath right to, and some are so near it, that they seem possessed of it. The grave is mine, saith Job, or I am as a dead man, ready to be carried to my grave: The Grave is not made ready, till man is undressed by death, and so made ready for the grave. We say of very old men, though in health, and we may say of very sick men, though young, They have one foot in the grave. Job speaks as having both his feet in the grave: Yea, we may say, that Job speaks as if he had not only his feet in the grave, but (which is far more) his heart in the grave. There are many who have their feet in the grave, whose hearts are at furthest distance from it, Job had both. Heman (Psal. 88. 4, 5.) describes his condition in such a language, My soul is full of troubles, and my life draweth nigh to the grave, I am accounted with them that go down into the pit; I am as a man of no strength, free among the dead; like the slain that lie in the grave, whom thou remembrest no more, and that are cut off from thy sight: That Scripture may be a Comment on this, My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct, the graves are ready for me.

Further, Job speaks in the Plural number; he saith not the grave is ready for me, but, The graves are ready for me. Why, how many graves must Job have? Would not one grave hold him? Or, was Job covetous to have many graves? Many houses will not serve some men when they live, but one house will serve any man when he dieth. A little room will hold those dead, for whose covetous and ambitious minds the whole World was not roomthy enough while they lived. Ordinary men will have here their Winter-houses, and their Summer-houses, their City-house, and their Country-house, their houses on the Plain, and their houses on the Hill; men have variety of houses while they live; but one is all when dead: Why then doth Job say, The [graves] are ready for me?

He

He saith it to shew that death abounded to his apprehension, or that he could not escape death: As if he had said, Whersoever I set my foot, I step upon a grave. The Poet describing a tragical state, saith, There was much of death to be seen, or many appearances of death. Job saw deaths, and beheld graves every where gaping for him. Paul was in deaths often, and Job was in many deaths at once: The graves are ready, there are many Pits making, I am sure to fall into one, there's no avoiding it.

Plurima mortis imago.

Learn from it, First,

That, In times of sickness and affliction, discourses of the grave, are the most seasonable discourses.

Death should be much in our thoughts, and much in our speech at all times, but most of all in times of sickness, or of danger. Some when they are sick, cannot abide to hear a word spoken of the grave; others will forbid such as come to visit the sick, to speak a word of death. Lewis the eleventh King of France, was so excessively afraid of death, that he had given command to his Attendants not to give him any warning of the approach of this his last Enemy by Name. It was worse then death to him to hear of death; and yet before he died, he was told of it, not only plainly, but rudely. The French Historian reports, that his very Barber, with some other inferiour Servants (as if they had rather come as Judges to pronounce the sentence of death upon him, then as friends to be his remembrancers of death) told him bluntly and abruptly, without preface or preamble, or the least word of comfort to sweeten such a bitter potion, That his fatal hour was come, that neither his Hermit nor his Physitian, could keep him alive a day longer. They who are unwilling to hear, or speak of death, shall hear it spoken of whether they will or no. Death should be much upon the tongue, and more in the thoughts of good men when they are in health, but when they are in their natural preparation for death (sickness is a natural preparative for death) they should be very often in their spiritual preparations, by thinking and discoursing of it.

Comines. lib. 10.

Observe, That, A godly man is sometimes as ready for the grave, as the grave can be for him.

Let it come as soone as it will, it cannot come too soon; as the grave gapes for him, so doth he for the grave; as the grave hungers for him, so doth he for it, and nothing can satisfie him but a grave. I desire (saith Paul) to be dissolved: He was ready for the grave: And ready he was, not in a vain wish, O, I would die, and I desire to die; but from a grounded hope that he should be well in death. Saul (2 Sam. 1.9.) was sorely wounded, the graves were ready for him, and he was ready for the grave too: But whence was it? It was not from his preparedness to die, but from his impatience to live; as appears both by the true History of his death, and by the false report of it made by the Amalekite. The former saith (1 *Sam.*31.4.) Then said Saul unto his Armour-bearer, Draw thy sword and thrust me through therewith, lest these uncircumcised come and thrust me through and abuse me: Saul, upon this account was so ready for the grave, that he begg'd to be thrust into it, and when he could not obtain that miserable favour, he thrust himself into it; so the latter part of the Verse informs us, But his Armour-bearer would not, for he was sore afraid: therefore Saul took a Sword and fell upon it. The Amalekite reports Saul thus bespeaking him (2 *Sam.*1.9.) Stand I pray thee upon me, and slay me; for anguish is upon me, because my life is yet whole in me.

Man dies not by piece-meal, now a little, and then a little, nor is life divisible, when it departs it departs together; but when Saul had no mind to live, it troubled him that he was no nearer death: A dishonour was fallen upon him, the day was lost, and he was wounded: Saul could easier die then out-live this disgrace. Such a readiness to die many have had, it vexeth them to live, die they will, because they cannot live as they would: this is a readiness of desperation, not of preparation. Job was much troubled, pain and smart afflicted him, and they had some influence upon his desire of death; but his chief motive was above: what old Simeon desired, to depart in peace because his eyes had seen his salvation, Job desired, because he knew by Faith, that God was his salvation.

Thirdly, Job speakes chearfully of the Grave:

Hence learn, A believer in the greatest afflictions of this life, sees ease and refreshing in death.

He knowes that he shall bury all his sorrows when himself goes to the grave; yea, that then his sins, as well as his afflictions go to their grave too, and shall never rise again.

Fourthly, Job speakes confidently, he shall die presently, the grave was ready for him: But it was not so, Job's grave was not ready, and he out-lived this black day many a fair year.

Hence Observe, A good man may mistake the times and seasons of God's dispensations to him.

He thinks, yea concludes, he shall die, when he shall not die: Wicked worldly men, do not believe they shall die, when they must; they cannot be perswaded that they shall die, when they are ready to drop into their graves. Job seemed to have an assurance that he should die, yet he did not, God reprived him from death, and restored him from trouble. We are never the nearer the grave, because we prepare for it, speak and meditate on it, or resolve to go into it: It is not our holding back from the grave, that will keep us out of it, nor our willingness to go to the grave, that will put us into it. It is good to mistake upon the best side; God usually recalls those from death, who are most ready at his call to die.

Fifthly, In that he speaks of Graves in the Plural number: Learn this, There are many wayes of going out of the World, though there be but one way of coming in.

Whithersoever we are going, we are going to the grave; and when we have stept over, or scrambled out of one grave, we may quickly slip into another, and be locked in fast enough.

Lastly, Take this from the whole, by way of Corollary; It is our wisdom to stand alwayes ready for death, and the grave, for they stand ready for us: Ours is a dying life, a decaying strength, ours are consuming dayes, our dayes cannot be many, possibly they will be but very few; for ought we know the grave is now ready for us, and we are sure it is a digging and preparing for us: Therefore let us be digging in the Word of life, that we may be ready to meet and welcome death and the grave, which are so ready for us: The graves are ready for me.

Job proceeds to re-inforce the cause of his appeal.

Vers. 2. Are there not mockers with me? And doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Master Broughton translates by way of affirmation, Surely mockers are bestowed on me. We by way of Question, Are there not mockers with me? Yes, there are mockers with me: Some read it as the form of an Oath. It is familiar in the Hebrew to use such forms of swearing and imprecating; so the words are rendred by a learned Interpreter, Let me perish if my friends are not mockers, if they go not about to delude me. Job spake this a little before, My friends scorn me (*Chap.*16.20.) Here he is at it again, Are there not mockers with me? I find three words applyed by Job to his Friends, while he reproves this their unfriendly usage.

אם לא Formula jurisjurandi huic linguæ familiaris. Merc. Disperea nisi amici mei studeant mihi imponere. Vatabl.

The first (*Chap.*12.4.) there he useth a word which signifieth to mock with derision. The word (*Chap.*16.19.) notes them such as mocked, with wit and jesting. The word here used signifies to mock by deceiving or deluding, as if his Friends had carried matters with him more like Sophisters, then Comforters: So the word is applied (Gen. 31.7.) Jacob tells Leah, and Rachel, You know that with all my power, I have served your Father Laban, and your Father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times: that is, He thought by changing my wages to deceive me, and get all the stronger Cattel to himself. When Moses went out upon the request of Pharaoh, to sue unto the Lord for the removing of a present plague: Moses said, Behold I go out from thee, and I will intreat the Lord that the swarms of flies may depart from Pharaoh, from his Servants, and from his people to morrow; but let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more (*Exod.*8.29.) as if he had said, You have mocked me two or three times, and said you would let the people go, do not so any more, lest your deceiving of my expectation, prove the greatest deceit of your own.

The deluding Doctors which some delighted in, are expresst by this word (*Isa.*30.9.) This is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the Law of the Lord: They did not love the Law of the Lord; What then? which say to the Seers, see not, and to the Prophets, prophesie not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things, prophesie deceits. The wickedness of that people lay in two things; either they would have the Prophets silent, and not speak at all, or if they did speak, they must Prophesie deceits: They loved to to be cozoned: truth made them smart, and they could not abide it. A guilty conscience cannot endure plain words, but it loves smooth words; as many as you will of these words (say they) or else not a word; either prophesie deceit, or cease prophecying. Here Job complains, Are there not deceivers with me? As if he had said, You tell me you bring the mind of God, but you bring false Doctrine, you preach deceit. Though we cannot say they preached smooth things to Job, they spake hardly enough of him, and harshly enough to him, yet we may say they preached deceitful things to him; for though they did not speak with an intention to deceive him, yet they were deceived in speaking, and he had been deceived if he had yielded to what they spake. In which sense Job calls them (which one would think he had little reason to do, considering how roughly they dealt with him, he, I say, calls them) Flatterers, at the sixth Verse of this Chapter: And what's the business or chief design of Flatterers, but to catch others with words, or to deceive them into a compliance with their own ends. And this is often (and was in this case) the end, or tendency of the action, when it is not the end, or intention of the Agent. From this notion of the word, Finis operis & finis operantis distinguuntur.

Observe, First, To be among Deceivers is a great misery.

Secondly, To be a Deceiver is a great sin.

Thirdly, To publish that which is false, though there be no intendment to deceive, is to be a Deceiver.

As most are ignorantly deceived, so there are some ignorant Deceivers: and as some think what they do to be very just, and that it is their duty to do it, when indeed it is very sinful, so there are some who think what they teach to be very true, and that it is their duty to teach it, when indeed it is very erroneous. There are but few who know they are Deceivers, when they are: now as that Servant which knew his Lords will, but did not according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes; and yet, he who knew it not, and did commit things worthy of stripes (shall not escape a beating, he) shall be beaten with few stripes (*Luk.*12.47,48.) So he that knowes the truth of God, and yet deceives others with false Doctrine, shall be beaten with many stripes; and he who not knowing the truth, deceives others, shall not escape unbeaten, or unblamed, as Job's Friends did not.

Non peccavi. Vulg. q.d. innocens heu morior. Quandoquidē non sunt ludificationes apud me. Jun.

There is another reading of this first clause, differing from ours, Are there not mockers with me? The Vulgar thus, I have not sinned. A second to the same sense, thus, For as much as there are no mockings or deceivings with me, I am a man who deals plainly and simply. The word which we translate Mockers, as noting a Person, is rendered by the act, and that negatively: There are no mockings with me; that is, I use no mockings or no false play, as I am accused; I have spoken my heart nakedly and clearly. And yet mine eye continueth in their provocation: therefore lay down now, put me in a surety with thee, &c. (*Vers.*3.) This is a good reading, but I will not stay upon it; only take two brief Notes from it.

A good man is upright-hearted, and down-right in all his dealings and sayings.

There are no mockings with me, I am what I appear, and I appear what I am: An Hypocrite is full of tricks and shifts, he disguiseth both his person and his actions: No man can tell where to have him, or what to make of him. When he speaks, his words do not signifie what he means, if they signifie any thing; and when he acts, his works do not signifie what he is, they signifie any thing rather then that. All are mockings of others, though he will find in the end, that he hath mocked himself most all.

Secondly, As he joyns this with the next clause, There are no mockings with me, and yet mine eye continueth in their provocation. Note, that,

How plain-hearted soever a man is, yet it is very hard to perswade those who are once prejudiced against him that he is so.

Let Job say and profess what he would, yet he could not recover his credit, nor set himself right in the opinion of men till God did it for him (*Chap.*42.) But I pass that, Are there not mockers with me? What the mocking and scorning of Job's Friends was, hath been opened (*Chap.*12.4. Chap. 16.19.) And therefore I refer the Reader thither.

Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Should he not rather have said, Doth not mine ear continue, &c. Mocking is the object of the ear, and not of the eye. There are some mockings indeed, by mimical foolish gestures, and they are the object of the eye; but here Job speaks of what he had from them in conference, which is properly the business of the ear; and yet he saith, Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation? By the eye we are to understand the eye of the mind. Doth not mine eye? that is, Have I not a representation in my spirit, or upon my fancy of your mockings, and bitter provocations, even as if they were visible before mine eyes? Have I not night visions and apparitions upon my Bed, of what you speak or act against me every day?

Assidue in id oculos & mentis aciē intentā habeo quod me assidue irritant, in eo defixæ sunt omnes meæ cogitationes. Merc. Isti dies noctesq; nō cessant exacerbare animā meū. Jun. Intenta cogitatio somnū impedit.

Again, We may expound the Text properly of his bodily eye, because the trouble which they gave him in the day time, hindred his sleep in the night. The letter of the Hebrew favours this sense, Doth not mine eye lodge in their provocation? So we put in the Margin of our Bibles: Hence Mr. Broughton reads, In these mens vexing lodgeth mine eye; that is, When I go to Bed and hope to sleep, then in stead of lodging in my Bed, I lodge in the thoughts of my Friends unkindness; and indeed, a man may sleep better upon the bare boards, then upon hard words. Such words keep the eyes waking, and are as bad to sleep upon, as a pillow of thorns; especially when (which was Job's case) the eye continueth in them. Intentness of mind, or vehement cogitation about any thing, keep open the eyes, and forbid the approach of rest; Doth not mine continue?

Vel a מרר amarū esse. Sive à מרח quod est irritare sive exacerbare.

In their [provocations.] He called them Mockers, and their mockings were provocations. The word (as some derive it) signifies that which is bitter. Provocation is a bitter thing. Others derive it from a root signifying to irritate and stir up the spirit of a man; which is provocation properly. Provocation is a high act of wrong: A man may do another wrong, on this side a provocation. As the provocation of God is a high act of sin in man, ordinary acts of sin do not amount to a provocation (*Psal.*106.7.) They provoked him at the Sea (it is this word) even at the red Sea, that is, There they sinned extreamly. So (Psal. 95.8.) which the Apostle quotes (*Heb.*3.8.) The holy Ghost calls the whole time of that peoples froward walking, or sinning against God in the Wilderness, The provocation: Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation: that is, In the time when ye sinned, not only to the offending, but to the provoking of God against you, not to the breaking of his Laws, but to the vexing of his spirit. When sin is compleat, and iniquity grown to a full stature, that day is justly marked in the Calendar of Scripture, with a red letter, implying wrath, and is therefore called, The provocation: So when any man deals very unkindly, frowardly, or unfaithfully, against his Brother, then 'tis a provocation, Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Now for as much as the same word signifieth both bitterness and provocation, and that most provocations are given by uncharitable and unconsiderate speeches;

Observe, First, Unkind words are bitter to the hearer.

The Apostle gives the rule to Husbands (Col. 3.19.) Husbands love your Wives, and be not bitter to them: that is, Do not give them bitter words in stead of faithful counsels. Some Husbands speak their Gall to their Wives, to whom they have given their hearts. Among the Heathens the Gall of the Sacrifice which they superstitiously offered at Marriages, was pull'd out and thrown away, before it was presented at the Altar, signifying that Man and Wife should be (as Naturalists say the Dove is) without Gall one towards another. Wholsome counsels and admonitions monitions for the matter, are often adminiſtred with ſuch an undue mixture of heat and paſſion as renders them, not only diſtaſtful but hurtful to the receiver.

Secondly, Note, Harſh words carry much provocation in them.

ἵνα μὴ ἀθυμήσωσιν, ἀ-ϑυμέω, animum dejpendeo.

The ſame Apoſtle in the ſame Chapter enlarging his Inſtitutes for the direction of Believers in all Relations, beſpeaks Parents (*Verſ.*21.) Fathers provoke not your Children to anger: The word ſignifies any kind of provocation, but that eſpecially which is cauſed by contumelious and upbraiding ſpeeches. A Father provokes his Child, when he ſpeaks haſtily, and threatningly, terrifying his Child, rather then inſtructing him: The reaſon why Fathers ſhould not thus provoke their Children, is added, Leſt they be diſcouraged, or (as the word imports) be as if they were without ſouls, moop't (as we ſay) and heartleſs. For as there is a provocation (in a good ſenſe) which heightens the ſpirit in well-doing, and enlivens it for action: The Apoſtle exhorts to that (*Heb.*10.24.) Let us conſider one another to provoke one another to love, and to good works. That is, let us ſet ſuch copies of holineſs that others may be ſtirred up, beyond their ordinary pitch, and elevation of ſpirit, to a zealous doing of good: Or ſpeak ſuch winning words, give ſuch preſſing exhortations, that the hearts of your Brethren, may be carried beyond their uſual courſe in holineſs. Thus he tells the Corinthians (2 Epiſt. 9.2.) That their zeal had provoked many: But to what had it provoked them? Not to anger and paſſion, towards any, but to charity, yea and liberality towards the poor. And though the Apoſtle uſeth another word in the Greek, yet he means the ſame thing, when he aſſures us (*Rom.*11.11.) that the Jews ſtumbled, not that they ſhould fall (but that they might riſe) for ſo it follows, But rather through their fall ſalvation is come to the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealouſie. The ſalvation of the Gentiles bred emulation in the Jews, What? Shall they go away with all the ſalvation? Shall the Gentiles poſſeſs Heaven alone, whom we thought the meaneſt people upon the Earth? Come, let us alſo put in at leaſt for a part, and get a ſhare in Goſpel-mercies and priviledges with them. Thus they were provoked to emulation, and this emulation was and ſhall be (through the power of God, who is wonderful in counſel, and excellent in working) a help to faith in Chriſt, and ſo to their riſing from their fall. And the Apoſtle was ſo intent upon the promoting of this deſign of God, that he profeſſeth (*Verſ.*13,14.) that he magnified his Office among the Gentiles, not only to ſave them, but (ſaith he) If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my fleſh, and might ſave ſome of them: He hoped the Jews would, at laſt, believe for anger, or for very ſhame, and go to Heaven in a holy chaſe.

Now (I ſay) as there is a provocation which heats and hightens the mind of man to an eager purſuite of the beſt things; ſo there is a provocation which abates and blunts his edge, which chils and flats his ſpirits to any thing that is good, which was the ground of the Apoſtles dehortation, Provoke not your Children, leſt they be diſcouraged: And as the effect of ſuch provocations is to ſome a diſcouragement in doing their duty, ſo the effect of it in others is a thruſting them on to do that which is moſt contrary, not only to their duty, but to their diſpoſition.

Railing ſpeeches, uncomely and uncivil language, have provoked many, both to ſpeak, and to do that which they never dreamt of, or which was moſt remote from their natural temper and inclination. For though ſuch diſtempers lie in the bottom of nature, yet unleſs they had been ſtirred and ſpurred up, thoſe diſtempers would not have appeared and broken out. Moſes was the meekeſt man upon the earth, yet when they provoked his ſpirit, he ſpake unadviſedly with his lips (*Pſal.*106.33.) There are three ill effects of provocations.

Firſt, Provoking ſpeeches raiſe up hard thoughts of the ſpeaker. It is a high work of grace to think well of them, who ſpeak ill of us, or to us.

Secondly, Provoking ſpeeches blow up hard words of the ſpeaker; many excuſe it, when they give ill language, You provoked me: And though they be not to be excuſed who do ſo when they are provoked, yet their ſin is the greater, who provoke them.

Thirdly, Provoking ſpeeches are ſometimes the cauſe of revengeful practices, and very often of licentious practices. Sober admonitions and grave reproofs, reclaim thoſe who go aſtray, but violent rebukes make them deſperate. Some care not what they do when they hear others ſay they care not what. Many Children have run ill courſes by over much indulgence, and neglect of diſcipline; and ſo have not a few, by the over-much ſeverity and ſharpneſs of thoſe that are over them. Patience is hard put to it, to keep either mind or tongue or hand in compaſs, when we are provoked: Great provocations are great temptations. When God is provoked he is tempted (*Heb.*3.8.) Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the Wilderneſs, when your Fathers tempted me, &c. We may expound it two wayes.

Firſt, That while they tempted God, by queſtioning his power for them, and preſence with them, they provoked him, he was greatly diſpleaſed with them for it.

Secondly, That while they provoked God they tempted him, they tempted him to deſtroy them, or to act that power againſt them which they did not believe (after ſo many experiences) able enough to deliver or protect them. If then God himſelf be ſo tempted, that (as he is pleaſed often to expreſs himſelf after the manner of men) he can ſcarce hold his hands, or forbear to do that which he had no mind to do when he is provoked, how much more is weak man tempted to do that which his corruptions are alwayes forward enough (and too too much) to do, when he is provoked.

Again, When he ſaith, Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Learn, thirdly, Hard words ſtick upon the ſpirit.

They hang about the mind, and are not eaſily gotten off. Good words dwell much upon the ſpirit, and ſo do ill words. When a man hath once got a word of promiſe from God, about any mercy ſet home upon his heart, the eye continues in that conſolation: O it is a ſweet word, the ſoul lies ſucking at it night and day. And when a man hath once got a word of command from God about any duty ſet home upon his ſpirit, his eye continues in the direction of it. O how I love thy Law (ſaith David, *Pſal.*119.97.) It is my meditation all the day; he could not beat his thoughts off from it, when love had faſtned on it. As theſe good words cleave to a gracious ſoul, and dwell with it; ſo it is hard even for a gracious ſoul to diſlodge hard words: O how doth the eye continue in thoſe provocations? And doth not experience teach us, that vain thoughts thrown into the mind by Satan will not eaſily be driven out? How often doth the eye continue in his provocations? The ſpirit of a man hath a ſtrong retentive faculty, it will hold the object cloſe, and as it were live and lodge in it. How many make their abode in provocations, and reſide upon bitter words, received from their Brethren? How many lie down with them at night, and riſe with them in the morning; yea, and walk with their eye upon them all the day long? And here it may be queſtioned,

Was not this a ſin in Job? That rule of love then was in being, which is now expreſſed (*Epheſ.*4.26.) Be ye angry and ſin not, let not the Sun go down upon your wrath. Then, how could Job ſuffer his eye to continue in theſe provocations?

I anſwer, There was an infirmity in this; 'tis our duty, as to forgive, ſo to forget, or lay aſide the thought of injuries and wrongs received: And it is the Character of wicked men, They ſleep not unleſs they have done miſchief (*Pro.*4.16.) Their eye continues in their own corruption, or in the temptation of Satan till they have brought it forth. For as when good men have ſtrong impreſſions unto good upon their ſpirits, they cannot ſleep till they have done good, their eye continues in that holy provocation (*Pſal.*132.4.) I will not (ſaith zealous David) give ſleep to my eyes, nor ſlumber to my eye-lids, until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob: So wicked men give no ſleep to their eyes till they have done that miſchief, or executed that revenge to which they conceive themſelves provoked. But the eye of Job did not continue in thoſe unfriendly provocations, to watch an opportunity for ſelf-revenge upon, or of doing miſchief to his Friends: He did not let the Sun go down upon wrath, that he might deviſe their ruine in the dark. He was not ſo wiſe as he ſhould have been, to hurt himſelf, and hinder his reſt, by ſuch a contiual poring upon their unkindnesses; but he was not wicked at all, much less so wicked (which some from this passage may conceive him) as to pore upon their unkindnesses, with a purpose to hurt them: So, that act might have somewhat of sin in it, because he troubled his own peace more then he needed, but it had not this sin in it, that he studied how to trouble the peace of others.

Lastly, We may rather interpret these words to the blame of his Friends, who continued to provoke him, then to his, whose eye (because they did so) could see nothing but provocation, or at least must see that, whatsoever it saw, and therefore could not but continue in it. How could the eye of Hannah chuse but continue in the provocation of Peninnah, when it is said (*1 Sam.*1.6,7.) That as her Husband Elkanah gave her special tokens of his love, year by year, so she provoked her to make her fret year by year, therefore she wept and did not eat. While a provocation is continued, our sense of it can hardly be intermitted.

Job having complained of received provocations, renews his appeal to God.

Vers. 3. Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee: who is he that will strike hands with me?

The words are an Apostrophe to God. That Job speaks to God, not to Eliphaz, is clearer then needs be proved. The word which we render lay down, signifies also to appoint, (*Exod.*1.11.) They did set (or appoint) over them Task-masters. And again (*Exod.*21.13.) I will appoint thee a place whither he (the man-slayer) shall flee. In the present Text both rendrings of the word are used. We make use of the first, Put, or lay down: What would Job have God lay down?

Appone cor tuũ, i.e. adverte quæso animũ meis verbis. Vatabl.

Some give it thus, Lay down, or apply thine heart to me, attend I pray thee to my words, and consider my cause.

Secondly, The words may be conceived as an allusion to those, who going before a Judge, or having a Cause to be tryed by Umpires, use to lay down an ingagement, or as we call it, an Assumpsit, that they will stand to the award, or arbitrement, which shall be made.

Put me in a surety with thee.] The Original word properly signifying to undertake for, or to give credit and assurance in the behalf of another; and hence the Noun derived from it, signifies an earnest, because an earnest laid down, is a real surety, that such a thing shall be performed. In which sense Thamar useth the word (*Gen.*38.17.) who when Judah promised to send a Kid of the Goats, said, wilt thou give me a pledge till thou send it? and hence in the New Testament the word Arrabo is used in the Greek, as also in the Latine, for the earnest of the Spirit, or for that assurance which the Spirit settles upon the hearts of Believers in this life that they shall inherit eternal life (*2 Cor.*1.22.) Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the spirit in our hearts. And again (*2 Cor.*5.5.) Now he that hath wrought us for the self same thing is God: God having prepared a place for us, prepares us for the place, and then gives us our evidences, that in due time we shall take possession of it. Who also hath given us the earnest of the spirit. The same Apostle tells the Ephesians, that, After they believed they were sealed with the spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, till the redemption of the purchased possession (*Ephes.*1.14.) So that an earnest is a real Surety, and a Surety is a personal earnest. While Job saith, Put me in a Surety, his meaning is, he would have some person to be an undertaker for the ordering of his Cause, or an ensurer that all should be performed according to the determination that should be given about it, Put in a Surety with me.

Who is he that will strike hands with me?] He proceeds in the same allusion. These words are disposed two wayes: Some put the Interrogation after He; Give, or put me in a Surety: Who is he? I would gladly see the man, or know who it is; Who is he? let him come and strike hands with me, whosoever he is: As if he had said, I shall easily agree that any man should have the hearing and determining of this business, whom thou shalt appoint.

We put the Interrogation after the whole sentence, Who is he that will strike hands with me? And then the sense appears thus, If God once put in a Surety to undertake for me, who is he that will contend with me, or engage in this Quarrel against me?

To strike hands, is a phrase of speech grounded upon that ancient form of making bargains or entring contracts, by joyning, or striking hands: And these contracts may be taken two wayes, or under a double notion.

First, As they concerned Suretiship for Money, in which sense Solomon speaks of it more then once (*Prov.*6.1.) My Son, if thou be surety for thy Friend, if thou have stricken hands with a stranger; that is, if thou hast entred into Bond for him, and hast testified it by striking hands, then, &c. (Prov. 22.26.) Be not thou one of them that strike hands; that is, Be not too forward to engage thy self, or to undertake for others; as it is expounded in the next words, or of them that are Sureties for debts; such hasty engagements may bring thee into more trouble, then thou wilt be able to get off in hast: There are many who have struck, yea wounded their own hearts incurably, by striking hands for their Friends. Go to the Courts of Justice, and there is nothing more frequently heard of, then the sighs of Sureties: He dissassures his own Estate, who assures for others.

Hæc est sponsio quæ propriè ad nũmorũ negotiũ spectat. Aben Ezra. in Prov.6.

Secondly, As Contracts and Suretiship for Money were confirmed by striking hands; so it is very probable that those Suretiships which were given about Tryals, and for appearing to the Action of the Plantiff in Judgement, were also confirmed by that outward ceremony; in which sense we are to understand it here.

Further, The word which we translate to Strike, signifies also to Fasten, which shews another part of the Ceremony; for as striking, so joyning and clasping of hands was used.

Once more, the word signifies, and oft is applied to the sounding of a Trumpet, or the giving of any sound: This also carries on the same allusion, because when two men strike hands, they make a sound; the interpretation of which is, that the bargain is made, or it speaks the parties agreed; and hence that known expression among us, Of striking up a bargain, or a business.

Thus the whole Text is carried on in terms alluding to the ordinary proceeding, either in becoming Bound with another for Money, or in giving assurance to perform, and stand to the arbitrement, or award of those who shall judge, and determine any matter in difference: But how are we to apply this to the present case?

Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee: who is he that will strike hands with me?

There are three or four expositions given about it.

First, That Job, in these words, desires God to give surety that he would stand to the judgment which should be given: or he would have God assure him, that he would not deal with him according to the severity of his Justice, or the excellency of his Sovereignty as a Judge, but descend to such a course as is usual among men, while they are engaged in any controversie between themselves. Job hath spoken the same sense clearly before, in some other passages of this Book, especially (*Chap.*9.33,34.) But this sense is not clear to the scope of the present place: And therefore as they who maintain it, confess, that Job was somewhat too bold with God, so we may say that they are somewhat too bold with the Text.

Da fide-jussorẽ apud te, qui in hac contentione quæ mihi tecũ intercidit spondeat te statuturum iis quæ judicata fuerint; ut te non tanquã judicẽ geras sed tanquam litigatorẽ. Merc. Familiarius quã par erat cũ Deo agit. Merc.

For the reason or ground upon which Job desires that God would give him a surety, hath no correspondence with this interpretation (*Vers.*4.) For thou hast hid their heart from understanding. Now, what coherence is there between these two, that Job should say, Thou hast hid their heart (that is, the heart of these men) from understanding: therefore give me a surety that thou wilt proceed with me after the manner of men. Besides the words of the fifth Verse oppose it yet more, He that speaks flattery to his Friend, the eyes of his Children shall fail. Now, for Job to to desire God to put him in a Surety that he would deal thus, or thus with him, because the man who speaks flattery to his Friend, his Childrens eyes shall fail, hath no argument at all in it; yet the abetters of this Interpretation mollifie all, by saying, that Job spake from a disturbed spirit, being much moved with the ill-dealing of his Friends; and though there may be some inconsistence with the context, yet the Text considered in its own compass, bears it well enough; but I pass from it.

Secondly, That Job desires God to appoint a Surety between him and his Friends, who should undertake both God's Cause and his against them three: As if he had said, Lord, my Friends have wronged me, and they have wronged thee too, O that thou wouldest provide a man furnished with wisdom, and a spirit of discerning, both to right thy honour, and to clear up my integrity. Such a one was Elihu, who appeared shortly after upon the Stage, and there acted such a part as this.

Thirdly (say others) Job desires that God himself would be his Surety, and take up the whole matter between him and his Friends; which he also did in the latter end of this Book, giving judgement for Job, and blaming the miscarriage of his Friends. So the word is used (*Isa.*38.14.) when Hezekiah lay sick, even unto death, he prayed, Lord I am oppressed, undertake for me, It is this word, Be Surety for me. A learned Translatour renders it, Weave me through, or weave me to the end; for the word signifies the Thred in weaving, called the Woof, which being put upon the Shuttle, is cast through the Warp, in making Cloath, whither Linnen or Woollen; thus it is used (*Lev.*13.52.) and so these words of Hezekiah carry on the Allegory of the tenth Verse, I said in the cutting off of my dayes, &c. and of the twelfth Verse, I have cut off like a Weaver my life, he will cut me off with pining sickness. In both which Verses, Hezekiah compares man's life to a piece of Cloath in the Loom, which is made sometimes shorter, and sometimes longer, and whersoever it ends, the Woof, or running Thred is cut off: Hence Hezekiah prayeth, Lord, these sicknesses, like a sharp Knife, threaten to cut the threed of my life, yet I beseech thee, do thou weave on, weave me to the end of that Warp which is given to man, in the common course of nature, and let not this sickness cut my thred in the mid-way: This is a good sense of the Text.

Pertexe me. Jun.

But when our Translators render the word, Undertake for me; the meaning is, I am sore oppressed with the violence of this sickness, which like one of the Sergeants of cruel death hath arrested me, nor is there any way for me to escape, unless thou, O Lord, rescue me out of its hands, or (as it were) give Bail, and become surety for me: I am oppress, O Lord, undertake for me.

David having done a great piece of Justice which contracted him much envy, and had drawn many Enemies upon him, thus bespeaks God (*Psal.*119. 121, 122.) I have done judgement and justice, leave me not to mine oppressours, be surety for thy Servant: that is, maintain me against those who would wrong me because I have done right; put thy self, or interpose between me and mine Enemies, as if thou wert my pledge. Impartial justice upon oppressours, layes the Judges open to oppression; but they who run greatest hazzards, in zeal for God, shall find God ready to be their Surety, when they pray, Be surety for thy servants. And thus we may conceive Job entreating the Lord to be his Surety and Protectour against all those oppositions and misapprehensions which were heaped upon him by man. David was assured that God would be his Surety (*Psal.*27.5.) In the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion; and he assures all that fear God, that he will be their Surety (*Psal.*31.20.) Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence, from the pride of man: Thou shalt keep them secretly in a Pavilion, from the strife of tongues. To this sense the Vulgar Latine translates the whole Verse, Put me near thy self, and then let whose will contend with me; that is, Do thou stand by me, and undertake for me, and then I fear not who opposeth me: Which answers that of the Apostle (Rom. 8.) If God be with us, who can be against us.

Pone me juxtate & cujusvis manus pugnet contra me. Vulg.

This exposition holds out a comfortable truth to us, yet The Text seems to aim at somewhat else; for the words are not barely, Put me in a surety, but, Put me in a surety with thee; which shewes that God and the Surety he desired, were two, or distinct; his prayer was not that God would be his Surety, but that he might have a Surety with God. And therefore,

Fourthly, The whole Verse is thus read word for word out of the Original; Appoint I pray thee, my Surety with thee, who is he then that will strike upon my hand; that is, Appoint Christ, who is with thee in Heaven (and hath already agreed with thee, to be the Surety of distressed sinners, appoint him I say) to plead my cause, and to stand up for me, and then no man will dare to contend with me. So the words are of the same meaning with (Chap. 16.21.) where Job having made his appeal to God, declares his confidence that Christ would plead for him, and appear his Advocate.

Hence Observe, First, Jesus Christ is not only an Advocate for his people, but their Surety.

He doth not only plead our cause, but pay our debts. Christ entered into Bond for us, and took all our debts and duties, whatsoever we owe to God, upon Himself, to see all performed, that we might go free, and be accepted (*Heb.*7. 22.) By so much was Jesus made the surety of a better Testament. Where the same word which is here used by Job, is (with the difference only of that Dialect) used also in the Syriack version of that Epistle. Jesus Christ may be called the Surety of the Covenant two wayes.

First, Because he ratifies it on Gods part, making Faith of it unto us, or assuring us that all the mercies and good things therein granted and promised, shall be made good, and fulfilled to every Believer; as the Apostle concludes (2 Cor. 1. 20.) For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen: that is, He will give a being and an accomplishment to them all. Whatsoever God hath spoken, he will see it done.

Secondly, Jesus Christ is called the Surety of the Covenant because he ratifies it on our part: For though (as Socinians object against this point) we sent not Christ unto God in our name, but God sent him to us in his name, yet Christ did undertake, as in our nature, so in our name, and did restipulate with God on our behalf, that whatsoever was owing to his justice and holiness by man, either as a penalty for past defaults, or as a duty to present commands, should all be satisfied and performed by himself: And as Christ (being our Surety) did both these in his own person, by active and passive obedience, so far as it was satisfactory; so (as a Surety) he helps us to perform the latter so far as it is gratulatory. For whatsoever duty God requires of us, and calls us to, in testimony of our thankfulness for his benefits, and of our submission to his will, this Christ undertakes to his Father that we shall do, and accordingly out of his fulness gives us grace and strength to do it.

Secondly, Observe, If Christ be Surety for us, we need not fear any opposer.

Put me in a Surety with thee (saith Job) who will strike hands with me: who will contend with me, or sue me? When either the Money or duty which a man is bound to pay, is already paid by his Surety, or is undertaken for by a Surety, who is not only able but willing to pay; what needs he to fear? The Creditor cannot Arrest the Debtor, if the Surety have discharged and cancel'd the Bond. Thus the Apostle teaches Faith to triumph (*Rom.*8.33,34.) Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods Elect? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth; it is Christ who died, yea rather who is risen again? Job's challenge, Who is he that will strike hands with me? is very parallel in words, and full to the sense of Pauls, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods Elect?

Thirdly, Observe, Our Surety is of Gods appointing, not of our own.

Appoint, I pray (saith Job) put me in a surety with thee. We sinned of our selves, but we could not find a Surety of our selves. God sent his Son, made of a Woman, made under the Law, to deliver those that were under the Law (Gal. 4. 4.) God sent his Son, man did not send for him, no nor sue for him: The way of our deliverance was as much from the will and wisdom of God as from his mercy (*Heb.*10. 10.) By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. It was as impossible for man to contrive this way of his deliverance, as it was to deliver himself. Job did not direct God to this way of acquitting by a Surety, but God having revealed it to Job, he prays for the effect and comfort of it, to his own soul: when a Believer burdened with sin, or distressed by temptation, spreads his condition, and makes his moan to God, he in effect begs of him (as Job here did) to appoint and put him in a Surety with him, by perswading his heart, that Jesus Christ became bound for him, and hath discharged all his engagements according to that eternal Decree and Ordination of saving lapsed man by his mediation.

To

To which Ordination Jesus Christ most willingly consented, as the Apostle expresseth it (*Heb.*10.9.) Then said I, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God, &c. Which readiness and freeness of Jesus Christ to undertake for us, is also elegantly described by the Prophet Jeremiah (*Chap.*30.21.) by that very word which Job useth in this place, For who is this, that engageth his heart to approach unto me, saith the Lord? The Jews had been long under the Babylonian yoke, and their Governours were either strangers, or appointed by strangers. But the Lord promised in this Verse, that their Nobles should be of themselves, and that their Governour should proceed from the midst of them: Which was verified, when God turned their Captivity as Rivers in the South, and raised up Zerubbabel, and others of the Jewish line, to reassume the Government of Judah. But this Prophesie was chiefly intended and verified in a spiritual sense, when God sent Jesus Christ, a Governour, proceeding from the midst of them (of whom Zerubbabel was but a type) for of him the Lord speaks chiefly in this admiring Question, Who is this, that engageth his heart to approach unto me? Or who is this that with his heart (that is, with so much chearfulness and willingness) hath put himself as a surety for this people with me, to approach to me in their cause, and to take upon him the dispatch of all their affairs and concernments with me in the Court of Heaven? Who is this great, this forward Engager, but he who also said, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God? What will came he to do? Even this, To be a Surety, and so a Sacrifice to God for sinners (Heb. 10.) Thus the whole business of our deliverance, and the first motions to it, lay quite without us. God appointed and put in Christ our surety with him, and Christ freely condescended to be our surety, knowing that the whole debt must lie upon his discharge: Put me in a surety with thee.

But here it may be doubted, how this notion of a Surety, suites with this place, seeing Job's controversie was with man, not with God; and himself also had professed that all was clear for him in Heaven.

I answer, That although men accused Job, yet their accusation reach'd not his peace with God: for had he been such a one as they represented him, he must needs have fallen under the divine displeasure, more then he did under theirs. And therefore while he pleaded Not-guilty to their charge, he begs further discoveries of the favour of God to him through the Mediatour, by the remembrance of whose Suretiship his heart was confirmed in the pardon of all his sinful failings against God, whereof he was guilty, as well as his heart told him that he was not guilty of those wilful sins wherewith he was accused by men. When we lie under wrongful accusations, of which we indeed need no surety to acquit us, it is good to view and renew our Interest in the Surety, who will acquit us where there is need.

Job proceeds to re-inforce the reason why he desired God to undertake, or to provide a Surety for him.

Vers. 4. Thou hast hid their heart from understanding, therefore shalt thou not exalt them.

Or, Thou hast hid understanding from their heart. As if he had said, Thou hast cast such a mist before the eyes of these men, who mock me, and judge me wicked, that they are unfit to be trusted with the determination of my cause; for did they not want a due light of understanding, they might quickly discern my integrity, and clear me from their own suspitions. God sometimes (as it were) wraps, or folds up the hearts of the Children of men in ignorance, blindness, and darkness, and so hides not only understanding from their hearts, but their hearts from understanding. As God is said to circumcise the heart, to open the eyes, to take away the vail, when he gives the knowledge of his truth; so he is said to blind the eyes, to cover the heart with fat, and to cloud the understanding, when he denies, or withholds the knowledge of the truth: Thou hast hid their hearts from understanding.

שכל Est mens, ratio, intellectus, dexteritas in agendo.

The word which we translate Understanding, signifies any of, or all the intellectual powers, together with a readiness, or activity for dispatch in any service we are called unto, Thou hast hid their heart from understanding, therefore they do but bungle at the business, and cannot judge aright; they cannot discern the manner of thy dispensations towards me, nor see the bottom of my condition. Job did not censure his Friends as fools, or ignorant, as if they were witless, or worthless men; they were wise and learned, yea honest and godly too. But when Job saith, Thou hast hid their heart from understanding, we are to restrain it to the matter in hand, or to his particular case: As if he had said, Thou hast hid the understanding of what thou hast done to me from their hearts; thy providences are mysteries and riddles which they cannot unfold; and as they know not the meaning of what thou dost, so they know not my meaning, when I said (*Chap.*9.17.) He hath multiplyed my wounds without cause; Nor when I said (*Vers.*22.) He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked. These sayings are secrets to my Friends: Now, Lord, for as much as these men have no true insight in this present controversie, therefore I beg that thou wouldest undertake for me, or put me in a surety with thee.

Further, For the clearing of this Scripture, it may be questioned: First, how God is said to hide the heart from understanding? God doth this four wayes.

First, By speaking darkly, or in such a manner, as the understanding cannot easily find a passage to the things that are spoken. A Parable is a dark saying: And when Christ Preached in Parables, His Disciples came and said unto him, Why speakest thou to them in Parables? (*Mat.*13.10.) Now among other reasons which Christ was pleased to give of that dispensation, this was one (*Vers.*14.) In them is fulfilled the Prophesie of Isaiah, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand: and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive. As if Christ had said, These men have justly deserved to be punished with spiritual darkness (which is not Understanding) and therefore I have spoken to them in a dark way. They did not hear to obey what was plain and easie to be understood, and therefore now they shall hear what they cannot understand.

Secondly, God hides the heart from understanding, by denying, or not giving light; and that a twofold light.

First, The outward light of his Word: Thus all those people are said to sit in darkness, that is, to have no understanding in the things of God, where the Gospel is not published.

Secondly, By denying, or not giving the inward light of his Spirit, though the light of the World abound. For as a man may have the Sun shining in his face, and yet be in the dark, if he wants eye-sight: So (as the Apostle speaks, 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.) the Gospel is hid in the most glorious shining of it to those, whose minds the God of this World hath blinded. Now, every man is born spiritually blind, or he is blind by nature, and he is blinded by the God of this World, till the God of all Worlds sends his spirit with the Word for the opening of his eyes.

Thirdly, God hides the heart from understanding, as by not giving, so by withdrawing the light which he hath given. Many have forfeited their eye-sight and their light, and God hath taken the forfeiture of them: Which he doth first, when men are proud of the light, and puft up with knowledge. Secondly, when men are unthankful for the light, and will not acknowledge God the giver of it. Thirdly, when men grow wanton or vain in the light, when they abuse it, and having the light walk in darkness. All which reasons of Gods withdrawing light, as many Scriptures testifie, so they are all testified in that one Scripture (Rom. 1. 21, 22.)

Fourthly, As God may be said to hide the heart from understanding, by a total withdrawing of light, so by withholding it for a time, or in part, by clouding or eclipsing it. God hides the heart of some men from understanding, only in such a point, or at such a season, giving them light in other things, yea and in that thing too at another season. This fourth way I conceive most proper to this Text of Job; for his freinds were not under that terrible judgment of a total hiding their hearts from understanding; only the light was with-held from them in and about that transaction. As when Christ after his Resurrection appeared to those Disciples (Luke 24. 26.) the Text saith, Their eyes were held, that they should not know him. And (Vers. 31.) There eyes were opened, and they knew him: Thus God at one time holds the intellectual eye of some good men, that they cannot discern such or such a Truth, yet afterwards he opens their eyes and they discern it.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, The wiſeſt men do not ſee all truths, nor are they able to judge of all matters.

Theſe were wiſe men, very wiſe men; they ſpake excellent things, and very underſtandingly about God, they gave Job very good counſel, but yet they failed here. Elihu (Chap. 32.9.) ſaith, Great men are not always wiſe; we may ſay wiſe men are not always wiſe: and as no man is wiſe at all times, ſo there is no man wiſe in all things. We cannot conclude, that becauſe a man hath given a right judgement in ſome one, or in many points, that therefore we may truſt his deciſions in all points. As God hides all wiſdom from ſome men, ſo he very rarely, if at all, truſts any one man or ſort of men at one time with all wiſdom. Job's Friends were well acquainted with, and they have acquainted us with many excellent notions about that great Doctrine of Providence, but they were much miſtaken about the Providence of God with Job, nor did they ſhew themſelves acquainted with that excellent Deſign of God in his afflicting Providences, thereby to try the ſtrength and manifeſt the graces which he hath beſtowed upon his people.

Secondly, Obſerve, The hiding of the heart from, and the opening of the heart to underſtanding, are the work of God.

We ſee no further then God gives us light, and ſo far as he leads us, we go right; if he withdraw, we turn aſide, and quickly wander from the way of truth and righteouſneſs. We have nothing of our own but ſin and ignorance, wiſdom is of God; Every good and perfect gift comes from above. As God hides all Goſpel-truths and myſteries from worldly wiſe men; ſo no Goſpel-myſtery is known to any man till God diſcover and make it known (Matth. 11.25.) At that time Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, becauſe thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe and prudent, but haſt revealed them unto babes. By wiſe and prudent, he means worldly wiſe men, meer Philoſophers and Politicians, or Hypocritical Profeſſors, ſuch as the Scribes and Phariſees were, from theſe God (in judgement) hides the things of the Kingdom of Heaven, and reveals them unto Babes; even to ſuch as are at the greateſt diſtance in natural conſiderations from the capacity of ſuch rich and heavenly manifeſtations. There is no greater argument, that God opens the heart to underſtand, then to ſee Babes underſtand: If true knowledge in ſpiritual myſteries were from man, they who have moſt of man in them would have moſt of that knowledge; but we are taught by experience, that ſuch men as the World calls Fools, do not err in the way of holineſs (Iſa. 35.8.) And that the courſe of all Worldly wiſe men, is a continual erring from that way, and that ſome godly men, who are higher by head and ſhoulders then ſome of their Brethren in natural wiſdom, have run into, and maintained errours; whither can we aſcribe all this, but to the power of God? Moſes ſpeaks of the many ſigns and miracles which God wrought in the midſt of that people, which they did not underſtand: Why, what was the reaſon? Moſes tells us expreſly, what, Yet the Lord hath not given you a heart to conceive, nor eyes to ſee, nor ears to hear to this day (*Deut.*29.4.) They had ſenſitive eyes and ears, yea, they had a rational heart or mind, but they wanted a ſpiritual eye to ſee, a ſpiritual ear to hear, a ſpiritual heart or mind to apprehend and improve thoſe wonderful works of God: And theſe they had not, becauſe God had not given them ſuch eyes, ears, and hearts. Wonders without grace, cannot open the eyes fully, but grace without wonders can. And as man hath not an eye to ſee the wonderful works of God ſpiritually; until it is given; ſo, much leſs hath he an eye to ſee the wonders of the Word of God, till it be given him from above; and therefore David prays (*Pſal.*119.18.) Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wonderous things out of thy Law. And if the wondrous things of the Law, are not much ſeen till God give an eye, then much leſs are the wondrous things of the Goſpel. The light of nature ſhews us ſomewhat of the Law, but nothing of the Goſpel was ever ſeen by the light of nature: Many who have ſeen and admired ſome excellencies in the Law, could never ſee and therefore have derided that which is the excellency of the Goſpel, till God hath opened their heart to underſtanding.

Thirdly obſerve, It is a great judgement to have our hearts hidden from underſtanding in the things of God.

It is a ſore judgement not to have the light, but it is a ſorer judgement not to ſee by the light when we have it. To have a heart hid from underſtanding, is far worſe then to have a heart unable to underſtand. Our inability to underſtand, ariſeth two wayes.

Firſt, From a natural infirmity in the underſtanding.

Secondly, From the natural obſcurity of the matter preſented to the underſtanding.

Plain truths are not apprehended by a weak underſtanding, and the ſtrongeſt underſtanding cannot apprehend ſome obſcure truths, as the Apoſtle Peter ſaith of S. Paul's Epiſtles, that in them there are ſome things hard to be underſtood (*2 Pet.*3.16.) Now as there is an affliction in it, not to be able to underſtand any truth which God hath revealed for our uſe, ſo there is much wrath and judgment in it, when God hides underſtanding from the heart in any of thoſe things which he hath revealed for our uſe; but eſpecially in thoſe things which are neceſſary, either to our future, or our preſent peace. Thus the Prophet Iſaiah was ſent to preach that people blind, and deaf, and ignorant (Chap. 6.9, 10.) Go tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but underſtand not, and ſee ye indeed, but perceive not: Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and ſhut their eyes, leſt they ſee with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and underſtand with their hearts, and convert and be healed: As if the Lord had ſaid, This people ſhall want neither means nor Miniſters, neither word nor light; but they ſhall reap no benefit neither by means nor Miniſters, neither by word nor light; yea, all theſe means ſhall produce contrary effects, they ſhall be hardned and not ſoftned, blinded and not enlightned, their ears ſhall be deafned, not bored by the Word. They would not hear, therefore they ſhall not; they would not underſtand, therefore they ſhall not be able to underſtand. They who refuſe the offers of mercy, ſhall be deſtroyed with the offers of mercy. And as God doth often take away the Goſpel in wrath, ſo he ſometimes ſends it in wrath. It is a great miſery to have the Goſpel hid from a people for want of revelation, but it is loweſt miſery to have it hid in the revelation. Jeruſalem ſignifies, The viſion or ſight of peace; and this was the glory of Jeruſalem; yet at laſt this glory was taken from Jeruſalem, though her name continued; Jeruſalem (the ſight of peace) could not ſee her peace (*Luk.*19.41,42,43.) When Chriſt came near to Jeruſalem, He beheld the City, and wept over it, ſaying, If thou hadſt known, even thou, at leaſt in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace: What then? Chriſt ſuppreſſes the happineſs which they ſhould have enjoyed by ſuch a ſight, with a ſilent admiration; and only tells them weeping, But now they are hid from thine eyes; How hid? Was there no more Preaching in Jeruſalem, no publick Miniſtry after that day? Yes, the whole Colledg of Apoſtles preached there, and they preached the things which belonged both to their temporal, and to their eternal peace; yet as the things which belonged to their eternal peace, were hidden from moſt of their eyes, ſo the things which concerned their temporal peace, were hidden from ſo many of their eyes, that their ruine was unavoidable. God hid their heart from underſtanding, therefore he did not exalt them; yea, therefore he caſt them down.

Thus Job deſcribes the ſequel of that ſad diſpenſation to his Friends, Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding: What follows?

Therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them.] Mr. Broughton renders it; Therefore thou ſhalt not give them Honour: And is this all, that they ſhall not be exalted or honoured? No, the Negative hath this Affirmative in it, Thou wilt therefore caſt them down, or humble them: As (*Prov.*17.21.) Solomon ſpeaks of the Father of a Fool, He that begets a Fool, doth it to his ſorrow, and the Father of a Fool hath no joy: Is that all, that he hath no joy? No, the meaning is that the Father of a Fool, hath much ſorrow; yea, the denial of all joy, affirms more then the feeling of much ſorrow, for it ſpeaks all ſorrow. So, to accept perſons in judgement is not good; that is extream ill: There is nothing worſe then that, which in this ſenſe is not good. Thus here, thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding, therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them: that is, Thou ſhalt humble and abase them; and though Non-exaltation, in this place, doth not carry all kind, or the extremity of abasement, yet it carries a very great abasement: Why? What was this abasement, or Non-exaltation?

We may interpret it two ways. Thou shalt not exalt them, that is,

First, Thou shalt not give them this honour to determine my cause; thou wilt take the matter out of their hands into thine own, or thou wilt put it into some other hand.

Secondly, Thou shalt not exalt them to the honour of a conquest over me, or to carry the cause against me; yea, they shall be overthrown, and the cause shall go against them: Both these ways answer the event. Job's three Friends had neither the honour to end this controversie, nor did they at all prevail in the end; they went not away with victory, nor could they glory, that they had got the day of Job: Thou shalt not exalt them.

Hinc colligo te nolle ut de reportata super me victoria glorientur. Bold.

Note hence, First, Exaltation is from God.

Promotion comes neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South; that is, it comes not by the power of any creature, in any coast or quarter of the earth. Whence comes it then? The next Verse directs us, For God is the Judge, he putteth down one, and setteth up another (Psal. 75.6,7.) We can no more make our selves great men, then, we can make our selves men: Our civil frame is as much from God as our natural; by what hand soever we are exalted, it is God that exalts us.

Secondly, Observe, God hides understanding from them, whom he is about to abase, or cast down.

The fall of most men is from their own folly, and usually God takes away their wisdom, whose honour he takes away. They shall not see the way to their own preservation, who are intended for destruction. All Ages have taught us this Doctrine in the downfal of the greatest Princes; who have refused all counsels and overtures for their own good, till their evils have psoved past cure, and themselves irrecoverably lost. That which a Child might foresee, they have had no eyes to see, nor hearts to consider: because God would either not exalt them, or not establish them in their exaltations, therefore he hid their hearts from understanding the things of their own peace. Fools are not fit to be exalted to high places, and when once we see those who are in high places, acting the foolish man, we shall soon see them tumbling down from their high places, and acting the miserable man. Some who were never very wise, have been exalted to, and continued in high places; but there was scarce ever any man, who (in this sense) lost his wits, that hath either been exalted to a high place, or continued in his exaltation.

Quos perdere vult Jupiter hos dementat.

Thirdly, Considering those particulars wherein the Non-exaltation here propheſied of, did consist.

Observe, It is an honour to hear and judge the cause of another man.

God is the Judge of all the Earth, he will hear and determine the causes and cases of all mankind. He that hath the hearing but of any one case, shares in this honour of God, and they who are set apart by office to do so, are called Gods (Psal. 82.) God puts so much of his own work into the hand of a Judge, that he therefore puts his own name upon him.

Again, We may look upon Job's Friends, not as Judges of his case, but as Parties, putting in their accusation, and pleading against him.

Hence observe, It is an honour, and an exaltation to win the day in any cause, or to get the better.

Whatsoever the contention be, or in what way soever managed, whether by the Sword, or by the Tongue, or by the Pen, to be victorious in it, is honourable; and he that loses his causes, loses much of his credit also. And though prevailing, or success doth not at all justifie the matter (it is the matter which must justifie the success) yet success doth alwayes exalt the man. He that overcomes in a dispute carries away the honour, though possibly he carry not away the truth.

Lastly, From the connexion of this with the former part of the Verse, Observe, They who maintain errour among men, shall not find favour with God.

A heart hid from understanding is hid from the truth; God loves his truth so well, that he will not exalt those who depress his truth. Job's Friends being left in the dark (as to that point in question) did not speak of God the thing that was right (Chap. 42.7.) And therefore the Lord said to Eliphaz, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two Friends. Though an errour be held unknown and in zeal for God (as they did) yet the jealousie of God waxeth hot against such: These repenting were, and such as they, repenting, may be pardoned, but they shall nor be exalted. And if they who for want of light of knowledge, and in much heat of honest zeal, defend a lesser errour (such was theirs) shall not be exalted, how will the Lord cast them down who broach, and spread blasphemous errours, and damnable Doctrines, in a time of clear light, and against frequent admonitions, if not convictions? Whosoever (saith Christ, Mat. 5.19.) shall break one of these least Commandments, and teach men so (joyning the errour of his practice with, or turning it into the errour of his opinion) he shall be called least (that is, nothing at all, or No-body) in the Kingdom of Heaven: And he who is nothing in the Kingdom of Heaven, is not exalted, how high soever he may get in the Kingdoms of the earth. And if the teacher of errour against the least Commandment of the Law shall have no place in Heaven, where will their place be who teach errours against the greatest Commandments of the Law, yea against the most precious and absolute necessary principles and foundations of the Gospel?

Vers. 5. He that speaks flattery to his friends; even the eyes of his Children shall fail.

There is some variety in expounding these words; because of the several notions into which the Original is rendred: As we read the Text, it is a plain affirmation of judgment upon the posterity of Flatterers.

The word which we translate Flattery signifies in the Verb to divide into parts, and hence in the Noun, a lot or portion, because every lot or portion is divided from the whole; it signifies also a prey or booty, which men take in War, or which Thieves and Robbers take from Travellers upon the high way, and that upon the former reason, because when a prey is taken, they divide, or cast it into several portions, or parts: Hence also (say some) it signifies to flatter; because the tongue of a flatterer is divided from his heart.

Further, It signifieth to smooth and polish, or (as we say) to make a thing very glib and neat. This comes nearest our translation; for a flatterer hath a smooth, polished tongue, and his trade is to smooth, or sooth both things and persons. The flatterers tongue is like the Harlots tongue, to whom this word is applied (*Prov.*7.21.) With much fair speech, she caused him to yield, with the flattering of her lips (with the smoothness, or as some translate, with the lenity of her lips) she forced him: Flattery seems to be far from force, yet nothing puts, or holds men under a greater force then flattery.

He that speaks flattery to his friend.] Flattery is a special language, though it be spoken in all languages. Men learn to speak flattery, even as we learn to speak Latine, French, Italian, Spanish, or any other Language: Flattery is an Art, it hath rules of its own, and terms of its own; he that speaks flattery: Mr. Broughton in this place calls it, Vain-goodly-speech: And the Apostle Paul calls it, Good words, and fair speeches (*Rom.*16.18.) The expressions which the Apostle useth, are most proper to the description of flattery; they are both Compounds, as the spirit of the Flatterer also is: He hates simplicity, or singleness of heart, making a shew of much goodness in word, but is void of deed and substance: He promiseth fair, and when he speaks, you would think he minded nothing, or were solicitous about nothing but the Honour and advantage of him to whom he speaks, when indeed he minds nothing but himself, and self-concernments, as the Apostle in that place deciphers him; He serves not our Lord Jesus Christ, but his own belly, and by his good words and fair speeches, he deceives the hearts of the simple. The Greeks have another characteristical word for this sort of men, by which they mean all such as seem to carry it fair with all men, but maintain true friendship with no man; we may call them Men-pleasers, but Self-seekers. As also one of the old Emperours had his Sur-name from that word used by the Apostle in the place last mentioned; because he was observed very ready to give all men good words, but had no regard to do good, yea, he did very much evil; or as another gives the reason, because he was a Fawning Prince, rather then a kind one. Job seems to charge his Friends, that they were men of such a temperament, and had rather fawn'd upon him then been real friends to him.

Hæc est blandities quæ à Græcis vocatur ἀρεσκεία, & Aristoteles vulgò ἀρεσκοὺς, appellari docet eos, qui comiter cum omnibus cõversantur, sed veram amicitiam cũ nemine colunt. Arist. l. 8. ad Nico. Pertinax Imperator dictus χερσολόγος quod blandus esset magis quã benignus. Bez. in loc. ex Aurelio. Vict.

But here it may be questioned, Why doth Job speak his Friends speakers of flattery? He had little reason to complain he was flattered; and we find him often complaining that he was roughly dealt with: Job heard few polished, or buttered words, but bitter words great store, why then doth he say, He that speaks flattery to his friend?

We may understand it two wayes.

In reference to { Job. / God.

First, His Friends had spoken flattery to him; for though in some things they were very severe and harsh, yet in other things he might interpret their sayings to be but soothings; they made him large promises of a restauration, that his estate should be like the morning, that he should out-shine the very Sun, and be a great man again. Thus they spake (*Chap.*5,19,20. *Chap.*8.5. *Chap.*11.15,16, &c.) he looked on all these fair promises as flatteries, because in his own thoughts he was a dead man, and his calamities past all hope of recovery in this World. As if he had said, Why do you feed me with such vain hopes, and propheſie to me of Wine, and of strong drink, of earthly honour and riches, of length of dayes, and of a multitude of years yet behind in the race of this present life; I cannot but call this flattery, and a departure from the laws of friendship: For alas! My dayes are extinct, my breath is corrupt, and yet you are telling me of long life, and good dayes in this World. And indeed this is at once the custom and the fault of many who visit their Friends upon the borders of death; they think they are not friendly, unless they labour to give them hopes of life, and deliver their opinion peremptorily, We doubt not but you will do well enough, you will recover from this sickness, and getting over this brunt, see many dayes. This is flattery: it is our duty to speak comfortably to our dying Friends, to set forth the love of God, and his readiness to pardon, to prepare them for a better life, and to make their passage out of this more easie: But when we see them at the Graves mouth; when death is ready to seize on them, then to tell them of long life, is rather the office of a Flatterer then of a Friend. We shew more love to our dying Friends, by offering our counsels, and tendering up our prayers for their fitness to depart out of this life, then by shewing our desire, that they should live, and our loathness to part with them.

Is est χερσολόγος qui verbis multũ pollicetur nihil præstat. Bez. Blanditur dum externa bona illi pollicebantur. Merc.

Secondly, Job's Friends may be said to speak flattery to God; and then the words are an Argument from the greater to the less; as if he had said, If he who speakes flattery to his friend, a man like himself, shall be punished, then much more shall he, who speaks flattery to God. But, you will say, How can God be flattered? There are two wayes of flattering men.

First, By promising them more then we intend.

Secondly, By applauding them more then they deserve.

When we cry up those for wise men who are little guilty of wisdom; or commend those as good, who are very guilty of evil; both these are strains of flattery: It is impossible to flatter God in this latter sense, for we cannot speak of God higher then he is; his glory, wisdom, and goodness, are above, not only our words, but our thoughts. But we may flatter God in the first sense, by promising him more then we intend; they on their sick beds do but flatter God, who tell him how good and holy they will be, when their hearts are not right with him: Yet neither is this flattery of God which Job may be supposed to suggest against his friends. The flattery here suggested, is their justifying the proceedings of God in afflicting Job, by condemning Job; as if there had been no way left to clear up the righteousness of God, but by concluding that Job was unrighteous: This manner of arguing, Job calls, Speaking wickedly for God, and talking deceitfully for him: This he also calls, The accepting of his person (*Chap.*13.7,8.) As if they had been the Patrons and Promoters of Gods cause and honour, while they thus pleaded against Job, and laid his honour and innocency in the dust. That there is a sinful flattery of God in such a procedure against man, was shewed more largly in the place last mentioned, to which I refer the Reader for his further satisfaction.

He that speaks flattery to his friend, What of him? The next words tell us what.

The eyes of his Children shall fail.] But shall he himself escape? Shall not he smart for it? Saith not the Scripture, Whatsoever a man sowes, that shall he reap: the sower shall be the reaper.

This is not spoken to free the Flatterer from punishment, but to shew that more then he shall be punished for his flattery; as he himself shall not escape, so he may bring others also into danger with him: As sin spreads it self in the pollution of it, so in the punishments of it. When but one sins, many may be defiled, and when but one acts a sin, many may be endangered; a man knows not upon how many he may bring evil, when he doth ill himself.

The eyes of his Children shall fail. What is meant by the failing of the eyes, was shewed (*Chap.*11.20.) where Zophar saith, The eyes of the wicked shall fail, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost. In general 'tis this, They shall be disappointed of their hopes, or they shall expect so long and nothing come, that their eyes shall fail with expectation, The eyes of his Children shall fail.

Morũ atque vitæ imitatores. Aquin.

Some by Children, understand, not his natural Children, or the Children of his body, but his Children in a figure, such as imitate and follow him, who take his course, and tread in his paths; for as they are called the Children of the Devil, who are like him, and do his works; and as we are called the Children of God, not only in reference to our new birth and spiritual generation, but also in reference to our new obedience and holy actions (*Mat.*5. 44,45.) So they may be called a mans Children, who resemble him in his manners, as well as they who issued from his loins.

Hence Note, First, The punishment of sin doth not alway rest or determine in him that committed the sin.

The bitter fruits of sin are often transmitted, and handed over to those who had no present hand in them when they were committed. The whole Family and Posterity of sinners may smart many a day after, and inherit the sins of their Progenitors, as well as their Lands; when the Father purchaseth, or provides an Inheritance for his Child by flattery, or any other indirect way, the eyes of his children may fail for it. I have met with this point before (*Chap.*15. 33,34.) and elswhere, therefore I only touch and pass from it.

Secondly, Consider the particular sin against which this judgement is pronounced: It is the speaking of flattery.

Hence Observe, The sin of flattery is a very provoking sin.

That sin which shall be punished in posterity, is no ordinary sin: Those good actions which the Lord promiseth to reward in posterity, or in after-times, have a special excellency in them: It shewed that the deed of Jehu, in destroying Ahabs House, and rooting out his Idolatry (though Jehu himself was a very bad man, and did it with a bad heart, yet I say, it shewed that the deed) was very good, because the Lord promised to reward his Children for it, with the possession of the Throne of Israel to the fourth generation (2 *King.*10.30.) Now as those acts have a great deal of excellency in them, for which God rewards and blesseth to posterity; so those sins have a special malignity in them, which are threatened and pursued with revenges to Posterity: Such sins have a touch of the first sin in them. The punishment of Adams first sin is hereditary to the last man; all have smarted for that sin, and the eyes of his Children have failed, because he looked upon, and eat the forbidden fruit. Now every sin which is thus spoken of in Scripture, as Idolatry in the second Commandment, and here flattery, hath a special stamp of the first sin upon it; not only as being a ſin, and ſo a derivative from it, but as having much of the ſinfulneſs of that ſin in it: The evils of which did not dye with thoſe who gave it life.

And as all flattery is very ſinful, ſo ſpiritual flattery, or flattery about ſpiritual things, is moſt ſinful; both becauſe about them we ought to be moſt plain-hearted, and becauſe a deceit about them doth moſt hurt. Any kind of flattery is bad enough, but this is worſt; ſuch was that of the falſe Prophets, Who daubed with untempered morter, and cryed, Peace, peace, when there was no peace: Who ſet themſelves to pleaſe, not to inſtruct the people, and were therefore buſie in ſewing pillows under every elbow. A flatterer would make all men lean ſoft, ſit eaſie, and be well perſwaded of themſelves, though their caſe be ſtark naught: He that thus ſpeaks flattery to his friend, doth indeed ſpeak miſery, yea, and death to his friend. The flatterer is the greateſt hater, and no man ſpeaks worſe of another then he who ſpeaks better of him then he deſerves, or then his ſtate will bear. It is dangerous to ſpeak all the good of a man that is true; but to ſpeak good of him which is not true, may be his utter undoing.

And though it hath been ſaid, and often experienced, that flattery gains friends, and truth ſpeaking hatred; yet none have run into ſo much hatred as flatterers. For as it is ſaid of Treaſon, That many love the Treaſon, but all hate the Traytor; ſo many love to hear themſelves flattered, but all hate Flatterers. And though true reproofs are bitter Pills, and very diſtaſtful to moſt in the taking down, yet wiſe Solomon hath aſſured us, That, He that rebuketh a man, afterwards ſhall find more favour (even with that man) then he that flattereth with his lips (Prov. 28. 23.) There are many who, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks (Pſal. 36. 2.) Flatter themſelves, they are their own Paraſites. But as they who flatter others do moſt commonly fall under their diſpleaſure; ſo all they (ſooner or later) ſhall fall under their own diſpleaſure (and that's worſe then the diſpleaſure of any, yea, then of all men) who have flattered themſelves. It is our wiſdom and our peace, to be plain with our ſelves and with all men, how much preſent diſquiet ſoever we get by it. Paul ſpeaks it out to the Theſſalonians (Epiſt. 2. 3, 4, 5.) Our exhortation was not of deceit, neither at any time uſed we flattering words. But as we were allowed of God to be put in truſt with the Goſpel, even ſo we ſpeak; not as pleaſing men, but God.

Further, theſe words may be expounded, not as a threat againſt his Friends for their flattering of him, but as a threat againſt himſelf, in caſe he ſhould have flattered them. And ſo they carry alſo the weight of a reaſon, why he uſed ſo much freedom in reproving them, and ſhewing them the danger that hung over their heads: As if he had ſaid, You, my Friends, may perhaps wonder at my boldneſs and plainneſs of ſpeech, while I tell you that God hath hid your hearts from underſtanding, and that he will not exalt you: But you muſt pardon me, I had rather incur your frowns by my downright dealing with you, then Gods by flattering you; I had rather make your ears tingle by reproving you, then make the eyes of my Children ake by my applauding you; for this I have learned as a certain truth, that he who ſpeaks flattery to his friend, the eyes of his children ſhall fail.

Hence Obſerve, That even a godly man doth, and ought to ſtrengthen himſelf in doing his duty, by the remembrance of thoſe evils which are threatned againſt the neglect of it.

A Believer makes uſe of the threatnings, as well as of the promiſes, to keep his heart cloſe in obedience. That is the beſt obedience which ſprings from the fear of the Lord and his goodneſs; but that may be a good and pure act of obedience which ſprings from the fear of the Lord, and his wrath. Chriſt exhorts and forewarns his friends to fear him, who after he hath killed, hath power to caſt into Hell (Luke 12. 5.) 'Tis nobleſt and moſt ſpiritual, to obey God for himſelf, without reſpect either to Heaven or Hell; yet we may have reſpect both to Heaven and Hell, to reward and puniſhment in our obedience. Joſeph reſiſted temptation by the higheſt Argument, when he ſaid, How can I do this great evil, and ſin againſt God? (Gen. 39. 9.) He reſiſts temptation by a good Argument, who ſaith, How can I ſin againſt God, which will do ſo much evil to my ſelf, or draw many evils upon mine? And thus Job argued according to this interpretation, when he ſaid, He that ſpeaks flattery to his friend, the eyes of his Children ſhall fail: Or, as Mr. Broughton renders, The eyes of the given that way (that is to flattery) ſhall be conſumed.

There is another reading of the latter clauſe, and ſo of the whole Verſe, The eyes of thoſe that conſider, obſerve, or attend him, ſhall fail; and ſo they derive the word (Bamin) not from (Ben) a Son, or a Child, but from (Bin) which ſignifies to underſtand or conſider, The eyes of thoſe that conſider him ſhall fail: Then the meaning is, my friends are ſo exact, and acute in flattery, in compoſing and uttering fauning ſpeeches, that they who hear them are wrapt into an extaſie, and their very eyes do fail with their intentneſs in beholding them. They are ſuch powerful Orators, that they can draw the minds and eyes of their Auditors whither they pleaſe, and cauſe their eyes to ake with looking ſo wiſtly on them, having (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks in a like caſe) their perſons in admiration.

Job having thus complained againſt, and taxed his Friends of flattery, goes on to aggravate the ſadneſs of his condition, and upon the whole, to move the Lord to haſten an end of his miſeries, or to haſten his end, either to determine them, or to determine him.

Vox Banim non filios ſed intelligentes vel conſideran-tes ſignificat à Verbo בון quod eſt intelligere, hinc ſic conficitur textus. Et oculi conſiderantium eum deficient. Bold.

VERS. 6, 7.

He hath made me alſo a by-word of the people, and afore-time I was as a Tabret.
Mine eye alſo is dim by reaſon of ſorrow, and all my members are as a ſhadow.

IN theſe two Verſes Job repeats and aggravates his affliction; and he doth it (as he had done before) by ſhewing the effects of his affliction. We judge of cauſes by the effects; that which produceth a great effect, muſt needs have a greatneſs of caſuality in it. Two effects of his affliction are laid down in this context.

The firſt tells us what his affliction wrought in others.

The ſecond, what it wrought upon himſelf.

What his affliction wrought in others, is ſet forth (Verſ. 6.) He was become the talk of all, poſſibly, the ſport of not a few.

The Argument ſtands thus,

That it is a very great affliction, which every man ſpeaks of, or which makes a man a by-word.

But ſuch is my affliction, every one talks of it, and I am made a by-word of the people.

Therefore my affliction is very great.

What his affliction wrought upon himſelf, is expreſſed in the ſeventh Verſe: Dimneſs in his eye, and weakneſs in his whole body, Mine eye alſo is dim, by reaſon of ſorrow, and all my members are as a ſhadow.

The Argument may be formed thus,

That is a great affliction, the ſorrows whereof dim the eyes, and macerate all the members of the body.

But ſuch is the ſorrow of my affliction, that my very eyes are dim, and all my members are macerated.

Therefore mine is a great affliction.

As if he had ſaid, Should I hold my peace and ſit down in ſilence, yet my dim eyes and dryed bones, my withered skin and crippled limbs, are as ſo many tongues, yea, trumpets, to ſpeak and ſpeak aloud the ſorrows of my heart, and the ſufferings of my outward man. This ſeems to be Job's ſcope in the words now under hand.

Verſe 6. He hath made me a by-word of the people.

He] Who is that? The Antecedent is inquired for: Our late Annotations fix it upon Eliphaz, who ſpake laſt, and at whom he pointed in the Verſe before, He hath talked ſo of me, that now I am a common talk: He hath ſpoken ſuch words by me, that now I am made a by-word. We had need take heed of what we ſay of any Brother, for if one man give out the word, enough will follow to make him a by-word.

Others reſolve it upon God himſelf, He, that is, God hath made me a by-word. Job at firſt acknowledged God the Author of his troubles, and ſo he hath done all along, as hath been toucht in divers paſſages of this diſpute: As no man man lifts up his hand, so no man lifts up his tongue without God. As afflicting actions, so afflicting speeches are at his dispose: He hath made me

A by-word.] The Hebrew word in the Verb, signifies properly, to rule, to govern, to have dominion, or supreme power, as a Prince or Potentate: And by a Metaphor it signifies any thing that excelleth, or is eminent in any kind: Upon this account it is oft employed to signifie those rules of truth and holiness, to which every mans reason must yield obeysance; such are called in a way of excellency by Moralists, Proverbs; by Orators, Sentences; by Logicians, Maxims, or Principles, which are not to be proved, but supposed: No man must deny them, or if any man do, he is not to be disputed with; such rules are Rulers; and they are thus expressed upon a twofold reason,

First, Because of the difficulty and mysteriousness of their meaning; they are of few words, but of so large and multiplying a sence, that they do as much master, as enlighten the understanding.

Secondly, They are so expressed because of the extent or universality of their usefulness, they being such as bear sway in, and have an influence upon all transactions. That one sentence, or rule of Equity, What you would have others do to you, do so to them, runs through the whole course of mans life, and reacheth us in all acts of Justice, whether distributive, or commutative. And as those proverbial sentences, which direct justice and good manners, are of great command and authority among men; so likewise are those which had their rise from the reproof of any mans injustice, or evil manners. If once a man be made a by-word (whether the grounds of it be true or false, makes no matter as to this point) it will stick by him, and overcome his credit; let him do what he can, he shall hardly claw it off again as long as he lives. Thou hast made me a by-word.

In parabolizare populorum. Nam est infinitum, q. d. ut sim illis proverbio & vulgi fabula, vel ut de me proverbium faciant, Merc.

Further, to clear the Text, we may consider that the word By-word in the Hebrew is of the Infinitive Mood, and so some render it, Thou hast made me for the parabolizing of the people; or that the people make Parables and Proverbs of me; which we render fully to the sence, Thou hast made me (a Parable, a Proverb, or) a by-word among the people. Two things are usually implyed when a man is said to be a by-word.

First, That he is in a very low condition. Some men are so high, that the tongues of the common people dare not climb over them; but where the Hedge is low, every man goes over.

Secondly, That he is in a despised condition: To be a by-word carries a reflexion of disgrace. He that is much spoken of, in this sence, is ill spoken of; and he is quite lost in the opinion of men, who is thus found in their discourse. It is possible (though rare) for a man to be in a low, or bad condition, and yet to be well spoken of, yea, to be highly honoured; some are had in precious esteem, while they lye upon the dunghil: But usually a man greatly afflicted is little valued, and he whose state is laid low in the World, his person is also low in the opinion of the World. Job was at that time a By-word in both these Notions; he was low in state, and he was lower in esteem.

Hence Observe, First, Great sufferers in the things of this World, are the common subject of discourse, and often the subject of disgrace.

Fieri solet ut insignes virorum illustrium, calamitates in proverbium abeant deque iis fiant cantiones. Merl.

Such evils as few men have felt or seen, all men will be speaking of. Great sorrows, especially if they be the sorrows of great men, are turned into Songs, and Poetry playes its part with the saddest disasters. When Sihon King of the Amorites had taken many strong Cities from the King of Moab, the misery which fell upon the Moabites by that War was put into Verse, and passed into a Proverb (Numb. 21.27,28,29,30.) Wherefore they that speak in Proverbs say, Come into Heshbon, let the City of Sihon be built and prepared: For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the City of Sihon, &c. That is, A fierce hot War is made, which hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the Lords of the high places of Arnon. Holy David met with this measure from men in the day of his sorrows (Psal. 69. 10, 11.) When I wept and chastened my soul with fasting, that was to my reproach, I made sack-cloth my Garment, I became a Proverb (or a By-word, 'tis Job's language) to them: In the next Verse he tells us who did this, by way of distribution, They that sit in the Gate (that is, Great ones) speak against me, and I was the song of the Drunkard: That is, Of the common sort. When those false Prophets, Ahab and Zedekiah (who to put the Jews into a hope of a speedy return from their captivity in Babylon, prophesied the speedy ruine of Babylon it self, when, I say, those false Prophets) should be cruelly put to death by the command of the King of Babylon, according to the the Prediction of the Prophet Jeremiah, then the same Prophet foretels also, that this judgment of God upon them for their lyes, should be made a By-word, and their names a curse (Jer. 29. 21, 22.) And of them shall be taken up a curse, by all the Captivity of Judah, which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab, whom the King of Babylon rosted in the fire. That signal Victory of Gideon over the Midianites became a Proverb in Israel (Isa. 9. 4.) As in the day of Midian. And the Lord promises his people, that the fall of the King of Babylon shall be so notorious, that they shall take up this Proverb, and say, How hath the oppressor ceased? The golden City ceased? (Isa. 14. 4.) The Prophet Habakkuk assured them that this should be, while he said (Chap. 2. 6.) Shall not all these (certainly they shall) take up a Parable against him, and say, Woe to him that encreaseth that which is not his? How long? And to him that ladeth himself with thick clay.

Plaga Zedekiæ tangant te, sit frater & servus Zedekiæ. Vatabl.

Secondly, Observe, It is a great burden to be made a disgraceful by-word.

Thus God threatened his own people, and numbred it among the forest punishments of their disobedience (Deut. 28. 37.) The Lord shall bring thee and thy King whom thou hast set over thee, to a Nation whom thou nor thy Fathers have known, and there thou shalt serve other Gods, wood and stone, and thou shalt become an astonishment, and a Proverb, and a by-word, among all the Nations whither the Lord shall lead thee. This threat was renewed (1 Kings 9. 7.) And the Psalmist bewails it, that God had brought his people into such a condition, Thou hast made us a by-word among the Heathen, a shaking of the head among the people: Thou hast made us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us (Psal. 44. 13.) The Prophet Jeremiah speaks terror from the Lord (Jer. 24. 9.) I will deliver them to be removed to all the Kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, to be a reproach, and a proverb, and a taunt, and a curse in all the places whither I shall drive them: The Hypocrite, who putteth the stumbling block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to a Prophet to enquire of the Lord, hath his doom denounced in this tenor (Ezek. 14. 8.) I will set my face against that man, and make him a sign and a proverb, and cut him off from amidst my people. Again (Ezek. 16. 44.) They that speak in proverbs shall say, Such as the Mother is, such is the Daughter: The Hittites and the Israelites were both alike in sin, and they should not be unlike in punishment: Such short sentences are an advantage to memory, and serve in stead of larger Histories of eminent providences, whether mercies or judgments.

Thirdly, Observe, God often turns that to the honour of his Servants, which men intended to their disgrace.

In proverbium abiit, Jobi patientia.

Job was a by-word, in disgrace; God made him a by-word too, but for his honour. Job is famous to a Proverb at this day; for as when we would set forth the greatness of any mans suffering, we say, He is as poor as Job; so when we would set forth the greatness of any mans patience, we say, He is as patient as Job, or, He is another Job: All the vertues and graces which the Saints have manifested under sufferings, are proverbially expressed under the sufferings and patience of Job. Never did Cesar, nor Alexander, nor any of the great Hero's of the World, obtain such a name and glory, by victories over men, as Job did by patient suffering under the hand of God.

And as he is proverbially spoken of for his suffering, so likewise for his holiness, God made his piety a Proverb too, though his Friends suspected him for an Hypocrite. When the Lord would shew himself so unalterably resolved, ved, that nothing should take him off from bringing judgment upon a sinful people, he saith, I will not do it, though Noah, Daniel, and Job stood before me (Ezek. 14. 14.) As if he had said, I will not do it, though the most eminent men in holiness, or the greatest favourites that ever I had in the World sue that they might be spared. If any in the World could obtain this of God, Noah, Daniel, and Job could: but they should not, therefore none shall. See with what honourable names he is listed, Noah and Daniel, men remembred, yea crowned with honour by God and all good men, are but company good enough for Job. Thou hast made me a by-word.

And aforetime I was as a Tabret.

Aforetime. The word may be taken two wayes.

First, As signifying what was or hath been done in former times, in which sence we translate, Aforetime, or formerly, I was as a Tabret.

Secondly, As signifying what is or hath been done in the presence of others, Before them I was as a Tabret: We put in the Margin, Before their face, or in their sight: That is, They being witnesses of it, I was as a [Tabret.]

The Vulgar Latine translates the word which we render Tabret, an Example, I am a by-word, and an example before them; which is a good sence; and then the word Tophet (of which more by and by) is used for Mophet, which signifies a wonder, or some strange unusual thing which appears, or is reported to the admiration of all beholders and hearers. I am a Proverb, and a strange example: Strange examples grow often into a Proverb. So the Greek expresseth it; and we in English say to a man who hath offended greatly, You shall be made an example: That is, You shall be severely punished (Matth. 1. 19.) Joseph being very tender of the honour of Mary his espoused Wife, perceiving that she was with Child before they came together, he was loth to make her a Paradigm, or an example, of dishonesty and disloyalty; he was unwilling to make her a publick example, and therefore was minded to put her away privily, till the Lord gave him warning in a dream about it: So saith Job here, according to this rendring, I am a by-word among the people, and as it were a Paradigm, a publick example. Great afflictions have these three things in them, in reference to others.

First, they are a wonder to others.

Secondly, They are a terror to others.

Thirdly, They are an instruction unto others.

We find all these and more in one Verse (Ezek. 5. 15.) So it shall be a reproach and a taunt, an instruction, and an astonishment unto the Nations round about thee, when I shall execute judgments in thee in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebuke: I the Lord have spoken it.

The Apostle Peter describing the judgments of God, first upon Sodom and Gomorah, saith, That, God turning the Cities of Sodom and Gomorah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample to those that after should live ungodly (2 Pet. 2. 6.) The burning of those five Cities by immediate fire from Heaven, made them examples, or instructions to all succeeding Generations; we may read the odiousness of those sins, and the severity of God against them, by the light of that fire to this very day. Great afflictions are teaching afflictions; Those calamities which destroy some, should instruct all: We are not only to admire and wonder at them, to be amazed and terrified at them, but to be taught and admonished by them. So the Apostle concludes concerning the several judgments which God brought upon the Jews, while they murmured and disobeyed him in the Wilderness: All these things happened to them for examples (or types) and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the World are come (1 Cor. 10. 11.) There are two sorts of examples written in the Word.

First, There are examples for our imitation.

Secondly, There are examples for our caution.

Some are examples by the good which they have done, these must be imitated; others are examples by the evils which they have suffered, by these we must be warned: This translation of the Text intends Job an example of Caution.

Again, Aforetime I was as a Tabret: That is, Aforetime I was in good repute, or I was pleasant company: As if he had said, I am now derided, mocked at, and tossed upon the tongues of men, yea, I am now voted an Hypocrite, though heretofore in my prosperity, report gave a very pleasant sound of me, though absent, and my person was as welcome to them as a Tabret. To speak of me wheresoever I came not was musick, and I was musick wheresoever I came; but now what am I? A by-word, musick still if you will, but in scorn, a song of disgrace. That's the first sence.

Hence take one Observation, before I proceed to further explication.

The affections and opinions of men are very variable.

I am now a By-word, before time I was as a Tabret. As the estates of men change, so usually do our opinions of them. Job's heart was the same as before, he was as holy as ever he was, only he was not so wealthy as he was; his spirit was as full of Grace as before, only his Purse was not so full of Gold as before; he had not so many thousand Sheep, nor so many hundred Oxen, he had not such a Family and Retinue, such worldly riches and honour, and because he endured such a change in his condition, see what a change he suffered in mens affections, he that before was as a Tabret, all were glad of him, is now a by-word, the scorn of all.

Christ giveth testimony of John Baptist (John 5. 35.) He was a burning and a shining light; and what followes? And you rejoyced in him for a season. Though John did burn and shine all the while which God continued him in the Candlestick of the Church with equal heat and lustre, yet they rejoyced in him but for a while, or for a season. The Jewes changed their thoughts of John, and their esteem of him was weakened, though John continued in the same strength of parts and gifts: Then, how would they have changed if John had changed. The peoples hearts were flatted towards him, though his abilities were not; John had not that repute and honour after a few years which he had at the first. And the word in the Gospel which we translate to rejoyce, comes neer the word which we have in this Text, a Tabret; for it signifies to leap and dance; and the Tabret is a musical Instrument, at the sound of which men dance and leap; for a time they leaped about John; he was a burning and shining light, and they danced and skipped about him, as Children do about a blazing Fire in the Streets, but this was only for a season: John himself found the World a changling, his followers kept no constant tenour towards him, how constant soever his tenour was. How great a change did Christ himself find; He is yesterday, to day, and the same for ever; yet one day the Jewes cry Hosanna, they will needs make him a King, he had much ado to keep himself from a Crown; the Air eccoes with Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: yet presently after, the cry was, Crucifie him, crucifie him, he is not worthy to live, he could not keep himself (by all his power as man) from a Cross; a Murtherer is preferred before him, Not this man, but Barrabas. We read (Acts 14.) how suddenly the tide and stream of affections turned, and how opinions varied about Paul; when he and Barnabas had wrought a great cure, the people came and would needs adore them and offer Sacrifice, and said, The Gods are come down in the likeness of men: They brought Oxen and Garlands, and would needs worship them, there was much ado to stave them off from Deifying, or making Gods of them; and yet before that Chapter is at an end, their acceptation of him was at an end; and Paul was stoned as unworthy the society of men, by the same men, and in the same place where he was saluted as a God. It is no new thing in the World, to see those a by-word of the people, who even now were their Tabret: To adore one while, and to despise another, to applaud to day, and to dislike to morrow, now to smile, and anon to frown, is the constant inconstancy of the creature.

Therefore, Live not upon the breath of men, upon popular air, or the speech of people: Though to have credit with men be a blessing, yet let us live upon the credit which we have with God, and rejoyce only in his esteem. Most men are full of change, and are apt to vary their aspects every moment, their affections are as moveable as their outward condition is. Only God never alters his opinion of any man, he never rejects where he hath accepted, nor casts off where he hath embraced; once a friend, and alwayes a friend; freind, once pleased with us and always pleased with us; yea God is pleased with his while he manifests a fatherly displeasure against them; and they are as a Tabret to him while he makes them a By-word among the people. Job was a Tabret in the ears of God, when he was a By-word among the people.

Thirdly, Because a Tabret or Drum is empty of all but Air, and giveth nothing but a sound; some interpret thus, I am before them as an empty Vessel, or as one who hath nothing in him but wind, and from whom nothing comes but a sound of words; that is, They look upon me as a man of no real worth. Paul saith of himself, that though he spake with the tongues of men and Angels, that is, with the most excellent tongues. Angels have no tongues, nor have they any faces as men have, yet in Scripture, the face of an Angel is put for the most beautiful face, and the tongue of an Angel for the most eloquent tongue among all the children of men: Now saith Paul, though I had the tongue of Angels, or men, and were the best speaker that ever was, yet (being void of true charity) I should become as a sounding brass and a tinckling Cimbal (1 Cor. 13. 1.) Such a tinckling Cimbal was Job esteemed, a Drum full of Air, or any empty Vessel, as Jerusalem was left by the King of Babylon (Jer. 51. 34.)

Existimant esse vocem Chaldaicam quæ significat Dominum vel principem q. d. qui princeps eram factus sum in proverbium & fabulam. Rab. Lev. Yarabi.

Fourthly, Some both of the Rabbins and latter Writers tell us, that Tophet is a Chaldee word, signifying Lord, or a Prince: And they refer us for a confirmation to (Dan. 3. 2.) Where we find the word put into the Summons which Nebuchadnezzar sent to his Nobles and great Officers, for their attendance at the Dedication of the Image which he had set up: We render it, Sheriffs, whether our word hits that, is doubtful, but without doubt it signifies such as were in high Authority, being there marshall'd before the Rulers of the Provinces.

Taking this interpretation of the word, Jobs meaning is, I am now a Proverb, or a man of no credit, though heretofore I was as a Prince, or a Ruler in their presence. Some reject this because the mixture of the Chaldee with the Hebrew, was long after Jobs time, which yet may easily be reconciled. And the sense is good, being indeed the same in substance with the second Exposition.

Fifthly, This word Tophet which signifies a Drum, or (as we) a Tabret, which is a smaller Drum (for there is the Martial Drum, or the Drum of War, and the Tabret, which is a Mirth Drum, a Drum used at sports, and dancing; this word I say) gives denomination to a place very famous or infamous rather in the Scripture of the Old Testament: A part of good Josiah his reformation is thus described (2 Kings 23. 10.) And he defiled (in the opinion of Idol-Worshippers, though indeed the purest worship used there, was more filthy then any filth which Josiah threw into it: He, saith the Text, defiled) Tophet, which is in the Valley of the Children of Hinnon, that no man might make his Sons and Daughters pass through the fire to Moloch. The Prophet Jeremiah complained of, and threatned that place (Chap. 7. 31, 32.) They have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the Valley of the Son of Hinnon, to burn their Sons and Daughters in the fire, &c.

Now, the reason why that place was called Tophet, from the word in the Text, arose thus, because when the Jews in those abominable Idolatries offered their own Children, the fruit of their bodies, in Sacrifice to Moloch, the reputed God of the Moabites and Ammonites, who was so called from Malac, signifying to Rule or Reign (for as all Idols would rule as Kings, so this was a chief, a King Idol; hence some conceive Moloch to be the same with Baal, which is also a name of Supremacy, signifying Lord, or Master) This Moloch was an hollow Image of Brass, into which they put much Fire, having the face of a Bullock, and hands spread abroad like a Man; He had seven Chappels, and whosoever offered his Son to him entred into the seventh; which when any did, they used to beat upon Drums and Tabrets, that the shreeks and cries of the poor Child might not be heard by the Father: Hence the place was called Tophet from Toph, a Drum, which comes from a radical word signifying to beat, or strike with the hand, because Drums are artificially beaten, and we ordinarily say, Beat the Drum, or, At the beat of Drum.

A nomine Gehinnon, i. e. Vallis Hinnon. infernum dicitur Gehenna. Hieron. in 10. Cap. Math.

גיא Vallis & נהם ruguit, gemuit. Et ignis gehennæ primo ero. Rab. Da. Pagn.

And hence this place Tophet, where those Children were superstitiously tormented by fire and burnt to ashes, grew to a Proverb; so that any place of extream torment was called Tophet. As Hell is called Barathrum, because Barathrum was a place so called among the Athenians, into which they cast notorious Malefactors. Hence also Hell is called Gehenna, from the Valley of the Son of Hinnon, where those Children were Sacrificed, or from Ge, signifying a Valley, and Naham, roaring or crying: So that it was called Gehinnon, from the cry of the Children, and Tophet from the beating of Drums to drown the cry of the Children. And upon this account some learned Translators render the sense thus, He hath made me a by-word, and I am as Hell: that is, They judge me worthy of Hell and Damnation; yea, that I am a very Hell, I am as Tophet before them; or they look upon me, as a man in Hell already: But I find this Interpretation discharged from this Text upon good reason, especially by a demonstration of the invalidity of that reason upon which it is grounded, either by the first discoverers or maintainers of it. For the Idolatry of Sacrificing Children to Moloch in Tophet, and the fire in the Valley of Hinnon were not heard of in the time of Job. The first mention of the Valley of Hinnon is (Josh. 18. 16.) at the distribution of the Land of Canaan among the Tribes of Israel; and the name Tophet was not given it till some Ages after that, not till the Idolatry of the Jews was grown to its height (which was not presently, but by certain degrees) for that act of theirs in offering their Children to that Idol seems to be the highest growth and top-branch of it. And therefore I pass this exposition.

Existimo Toph significare Tympanizatum, i. e. hominẽ qui passus est illud supplicium, quod Græci vocant τύμπανον, Latini quoque Tympanum. Bold. Tympanizatio illa videtur esse quæ erus per quatuor mẽbra distentus bacillis ad numerũ in ventre tanquãtympanum percutiebatur. Id.

ἄλλοι δὲ ἐτυμπανίσθησαν,

Sixthly, The word Tophet is conceived to set forth the manner of a punishment or torture used in those times. Some Malefactors were adjudged to have their bodies stretched out by the four quarters upon an Engin, and then to be beaten upon their bellies to such a number of strokes as the Law, or sentence of the Judge appointed. Which manner of torture was called by the Greeks Tympanization, or as we express in our language, Drumming, and the person adjudged to that punishment was said to be drummed, when it was inflicted upon him, because he was beaten upon his body like a Drum, and beaten also like a Drum in measure, or to a certain number of stroaks, the greatest number not exceeding forty, as the judicial Law of Moses appointed (Deut. 25. 2, 3.) which may be a confirmation of this Notion upon Jobs Text. To which also we may add the present custom of the Eastern countries, especially among the Turks, who commonly punish their Captives and Gally-slaves stretching them naked upon a broad Plank or Board, and giving them many cruel stroaks upon their Bellies: But above all, the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews gives a cleer light to this (Heb. 11. 35.) where describing the several torments which the Saints of the old Church among the Jews endured, he saith, Women received their dead raised to life again, and others were tortured. So we translate: The Greek is, Others were drummed, that is, they endured the torture of Tympanization, or Drumming; which word is also used by the Compiler of the History of the Maccabees (2 Maccab. 6. 19. 28.) who tells us that Eleazer, and other Martyrs were Tympanized or Drummed; he offered himself willing to the Torment or Drum; the manner of which may be easily collected from the thirteenth Verse of that Chapter in the Maccabees, where the Author saith, As he was ready to give up the Ghost, because of the stroaks, &c. which shews two things.

First, That the torture was by beating with Staves, or Cudgels.

Secondly, That it was not usual for men to die under such beatings, that punishment not being to death, but to paine and disgrace; as appears also from that of Pilate concerning Christ, who when he found nothing in him worthy of Death, said, I will chastise (or beat) him, and release him (Luke 23. 15, 16.) And Paul received forty stripes save one, five times of the Jews (which seems to have been a torture somwhat like this we are now upon) and was thrice beaten with Rods, and yet survived them all (2 Cor. 11. 24, 25.)

The Prophet Nahum also may be thought to allude to this custom (Na. 2. 7.) And Huzzab (which some take for the proper name of the Queen of Ninevie) shall be led away Captive, she shall be brought up, and her Maids shall lead her as with the voice of Doves, tabring (or Drumming) upon their breasts, it is this word in the Text; that is, They shall inflict that punishment upon themselves, which others use to inflict on evil doers; as if he had said, They shall torture upon themſelves, or be their own Tormentors for very griefe and vexation at thoſe miſeries which their enemies ſhall bring upon them. As the poor Publican filled with godly ſorrow and remorſe for his ſin, Smote upon his breaſt (Luke 18.13.) So it is uſual for ſuch as are overburdened with worldly ſorrow, to ſmite upon their breaſts, and add a voluntary pain to that which is inflicted.

Statuit me ad dominari populis & tympanizatus palam ero. Bold.

Job is conceived to aim at this form of puniſhment; and then (taking the former part of the Verſe, not as we render it, I am a by-word, but as the word properly ſignifies, to Govern, or bear Rule, and then I ſay) the ſenſe appears thus, I who have been a Ruler, or in place of Authority heretofore, am now looked upon as a man who either had been, or deſerves to be tortured, drummed, or cudgelled; as if I were at once an ordinary man, and an extraordinary Malefactor: We may alſo keep to our Tranſlation of the former part of the Verſe, and ſuite this Expoſition of the latter part very well unto it; Thus, He hath made me a by-word of the people, and before them I am in no better repute then a man who for his faults hath undergone publique ſhame; as if we ſhould ſay (according to our cuſtomes) then a man that hath been whipt about the Streets, or hath ſtood upon the Pillory, or that hath been branded with a hot Iron in the hand or face; both which Applications of this Expoſition center in that Obſervation lately given, about the changeableneſs and inconſtancy of mans opinion concerning and of his affections towrads man: And therefore I ſhall not inſiſt further upon the uſe of it, but onely add, that,

Bolduc. A learned Interpreter takes much pains to make out a proof of this expoſition from that paſſage of the Prophet Iſaiah (Chap. 30. Verſ. 30, 31, 32, 33.) where the Lord having made gracious promiſes to his own people of their deliverance from the Aſſyrian Bondage, thus threatens the Aſſyrian, the Rod of his anger, and the Staffe of his indignation (Verſ. 30.) The Lord ſhall cauſe his glorious voice to be heard, and ſhall ſhew the lighting down of his arm, with the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire, with ſcattering Tempeſt and Hailſtones. For through the voyce of the Lord ſhall the Aſſyrian be beaten down, which ſmote with a Rod. And in every place where the grounded ſtaffe ſhall paſs, which the Lord ſhall lay upon him, it ſhall be with Tabrets and Harps, and in Battels of ſhaking will he fight with it. For Tophet (which is the word of the Text) is ordained of old, yea for the King it is prepared, he hath made it deep and large: the pile thereof is fire, and much wood, the breath of the Lord like a ſtream of Brimſtone doth kindle it. In theſe words (ſaith my Author) there is a cleer deſcription of that kind of torture, called Tympanization, or Drumming, with which the King of Aſſyria is either threatned (in ſpecie) particularly, and properly, or by a Synechdoche, to ſhew that God would lay ſevere puniſhments upon him. For (ſaith the Prophet) Through the voice of the Lord ſhall the Aſſyrian be beaten down, which ſmote with a Rod: He ſmote with a Rod, but he ſhall be beaten down with a Staffe; for in every place where the grounded Staffe ſhall paſs, or, every paſſing of the Rod founded; that is, Of the Rod founded in the Decree of God, which ſo eſtabliſheth it, that no power nor policy of the Aſſyrian ſhall avoid, or remove it: For though God will not let the Rod of the Wicked reſt upon the lot of the Righteous (Pſal. 125. 3.) yet the Rod of God ſhall reſt upon the lot of the Wicked, There ſhall be the reſt thereof (Zech. 9. 1.) The Rod of God, by the lighting down of his arm (Verſ. 30.) ſhall ſtrike home to, yea into the fleſh of his Enemies, and there make deep gaſhes or cuts, running like ſo many rivulets with blood; and (ſaith he) The Lord ſhall lay it upon him, or, as our Margin hath it, Shall cauſe it to reſt upon him; when the Lord layes it on, let who ſo will, or rather who ſo can (and indeed none can) take it off, The Lord ſhall lay it upon him; and (as it follows) it ſhall be with Tabrets and Harps; which, as moſt Interpret of the joy which the Jews ſhould have at the downfall of the Aſſyrian, ſo my Author expounds it ſuitably to his Notion, of the manner of Gods ſmiting the Aſſyrian; which ſhould be as a Drum or Tabret is ſmitten, with many repeated ſtroaks, which in ſome exerciſings of that Art, paſs ſo thick, and ſo unceſſantly, that the Sticks ſeem to reſt upon the Drum, as alſo the finger upon the Harp, and not to move at all off from either; even thus ſhall God lay his Staffe upon the Aſſyrian: and in Battels of ſhaking will he fight with it, or with them; that is, by the ſhaking of Battels, or by frequent renewed Battels, will he fight with and deſtroy them. For (as it follows) Tophet is prepared of old; that is, The Engin upon which he ſhall be tortured: the form and manner of which is in many particulars deſcribed out of ancient Writers, by the Author of this Expoſition, but I ſhall not ſtay upon them. This Tophet is prepared of old, or, from yeſterday; that is, God hath prepared it aforehand, and made it ready, He hath made it deep and large; that is, proportionable in all its dimenſions for that uſe and purpoſe; yea for the King it is prepared (the great King of Aſſyria) which is added, becauſe this was a puniſhment for common men, yet the King (ſaith he) ſhall be thus tortured, he ſhall no more eſcape the hand of God, then the meaneſt of his Subjects, and he ſhall be handled in the ſame manner as the meaneſt among them ſhall. The diſhonour of ſuch a ſuffering is a greater puniſhment to a great King, then the pain of it, yet he cannot be diſpenſed with, yea for the King it is prepared. The pile of it is fire, and much wood: What's the meaning of that? My Author anſwers, This puniſhment of drumming was ſometimes but preparatory to another: firſt they were beaten, and then they were burned; and therefore (ſaith he) before the Engin a great fire was made, into which when they were tortured by beating, offenders were caſt and conſumed to aſhes. Our Martyrologies tell us of ſome, who have been firſt hanged, and then burned; and ordinarily among us, when Traytors are put to death, a fire is made at the place of Execution, into which their bowels are caſt, when their bodies are cut up and quartered. Thus here, The pile thereof is fire and much wood: And the breath of the Lord as a ſtream of Brimſtone doth kindle it; that is, The Lord being extreamly angry with, and incenſed againſt the King of Aſſyria, will therefore kindle this fire of his wrath totally to conſume him.

Jubet amoveri naxialem ſtipitem plebeia clarumpæna me dannet virum. Prud. in Rom. Martyr.

But here it may be demanded, Did any of the Kings of Aſſyria, who captivated and afflicted the Jews, ſuffer ſuch a kind of death as this? I ſuppoſe none of them did: Some tell us that the Army of Sennacherib which invaded Judea, was overthrown and deſtroyed by the Angel in that place called Tophet, or in the Valley of Hinnon, which is alſo given as a reaſon why that word is uſed in the Prophet; but Sennacharib himſelf was ſlain in the Temple of this Idol (2 Kings 19. 37.) Nor is it (as I conceive) the mind of our Expoſitor, to conclude from hence that the King of Babylon was put to death by ſuch a torture; but only to ſhew under the deſcription of that kind of death, that the death and deſtruction of the King of Babylon ſhould be very terrible, and that God would judge him, even as notorious offenders are, both to a painful and a ſhameful end.

As this Interpretation of the Prophet gives much light to that of Job, ſo it is an ingenious conjecture upon that place, and carries a fair correſpondence both to truth and reaſon. Nor is there (that I have met with) any Interpreter who doth not underſtand that Text of Iſaiah in its firſt and literal ſenſe, of the temporary judgements which God threatned to powre upon the State and King of Babylon; as moſt in a Tropological and Alluſive ſenſe, interpret it of eternal judgment in Hell, which is indeed a fiery Tophet, and is prepared of old, yea for the King it is prepared, for the great King of Aſſyria, as well as for the meaneſt perſon.

Nam ſore ut inſtituat me ad præſidendum populis, quamvis tympanotribarum materia ante fuerim. Jun.

There is a ſeventh Tranſlation and Expoſition of theſe words which takes the former part of the Verſe as was toucht upon the laſt, and reads the whole thus; For he will make me a Governour among the people, though I have thus been made as matter for the Fiddlers or Taberer's Song. So that, as the former Expoſition renders the Text as a complaint, proceeding from Jobs grief, that he who had been a great Man, a Governour of the people, ſhould be now puniſht as a Slave, or as a Malefactor; ſo this renders it as a Propheſie, proceeding from his Faith, That God would reſtore and raiſe him again to be a Governour among the people, though now he was the ſcorn and deriſion of the people.

Reſtituet me Deus in dignitatem meã & altius provehet. Jun.

This reading riſes cleerly enough from the words of the Text, yet I have one exception againſt it, as to the conſtant tenour of Jobs profeſſion; who though he were full of Faith in God, that it ſhould go well with him for eternity, yet he conſtantly diſclaims a hope of reſtauration to a temporal greatneſs; and having ſaid at the beginning of this Chapter, My days are extinct, the Graves are ready for me, it ſeems unſuitable to ſay here (which is the ſenſe of this tranſlation) My Worldly joyes are bloſſoming, the Thrones are ready for me: And therefore (with much reverence to the learned Author) I lay by this Interpretation.

Laſtly, Maſter Broughton tranſlates thus, That maketh me a by-word to the people, and I am openly a Taber: He applies it not (as we) to the former time, but to that time, I am a Tabret, and that openly, or in open view, in the ſight of all. We ſay of a man that is abuſed and jeered, He is played upon; ſo ſaith Job (according to this rendering) They play upon me as a Tabret, they rejoyce in my ſufferings, they make themſelves merry with my ſorrows, and rejoyce at my calamity. So the Lords of the Philiſtims dealt with Sampſon, having put out his eyes and impriſoned him, they ſent for him, to make them ſport (Judg. 16. 25.) Thus (as the ſenſe of this Tranſlation leads us) Job aggravates his ſorrows, by the joy which others diſcovered at it; which is alſo the meaning of the Septuagint, whoſe reading is, Thou haſt made me a talk among the people, and I became a Laughing-ſtock to them.

Poſuiſt autem me fabulam ingentibus & riſus eis devoti. Sept.

Thoſe afflictions which make others laugh, make us moſt mournful. When Nero had ſet Rome on fire, he made himſelf Muſick at it; and that calamity upon the City, was as a Tabret to him; while they were ſorrowing, he was ſinging. As to rejoyce at the evil which others ſuffer, is baſe joy, the worſt of joyes in it ſelf, ſo it makes the evils which we ſuffer worſe to our apprehenſion. The Prophet laments over Jeruſalem, becauſe of this (Lament. 2. 15.) All that paſs by, clap their hands at thee, they hiſs and wag their head at the Daughter of Jeruſalem, ſaying, Is this the City that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth? All thine enemies have opened their mouth againſt thee, they hiſs and gnaſh the teeth, they ſay, We have ſwallowed her up certainly, this is the day that we looked for, we have found, we have ſeen it. Jeruſalem was as much burdened with her Enemies joy, as with her own ſorrows. If when we mourn, we have ſome to mourn with us, we are comforted in our mournings; but when God leaves us to the ſcorn and contempt of men, when they make themſelves merry with our troubles, and exult at our calamities, when our tears are as Wine to them, and the Bread of our affliction becomes the Bread of their deſire, this renders our ſorrows out of meaſure ſorrowfull. Hence David (Pſal. 25. 2.) prays ſo hard, Lord let not mine Enemy tryumph over me: It is eaſier to loſe a Battel, yea to die in Battel, then to be led in Triumph, or to be Triumphed over after the Battle: David being freed from that fear, gathers a ſtrong argument that God had reſpect to him (Pſal. 41. 11.) By this I know that thou favoureſt me, becauſe mine Enemy doth not triumph over me. It is greateſt mercy when we triumph over our Enemies, but it is great mercy when God delivers us from being triumphed over by our Enemies; for as the mercies of the Wicked, ſo the joyes of the mercileſs are cruel. The Apoſtle reports it as a great part of his affliction, that he was made a gazing ſtock, or a ſpectacle to the World, to Angels and men (1*Cor.* 4. 9.) The word which the Apoſtle uſeth is an Alluſion to the Roman Theaters, whither all the people reſorted to ſport themſelves; and their ſpecial ſport was, to behold the combates of Men with Men, or of Men with Beaſts; ſuch a ſporting ſpectacle were the Apoſtles made (in their combates with the World) to the World, and to Angels, and to Men: They had Spectators enow, they were a Spectacle to the World, that is, to the Inhabitants of the World, who are diſtributed into their firſt and grateſt diviſion in the next word, Angels and men: Heaven and Earth are the Fabrick of the whole World, Angels and men are all the Inhabitants of both: yet ſome reſtrain Pauls Text, to evil Angels only, or Devils, becauſe it ſounds harſh to the ear, that the good Angels ſhould delight themſelves in beholding the ſufferings of good men; but it is not Pauls ſcope to ſhew that every beholder of their ſufferings took delight in their ſufferings, but that all did, or might behold them, for thoſe things were not done in a corner. The Apoſtles were ſet forth by their Adverſaries as if they had invited all the World, Angels and Men, good and bad, to laugh at them; yet as good men could not behold them without weeping, ſo the good Angels could not behold them with rejoycing, unleſs it were at their conſtancy and courage for God, or at that Crown which they ſaw ready prepared for thoſe who overcome: And in this ſenſe good men alſo rejoyced at their ſufferings. But when any mans ſufferings are rejoyced at, becauſe he ſuffers, and is in pain; this is very painful.

This was Moabs burden (Jer. 48. 39.) They ſhall howle, ſaying, How is it broken down? How hath Moab turned the back with ſhame? So ſhall Moab be a deriſion, and a diſmaying to all them about him. And when the Pſalmiſt would expreſs how highly God was offended at the counſels and plottings of wicked ones, he tells us, He that ſitteth in Heaven ſhall laugh, he ſhall have them in deriſion (Pſal. 2.)

Job having aggravated his ſorrows, by their effects upon others; now ſhews what effect they had upon himſelf.

Verſ. 7. My eye alſo is dim by reaſon of ſorrow, and all my members are as a ſhadow.

Mine eye. The eye is taken two wayes, either properly for the corporal eye, or tropically for the underſtanding: Some interpret Job of the eye of the minde; and that hath compliance with the tranſlation which is alſo given of the latter clauſe, as I ſhall ſhew when I come thither. But I rather take it literally for the eye of the body. Mine eye, that is, That Organ of ſight which is as the Glaſs or light of the whole body, even that is dim by reaſon of.

Ut illa de inferiori ſenſibili cognitione quæ fit per phantaſmata, ſic iſta de intellectuali oculo exponi debet. Bold.

Sorrow. The word ſignifies more then ordinary ſorrow, it ſignifies ſorrow with indignation, or from provocation: Job's ſorrow had a touch of indignation, and it ſtirred him up to ſome undue provocations: Sorrow is taken two wayes.

Actively.

Actively, for the ſorrow, ſorrowing.
Paſſively, for the ſorrow, ſorrowed.

כעש Denotatur in illo verbo activa provocatio, indignatio, irritatio.

Sorrow is the affliction it ſelf, or ſorrow is that paſſion which moves in us when we are afflicted, By reaſon of ſorrow mine eye is dim: Sorrow is a waſt both to the vital and viſive powers (Pſal. 6. 7.) Mine eye is conſumed becauſe of grief: Again (Pſal. 39. 9, 10.) Have mercy on me O Lord, for I am in trouble; mine eye is conſumed with grief, yea my ſoul, and my belly. This effect of grief hath been toucht before (Chap. 16. 16.) Mine eye is dim by reaſon of ſorrow.

Members. That is, Firſt, all the members of my body: Secondly (the Hebrew bears it) all the creatures, and imaginations of my mind are as a ſhadow.

The ſame word is uſed (Gen. 6. 5.) The thoughts of the imaginations of mans heart (that is, the figments, or features of things which are formed up there) are evil, and only evil continually: We put, All my thoughts, in the Margin of our Tranſlation: As if he had ſaid, My minde is ſo enfeebled that I can ſcarce think or frame any ſolid notion; my mind is ſo unſetled that I know not how to make up my thoughts, or bring them to a rational iſſue about any point. Sorrow weakens the intellective part, as well as the ſenſitive: As if he had ſaid, My minde, which heretofore was apt to conceive, and to bring forth the exacteſt Ideas and platformes of truth; I, who could ſhape and faſhion excellent meditations, am now ſo weak-headed, that I can ſcarce put two thoughts together, and all I do is but a ſhadow to what I have been able to do.

Creata in ea quaſi umbra omnia. Merc. Per creata alij membra alii cogitationes volunt. Rab. Lev. Vocabulum illud quadrat in illa omnia quæ externa figura aut interna cogitatione effigiantur; hinc multi legunt cogitationes phantaſiæ. Pagn. Reg. Vatabl.

This is a fair ſenſe, yet conſidering the context, I rather underſtand it of the members of his body, which were ſo decayed and poor, that he look'd like a Skeleton, or (as we ſay of ſuch) Anatomy, nothing being left but skin and bone, nothing but a pack of bones; ſo that he was rather the ſhadow and appearance of a man, then a man.

Hence Obſerve, The ſorrows of the mind break the body, as well as the mind.

This effect of ſorrow hath been met with in other places, places, and particularly (Chap. 16. 16.) I shall only add, that although godly sorrow (as was there shewed) may work deeply to the expence of bodily strength, yet there is a very gracious promise (Isa. 58. 11.) that God will make the bones of such fat, that is, Fill them with marrow, which is the strength of the whole outward man. And they who are weakned by the continual exercises of godly sorrow, here, are in preparation to an estate, where they shall sorrow no more: There will be no dim eyes in Heaven, nor members like a shadow: Our vile body shall be fashioned like unto his glorious body, and all tears and mourning shall flee away. Perfect happiness is inconsistent with a blubbered eye. And though in Heaven a Saint may be called Adam (because his body, for the substance of it, shall be the same that it was here on earth, though extreamly refined and sublimated, yea, spiritualiz'd, yet earth still, now I say, though a Saint in Heaven after the resurrection, may (in this sense) be called Adam, made of Earth) yet no Saint can be there called Enosh, that state being incapable of the least mixture of sorrow.

VERS. 8, 9.

Upright men shall be astonied at this, and the innocent shall stir up himself against the Hypocrite.
The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger.

IN the two former Verses Job shewed the greatness of his affliction from a twofold effect.

In these two Verses he shews two reasons why his afflictions were so great; not as Eliphaz and his Associates had suggested, because he was a great sinner, or had sinned beyond the common line of man; but,

First, That men, even upright men might be astonied, at the strangeness of this dispensation of God, and of his strength, supporting a weak creature under it, and carrying him through it: God will do some things which shall at once teach and astonish his people, and gives them not only matter of instruction, but cause of wonder.

Secondly, That the innocent and righteous might be encouraged by my example to proceed vigorously in the ways of holiness, notwithstanding all the opposition they find from men, and the afflictions laid upon them by the hand of God; for as much as the favour of God shines in upon me through all these Clouds, and I have no doubt of his love, though I feel all this smart.

Vers. 8. Upright men shall be astonied at this.

Nabi nō tam in conscientia parum à peccato, quā ab omni passione, humanoq; respectu immunē virū hic significat. Bold.

Who is an upright man hath been opened before; yet here the upright man is a man free from passion and prejudice, as well as from hypocrisie and false-heartedness.

The word which we translate [Astonied] signifies astonishment with admiration, or such an admiration, as leaves a man astonied and senseless, or puts him quite beside himself. When natural reason is much overpowered, we act as if we had had no reason.

Tacitus miratus est, præ admiratione stupuit.

Upright men shall be astonied. Master Broughton reads it in the Imperative Mood, Let upright men be astonied at this: He carries the same form to the end of the context, Let upright men be astonished at this, and let the innocent stir up himself against the Hypocrite: Let the righteous hold on his way, and let him that hath clean hands be stronger, and stronger: As if the words contained a use of exhortation or direction to several duties which Job's state calls us unto.

We say, Upright men may be astonied, as importing the event, or what was intended in the act: As if he had said, Men of a right temper will not be transported with ungrounded jealousies and uncertain conjectures concerning me, when they see all this upon me, but will refer my strange disasters to the unconceiveable wisdom of God, who thus orders the afflictions of his people, and seems to reward their holy services with sharpest sufferings.

Upright men shall be astonied, at what? At this, or upon the consideration of this thing: but what is this thing, the consideration whereof, shall raise up such astonishment? When the Bush burned and was not consumed, Moses resolved, I will turn aside now, and see this great thing: Strange sights call us to consideration. We have in this Text, A bush burning and not consuming, upright men may well be astonished, and turn aside to see it.

More particularly, there are four things upon which the occasion of this astonishment is pitcht.

Upright men shall be astonied at, or upon this.] First, At your hard dealing with me, at your rigid censures of me: your bitter by-words and taunting Proverbs against me, will certainly cause upright men, men of a clear judgment and conscience, to stand astonied: As if he had said, It is not my single opinion that you have wronged me, but all men of integrity will not only say the same, but be amazed at your dealings with me.

Secondly, At this, that is, at the deliverance which God will give me out of these troubles. Thus the sense is made out by those who render the sixth Verse as the Prophesie of Job's Faith, that he should be restored and set up to govern among the people: This turn of things shall worke astonishment in the best and most sober spirited men, upright men shall be astonied, to see me translated from the dung-hill to the Throne, from a state of greatest contempt to a state of highest honour. Good men shall glorifie God in me, and shall rejoyce at the downfal of Hypocrites; but though the event did verifie this, Job was at the last restored, and was made as a Prince among the people, and his restauration was such as might justly astonish and draw all that either saw or heard of it into admiration, yet I much doubt whether Job had any such scope in these words, which rather continue and heighten the aggravations of his then present troubles, then hold out any intimations of his hope, much less of his assurance of a raising to a future worldly prosperity.

Animi, dictis, factis viri boni gloriantur in Deo & de hypocritarū confusione exultant. Jun.

Thirdly, Some conceive this matter of astonishment to be the patience of Job under his sufferings, that he should endure and hold out in such extremities, till his eye was dim by reason of sorrow, and his members were like a shadow: Upright men shall be astonied at this. Is it not marvellous that a man should act a life of grace, when it could scarce be perceived that he acted the life of nature? As God doth often work miraculously for the deliverance of his people out of trouble, so they sometimes (by his power) work miraculously under troubles, before deliverance comes. Such patience, such humility, such meekness, and faith, are recorded in Scripture, as have caused upright men to stand astonied. This is a good sense, but I rather pitch upon a fourth, as most proper to this place.

Cladis hæc mea universis est stupenda sed justis præsertim. Pined.

Fourthly, I conceive when Job saith, Upright men shall be astonied at this, He points at the greatness of his affliction: As if he had thus expressed it, My being made a by-word among the people, my dim'd eyes and leane body will make such a report, and be such a sight, as will set all honest men a wondring, upright men shall be astonied at this. What! Hath the Lord dealt thus with Job, a holy man, concerning whose integrity he hath given such ample testimony? This is indeed the Lords doing, but it is marvellous in our eyes.

Quod ita atrociter affligar cū sim innocens, &c. Mere.

Hence Observe, First, That the best of men, upright men are sometimes at a loss how to interpret the outward dealings of God.

Some providences of God put the wisest to a stand; not only are Fools and wicked men, but men of the greatest experience and understanding in the ways of God, so puzzled that they know not what to say, or how to answer? The Lord is pleased to give as hard Texts and Chapters in his works as he doth in his Word; many outward administrations lie so close, yea so cross to his ordinary proceedings, that we know not what to make of them: If we see a wicked man afflicted, we shall see a godly man afflicted much more: If we see a godly man prosper, we shall see a wicked man prosper double to it; these are strange things, at which not a few are amazed, and at their wits end; should we judge of all the dealings of God by humane reason, we should conclude some of them without, or against reason, though indeed they are only above our reason, or have a height of reason in them, which we cannot reach, and therefore must admire.

No man wonders at that for which he can give a reason, and therefore we say it altogether unbecomes a Philosopher (who would be thought knowing about the reason of every thing) to wonder: There are depths in the providenees of God which no man is able to reach or sadom, the upright men need not be astonied at them. The Preacher gives a caution, that we should not be over curious in prying into such secrets (as some make the connexion of those two Verses, *Eccles.*7.15,16.) All things have I seen in the dayes of my vanity: Solomon was a man of vast observation, and though he had not seen all things in their particular existence, yet he had seen all things in their general nature; and he gives instance in two sorts of things which he had seen, There is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness (Job was a righteous man, and he perished outwardly) and there is a wicked man that prolongs his life in wickedness. Among all his observations, he thought none of greater moment then these two: Now when God puts the righteous into a perishing condition, and sets up the wicked in worldly glory; this is matter of much admiration and inquisition, therefore he subjoyns (according to this interpretation) his caution (*Vers.*16.) Be not righteous overmuch, neither make thy self over-wise; that is, Be not anxious in searching out every particular, or every little little about this administration of God; make not thy self over-wise, do not think that thou canst reach the reason of all that God hath done in causing a righteous man to perish, and a wicked man to flourish, there is more in it then thou canst comprehend, Why shouldest thou destroy thy self? that is, Thou maist amaze and bewilder, yea undo and destroy thy self, if thou venturest too far upon those secrets of providence, but thou wilt not be able to extricate or resolve thy self by all thy venturing.

Dum plus scire vis quã oportet, præ admiratione rei humanum captum vincentis ad mentis stuporem devenias. Pined.

Now, If the providences of God be such a deep, that upright wise men are astonied at them, then what a deep are the counsels and decrees of God? Providences are the dispensations of God to the eye, they are the objects of sense; if we cannot see to the end of that which is before us, as providences are, how shall we see the end of that which is so far off from us, as the Counsels and Decrees of God are? The Apostle stood as a man astonied at both (*Rom.*11.33.) when he had spoken of that amazing dispensation of God in casting off the Jews, and receiving the Gentiles, he cries out, O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgements! and among them, this special judgement, in taking the Gospel from the Jews, and breaking them off, who were the natural branches, that the Gentiles who were the wild Olive might be graffed in: How unsearchable is this judgement, and this way of God past finding out! Upright men are astonied at this.

Secondly, Observe, How strange soever the dealings of God are with his, yet righteous men are only astonied at them.

They are not scandalized, they are not offended at God for them, they do not blaspheme the name, or apostatize from the ways of God, nor do they quarrel at his dispensations. For as when they are astonished at the prosperity of the wicked, they preserve high and holy thoughts of God, and only seek resolution at the mouth of God: as the Prophet Jeremiah did (Chap. 12.1.) Lord, thou art righteous, yet let me reason with thee: Why doth the way of the wicked prosper? Or as Habakkuk (*Chap.*2.2.) propounds his question to find out the knot in the ways and dealings of God: Now I say, as it is thus with the righteous, when they see the great prosperity of the wicked, so when they see the greatest adversities of the godly, they are only amazed at the dealings of God, they do not despond, much less blaspheme because of his dealings. But when carnal men see those who have gone for righteous or upright, under afflictions, they run into desperate extreams.

First, They despise and slight them.

Secondly, They look upon them as the most miserable men in the World: Afflicted grace and innocence hath no beauty in a carnal eye.

Fourthly, They judge hardly of God, who deals thus severely with men: what? Are these the servants of God, and doth he use them thus? Doth he recompense them thus for the pains which they have taken, and for the work which they have done him?

Fifthly, They grow into an abhorrence of holiness, and into a distast of Religion it self. If God pay his Servants wages in such coyn as this (say they) let whoso will serve him, we are not ambitious of his Livery. If this be the portion of Professors (as you call them) let who will profess; thus they are scandalled and offended.

It is storied, that when Aygoland a King of the Moors (who had long maintained War against Charles the Great, hoping to make a fairer agreement with him) and promised to receive the Christian Faith, and be Baptized, he coming with a Gallant retinue to the French Court, saw there a number of poor men fed and cloathed by the Emperours charity, and enquiring who they were, it was answered, That they were the Servants of God: What, said he, Are the Emperours Servants so rich and brave, and are the Servants of God so poor and squalid? I had a purpose to be baptized, but now I am resolved never to serve that God, who keeps and rewards his Servants no better. What this King spake out, many speak in their hearts; they will not serve Christ upon self denying and suffering terms.

Aygolandus abjecto servorum Dei statu offensus a Christianæ fidei professione abstinuit. Lampad. in Sleyd. part. 3.

As when the Cross falls upon Hypocrites, they depart from the Faith, and (with Demas) imbrace this present World, they will not endure a storm for Christ, nor hazzard their worldly possessions for all the promises in the Gospel; so when the godly fall under crosses and afflictions for the Gospel, evil and prophane men reject it, they will none of it: The righteous may be astonied and wonder, but the wicked blaspheme at this.

Thirdly, Observe, Good men are apt to have strange thoughts about afflictions and crosses.

They who are well acquainted with the Theory of sufferings, yet when they come to suffer indeed, find much loathness and averseness to it. The Apostle Peter saw this, and laboured to remove it (*1 Pet.*4.12.) My brethren, think it not strange concerning the fiery tryal, as if some strange thing had hapned to you, but rejoyce, &c. They looked strange on tryals, as if they had never seen nor heard of them before: They knew not how to digest such hard meat as sufferings are, under the profession of the Gospel; their hearts were somewhat cold to those fires, and they had no mind to come near lest they should burn their fingers, and were therefore warned, Think it not strange concerning the fiery tryal. Jesus Christ (as the Prophet describes him, Isa. 53.3.) was a man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief. Christ and grief were no strangers, why then should a Christian think strange of it? The Apostle useth that argument (Vers. 13.) But rejoyce in as much as ye are partakers of Christs sufferings: Ours are the sufferings of Christ, not only because we suffer for him, and he suffers with us, but because he suffered the same things, yea far greater both before us and for us: Christ took our sufferings upon him, when he took our nature upon him, yet our nature thinks strange to partake in the sufferings of Christ.

The Apostle Paul (1 Epist. 3.3,4.) tells the Thessalonians, that he sent Timotheus to establish them, and to comfort them concerning their Faith, That no man should be moved by these afflictions: Intimating that the best of men, the best of Saints, are apt to be moved by afflictions; he means it of an inward motion, that is, to have their spirits disturbed and troubled, as Davids was when he put those questions to his soul (*Psal.*42.11.) Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? But why should no man be moved by those afflictions? The Apostle shews why, For your selves know that we were also appointed thereto: for verily, when I was with you I told you before that we must suffer tribulations, as it came to pass, and ye know it. Paul gave them notice before affliction came, lest they should be moved when they were come. Thus Christ warned his Disciples, and he warned them for this end (John 16.1.) These things have I spoken to you that you be not offended: What things were these? They (saith he) shall put you out of the Synagogues; yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doth God service: Christ foresaw that when these things came, they would find work enough to quiet their spirits in, and to quit themselves from troublesome motions: And as Christ, to keep or make their hearts quiet, tells them of their sufferings aforehand, so he therefore tells them that he himself had suffered before-hand (John 15. 18.). If the World hate you, you know it hated me before it hated you; you know it, and knowing it, you ought not be troubled when you meet with hatred in the World: The Servant must not expect better usage then his Master. When we see so much laid in to fortifie our spirits against outward crosses, in, or for the profession of the Gospel, it is an abundant argument that our hearts are apt to startle, and we to be astonied at them.

And the innocent shall stir up himself against the Hypocrite.

עיר Evigitavit, excitavit.

The innocent.] Here is a different Character, or cloathing of words, but the person is the same. The innocent shall [stir] up himself: The word signifies to stir up from sleep, and to stir up from sloath; it signifies also such a stirring as the Eagle useth to provoke her young ones to fly (Deut. 32. 11.) Thus the innocent shall awake and stir up himself.

חנף Sunt qui reddunt improbum quomodo ea vox exprimitur apud Hebræos. Drus.

Against the Hypocrite.] The Hypocrite is taken two wayes: Either strictly, as opposed to the upright in the former part; and under that notion I have heretofore spoken of the Hypocrite (Chap. 8, &c.)

Secondly, The Hypocrite may be taken largely, and so every wicked man is he, except he who openly professeth wickedness, and yet even he may go for an Hypocrite, for he is more wicked (when he hath professed his utmost) then he doth profess himself to be.

Reddunt iniquum. Sept. Delatorem. Targ. Justus super inimicum consurget. Olymp.

The Septuagint render him, Unjust, and the Chaldee Paraphrase, The backbiter or defamer: And another of the Greek Interpreters calls him the enemy; The innocent shall stir up himself against his enemy, or against his opposite: And who is that, but the wicked man, under what notion soever we put him? The single terms thus cleared, fall yet under a different sence, as joyned together.

Suam orationem paulo incitatiorē excusat, q.d. quid mirum me ita loqui cum res ipsa tam indigna sit? Pined.

First, Some conceive that Job makes an apology, or an excuse for himself in these words, why he expresst so much passion, and used such sharpness of speech toward his Friends: As if he had said, Blame me not for doing it, things are carried so, as upright men may be astonied, it would make a wise man mad, and a meek man furious; a very post would be awakened and stirred, at what my Friends have again and again pressed upon me; therefore pardon my passion, and (if you will needs call it so) my impatience.

Non me latet ad rem tantam sapientes percelli, atque adeo interdum insontes adversus eos qui sic affliguntur, tanquam adversus hypocritas commoveri. Bez.

Secondly, Master Beza expounds Job aiming at a good man in great troubles mistaken for an Hypocrite, by those who are good: He represents him speaking thus, I am not ignorant, that not only ordinary and common men, but even the wise and the upright will be troubled and astonied at my sufferings, and that sometimes (in such a case as mine is) innocent men will stir up, or set themselves against him that is afflicted, as if he were an Hypocrite. When God puts a disguise of great troubles upon his faithful Servants, they who are faithful will scarce own them; they are ready to number them among enemies, at least to doubt very much (as they did about Paul upon another account, Acts 9. 26.) whether he be a Friend or a Disciple. Afflictions have made the sincere appear as Hypocrites in the opinion of those who are sincere.

Indignabitur contra hypocritam quod ille calamitates tribuit peccatis. Cajet.

A third makes this the ground of the innocent mans quarrel against the Hypocrite; why doth he stir up himself, and engage against him? Why is he so angry with the Hypocrite? Even because he sees the Hypocrite foolishly condemning the godly as wicked, because they are afflicted, or ascribing their calamities meerly to their sins.

Excitabit se contra impium florentem & felicem, quod videat illū non recipere digna peccati.

Fourthly, Thus, The innocent shall stir up himself; That is, His spirit shall be troubled at the Hypocrite, or wicked man, whom he sees in a flourishing condition: so we may expound it by that caution which David gives (Psal. 37. 1.) Fret not thy self because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity. Good men have been much moved and fretted at the prosperity of the ungodly: But surely Job is not here declaring the infirmities of the innocent, but their graces. And therefore,

Last y, The innocent shall stir up himself against the Hypocrite, carries in it the commendation of the innocent persons perseverance and constancy in the faith and sincerity of his profession, what changes soever are upon him: As if he had said, Though a godly man be afflicted and brought low, though he be scorned and trampled upon when he is brought low, yet he will not forsake his principles, or disclaim his profession; nay he will be so far from slacking in, or turning away from his profession, that he will manifest more holy zeal for God and his wayes, together with more holy opposition against wicked men, and all their wayes, then ever he did before: The upright shall be astonied at this, but they shall not be disheartened, their wisdom and courage shall still appear in maintaining their quarrel against the generation of evil doers, wheresoever they meet with them. The innocent shall stir up himself against the Hypocrite.

Quamvis ab eo rideatur quod affligatur, haud tamen propterea desiderio ducetur ejus sequendi aut ei se adjungendi sed excitabit se, &c. Merc.

Hence Note, First, There is an everlasting opposition between the godly and the wicked.

The innocent stirs up himself (like a Lyon) against the Hypocrite; His heart riseth against him, not as a man, not as his enemy, but as a wicked man, and as an enemy to God. The foundation of this holy War was laid in that word of God (Gen. 3. 15.) I will put enmity between thee and the Woman, between her seed, and thy seed. As there is an enmity, de facto, in wicked men against the righteous, they will ever be opposing them: So there is an enmity, de jure, of right and duty, in the righteous against the wicked, they ought ever to oppose them; that quarrel, those feuds must not be laid down: And therefore the Apostle John, who though he was the beloved Disciple, and was most pressing and perswasive to love among Saints and Brethren, yet he forbids the love of wicked men, Love not the World (1 Epist. 2. 15.) which refers as well to worldly persons, as worldly things. And the Apostle James is direct (Chap. 4. 4.) The friendship of the World is enmity against God. Our piecing in, or making peace with the World, is a proclaimed War against God himself. It is our duty, and it is our spiritual safety, to stir up our selves spiritually against the wicked. As we deny not civil peace with Hypocrites, and the worst of men; so there is a spiritual warfare which we are bound to continue (how chargeable soever it may prove to us) against all Hypocrites and wicked men. And if they say (of this Sword) as (Jer. 47. 6.) O thou Sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? We must answer as the Sword doth there, How can I be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given me a charge against Askelon? The Sword of that War receives its Commission from God, and is designed now to one Coast, anon to another: The Sword of this War hath long since received its Commission from God, against all the coasts of sin, and powers of darkness; nor can it be quiet, or put it self up in its Scabboard, while there is an Hypocrite appearing upon the face of the Earth.

Gods quarrel must be perpetuated, it can never be taken up. Let them return to thee, but return not thou to them, was the Prophets charge (Jer. 15. 19.) There's no compounding of this difference; they must return and give themselves up to God, and his wayes, else we cannot give them an inch of ground, or make truce with them for an hour, much less may we make peace with them, or give them the right hand of fellowship.

Secondly, Here we have the Hypocrite in his flourish, and the innocent in his affliction; the Hypocrite aloft, and the innocent below; yet when it is thus, even then the innocent is described stirring up himself against the Hypocrite.

Hence Observe, A godly man afflicted, doth not at all approve or applaud the Hypocrite, but opposeth him in his greatest pomp and worldly splendour.

When the wicked are at the highest, even as happy as the World can make them, yet a godly man will not change states with them, or (as we say) turn Tables with them; he would not have his outward prosperity, with his heart, if it were worth ten thousand Worlds: He sees and knows there is more excellency and worth in afflicted grace, then in the most prosperous wickedness: The love of God is better then life, and if so, what are all the things of this life compared to it? Hence a godly man hath no better opinion of the wicked in riches, then in poverty, and he hath no worse opinion of himself when he is poor, then when he was rich: He doth not account grace the leſs glorious, becauſe it hath ſo little of outward glory upon it.

And ſeeing he will not change ſtates with him, he cannot envy him: We envy thoſe only whom we judge in a better condition then our ſelves. David under a temptation, was envious at the fooliſh, when he ſaw the proſperity of the wicked (Pſal. 73. 2, 3.) and his feet were almoſt gone, his ſteps had well-nigh ſlipt, but when he recollected himſelf, and went to the Sanctuary, ſuch thoughts were quickly down, and envy was extinct, he ſaw much matter enough to pity wicked men, but none to envy them, they ſtand in ſlippery places, and are ſuddenly caſt down. How are they brought into deſolation, as in a moment they are utterly conſumed with terrors.

And as he doth not envy them, ſo thirdly, much leſs doth he imitate them; he is ſo far from imitating them, that he ſets himſelf to oppoſe them, and he oppoſeth them all thoſe wayes, and with all thoſe weapons that God hath put into his hand: He oppoſeth ever him by counſel and conviction, by reproofs and prayers. And as he fights againſt the Hypocrite by prayer; ſo by prayer he fortifies himſelf againſt all ſinful compliances with him.

Thus David prayed (Pſal. 141. 4.) Incline not my heart to any evil thing, to practice wicked works with men that work iniquity, and let me not eat of their dainties: As if he had ſaid, Though wicked men be fine fed, and dyet upon dainties every day, though they devour the fat, and drink the ſweet, and have all things that their hearts can deſire, yet, Lord, ever keep me from the practice of wicked works with men that work iniquity, and let me not eat of their dainties, who find a ſweetneſs in ſin, and take pleaſure in unrighteouſneſs.

It is the counſel of the Wiſe man (Prov. 1. 10, 11.) My Son, if ſinners entice thee, conſent thou not: Do not aſſociate with them, they will tell thee of great matters, they will ſay, Come let us lay wait for blood, we ſhall fill our houſes with ſpoil; caſt in thy lot among us, let us all have one purſe. My Son, walk not thou in the way with them, refrain thy foot from their paths; for their feet run to evil, &c. He that would refrain his foot from walking in, muſt firſt refrain his heart from approving of, the paths of wickedneſs.

This the innocent doth and more, while he ſtirreth up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite. And as he ſets himſelf againſt the way of the Hypocrites, ſo he labours to ſet forward with all his might in the way of holineſs, for that's his way, as appears in the next Verſe.

Verſe 9. The righteous ſhall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands ſhall wax ſtronger and ſtronger.

The righteous.] It is the ſame man ſtill, who ſhould be encouraged by Job's example to a vigorous progreſs; He, the righteous man,

Shall hold on.] The word ſignifies to hold with ſtrength, to hold toughly, to hold as with the teeth, reſolving never to let go, but ever to go on

In his way.] What way? It may be taken either particularly for that way of oppoſition which he maintained againſt the Hypocrite; or ſecondly, for the way of righteouſneſs, and that twofold.

First, The way of his heart, or his inward way.

Secondly, The way of his hand, or his outward way.

The righteous man holds on in both theſe wayes; he continues his courſe both in the holy motions of his ſpirit towards God, and in the holy actings of his life towards man: In this way he is full of motion, but he will not move a ſtep, nor willingly decline to the right hand or to the left, out of this way: Here he walks as to induſtry; and here he ſtands as to conſtancy. The righteous ſhall hold on his way.

Hence Obſerve, First, The righteous ſhall perſevere; perſeverance is at once the duty and the priviledge of the Saints.

As they are in a good ſtate, ſo they ſhall go on in a good way, The path of the juſt is as the ſhining light, that ſhineth more and more unto the perfect day (Prov. 4. 18.) The goodneſs of Hypocrites is as the morning cloud, and goeth away as the early dew (Hoſ. 6. 4.) The wind ſcatters the morning Cloud, and the riſing Sun exhales the early Dew; thus the goodneſs of the Hypocrite is gone; but the goodneſs of the righteous (like the goodneſs of God, of and from whom it is) endureth (in its proportion) continually (Pſal. 52. 1.) As they who joyn works to grace, make grace to be no grace; ſo do they who ſay, the work of grace may be loſt; or that grace may for ever loſe its working: The work of grace may be clouded, but grace is no cloud; the working of grace may decline, but grace cannot dye.

The righteous ſhall hold on his way.] Further, This Scripture tells us, that he ſhall hold on, not only in fair way, and in good weather, but in ſtormy weather, and rugged wayes, when his way lyes among ſharp Stones, and ragged Rocks, through Bryars and Thorns; yea, I may ſay, when his way lyes among Bears and Lyons, he will on.

Hence Obſerve, A godly man perſeveres, notwithſtanding all ſeeming diſcouragements from God, and all real oppoſitions from men.

Though God ſeem to caſt cold water on him, yet his fire never goes out, and often (by a holy Antiperiſtaſis) he is inflamed the more: While the evil World thinks to daſh him out of countenance, and damp his ſpirit, he is the more emboldened: As the Apoſtles approved themſelves the Miniſters of Chriſt, ſo doth every Believer (in his Sphere) In much patience, in afflictions, in neceſſities, in diſtreſſes, in ſtripes, in impriſonments, by honour, and diſhonour, by good report, and evil report, &c. (2 Cor. 6. 4, 8.) Let the way be what it will, foul or fair, a green Carpet way, or a deep pochy way, let it be what it will, he goes through thick and thin. Paul puts the queſtion, and reſolves it (Rom. 8. 35.) Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? He puts it of a perſon, Who ſhall? And he anſwers about things, Shall tribulation, or diſtreſs, ſhall theſe ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? That is, Either from that love which we bear to Chriſt, or from that love that Chriſt bears to us; what ſhall make Chriſt out of love with us? Or what ſhall make us out of love with Chriſt? Shall any thing? Nothing ſhall, for thoſe things ſhall not which might ſeem moſt able to make us out of love with Chriſt, or to tell us that Chriſt doth not love us. Shall tribulation, or diſtreſs, or perſecution, or famine, or nakedneſs, or peril, or ſword? Nay in all theſe things we are more then conquerours through him that loved us: He loved us, therefore he will love us, and we ſhall go on to love him: for through him we ſhall not only conquer, but over conquer, or more then conquer, whatſoever ſtands in the way to divert us from his love, or to render him unlovely. Nothing can ſeparate Believers from the love which Chriſt bears to them; if any thing can do it, ſin can; but ſin cannot, becauſe he hath more then conquered it by his own power: Nothing can ſeparate Believers from the love which they bear to Chriſt, if any thing can, tribulation can, but that cannot, becauſe we ſhall more then conquer it through his power. The righteous ſhall hold on his way; he neither turns back, nor ſtands ſtill. David was ſorely ſhaken, and tempted (Pſal. 73.) yet his feet were (but) almoſt gone, and his ſteps were (but) well-nigh ſlipt. As Hypocrites at the moſt are but almoſt Chriſtians they are not Chriſtians altogether; and as they ſtep at their neareſt but well-nigh Heaven, they ſhall not enter in; ſo the feet of true Believers may almoſt be gone out of the good way, but they ſhall not go out altogether, and their ſteps may well-nigh ſlip from God, but they ſhall be upheld; and hence it is, that though they have many, not only ſlips, but falls in the way, yet they ſhall neither ſlip nor fall quite out of the way; this David's experience taught him, at the twenty third Verſe of that Pſalm: Nevertheleſs (ſaith he) I am continually with thee, and thou haſt held me by my right hand: That is, Though I have many troubles in thy way, yet I depart not out of thy way: I have temptations to leave thee, but I will not leave thee; I am ſtill with thee, I am where I was, yet not by any power of my own, but by thy power, for thou holdeſt me by my right hand: It is not the hold which we have of God, but that which he hath of us that makes us hold on our way: We ſhould quickly let go our hold of God, if God had not infinite faſter hold of us; Thou holdeſt me by my right hand. There is a (manutenentia Dei)

Dei) an invisible Hand-holding of God, by which the whole visible Creation is supported, without which no Creature could hold on in the way of Nature; much more is there an invisible Hand-holding of God, by which the spiritual Creation is supported, and without which the new Creature cannot hold on in the wayes of Grace. 'Tis the hold which Christ hath of us, and the rooting which we have in him, by which we are confirmed. Israel the people of God, is said, to grow as the Lilly, and to cast forth his roots like Lebanon (Hos. 14. 5.) The Trees of Lebanon are high, and spread out their branches, but they are also deeply rooted, they have as much under ground as above, they have as much hold in the earth as they have shew in the air. As the Saints grow up and spread forth their branches, so they grow down and cast out their roots like Lebanon; so that the winds and storms which shake them, do indeed but settle them. 'Tis the goodness of the root which at once makes them fruitful, and makes them firm: He that stands by this strength shall stand; and he that is fruitful by these roots shall be fruitful still, and bring forth more fruit in age. The righteous shall hold on his way. As Christ speaks terribly to the wicked, that they shall hold on their way (Revel. 22. 11.) He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; he that is filthy, let him be filthy still: These are not permissions to wicked men to be wicked still, much less are they perswasions unto wickedness, but they are dreadful comminations; wicked men are threatned with this plague, to be given up to the wickedness of their own hearts: Now as Christ speaks terribly there to his Enemies, so he speaks comfortably and encouragingly to his Friends, He that is righteous let him be righteous still; and he that is holy let him be holy still: which carries not only the force of a command upon them, or the direction of a rule to them, but also the sweetness of a gracious promise, or of a special priviledge, that they shall be maintained in righteousness and holiness unto the end, or that they shall hold on their way. Hypocrites may make a fair flourish, and stand some brunts, they may endure for a season, but they endure not long, much less to the end. They went out from us, saith the Apostle John (1 Epist. 2. 19.) they had once an appearance, and a presence with us, but they were not of us: That is, They had no real communion and fellowship with us; their bodies were with us, but not their hearts; and when we lost them, we lost no more then the Corn doth when the Chaff is winnowed away; or then the Body doth, when hurtful humours are purged away. Who were these? He means the Apostate professors of that Age, Ebion, Cerinthus, &c. These were not of us: How did the Apostle know that? He tells us how in the next words, For if they had been of us, they would, no doubt, have continued with us; but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us. Saint John puts it beyond all dispute, and himself had not the least doubt of it, that they who are once in Church, shall continue in it; and that they who depart, do not depart from grace, but from a shadow of grace: They do not fall from what they were; but manifest what they were not: They went out from us, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us. But why doth the Apostle say they were not all of us? Were any of those Apostates of them? Not all, is a known Hebraism for none (Psal. 143. 2.) In thy sight (not all men, that is) no man living shall be justified. So (1 John 3. 15.) Ye know that every murderer hath not; that is (as we translate) No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. So here, They were not all, that is, None of them were of us: Many have forsaken a profession of Faith; but he that hath Faith will not forsake the profession of it. The righteous shall hold on his way: And not only so, but,

Cum creverimus in Domino mittemus radices nostras sicut arbores Libani, quæ quantum in auras consurgunt vertice, tantum radice in ima demergunt, ut nulla tempestate quatiantur, sed stabili motu consistant. Hieron.

He that hath clean hands shall wax stronger and stronger.

To continue in the right way is very good; but to encrease in it is far better; he that holds his own in sad times, is to be commended; but he that thrives and gains in godliness in sad times, is to be admired: And who is that? Job tells us,

He that hath clean hands.] The words are a Circumlocution, describing the same person, who was before called, upright, innocent, and righteous. And yet surely it is not a bare repetition of the same person, under another title; for though we must take this cleanness of hands in conjunction with cleanness and uprightness of heart: And though it be not so hard a matter to shew a pair of white clean hands, as it is to have an upright, or a clean white heart; yea, though it be true, that clean hands will not wax stronger and stronger in a day of affliction, unless joyned with an upright heart, yet (I say) these clean hands imply somewhat else, not only besides that uprightness, but also besides that innocency and righteousness spoken of before.

The Hand is the instrument of action, and clean hands are an emblem of holy actings: So that Job seems to intimate, that he, who besides the uprightness of his heart, and the general innocency and righteousness of his way, is also careful to keep himself free from every spot which might foul his hands. He (I say) who is thus compleat and spotless, is fullest of courage when troubles and sorrows are upon him. 'Tis true, a mans general uprightness and innocency will mightily uphold him in the main; yet if he have got a visible blot or defilement upon the face or hand of his conversation or dealings with men, this will be a damp upon his spirit, and a deadning to his heart, though the bent of his heart stands fair towards God.

Again, this may be added in answer to a Plea which some make when they are taxed with the uncleanness of their hands (say they) O we have good hearts, we are upright towards God; we confess we fail many times, but we have good meanings, and we would both do and be better: Is thy hand unclean? Thy heart is a thousand times more unclean: Is thy way evil? Thy spirit is worse: How can any man have a good meaning, or a good heart, when himself is evil? No man can. There is no excuse for the uncleanness of the hands, by saying the heart is clean? For where there is a clean heart there will be clean hands. Many have clean hands, that have unclean hearts; but no man hath a clean heart whose hands continue unclean; much less will such a one plead the cleanness of his heart in excuse for the uncleanness of his hand; nor is there any ground for such a Plea. Should a man say, here is a Tree that bears ill fruit, but it hath an excellent root, I am sure it is of a right kind, but (I confess) the fruit is naught; would not any man of reason condemn such reasoning? Would he not say, This is to bely Nature? For every good Tree brings forth good fruit: Is it not also a belying of the Spirit of grace, to say, The heart is upright, but the hands are unclean: For an upright heart makes a clean hand, as clean hands are a probable evidence of an upright heart.

He that hath not both these, hath neither of them to purpose; which (we may conceive) was Job's scope while he puts them here together.

Further, while Job speaks in the third person, He that hath clean hands; he answers Eliphaz for himself, who in a third person charged him with the uncleanness both of his heart and hands (Chap. 15. 14.) from which he also vindicates himself (Chap. 16. 17.) As if he had said, You have often charged me with the uncleanness of my hands; but though I will not boast of my self, yet this I feel and speak by experience, He that hath clean hands shall wax Stronger and stronger.] The Hebrew is, He shall add strength; that is, He shall go on from one degree of strength to another. But what strength shall he add? He means not bodily strength: The best of Saints may loose that in the battels of affliction, and grow every day weaker and weaker: But he shall add spiritual strength, so the Apostle states it (2. Cor. 4. 16.) Though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. The more evil a Believer suffers, the stronger he is in goodness, and to do good; while his flesh wears off and wastes, he gets new spirits; he takes heart, and is more couragious, as the Septuagint render Job's Text.

Hence Observe, First, Grace is of an increasing nature, it grows stronger and stronger.

True grace lives, and therefore it must needs grow. The grain of Mustard-seed proves a great tree (Psal. 84.)

They

They go from strength to strength, or from company to company; that is, from one good company to another, still gathering up goodness as they go. As the Bee goes from Flower to Flower, to gather Honey; so Believers go from Duty to Duty, from Ordinance to Ordinance, from Praying to Hearing, to gather Grace and Strength; every Grace hath strength; and the more Grace the more strength; till we come to that, which is strictly called, Strength of Grace.

Secondly, Observe, A through godly man doth not only not fall from Grace in time of trouble, but he increaseth and groweth in Grace; he addeth Strength.

As affliction gives a proof of Grace, whether it be true or no; so where it is true, it is improved by affliction. Naturalists tell us, that the reason of Thunder and Lightening is, because the Heat being pent in, and imprisoned by the Cold of the middle Region, breaks out (by an Antiperistasis) with terrible noise and flashings: And thus when Grace is pent in by opposition, persecution, and affliction, it enlargeth it self, and breaks out with greater strength, yea, with a kind of heavenly violence; and not only maintains its own, but is a gainer.

Tanto magis integritati studebit. Bez.

It is said of the Lacedemonian Republick, That when all other Kingdoms were undone by War, that only grew rich, was bettered by it. We may say, that whereas all prophane persons, and Hypocrites, are undone by affliction (all their Paint is washed off, their Varnish discovered) only true Believers thrive, and are advantaged by it: He that hath an upright heart, and clean hands, grows stronger and stronger: His inward man increaseth in outward decayes. It is said of the Israelites (Exod. 1. 12.) that the more the Egyptians afflicted them, The more they multiplied and grew: They multiplied in number, they grew in strength and stature; their oppression was their addition in temporals: It is so with all true Israelites in spirituals, the more they are afflicted and troubled, the more they increase: And whereas the Lord speaks in reference to wicked men (Isai. 1. 5.) Why should you be smitten any more? Ye will revolt more and more. (The more evil men are smitten for their good, the worse they are.) We may say on the contrary, that the righteous, the more they are smitten with evil, the better they are; yea, they sometimes put wicked men to such a stopping expostulation, as God makes there concerning wicked men; Why should we trouble them any more? They will hold fast more and more; they will not be beaten off with sowre looks and hard words, no nor with our hardest blows: We may trouble and weary out our selves, yea, and break our own hearts, but we shall never dishearten them. All Ages have given experiments of this: The Apostles in the Acts rejoyced when they were threatened, and were emboldened with scourging. 'Tis said of the suffering Saints (Heb. 10. 34.) They took joyfully the spoiling of their goods: They were glad of an opportunity to put off their worldly goods at so great a rate, as a proof of the sincerity of their graces: Our goods never go off at so high a price, nor come to so good a Market, as when they are spoiled in a good cause. Paul tells us, That many waxed confident by his bonds (Phil. 1. 14.) They were so far from withdrawing from the profession of the Gospel, because Paul was clapt up in Prison, and laid by the heels, that they were more bold to avouch it. As some have been weakened and terrified by the sufferings of others; so many have been confirmed and heartened; they have not only kept from discouragement, but they have waxed confident by bonds, and their Spirits have been at greater liberty by seeing others in Prison, though they had reason enough to expect their turn would be next.

Exquisitior crudelitas gentium adversus Christianos, illecebra est magis sectæ, plures efficimur, quoties metimur. Tertul.

One of the Ancient tells us, The more cunning and exact Persecutors are, the more constant and exact Believers are. The Christians of those times grew into a kind of artificialness in Grace, while the Heathens grew so artificial in cruelty; and the oftner they were mowed down by the bloody Sword, the more were begotten and quickened by the Word: The opposition which truth and holiness found, was a provocation to own the truth, and to them a sweet temptation unto holiness.

Thirdly, Note, When God gives new tryals, he will give new strength.

The righteous grow stronger as their afflictions grow stronger: Never fear greater tryals, when you are promised greater strength: If you have more burdens, you shall have more shoulders. Whether the Lord calls us to passive obedience, or to active, he is wise and faithful to proportion, and gives out suitable ability. It is not from the improvements of Free-will, but from the fresh anointings of the Spirit, That we are strengthened with might in the inner man (Ephes. 3. 16.) And again, (Col. 1. 12.) We are strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience, and long-suffering with joyfulness. Affliction it self cannot strengthen us in Grace, it rather weakens us; the increase of strength flows from the same Fountain, whence we had the first strength: All is from God. In the Lord have we righteousness and strength (Isa. 45. 24.) And He is an everlasting strength, the Rock of Ages (Isa. 26. 4.) As he is an everlasting strength in himself, so he is to his people: And the reason why his people are everlasting strong, is, because he is so. Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall; but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings as Eagles, they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint (Isa. 40. 30, 31.) But why shall the youths faint, and the young men utterly fall? Are not beginners in grace as sure to be upheld as the ancient, or men of dayes? And why is fainting and falling the lot of youths and young men, who are supposed in their spiritual capacity, or in their natural, to have the greatest strength? The Apostle John's experience of the young men seems to differ very much from this Prophesie of them; I write unto you young men (saith he, 1 Epist. 2. 14.) because ye are strong, and the Word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one. How doth Isaiah say, the young men shall utterly fall, and yet John saith, They have overcome the wicked one? That is, The Devil. Every Victory is an argument of strength; especially a Victory over him who is very strong.

I answer, The Prophet and the Apostle do not speak of the same young men: The Prophets young men are any men that boast of their own strength in spirituals, and trust upon it; these, of what age soever they be, he calls young men, not because like young men they have a real great strength, but because (which young men are very apt to do in the strength they have) they trust in a strength which indeed they have not; so that these are called young men, because they boast of, and trust in their supposed strength, not because they are really very strong; and therefore these young men shall not only faint, but utterly fall. But the Apostle John's young men are such as have much strength in them, and yet live, and walk, and fight in the strength of Jesus Christ; these young men are so far from falling utterly, that they shall stand for ever, and all their enemies shall either flee or fall before them, because as the battel reneweth, so Christ will renew their strength, and recruit their hearts with further aid at every further charge.

Only by going out of our own strength we get strength, that was Paul's experience of himself (2 Cor. 12. 9, 10.) When I am weak, then I am strong: That is, When I am weak in my self, and have low thoughts of my own stock, then strength is sent me in; and I am supported by an Almighty power, when I see that I have no might: Therefore (saith he) most gladly will I rejoyce in my infirmities, that the strength of Christ may rest on me: Paul was no sooner convinced that the strength he had was not sufficient, but he heard that comfortable word from Heaven, My Grace is sufficient for thee: We are stronger by the Grace in Christ, then by the Grace we receive from Christ. He that lives upon the Grace received from Christ, and not upon the Grace in Christ, shall quickly feel a want of Grace, and a decay of spiritual life.

Now, if Grace received from Christ be not stock enough to live and continue upon, what is Nature for any man to begin upon? Peter had received Grace, and he made an honest real profession to Christ, not a flattering verbal complement, when he said (Matth. 26. 33, 35.) Though all men ſhall be offended becauſe of thee, yet will I not be offended; and though I ſhould die with thee, yet will I not deny thee: yet becauſe he did not enough (if at all) renounce his own ſtrength, inſtead of waxing ſtronger and ſtronger, he was weaker and weaker, and did not only deny his Maſter, but forſwore him. Not only they who go out in the ſtrength of nature, but they alſo who go out in the ſtrength of inherent grace, may quickly (notwithſtanding a ſincerity of profeſſion) diſhonour their profeſſion, and fall from their own ſtedfaſtneſs: Therefore truſt in the Lord, and ye ſhall not only hold on, but grow ſtronger and ſtronger in your way.

And if ſuch be the ſtate of a godly man, that he holds on, and waxeth ſtronger in times of trouble, what ſhall we ſay of them, who turn out of the way, or languiſh in it, when nothing troubles them? What ſhall we ſay of them who run out of the way, though there be no Lyon in the way, when we hear that Saints will not out though there be a Lyon in the way? What ſhall we ſay of them that depart from God, when (as Job ſpeaks in another place) they waſh their footſteps with Butter, and the rock powers out Oyl to them (that is, when God loadeth them with his benefits daily) when we hear that the righteous, and he that hath clean hands will not out of the way, though every ſtep be up to the knees in Mire, though he be daſhed againſt the Rocks, and killed all the day long? Was there ever truth of grace in thoſe who finding nothing but comfort and outward bleſſings in the way, do yet go out of the way, grow cold and ſink in their profeſſion? When Chriſt gives outward pleaſure to his followers, and they forſake him, may they not juſtly be ſuſpected to take pleaſure in forſaking him? And that they never took any pleaſure in following him, but only followed him for their pleaſure? What would theſe do if they were aſſaulted with ſtrong temptations or troubles, who turn aſide being freed from all ſuch temptations? What would they do if their ways were full of briers and thorns, who go back and Apoſtatize while their wayes are ſtrewed with flowers, and they tread upon Roſes? 'Tis true indeed, that the warm Sun (as we ſay) cauſeth ſome to caſt off their Cloaks, which the cold wind moved them to keep cloſer on; but, though it be a truth, that proſperity makes many forſake God, yet it cannot be denied but that adverſity is a greater temptation to deny him. A ſound heart may (poſſibly) give in a little in boiſtrous times and Winterly dayes, but it is almoſt an infallible diſcovery of a rotten heart, to flinch in fair weather, or in a Summers day. As they who keep cloſe to, and hold in the wayes of God in dark and doubtful diſpenſations, ſhew a pure love to his wayes; ſo they who warp and recede, under clear and comfortable diſpenſations, ſhew a pure diſlike of them.

Laſtly, Note the various expreſſions uſed in theſe two verſes, we have here the deſcription of a godly man under four Titles.

Secondly, The innocent.
Thirdly, The righteous.
Fourthly, He that hath clean hands.

Theſe meet in one perſon, yet they have diſtinct ſignifications: Uprightneſs is ſtrictly oppoſed to hypocriſie: innocency, to guilt; righteouſneſs to oppreſſion; and cleanneſs of hands to all the pollutions of converſation. Every kind of goodneſs, and all the graces concenter in him that is truly godly.

He that is godly, is any thing that is good; and he that is wicked is any thing that is evil. You cannot call a wicked man out of his name, how ill ſoever you call him. And you cannot call a compleat godly man out of his name, how good ſoever you call him, he is upright, and innocent, and righteous; his hands are clean, and his heart is clean, he is clean all over, and holy all over, while we call him all this we do not call him beyond what God hath made him.

VERS. 10, 11, 12.

But as for you all, do you return, and come now; for I cannot find one wiſe man among you.
My dayes are paſt, my purpoſes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart.
They change the night into day, the light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.

THough Job's Friends had ſeverely reproved and threatned him; reproved him for his ſuppoſed ſin, and threatned him with further ſufferings, in caſe he continued in ſin; yet did they as often counſel, and encourage him; counſel him to repent, and return to God, encourage him with promiſes that God would repent and return to him, yea turn his captivity and afflictions, as the Rivers in the South; and that though he then was in a night of ſorrow, yet a morning of joy, or joy in the morning ſhou'd ſurely break out and ſhine upon him.

Now, as Job had before often (and alſo in the former part of this Chapter) ſupported himſelf under the weight of all their reproofs and threatnings, by the power of God, and the conſcience of his own integrity; ſo he had as often before, and he doth it here again in the latter part of this Chapter, caſt off their promiſes and incouragements, together with all hopes of any reſtauration in this life, to ſuch a flouriſhing outward condition as he once enjoyed.

And becauſe his Friends diſcerning this in him by ſome of his precedent anſwers, had judged it as a ſymptome of ſecret guilt, and ſelf condemnation, which would not let him ſo much as expect any good: So Eliphaz had perſtringed and ſmitten him (Chap. 15. 22.) He believes not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs: Therefore Job wonders to ſee them perſiſt in that opinion, and concludes them under a great defect of underſtanding, who did not perceive that a man ſo miſerably pined, and worn with ſickneſs and pain, as he was, had nothing to look after, or prepare for, but only a Grave. And this he doth with much rhetorical elegancy, and paſſionateneſs of ſpeech, to the end of this Chapter.

His ſenſe may be drawn together into this brief way of reaſoning.

He who is as a dead man already, ſhould not feed himſelf, or be fed by others, with hopes of life, or of worldly proſperity in this life.

But I (for my part) am as a dead man, or but the ſhadow of a man.

Therefore I will neither feed my ſelf, neither ought you to feed me with hopes of life, or of proſperity in this life.

Yet before he layes down, and illuſtrates this Argument, he invites over his Friends to his opinion, and profeſſeth that they had not yet ſpoken any reaſon, nor argued like wiſe men in all that they had argued to the contrary.

Verſ. 10. But as for you all, do you return, and come now, for I cannot find one wiſe man among you.

Though ſome wiſe men go out of the way, yet it is for want of wiſdom that any man goes out of the way; while Job calls upon his Friends to return, he implies that they going out of the way were not wiſe, and that it would be their wiſdom to return into it.

But as for you all.] Job puts all his Friends into one predicament, and indeed they were much alike to him, having all troden in the ſame path, and met in the ſame judgement of, and reſolutions againſt him. But what would he have them do? As he ſuppoſed them all in one way, and that out of the way: So he ſets them all to the ſame work, that they might come right again.

Do you return, and come now.] Yet, there are three opinions about his meaning, while he ſaith, Return and come.

Firſt, Some conceive, that Job's Friends, being nettled (as we ſay) and provoked with what he had ſpoken before, began to renew the diſpute, and to rally themſelves with conjoyned Forces, for a freſh encounter; which Job perceiving, he (according to this Interpretation) dares them in theſe words, and ſends them a Challenge: As if he had ſaid, I ſee you are providing your ſelves, Quaſi facta teſtudine una omnes concurrite. Nicet. Ad diſputationē provocat. Sanct.

selves, and consulting for a rejoynder with me; I, do, do if you think good, return, and come, put your selves into what posture you please, joyn your forces together, I am ready to receive your charge, and make my defence, I am not afraid of you all; you are three, and I have not so much as a Second, yet I will not turn my back from you all, therefore, as for you all, do ye return and come now, come, when, or as soon as you will.

Verumtamen omnes incumbite & venite quaso. Sept. Convertendi verbum cum quocunq; alio verbo junctum, idem significat quod rursus, aut altera vice aliquid facere.

Thus, He challengeth them to a further dispute. Return, and come, is (as the propriety of the phrase in the Original imports) come again if you will, come a second time, come a third. The word that we translate Return, when it is joyned with another Verb (say Grammarians) signifies as much as Again, or, to do a thing the second time. Take two places of Scripture for it (Jos. 5. 2.) At that time the Lord said unto Joshua, Make thee sharp Knives, and circumcise again the Children of Israel the second time: So we translate: The Hebrew is, Return (which is the word of the Text) and circumcise them a second time: Not that they who had been once circumcised, must have a second circumcision: But for as much as circumcision, which was first commanded to Abraham, had been long dis-used, while the people of Israel were moving and unsetled in the Wilderness, therefore the Lord gives circumcision a kind of second Institution, by requiring Joshua to restore it solemnly a second time, as it was set up at first. Return and circumcise them; that is, renew that ancient Ordinance of Circumcision.

The like way of speaking, read (Psal. 85. 6.) where David (in behalf of the Church) pleads with God thus, Wilt thou not revive us again? The Hebrew is, Wilt thou not return, and revive us? We translate the Verb Return, by the Adverb, Again. Wilt thou not revive us again? Thou hast given us many revives: when we were as dead men, and like carkasses rotting in the Grave, thou didst revive us; wilt thou not revive us once more, and act over those powerfully merciful works, and strong salvations once more, or again? So here, Return, and come; that is, Come again.

The words thus expounded, are an argument of Job's magnanimity and holy courage in maintaining his right, and standing up in the defence of his own integrity against all comers. As it is our duty to contend earnestly for the Faith once delivered to the Saints; so for our own faithfulness.

Secondly, Others expound the words as an advise, not as a challenge; not as a profession of his fixed purpose to oppose what his Friends should say in maintenance of their opinion, but only as a desire of their attention to what he had yet to say for his. Come return now, as if he had thus expressed himself, Ye are not right, let me set you right, and instruct you better; learn of me; you have need enough to be taught, for I have not found a wise man among you. Thus David calls his Scholars about him (Psal. 34. 11.) Come ye Children, hearken unto me, and I will teach you the fear of the Lord. The former gloss shewed the strength and courage of Job's spirit, this the piety and holiness of his spirit: 'Tis our duty, in meekness to instruct those who oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth (2 Tim. 2. 25.)

Incitat amicos ad mutandam sententiam. Pined. Ut convertatis. Jun.

Thirdly, The words are more generally taken for an invitation to repentance, Come now, return. Some translate the word Return in this Text, by Repent, which is the sense of it in a hundred Texts of the Old Testament. Repentance is a turning and returning; all returning supposeth, either our being out of the way, or that we have gone as far as our business lies in that way; The returning of repentance, supposeth only the former, for, every step in sin is quite out of our way; what have we to do in the way of sin, but only to come out of it, our business lies not there; all that we do there must be undone again, or else we are undone for ever.

In this returning of repentance, we may consider, first, the term from which, and secondly the term to which we are called to return. The term from which is twofold.

First, Sinful practices.
Secondly, False and erroneous opinions.

Job doth not deal with his Friends about the former; he did about the latter; they were under a grand mistake concerning the Doctrine of providence, and from that he invites them to a speedy return.

The term to which we are to return in the actings of repentance, is threefold.

First, To our selves.
Secondly, To God.
Thirdly, To him whom we have wronged, or from whom we sinfully dissent.

Job may be interpreted as calling his Friends to a return, in this threefold reference.

Ad se redire etiã Latinis dicitur qui ad bonam mentẽ redit. Grot.

First, As repentance is a returning to our selves: a man that is carried away, either to false opinions, or into wicked courses, is gone from his nearest home: 'Tis a duty to deny our selves, but 'tis a sin to depart from our selves: And as it is a sin to depart from our selves, so every sin is a departure from our selves; therefore re-repentance which is a turning from sin, must needs be a returning to our selves. The Gospel represents the repentance of the Prodigal Son, under this notion (Luke 15. 17.) And when he came to himself, he said, &c. He had not been with himself a long time before, yet at last he came to himself, this was his first step to repentance. An impenitent person is not only out of his way, but out of his wits, he is gone, not only from Divine truth and holiness, but from his own natural reason and prudence; if so, whensoever he repents, he returns to himself.

Secondly, Repentance is a returning to God; If thou wilt return O Israel (saith the Lord) return unto me (Jer. 4. 1.) The grace of repentance is most frequently and most suitably expressed by this act of returning to God; and they who do not repent are every where said not to return to God (Amos 4. &c.) Yet have ye not returned unto me.

Thirdly, Repentance is a returning to man: We must not be ashamed to acknowledge our failings one to another, or to return to them in duty from whom we have departed, either by not giving them their due, or by accusing them unduly. We must not be ashamed of returning to them, by submitting to the truth, from whom we have departed by following or holding any errour. Thus Job may be conceived counselling and calling his Friends to a return in these three senses given: First, to themselves; Secondly, to God; Thirdly, to him, whom they had so long opposed. But though all three may be included, yet the scope and design of Job seems to intend the third: Return, and come now; that is, Return to me, let not truth fare the worse for my sake, do not you cast it off, because I hold it. It is not enough to turn from any evil, whether of opinion or practice, and return to the obedience of God, but we must also return to the love of good men, and unite with them in the truth.

But why must they return? Job gives the reason expressly in the latter part of the Verse.

For I cannot find one wise man among you.

All the wayes of sin and errour are wayes of folly; they stamp a man for a Fool and unwise, whosoever walkes in them; I cannot find one wise man among you: When he saith, I cannot find, It shews that he had endeavoured to find, he had been seeking for a wise man among them, but he found none. The Lord (saith David; Psal. 14. 2.) looked down from heaven upon the Children of men, to see if there were any that did understand and seek after God (but he found none) They are all gone aside (Vers. 3.) Job seems to have been upon such an inquiry: He had looked over his Friends, and weighed them one by one, but he found not one wise man among them. The Preacher (Eccles. 7. 27, 28.) counting one by one to find out the account, found but one man (that is, one wise or good man) among a thousand: No marvel then if Job found not one among three, yet considering what three these were, men numbred among the Worthies, possibly, the first three of that age and place, it may justly be marvelled why Job should speak at so low a rate, or so slightly of them: Was he not too censorious and rigid, too bold and adventurous, to speak thus concerning men of such gravity, authority, and reputation, for wisdom, and learning, yea, and for holiness too, as these three were? Shall we say that this censure proceeded from Job's wisdom, or from his passion? Was he wise in saying so, or so much as charitable?

I answer, Job did not speak this from any ill will to his Friends, or from contempt of them; it had been not only unfriendly, but very sinful to have done it. That word of Christ had its truth in those times, He that is angry with his brother unadvisedly, shall be in danger of judgement; and he that saith to his Brother, Racha (which signifies an empty fellow, or a man that hath nothing in him) shall be in danger of a Councel: but he that saith, thou Fool, shall be in danger of Hell fire (Matth. 5.23.) Job did not call his Friends Fools, when he said, I find not one wise man among you; So much may be said without passion or reviling: Nor did he question their wisdom in general, but (as hath been answered for him upon a like passage) only to the point in hand: As if he had said, after all this arguing, You are still besides the matter, you have not hit the joynt of my case; come to me, I will shew you your mistake, and make it plain that you are all out.

Hence Observe, First, It is no fault to speak of men as we find them.

Venite ad me audiendū & ostendam vos omnes decipere. Drus.

The rule of Christ (Mat. 7.1.) Judge not that ye be not judged, forbids, first, rash judgement of men; secondly, wrong judgment of men; thirdly, final judgment of men (that's peculiar to God) but it doth not forbid all judgment of men. We may call a Spade, a Spade, and him unwise who is so: All reproving is taken away, if all judging be, for we must reprove no man but whom we judg faulty, Let the righteous smite me (saith David, Psal. 141. 5.) He means it not of smiting with the Sword, but of smiting with a deserved censure; as if he had said, If I have done amiss, let me hear of it, yea let me smart for it, by a faithful reproof.

Secondly, Observe, A wise man may do or speak that which is a just forfeiture of his present reputation for wisdom.

This proceeds sometimes from a special judgment of God upon men, who in anger blasts their abilities, and commands a decay upon their greatest treasures of wisdom (Isa. 29.14.) The wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid: It shall be so, saith God; the understanding of man is as much at Gods dispose, as his riches or honours are. Now as this proceeds sometimes from the special judgement of God upon man; so it may proceed at any time from the natural frame of man, who at the best is a creature composed of light and darkness, of wisdom and folly, of knowledge and ignorance, of grace and corruption, of an old man, as well as of a new. The over actings of the worser part, may soon leave a good and a wise man (in the main) under an eclipse, both of his goodness and wisdom. David said in his haste (and as he said it, he sinned in saying so) All men are lyars: But we may say it with fullest deliberation (and not sin at all in saying so) that All men are lyars. The Apostle saith it (Rom. 3.4.) while he saith, Yea let God be true, and every man a lyar; that is, Let this be acknowledged and confessed by all, That God cannot lie, such is his power that he can neither deceive, nor be deceived; but let it be as much acknowledged that every man is under a possibility to be deceived, yea and to deceive in the worst sense, and that in some sense every man is actually deceived, or a Deceiver: which proves this to be a truth, Every man is a lyliar: The lie, is that, which no man will bear at the hand of man, yet all must bear it from the hand of God; it is indeed a dishonour, but it is no slander to say, that every man is a liar: and because he is so, he may soon dis-intitle himself of wisdom. We must not lay too much upon men, for when they speak and do most unwisely, they speak and do most like men.

The Prophet (Hosea 6.7.) saith, They like men have transgressed the Covenant: The Hebrew is, They have transgressed like Adam. The Apostle speaks of some, over whom death reigned, who yet had not sinned after the similitude of Adams transgression (Rom. 5.14.) Infants die, and they die in that sin which Adam committed, though they never come to commit sin actually as Adam did; but all who sin actually, sin after the similitude of Adams transgression: He set the first Copy, and all his Posterity have written after him. We do but shew what we are, and whence we are, when we sin, even a company of men, the Sons of Adam. To be a man is also to be a sinner. Now, as it may be said, we like men have transgressed, so we like men are unwise. It is very easie for the wisest man to do unwisely; we have but shewed our selves men when we have shewed our selves unwise. That hath obtained us an Axiome, It is humane for man to erre: One of the wisest sentences among men, is, That man may do unwisely: He that doth all things wisely is more like God then a Man, nor can we do any thing wisely, but as God is pleased to teach and guide us. As we have need to ask our daily bread from God for the support of our bodies, so our daily wisdom from God for the management of our affairs. As God takes the wise in their own craftiness (1 Cor. 3.19.) So he can take wisdom from the crafty; and unless he supply wisdom to the wise, they will soon be so overtaken by their own folly, that of a whole throng of them, it may be said, by him that engageth with them, I have not found one wise man among you.

Thirdly, Observe, Wise men are rarely to be found.

There are store of subtle men, and crafty men there are but too many; but the wise man is a rare Jewel: It was for a wise man that the Prophet commands a search to be made, when he said (Jer. 5.1.) Run ye to and fro, through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now and know, and seek in the broad places thereof, if you can find a man. Jerusalem was full of men, and yet a man could not be found, when diligently sought for: What man was this? The next words describe him for a wise man indeed, if there be any that executeth judgment, and seeketh the truth. I cannot say that such wise men are thick sown, but I am very sure, they are thin come up. Paul found so great a scarcity and dearth of them, even among the Saints in the Church of Corinth, that though he doth not say it positively (with Job here) I have not found a wise man among you; yet he speaks it Interrogatively, and chidingly (1 Cor. 6.5.) I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? No not one that shall be able to judge between his Brethren? There are not many knowing wise men, among all men, but judging wise men are fewest of all.

Fourthly, Observe, Wise men are apt to shew themselves unwise in expounding and judging the providences and dealings of God toward man.

The works of the most wise God are all right, but few men are wise enough to pick out the right meaning of them. Providence is carried about the world in a Chariot of light, and yet there is much darkness in the minds of most men about it. This arises chiefly two wayes.

First, From the seeming confusions which are in the world. God doth not keep a method, nor govern himself by presidents, no man can tell certainly which way he will go, by looking into the way which he hath gone; for though he useth no liberty in the issue of his dealings, but rewardeth every man according to his works, yet he useth much liberty in the means which lead unto it.

Secondly, This ariseth from the narrowness of mans heart, who measuring God by his own line, and comparing what God hath done, by what he would do, cannot (as the Apostle speaks in another case) attain unto the righteousness of God in what he doth.

'Tis excellent wisdom to know how to interpret and improve the dealings of God with our selves or others. The grossest mis-interpretation of his dealings, is, to conclude the guilt or innocency of man, the love or hatred of God from them. Job's Friends upon such mistakes, incurred this censure, I have not found one wise man among you.

Job having by way of introduction, spoken to the men, or to the persons of his Friends, proceeds to speak his own case.

Vers.

Verſ. 11. My dayes are paſt, my purpoſes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart.

What do you tell me of comfortable dayes? My dayes are paſt, they are gone by: as we ſay, The Shew is gone by, or, the Company is gone by; ſo ſaith Job, My dayes are gone by: There's no looking after them any more: they are out of ſight, why would you bring them into my mind again? Dayes may be taken here in a two-fold ſenſe.

First, For the term of his life.

Secondly, For the ſtate of his life.

As taken for the term of his life, My dayes are paſt, is, I am a near neighbour to death, death and I am ready to meet and imbrace. The life of man is meaſured by dayes; when our dayes are paſt, there's nothing left to meaſure, nothing to meaſure by.

Morti vicinus ſum.

My dayes are paſt.] But how could Job affirm, The term, or dayes of my life are paſt, when, as he was alive that day to ſay this, ſo he lived many a fair day after he had ſaid it. Can we call that paſt, which is ſtill preſent with us? or which is yet to come?

He affirms this, First, becauſe he conceived that the greateſt part of his dayes were actually paſt, and that it was not worth while to reckon upon the few dayes behind, he did not think that remnant ſo conſiderable as to meaſure it, but threw it by, as a piece of uſeleſs nothing: Our dayes are ſo paſſing, that (with a little Rhetorick) we may ſay they are paſt, as ſoon as they begin; how much more may we ſay ſo, when we are ſure they muſt ſhortly end, and are really almoſt, yea, only not, paſt.

Secondly, Job might ſay, My dayes are paſt, becauſe doubtleſs it had ſeized on his ſpirit, that his Glaſs was run, that he ſhould die preſently, he never looked to out-live that ſtorm: So that his dayes were paſt in his account, though not in Gods account. Job could ſay of himſelf (as we uſe to ſay of thoſe Women, who have gone out their full time of Child-bearing) that, He had not a day more to reckon. As Job had a full aſſurance that he ſhould live eternally, ſo he had a kind of aſſurance that he ſhould die very ſhortly: And therefore as to his own apprehenſions, and the calculation which he had made of his dayes, their date was out, and he might ſay, My dayes are paſt.

Again, As taken for the ſtate of his life, ſo My dayes are paſt, is, My good dayes, my proſperous dayes, are paſt. You tell me of a day of deliverance, what a morning I ſhall have, but I look on all my dayes here, as dayes of darkneſs. We ſay of a man who is not only in an evil, but in a deſperate, or irrecoverably evil condition, He hath ſeen all his beſt dayes, or all his good dayes are gone. Job was full of truſt for a good eternity, but he had no hope of good dayes. The term of a mans dayes may continue long, when the comfort of his dayes, is, or when his comfortable dayes are quite paſt: Though Job's dayes continued, as to the term of his life, yet his dayes (as he judged) were paſt, as to any comfortable ſtate of life, in which ſenſe he might alſo ſay, My dayes are paſt.

Nor did Job ſpeak this complainingly, or with a low ſpirit, My dayes are paſt; he did not whine it out as they do, who are loath to die, and would fain live ſtill in the delights of life; but he ſpake boldly and cheerfully, he ſpake of his Dying-day, as of his Marriage-day, My dayes are paſt. As a young man ſaith, My marriage day is at hand, I ſhall be married ſhortly; with ſuch a holy alacrity Job ſpake, I ſhall die ſhortly, my dayes are paſt: He looked upon his comfortable dayes in the World as paſt, and yet he was comforted: Job was full of pain, yet uſually in the cloſe of his ſpeeches he gathered up himſelf, and ſpake in a height and heat of ſpirit. As the Cock towards morning flutters his Wins before he Crowes, and gives warning of the approaching day; or as the Lyon ſtrikes his ſides with his Tail, to rouze up his ſpirits before he attempts his prey; ſo Job ſtirr'd up himſelf towards the cloſe of his anſwers, and reſumed new ſpirits, acting That dying man to the life, who having nothing in this World, either to fear or hope, dies without fear, yet with abundance, yea in aſſurance of hope: My dayes are paſt.

Hence Obſerve, First, As the words are taken in the former ſenſe: A gracious heart hath peace in the approaches of death.

His contentments are not done, when the term of his life is done: He can ſay, My dayes are paſt, as cheerfully, as Agag ſaid, Surely, the bitterneſs of death is paſt. Some godly men have died far more pleaſantly then ever any wicked man lived.

Secondly, From the latter ſenſe, Obſerve,

A gracious heart can take preſent comfort, and rejoyce in this World, while he knowes that all his worldly comforts and joyes are paſt.

Faith overlooks, or looks through and beyond all the evils of this life, to a good which ſhall never die; yea Faith ſees and enjoys a preſent good, while ſenſe ſees nothing, and indeed hath nothing elſe to ſee, but evil. A carnal man parts with his good dayes, or with the good of his dayes, as Phaltiel went to deliver up Michal, Sauls Daughter, and David's Wife by right, weeping all along as he went (2 Sam. 3.16.) There's a ſad parting between a worldly heart and worldly things; but he that is ſpiritually minded, though he doth not deſpiſe the meaneſt of worldly good things, as made by God for the uſe and comfort of man, ſo when God calls him from them, or them from him, he can part with the uſe of them, and yet not be diſpoſſeſſed of comfort; he knows that he hath a preſent good, and that he hath greater good to come, while he ſaith, My dayes are paſt.

My purpoſes are broken off.] The word which we tranſlate Purpoſes, ſignifies moſt uſually an evil purpoſe, or wicked deſignments; yet it is uſed alſo, as among the Rabbins, ſo by the Penmen of Scripture in a good ſenſe, for a warrantable, yea for a holy purpoſe: In the Book of Proverbs (*Chap.*1.4. *Chap.*2.11.) it is tranſlated Diſcretion or Adviſement, proceeding from the teachings of wiſdom, which ſtirs up gracious purpoſes in the ſoul towards God, and every good.

זמם Cogitavit plerumq; in malum aliquando in bonum זמות Cujus ſingularis זמה quod antiquitus legebant Zemma ferre ſcelus denotat מומה autem quod ab eodem themate vocabulum eſt mediũ. Druſ. Rupti ſunt articuli cordis mei. Sept. Convulſæ ſunt compages corporis mei. Aug.

My purpoſes are broken off: The Septuagint render, My heart ſtrings are broken: The heart-ſtrings by a metaphor, may be taken for purpoſes, becauſe purpoſes are as Bands or ſtrings upon the heart; and therefore when purpoſes are broken, we may ſay, the bands or ſtrings of the heart are broken.

Another reads, The bindings or faſtnings of my body are looſned, or torn aſunder; which tranſlation (as alſo the former) taken literally, notes only his nearneſs to death; for when a man dieth, we ſay, his heart-ſtrings break, and his whole body is in a fit of Convulſion.

My purpoſes are broken.] The word ſignifies a violent forcible breaking, as if a Giant had broken them.

But what was it which broke his purpoſes? The violence and continuance of his afflictions was this Breaker; or his purpoſes were broken by the confuſed motions and troubleſome repreſentations of his own fanſie, to which ſick men are very ſubject.

Again, what were thoſe purpoſes of his which were broken? If they were evil purpoſes, he had reaſon to rejoyce, not to complain; if they were good purpoſes, was it not his ſin as well as his affliction that they were broken off.

I anſwer to that, Purpoſes may be good, and yet broken without the ſin of the purpoſer, if himſelf be not the cauſe of that breach, and the impediment of their performance: If our holieſt purpoſes are broken off by the inevitable providence of God, the holineſs of man receives no blemiſh by it. The purpoſes of Job were good doubtleſs, either ſpiritually good, or civilly good; and they may be taken either for thoſe purpoſes of doing good, which he had, before he fell into trouble, or for thoſe which he had laid up in his breſt, to do, when he ſhould be again reſtored and delivered out of trouble. As if he had ſaid, I once had an expectation of life, and I purpoſed with my ſelf what to do with, or in my new life, but now thoſe purpoſes are all broken off, for I ſee my life is ready to be broken off. The next clauſe seems to explain this, and in that we shall see more fully what he means by these purposes.

Even the thoughts of my heart.] Every thought of the heart is not a purpose; yet every purpose is a thought of the heart: our thoughts are made up into purposes, either what to do, or not to do: Hence it is usual to say, I thought to have done such or such a thing; that is, I purposed to do it. Therefore Job might well say, My purposes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart, because purposes are nothing else but a frame, or pack of thoughts: There is an elegancy in that word which we translate Thoughts. The Hebrew is, The possessions of my heart; so we put it in the Margin of our Bibles: A learned Translator renders it thus, The thoughts which my mind was wont to possess are pull'd or snatch'd away: He means it not of all his thoughts, as if his power of thinking had been lost; but of those special thoughts which he had, or hopes, which he nourished about his restoring to happy dayes; these once possessed his heart, but they were gone. Thoughts are called the possessions of the heart two wayes.

Dicuntur cogitationes possideri à corde, quid enim magis proprium aut innatũ cordi quam suæ ipsius cogitationes? Drus. Coc.

First, In a passive } sence.
Secondly, In an active }

Passively, Because they are possessed by the heart; the heart doth enclose and hold our thoughts: The heart is the naturally proper vessel or receptacle of thoughts, therefore they are called the possessions of the heart: The heart is the soyl and seat of thoughts; there they are planted, and there they dwell.

Actively, For as thoughts are possessed by the heart, so thoughts possess the heart; thoughts are full of activity; they trouble and they comfort the heart; look what our thoughts are, such is the state of our hearts; if our thoughts be quiet, our hearts are quiet; if our thoughts be unquiet, our hearts are unquiet; if our thoughts be joyful, our hearts rejoyce; if our thoughts be sad, our hearts are sorrowful. 'Tis said in the Gospel (Luke 24. 38.) Why are ye troubled? why do thoughts rise in your hearts? That is, Why do troublesome and disconsolate thoughts rise in your hearts? 'Tis as natural for thoughts to rise in the heart, as it is for water to rise in a Spring; therefore Christ did not chide them because thoughts, but because such thoughts did rise in their hearts: We cannot hinder our hearts from thinking, no more then we can hinder the fire from burning, or water from wetting; but 'tis our duty to hinder our hearts from undue or discouraging thoughts, and to check them for thinking so. Thoughts rule the heart and put it into several frames and forms according to their own likeness; and therefore it is both our wisdom and our holiness to put and keep our thoughts in the best likeness. The heart (in a figurative sence) is nothing else but the frame of our thoughts; and our thoughts in a proper sence, are nothing else but the possessions of the heart.

Tabulæ cordis. Chald.

Further, The Chaldee Paraphrase saith, The Tables of my heart are broken; so it is an allusion to writing: The Law was written at first in Tables of Stone, and now a heart of flesh (not a fleshly heart) is the Tables of the Law; our hearts are Tables both for our own writing and for Gods. Job had written many purposes upon those Tables; therefore he might well say as in this case, My purposes, or all that was written upon the Tables of my heart, are broken. In my thoughts I had written and set down many particulars which I purposed to have done, but now those lines are crossed, or quite blotted out. God writes many of his own thoughts in our hearts, and our thoughts are the writings of our hearts; when our purposes and thoughts are broken, the Tables of our hearts are broken.

Scriptura cordis nunc litura est. Pined.

Hence Observe, First, Right purposes are good, but it is not good to live upon purposes.

Action must presently follow resolution, and performance must be speeded after purposes, else they are to little purpose. When David had said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord (Psal. 32. 5.) he instantly confessed them: And when he said, I will take heed to my wayes (Psal. 39. 1.) he instantly took heed to them. His purpose was in nature, before his practice, but in time they went together: There is a double danger in delaying purposes.

First, That the mind of the purposer may change, and his spirit grow flat towards them.

Secondly, That the seasons may change, and though he have a mind, yet he may want means and opportunity to perform them.

There is danger in both wayes, and much sin in the former way of breaking purposes; The danger of both will be more discovered in the second Observation.

Secondly, Observe, When great afflictions come, especially when death comes, all our purposes are broken off.

As man is apt to busie himself about many things, which he cannot know, so about many things, which (though they are possible to be done, yet) he shall never do. It is in man to purpose, but we must ask leave of God, before we can perform: Cross providences break many purposes, but death breaks all. All our purposes concerning the World, and the things of the World dye with us. When the breath of great Princes goeth forth (Psal. 146. 4.) In that very day all their thoughts perish. Great Princes are full of great thoughts; but they who cannot keep themselves from perishing, shall never keep their thoughts from perishing. The imaginary frames which they set up, the contrivances, plots, and projects of their hearts are all swept away like the Spiders Web, or broken like the Cockatrices Egg, when themselves are swept away from the face of the Earth, and broken by the power of death. The thoughts of many Princes and Polititians dye while themselves live: Ahitophel's purposes were broken and disappointed, while himself looked on, and he was so vexed to see it, that he executed himself because his purposes were not executed. In these times of publick shaking, how many purposes have we seen go to wraek? They who have been long laying their designs, and brooding upon their counsels, have had their eggs broken in a moment, and their thoughts blown away like chaff before the wind, or the lighter dust before the whirlwind: Now as the purposes of many about gathering riches, about taking their pleasure, about advancing themselves to, or establishing themselves in honour and high places, have perished before they dyed; so when such dye, all their purposes shall certainly perish: And as the purposes of all about worldly things perish in the approaches of death; so do the purposes of some about spiritual and heavenly things. How many have had purposes to repent, to amend their lives and turn to God, which have been prevented, and totally broken off, by the extremity of pain and sickness, but chiefly by the stroke of death; when they have (as they thought) been about to repent, and (as we say) turn over a new leafe in their lives; they have been turned into the Grave by death; and into Hell by the just wrath of God.

Some interpret this Text, as Job's complaint of the unsettlement of his thoughts about heavenly things, and the breaking of his purposes in the pursuit of eternity: He could not make his thoughts about Heaven hold or hang together, even those thoughts were full of gaps and empty spaces, or rather like Ropes of Sand. Many honest and gracious souls have found work enough upon a death-bed, or a sick-bed to attend the pain and infirmity of their bodies. When they have purposely set themselves (the habitual bent of their hearts being alwayes set that way) actually to seek God, to meditate upon the precious Promises, to put forth fresh lively workings of Faith upon the Lord Jesus Christ, they have been suddenly recalled, yea, even forcibly fetcht back by some violent assault of pain, or a previous charge of death: So that those thoughts which should be (and they desired that they might be) like their objects, most durable and steady, were yet more like some odd ends or broken pot-sheards, more like vanishing flashes, or wandring fancies, then that beautiful frame of heart, or those well combined and fastened meditations which they intended. For though all the troubles of this life, and the approaches of death it self cannot break, disappoint or scatter those fixed purposes, and thoughts which a Believer hath had, or those results and resolves which he hath often made in his own soul about the hopes and concernments of eternal life; yet he may be pitifully puzzled, amuzed, and interrupted in his present motions and meditations about them.

Non poterat jugi contẽplatio in rerum divinarum ut quõdam solebat intendere propter vim doloris. Phil.

Propter multiplices animi motus & perturbationes jã dolebat, jam timebat, nunc se erigebat in spem meliorem, nunc iterum concidebat.

Hence take this Caution.

Seeing not only our worldly thoughts periſh, but our ſpiritual thoughts may be much broken by ſtrong temptations and variety of bodily diſtempers, in times of trouble and ſickneſs, let us haſten to ſettle our purpoſes and thoughts about eternal life, yea, to ſee our ſouls paſſed from death to life, before we ſee ſickneſs and ſorrow, much more before we ſee our ſelves ready to paſs from life to death. Purpoſes to repent, or to mind heavenly things, not only may, but for the moſt part are broken off, and loſt when ſickneſs and ſorrow find us. Beware of this deceit of the Devil, who tells us we ſhall have leiſure to ſeek God when we are ſick, and that we ſhall have a fair opportunity to ſettle all the affairs of our ſouls, when we are going out of the body: Then (he tells us) we ſhall have nothing elſe to do, and therefore we ſhall ſurely do it then. Let not Satan deceive us with theſe vain words, for then he intends us moſt blows; then is his ſeaſon to break our thoughts into a thouſand pieces, and to vex us with the ſplinters, even when we lye upon our ſick-beds, or are bewildred with affliction. There is ſcarce one of twenty, but finds breakings, and convulſions upon his thoughts, at the ſame time when he feels them upon his body: How often have ſick men been heard to ſay, We cannot ſet our ſelves to think ſeriouſly of Heaven, or to act Faith, &c. To ſuffer and be ſick, is work enough for any man at one time: He had not need to have his greateſt work to do when he hath ſuch work to do.

They who have had brave ſpirits, and fixed holy purpoſes upon their death-beds, were ſuch as had been long exerciſed in them before. Woe to thoſe who put off their beginnings in Grace, till they are ready to finiſh in Nature: A dying man is unfit for any buſineſs; how much more for this? He is extreamly indiſpoſed for worldly purpoſes, much more for heavenly: And therefore as ſoon as a man that hath any Eſtate, begins to be ſick, Friends will move him, Pray Sir, ſettle your Eſtate, make your Will, you know not how God may deal with you, if your diſeaſe ſhould encreaſe a little more, you may be totally diſabled to do it; therefore pray haſten: Yea, we find that moſt men of valuable Eſtates in the World, make their Wills in their health, when they are free from ſickneſs and furtheſt from death, when they have the greateſt activity of mind and body: They wiſely remember how ſome, who had a full purpoſe to make their Wills in ſickneſs, have been ſuddenly overpowered by the malignity of a diſeaſe, and could never do it, but have left all at ſix and ſevens. If ſo, ſhall any man leave his ſoul undiſpoſed of, or at ſix and ſevens, till ſuch a time? A ſick man being minded of any worldly buſineſs (unleſs he have a great mind to it) thinks it excuſe enough to wave it, becauſe he is ſick; I pray do not trouble me with it (ſaith he) I cannot think of it now, you and I will ſpeak about it hereafter when I am recovered. Do ſick men think it reaſon they ſhould be excuſed from worldly buſineſs becauſe they are ſick? And ſhall any man reſolve that it is beſt to deal about ſpiritual buſineſſes when he is ſick? If Job, who had a holy and a ſound mind under a diſeaſed body, ſaid, My purpoſes are broken off, and the thoughts or poſſeſſions of my heart: How much more will they feel theſe breaches, whoſe minds are ſick and more diſeaſed then their bodies?

Further, Obſerve, The difference between God and man, what a vain creature man is, and how excellent God is.

God never had one of his purpoſes broken; whatever he purpoſed he hath carried to perfection; he never loſt a thought, nor any of the poſſeſſions of his heart. The counſel of the Lord ſtandeth for ever, and the thoughts of his heart to all Generations (Pſal. 33. 11.) 'Tis the glory of God that his purpoſes ſtand; he is able to make them ſtand, though all the world ſhould combine as one man to caſt them down. 'Tis the diſhonour of man that he ſo often falls from his own purpoſes, and eats up his own reſolves; and 'tis the puniſhment of ſome men, that their purpoſes receive a fall, that their moſt ſolemn debates and ſetled reſolves are ſcattered and confounded: The Lord (in judgment) bringeth the counſel of the Heathen to nought, he maketh the devices of the people of none effect (Pſal. 33. 10.) All the thoughts of man are loſeable, and moſt men loſe their thoughts.

It is the comfort of Believers that they are not bottom'd upon their own purpoſes or thoughts, but upon the thoughts and purpoſes of God (that's their baſis) and that ſhall never be broken; God is unchangeable, and therefore his purpoſes cannot break: When mans purpoſes are broken, he either changeth, or ſuffers a change; of which Job complains in the next Verſe.

Verſe 12. They change the night into day, and the light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.

Here are two things to be opened.

Firſt, What is meant by changing the night into day.

Secondly, Who it is that changeth the night into day.

They change the night into day.] Hath not the Lord made a Promiſe, yea, a Covenant (which is more then a Promiſe) and annexed a ſign to it, which is the ratification of a Covenant (Gen. 8. 22.) that to the end of the world, while the earth remaineth, Seed-time, and harveſt, and Summer, and Winter, and cold and heat, and day and night, ſhall not ceaſe; that is, they ſhall not ceaſe in their turns and ſeaſons? How is it here ſaid, They change the night into day; as if the night and day were out of courſe, when as the Lord hath covenanted, that they ſhall continue in their courſe?

I anſwer, There is a twofold change of times, of day and night.

Firſt, A Natural
Secondly, A Metaphorical } Change.

The united power of all Creatures in Heaven and Earth, cannot make a natural change of day into night, and God the Creator hath promiſed that he will not make that change; he will not break the ſucceſſion of night and day, while the Earth remaineth.

But a Metaphorical change of night into day, and of day into night, hath been often made; for when the night is ſo full of trouble to us that we cannot ſleep, the night is changed into day; and when the day is ſo full of trouble to us, that we can neither do our work, nor take our comforts, then the day is changed into night: The night is the time appointed for natural reſt, therefore the night may be ſaid to be changed into day, when we cannot reſt, and this is a great affliction; for though in ſome ſence, and in Scripture-ſence too, to have the night changed into day, is a mercy, and notes a change from a troubled eſtate into a comfortable eſtate; yet to have the night changed by our reſtleſneſs, or want of ſleep, is both an affliction it ſelf, and an argument that we are burdened and over-preſſed with other manifold afflictions.

Hoc tormentum cordis, nec nox interrumpebat quæ eſt tempus deputatum humanæ quieti, gravius eſt patiſomni defectum in nocte quam in die. Aquin. Meæ cogitationes moleſtæ animum rodentes, noctem mihi convertunt in diem; efficiunt ut noctes ducam inſomnes. Merc.

In this ſence Job complains of the change of his night into day; and thus God often changeth times and ſeaſons, both to particular perſons and whole Nations (Dan. 2. 21.) Daniel anſwered and ſaid, Bleſſed be the Name of God for ever and ever, for wiſdom and might are his, and he changeth the times, and the ſeaſons, he removeth Kings, and he ſets up Kings: He changeth the times and ſeaſons; that is, He makes ſeaſons comfortable, or troubleſome; peaceable, or unquiet; he changeth the night into day, or the day into night, as himſelf pleaſeth.

And the light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.] That is, The day is to me as no day, becauſe of my calamity and miſery; my day is ſhort, becauſe darkneſs ſuddenly overtakes it. Artificial dayes are long or ſhort, according to the diſtance which the darkneſs of the night keeps from them. Our Metaphorical dayes are long or ſhort, according to the diſtance which the darkneſs of trouble keeps from them. Thus the change of day into night, and of night into day, is to be reckoned by the condition we are in: When we cannot ſleep in the night, our night is changed into day; and when ſorrow ſeizeth on us in the day, our day is changed into night; or, The light is ſhort to us by reaſon of darkneſs.

Propter calamitates.

But who was it that made this change? They change the night into day, and the day into night: Who? Some aſcribe it it to his troubled thoughts, of which he had ſpoken before; his thoughts were ſo torn and diſtracted, that their confuſions turned the night into day, and the day into night; that is a plain ſence: As if he had ſaid, By reaſon of my continual cares and diſtractions, I take no comfort neither night nor day.

Hæ meæ cogitationes noctem mihi in diem convertunt. Merc.

Others refer it his Friends, They, that is, my Friends, turn the night into day, and the day into night; and if his Friends be the Antecedent, it comes much to one, for his Friends did it by filling him with troubleſome thoughts, and unquiet reaſonings; his Friends did it by filling his heart and head (as we ſay) with their Proclamations.

Præſentium malarum cogitationes efficiunt ut dies quamvis lucidus mihi ſit nox. Jun.

Hence Note, When the mind is unſetled the man cannot reſt.

Waking nights and weariſome dayes are the portion of a troubled ſpirit.

There is a further elegancy conſiderable in the latter branch of this Verſe, The light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs. The Original is, The light is near becauſe of darkneſs. The word ſignifies nearneſs, whether in time or place, and it is uſually put in Scripture for ſhort, for that which is of ſhort continuance (Job 20. 5.) The triumphing of the wicked is ſhort. The Margin is, The triumphing of the wicked is from near: That is, It is hard by, it began but lately, and it will ſoon be over, or at an end. In this elegancy the holy Ghoſt ſpeaks of falſe Gods (Deut. 32. 17.) They ſacrificed to Devils, and not to God; to Gods whom they knew not, to new Gods that were come newly up: The Hebrew is, to near Gods (it is this word) to ſhort Gods; Gods that are near: That is, Gods ſhort or near in their original, they have been but a little while, they are newly come up, as we tranſlate, Whom your Fathers knew not, nor feared: Idols are new Gods, near Gods; we need not travel far to find out their deſcent and pedigree, the oldeſt of them are but of a late date, or of a new edition, upſtart Gods, as they are compared with Jehovah the true God, who is from everlaſting: And as they are called near Gods, in regard of their original, and riſe; ſo likewiſe in regard of their continuance, they are not for eternity, we ſhall ſee an end of thoſe Gods ſhortly, they are not long-lived, much leſs are they to everlaſting. The true God is the ſame for ever; falſe Gods are nothing; Idols are nothing in the World, and they ſhall in ſhort time be thruſt out of the World; and all the near Gods ſhall be put far away. What the Lord ſpeaks of theſe night-Gods, the Gods of the darkneſs of this World, Job ſpeaks of the comforts or light which he once received from God. The light is ſhort, becauſe of darkneſs: That is, It is ready to end and expire.

Propinquum pro brevi exponit. Rab. Sol.

Idola dicuntur dii ex propinquo, i.e. qui diu non durant, vel qui de novo pro diis haberi cœperint. Merc.

We may ſay of all the light which we have in this World, that it is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs: Spiritual light, or the light of Gods countenance ſhining in, or upon his people, hath a darkneſs attending upon it in this World. The experiences of moſt Chriſtians anſwer that of one of the Ancients about this heavenly light, It comes but ſeldom, and it is ſoon gone: We have but ſome glimpſes and glances of Divine favour here, not a ſteady ſence of it; that (except to a very few) is reſerved for Heaven: 'Tis ſo alſo about temporal light; the light of Gods providence towards us hath a darkneſs attending upon it, yea, a darkneſs mixed with it: When our comforts have ſcarce ſaluted us, or ſpoken with us, they are interrupted and taken off by approaching ſorrows. Thoſe creature enjoyments and relations which have moſt light in them, have alſo much darkneſs hanging about them, and hovering over them. Man at the beſt eſtate is altogether vanity: And his longeſt light here is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.

Rara hora brevis mora. Bern.

But Job ſpeaks not this in reference to the general ſtate of man, much leſs to the beſt eſtate of man in this life; he applyes it ſpecially to an afflicted eſtate, and particularly to his own: How ſhort is the light of an afflicted ſoul? How quickly do Clouds come over him, and Eclipſes ſhut the ſhining from him, when the light of a man in proſperity is but ſhort, and his day in danger of a night every moment? All our light on earth dwells upon the borders of darkneſs; the light of Heaven hath no neighbourhood with it, and therefore is not only long, but everlaſting.

Yet I find a learned Interpreter making this Verſe ſpeak the return of Job's light; The changing of night into day, is to be underſtood (ſaith he) in a good ſence: And the breaking of his thoughts and purpoſes is (according to this Interpretation) nothing elſe but the ſcattering of his dark and melancholy thoughts and purpoſes, which being removed and gone, the night of ſorrow was turned into a day of joy, and the morning light (here called the near light, becauſe it immediately ſucceeds the darkneſs, which the noon-light doth not) this morning-light (ſaith he) came before the face of darkneſs.

Illæ tenebroſæ cogitationes à mente mea diſcedentes, pro nocte jucundum quietis diem, & pro tenebris lucem matutinam, i.e. optatam pacē conſtituunt. Bold.

To which ſence the Vulgar Latine tranſlates the laſt clauſe, After darkneſs I hope for light; or, though I be now in darkneſs, I hope for light: As if Job had ſaid, After this dark night and dreadful ſtorm, God hath ſpoken to the angry Sea of my tempeſtuous thoughts, and behold there is a great calm. But though the Author of this Expoſition be ſo much in love with it, that he counts all other ſpurious; yet I rather perſiſt in, and ſtick to the former; ſeeing the whole context runs upon the aggravation of Job's preſent troubles, with which this Interpretation holds no agreement. Nor is there any neceſſity (as the Author ſuppoſeth) to take it up, for the avoiding of that imputation of a low, weak, and ſinking ſpirit, which the former Expoſition, in his apprehenſion, ſubjects Job unto; for though we ſay that Job doth, as often elſewhere, ſo here again, make report of his ſorrows in higheſt ſtrains of holy Rhetorick; yet we are ſo far from ſaying that he deſponded, or ſunk under them, that we doubt not to ſay (which is all that this Author would ſay, or have others take notice of in his ſingular Interpretation) that he was more then a Conqueror over them all. 'Tis not only granted, that Job did hope for a day of joy after his night of ſorrow, but affirmed, that he had a day of joy in his night of ſorrow (for he could ſay, in a true ſence, what the Apoſtle Paul after did, as ſorrowful, yet always rejoycing) yet his night (by reaſon of his outward troubles, and many aſſaults of inward terror) was changed into a laborious toyling day, and his outward light of comfort was ſhort and quickly ended, when he had it, By reaſon of the faces (as the Original hath it) or ſudden appearances of darkneſs.

Et rurſum poſt tenebras ſperò lucem. Vulg.

VERS. 13, 14, 15, 16.

If I wait, the Grave is mine houſe: I have my bed in the darkneſs.
I have ſaid to corruption, Thou art my Father; to the Worm, thou art my Mother, and my Siſter.
And where is now my hope? As for my hope, who ſhall ſee it?
They ſhall go down to the bars of the pit, when our reſt together is in the duſt.

JOB proſecutes the former Argument, and ſhews yet more fully the vanity of thoſe hopes which his Friends would nouriſh in him about a temporal reſtauration. He ſhews alſo, that though himſelf ſhould nouriſh them, and even ſtrive to hope, yet he could no more keep ſuch hopes from languiſhing, then himſelf from dying, If I wait, the Grave is mine houſe.

If I wait.] Waiting is an act of the mind, in expectation of ſome future good: The Original word ſignifies an earneſt waiting, or waiting joyned with much intention of ſpirit, and ſtrong deſires, as if the mind did let out a cord, or line, to take hold of the thing, for which we wait. Waiting is nothing elſe but patience lengthened out upon a promiſe. There are three acts of the ſoul upon the promiſes.

Verbum קוה affinitatem habet cum קו perpendiculũ, lineas

First, Believing.
Secondly, Hoping.
Thirdly, Waiting.

We believe the truth of the promiſe; we hope for the good laid up in the promiſe; we wait till that good be given out unto us. If I wait (ſaith Job) God waits

Dicitis (amici) ſi me humiliem, manere me nam lineam expectationem: atqui cernitis vires meas & vitam meam veniſſe ad ultimam quippe mala mea curam reſpuunt. Cor.

upon us; and we wait upon God: God waits in mercy; we wait in duty: God waits to be gracious (Isa. 30. 18.) and man waits to be refreshed with the Grace of God. Job, in this place, seems to make light or little of this duty of waiting: If I wait, or, although I wait, or, what if I wait, what shall I get by it? Where's the profit? Or what are my comings in? He tells us what; If I wait, all that I shall get by it will be a Grave, or a bed in darkness: And all my preferment will be, to call corruption my Father; and to say of the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and my Sister: Here's all I am like to have for all my waiting.

But was this all he looked for by waiting?

Yes, it was all he looked for, and all he thought himself in a capacity to receive in this World (though in that he was deceived) he had no expectation but to dye, and go down to the dust; he had no hope to rejoyce in any Kindred or Alliance, but Worms and corruption, these were his Mother, and his Sisters, and Brethren: If I wait, here's all I shall have. Thus (as I intimated before) the words carry a strong confutation of those hopes which his Friends endeavoured to raise up in him, that God would raise him up, and make him as a Prince among the people, if he repented and turned to God. No, saith he, what do you tell me of a great House, and of a great Name, of a rising Sun, and of the Morning light? why am I so often told of these things? I tell you once for all, the Grave is my house, Darkness is my bed, and the Worms are my kindred and companions; let me hear no more of these groundless prophecyings, and unsavory flatteries, for my wound is incurable, and I am at the last cast, If I wait, the Grave is my house.

Docet præcisam esse sibi his malis omnem vitæ spem vel si eam maximè animo fovere velit. Si expectē i. e. si expectare studeā. Merl.

Again, The word which we translate to wait, coming, as was toucht before, from a Root which signifies a Carpenters Line, by which he measures his buildings: Some render the Text thus, If I build, the Grave is my house: As if he had said, I have no other house to build but a Grave; or when I have builded my best, I shall have no other house but a Grave.

Si ædificavero, infernus domus mea. Rab. Dan.

The Grave.] The same word signifieth Hell, as was shewed (Chap. 11. 8.) and therefore I will not stay here upon it: If I wait, the Grave

Is my house.] He calls the Grave a house, because there we rest as in a house: Man goeth forth of his house to labour, and comes home to his house for rest: Some tell us Job calls the Grave his house, in allusion to those forms of making Graves, or Sepulchres, used in ancient (which are also continued in these) times, with arches, and contrivances like a house.

Ægyptii defunctorũ sepulchra, domos æternas appellant. Diodor. lib. 1.

And I have made my bed in the darkness.

Intelligi potest de lecto bene ornato super quem reponi solebant principum cadavera Mausoleis, quod juxta Hebræum in plurali dicitur, stravi strata mea, magnificum quid sonat & Pompaticum. Bold.

He speaks still in prosecution of the allusion: In a house there are Dining-rooms, and there are sleeping Rooms; there is the Bed-chamber, and the Bed in the Chamber. The Grave is my house (saith Job) and there I have a Bed, I have made it,

In the darkness.] The Grave is a dark place; and the Grave is called Darkness in a double respect.

First, Because there is no light of the body there.

Secondly, Because there is no light of the Sun there.

The light of the body is the eye, and the light of the Air is the Sun; but in the Grave the Sun shines not, or if it did, yet there the eye sees not, therefore the Grave is darkness: I have made my bed in the darkness: And darkness is most fit for a bed; sleep loves darkness: A working Room must be light; but 'tis no matter how dark a sleeping Room be: When we go to sleep, if it be not dark, we make it dark, that so we may sleep the better. The Apostle gives that as an argument why the Saints should not sleep as do others, because they were once darkness, but now light in the Lord. He that is in aerial light can hardly get his body to sleep; And will you who are in spiritual light compose your souls to sleep? All sorts of sleepers covet the dark, and therefore they who sleep in death, are elegantly described making their bed in darkness, that so they may have (as it were) all accommodations for their rest, I have made my bed in the darkness.

It may be questioned (towards the clearing of this Verse) Did not Job wait? Why doth he say, If I wait? Was he upon Iffs or Ands about that great and necessary duty? He resolved peremptorily (Chap. 14. 14.) All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come: And is he so much changed already into an unresolvedness about his waiting?

I answer, This supposition about waiting, is not a negation, nor is it a note of his irresolution to wait for any thing, but only for that particular, about which his Friends were so busie to awaken and heighten his expectations. Job waited upon God for all things which he desired to have; only he did not wait upon God for that which the visible dispensations of God seemed to tell him aloud, that he should not have, a temporal deliverance: yea, when he saith, If I wait, namely, for this thing, it is an Argument that he acknowledged it a duty to wait upon God for all those things, for the receiving of which he had any rule or ground of hope from God: Every exception confirms the rule. He that saith he doth not wait upon God about that for which he hath no warrant, saith strongly, that he ought to wait upon God where he hath a warrant.

From which consequence we may observe this unquestionable truth.

That it is the duty of man to wait upon God.

Waiting upon God is a duty of the first Commandment; it is a part of natural worship: It is not in mans liberty, whether he will wait or no, he is commanded to wait: David speaks it double, and no doubt he laboured to act it double (Psal. 40. 1.) Waiting, I waited; or, I waited patiently upon God. The Apostle gives that advice to the Saints (Heb. 10. 36.) Ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye may receive the promise: There is doing the will of God, and then there is receiving the promise; yet we must do somewhat after we have done the will of God, before we can receive the promise; and that is, we must wait upon him: You have need of patience, saith the Apostle: What kind of patience? There are three sorts of patience.

First, The patience of labouring, that he puts in the former part of the Verse, it is our doing the will of God.

Secondly, There is the patience of suffering.

Thirdly, There is the patience of waiting after we have both done and suffered the will of God.

We have need of this patience, the patience of waiting, that we may receive the promise, that is, the mercy promised. God hath preventing mercies, and they come to us before we wait for them; but his rewarding mercies must be waited for: He will exercise the grace of patience in us, by causing us to wait for our reward, as he exerciseth the graces of love and zeal, in commanding us to do his will; and usually without waiting after we have done his will, there is no receiving of the reward for doing his will. And for the Promises and Prophesies in general, Though God never fail his own time, yet he seldom comes at ours. That great Promise about the deliverance of the people of Israel out of Egypt, was performed punctually to an hour (Exod. 12. 41, 42.) It came to pass at the end of four hundred and thirty years, even that very night, it came to pass, that God brought out all the Host of Israel. The time being out in the night, God did not stay till morning, but brought them out that very night: We count it a very venial sin to break our word for a day, or to let a man wait a day beyond the time promised; we commonly say, A day breaks no square: It is not so with God, he keeps his time punctually, he will not break his word one day. We read of the shortening of evil times, but not of their lengthening: God never makes his people wait for good longer then he hath promised. But though God keep his time exactly, and come just at the moment he hath prefixed and foreshewed, yet we are apt to antedate the promise of God, and to set it a time before Gods time: We are short-sighted, and short-breathed; that which is but a moment in the Kalendar of Heaven, seems more then an Age to us. Now in this regard there is much need of patience, of waiting patience, to tarry, not only our time, but Gods time; which is the meaning of the Prophet Habakkuk (Chap. 2. 3.) The vision is for an appointed time, but at the end it will speak and not lye: though it tarry, wait for it, because because it will surely come, and will not tarry: The Prophet adviſes, Though it tarry, wait for it; there's our duty, yet he preſently affirms, It will not tarry: So then it may tarry, and yet it tarrieth not; it may tarry beyond our time, but it tarryeth not beyond Gods time; It will come, and will not tarry; that is, not beyond the time which God hath prefixed, though it may ſoon tarry beyond the time which we have prefixed; therefore if it it tarry, wait; there is no remedy but patience.

The Apoſtle James gives the Rule (Chap. 1. 4.) Let Patience have her perfect work: That is, Let all manner of patience work in you to the end, and let it work to all thoſe ends or purpoſes to which it is appointed. Patience hath her perfect work.

First, When it puts forth perfect acts.

Secondly, When it perſeveres in acting.

Patience aſcends by three ſteps to the perfection of her work.

The firſt is a ſilent (not a ſullen) ſubmiſſion or reſignation of our ſelves to the diſpoſe of God (Pſal. 39. 9.) I was dumb (ſaith David) and opened not my mouth, becauſe thou didſt it.

Secondly, A kind of thankful acceptation, or kiſſing of the Rod which ſmites us: If their uncircumciſed hearts be humbled (ſaith the Lord; Levit. 26. 41.) and they accept the puniſhment of their iniquity: The phraſe imports a welcome receiving of it, as of a love-token from the hand of a Friend, or that the Rod is not only juſtly, but mercifully and graciouſly inflicted: This is a great perfection of patience; and to this Job's patience attained the very firſt day of his ſorrows, while he bleſſed the Name of the Lord, not only for giving him ſo many good things, but alſo for taking them away (Chap. 1. 21.)

The third ſtep, is, ſpiritual joy, and ſerious chearfulneſs under ſorrowful diſpenſations: This the Apoſtle exhorts the Brethren to (Verſ. 2.) Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations: And preſently adds (intimating that the higheſt perfection of patience conſiſts in joy) Let Patience have her perfect work: As if he had ſaid, I have told you what the perfect work of patience is, do not give check to your patience till it be got up this ſtep, and hath ſet your ſouls a rejoycing, or (as we ſpeak) a crowing over all your temptations.

Every Grace ſhould have its perfect work in us, and ſo they have, when patience hath its perfect work; and then patience hath done that perfect work there commanded, when we wait quietly, thankfully, and rejoycingly, till God hath done the work which he hath promiſed. This waiting patience is alſo called (by Chriſt himſelf) The poſſeſſion of the ſoul (Luke 21. 19.) Poſſeſs ye your ſouls in patience. What title ſoever we have to our own ſouls, we have no poſſeſſion of them without patience: As Faith gives us the poſſeſſion of Chriſt, ſo patience gives us the poſſeſſion of our ſelves: An impatient man is not in his own hand. And as waiting patience gives us the preſent poſſeſſion of our ſelves; ſo it will bring us to the poſſeſſion of all good things elſe that we ſtand in need of to make us happy. The Prophet pronounceth them bleſſed, who wait; every bleſſing is a good thing; but to be bleſſed is all good things; not only is a bleſſing but bleſſedneſs the reward of a waiter. The Lord is a God of judgment, bleſſed are all they that wait for him (Iſa. 30. 18.) Waiting is not only a duty, but a benefit, yea, our bleſſedneſs. And if any object, How is it bleſſedneſs, or ſo much as a ſingle bleſſing, to wait upon God under this notion, as a God of judgment? To have ſaid, God is a God of mercy, bleſſed are they that wait for him, might have taken upon the heart; but to ſay, God is a God of judgment, bleſſed are they that wait for him: How can that be? Is there any deſireableneſs in judgment?

I anſwer, Judgment is not there oppoſed to mercy (there's no bleſſedneſs in being near ſuch judgment.) We may conſider judgment in a threefold oppoſition.

First, Judgment is oppoſed to anger and ſeverity (Jer. 10. 24.) Correct me, O Lord, in judgment, not in thine anger: It is a bleſſed thing to wait upon a God of judgment, in oppoſition to anger, or as judgment imports the golden bridle of moderation upon the paſſions and affections.

Secondly, Judgment is oppoſed to injuſtice: it is a bleſſed thing to wait upon a juſt God, who will certainly do us right; it is a miſery, one of the greateſt miſeries under the Sun, to wait upon unjuſt and unrighteous men; but how great a mercy is it to wait upon a juſt and a righteous God?

Thirdly, Judgment is oppoſed to folly, ignorance, and unadviſedneſs; thus God is a God of judgment, or wiſdom, and bleſſed are they that wait upon the wiſe; it is a vexation to wait upon raſh, fooliſh, heady men, who do they care not what, or know not what they do; but to wait upon a man, much more upon the God of judgment, who knows how to order and do all things, who hath the full compaſs of every cauſe within him, and will time every circumſtance to our beſt advantage (to wait upon this God, I ſay) is a high piece of happineſs: God being ſuch a God of judgment, Bleſſed are they that wait for him; and ſo bleſſed are they, that however he may put them to wait long, yet he at his coming will more then recompence all their waiting; as we find in the exultation of the Church (Iſa. 25. 9.) And it ſhall be ſaid in that day, Loe this is our God, we have waited for him, he will ſave us; this is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will be glad, and rejoyce in his ſalvation. Poſſibly ſome had ſaid then to the Church (as was ſaid continually to David, Pſal. 42. 3.) Where is your God? Ye have long looked for him, but he doth not yet appear. The Church having born thoſe reproaches long, ſees God coming at laſt, and then ſhe breaks forth in triumph, as if ſhe had held God forth in her hand, and cryes him up, Loe this is our God, we have waited for him: The words have a ſound of victory, yea, of many victories in them. They ſhall in the end overcome all difficulties, who can but overcome their own hearts to a patient waiting upon God: As true repentance for the evil we have done, ſo holy patience for the good we would receive, ſhall never be repented of.

And (to add that further) though, when (as it appeared here to Job) God in his providential actings, determines negatively, and ſpeaks it out by the manner of his workings, that his will is not to give, or do for us ſuch a thing, it ceaſes to be a Duty to wait for it; yet to lay down the Duty of waiting, or to throw it up at any time upon ſuch grounds as theſe four (which are the uſual grounds upon which it is laid down or thrown up) is extreamly ſinful, and a high contempt of God.

First, It is extreamly ſinful to give over waiting upon God, as being unwilling to tarry his leiſure. 'Tis the prerogative of God, to date all times, as much as to do all things for us; our times are in his hand as well as our affairs; and he is the diſpoſer of all things, as in regard of the means, ſo alſo of their ſeaſons. Hence 'tis our duty to wait as a time, ſo all the dayes of our appointed time (how many ſoever they are, they are all of Gods appointment) till our change ſhall come, as Job profeſſed his reſolution to do (Chap. 14. 14.) The Iſraelites are charged (Pſal. 78. 41.) For limiting the holy One of Iſrael: How did they limit him? There is a twofold limiting of God: First, To means, when we think we cannot be ſaved unleſs we are ſaved our own way. Secondly, There is a limiting of God to times, he muſt ſave us by ſuch a day, or elſe we cannot be ſaved: Thus the Iſraelites limited the holy One of Iſrael, and ſet bounds to him, whoſe Power and Wiſdom are immeaſurable. God may juſtly limit man; and man never doth juſtly, till he keeps within the limits of God: but it is not only a ſin, but a high preſumption, for man to limit God: Nor is it poſſible for man to break his own bounds more by any thing he doth, then by ſetting bounds to God, what, or when he ſhall do.

Secondly, It is exceeding ſinful to give over waiting on God for deliverance out of an affliction, becauſe we are either diſpleaſed with God who ſends it, or are angry at the affliction ſent. When God throws a ſtone at us, we ſhould ſtoop humbly, and taking it up, put it into our boſome (if we do ſo, though it look like a worthleſs Pebble, it will quickly change into a precious Pearl; however, we muſt) not like the Dog rage at it and bite it, which yet many do. Now they who are vexed at the affliction which God sends, or at God himself, for sending the affliction, these will never wait upon God for the removing of it. Such was the frame of that wretched King (2 Kings 6. 33.) who said, This evil is of the Lord, wherefore should I wait on the Lord any longer? As if he had said, I will never wait for any kindness at his hand, who hath already used me thus unkindly: He that takes an affliction in ill part at the hand of God, will never expect good from him; or if he do, it must come very speedily, or else his waiting is over. 'Tis not unlikely that this King, by the advice of the Prophet Elisha, had waited a little, but he was soon weary; Why should I wait any longer? There was reason enough why he should, but his unbelief would not let him see what he saw, nor understand what himself had spoken: For the reason which he gave, why he would wait no longer, is the strongest reason that can be given why he should have waited longer, This evil is of the Lord. 'Tis true, that among men, they, from or of whom evils are, are usually the unfittest to remove them: Men who wound are seldom skill'd at curing; but the Lord brings no evil, but what he can remove, nor doth he make any wound but what he can heal; yea, no Power nor Art in the World, can heal the wounds that he makes, or remove the evils which he brings, but his own. Hence the patient Believer cryes out with the Church (Hos. 6. 1.) Let us return to the Lord, yea, let us wait upon the Lord, for he hath torn, and he will heal: But the impatient unbeliever saith, Let us turn away from the Lord, let us wait upon the Lord no longer, for 'tis he that hath torn us, therefore surely he will not heal us. Grace and corruption may take up the same principles, but they draw conclusions from them as contrary as themselves are.

Thirdly, It is exceeding sinful to give over waiting, as thinking that God cannot help. Some shorten their patience by shortening the hand of God. That such were the apprehensions of the Jews, is more then probable by the Prophets Negative assertion (Isa. 59. 1.) Behold the Lords hand is not shortened that it cannot save.

Fourthly, It is exceeding sinful to give over waiting upon God, by turning aside to sinful wayes: Some find out (as they suppose) nearer wayes ro help themselves, then by attending upon God; they like not (as such have prophanely cal'ed them) those pious delayes; and so over Hedge and Ditch they will, to the overtaking of their own ends. The Prophet Jeremiah describes such (Chap. 18. 12.) And they said, there is no hope; or, our case is desperate, all's lost. What then? But we will walk after our own devices, and every one do after the imagination of his evil heart: The Lord had told them (Vers. 11.) Behold I frame evil against you, and devise a device against you. But did the Lord devise a device, meerly to ensnare them, or did he frame evil against them only to undo them? No, his aim was their repentance, not their ruine, and therefore he adds in the same Verse, Return ye now every one from his evil wayes, and make your wayes and your doings good: As if the Lord had said, Though I am about to frame evil against you, yet do ye return to me, and all shall be well. How do they resent this threatening and this Counsel? They grow desperate upon it: And seeing God had brought them into such straits, they would get out as well as they could: And as he was devising devices against them, so they had devices of their own, and them they would follow. Thus they would not wait upon God for a remedy in the way of repentance for their old sins, but they would provide themselves a remedy by running into new sins: They had a device in their heads which should match the device of God.

Now what the Prophet subjoyns (Vers. 13, 14, 15.) as a strong redargution of that people who refused to wait upon God in that way, the same we may say to all those who refuse to wait upon God in any way. The Virgin of Israel (he calls her so, to mind her what she should be, not to commend her what she was) hath done a very horrible thing; will a man leave the Snow of Lebanon, which cometh from the rock of the field? Or, Will a man (as our Margin hath it) leave my fields for a rock, or for the Snow of Lebanon? That is, Will any Traveller be so foolish, as to leave the plain fields, where he may pass with ease and pleasure, without let or hinderance, to climb over craggy Rocks, and precipitious Hills? Will he leave a beaten path, to go through vast Woods and desolate Forrests covered with Snow, where no track or footsteps are to be seen? Or (as it follows in that Verse) Shall the cold flowing waters which come from another place be forsaken? Or, Shall the cool running waters be forsaken for strange waters? That is, Will any man who hath fresh Fountain-water of his own at home, go to seek water in a stinking Ditch, in standing Pools, and miery Puddles, when he is athirst? Such is the choice or exchange which they make, who cease waiting upon God in his wayes, and turn aside for help to their own crooked wayes, Stumbling (as the Prophet speaks at the fifteenth Verse of the same Chapter) in their wayes from the ancient paths, to walk in paths, in a way not cast up, or, where no Causey is. Though the hand or providence of God doth sometimes bring his people (as the Prophet speaks, Isa. 42. 16.) By a way which they knew not, and leads them in paths that they have not known: That is, into a way which they knew not, by any former teachings of men, or experiences of their own; yet his hand never leads them into any way, which is not cast up, or which may not be made out, by some rule or example in the Word: To leave waiting upon God in his ordinary wayes, and to go in any extraordinary way which hath no ground in the Word, is purely to follow our own wayes, and to go after the imaginations of our evil hearts.

Job in this place apprehended it unseasonable for him to wait for those worldly attainments and enjoyments which his Friends promised him; but he was not unwilling to tarry the Lords leisure, nor was he displeased with God for afflicting him, nor did he say, God could not help him, much less did he turn from God to any wicked way to help himself, when he said, If I wait, the Grave is mine house.

A Believer may in this sence be an unbeliever, and lay down all his hopes in this life, of long life and of good dayes, of riches and temporal greatness: When Friends bid such on their sick Beds, Be of good chear, we hope to see you abroad shortly; we hope God will raise you up again, they will even forbid those comforts, and say, Do not intice us back into the World with these hopes, the Graves are ready for us, and we have made our bed in the darkness; it is not for us to look for life here, indeed to live to us is Christ, but to dye is gain. A Believer can willingly part with all his earthly possessions for heavenly hopes, much more can he joyfully part with all his earthly hopes for the possession of Heaven.

Thirdly, From these expressions, The Grave is my house, I have made my bed in the darkness.

Note, A Believer looks upon death as a state of rest.

As the whole house is a place of rest compared with the World abroad; so the Bed is the special place of rest (Rev. 14. 14.) Blessed are the dead which dye in the Lord, from henceforth they rest from their labours, and their works follow them: They shall follow their work no more, who are followed by their works. The Grave is the house and bed of the body to all who dye: Heaven is the house and rest of the soul to all those who dye in the Lord. Saints have here a rest in their labours, they shall hereafter have a rest from their labours.

Lastly, Whereas the bed of death is made in darkness.

Observe, There is nothing desireable in death, as considered in it self.

A dark condition is the worst condition: Darkness, which in Scripture signifies all evil, is a word good enough to express the state of death by: What desireableness there is in Death, what pleasures in the Grave, will appear further in those Arguments which Death useth to invite us home to its house, the Grave, in the next Verse, which tells us, our most lovely Companions, yea, our sweetest sweetest and most endeared Relations there, are, Corruption and Worms.

Verse 14. I have said to Corruption, Thou art my Father; and to the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and my Sister.

Hyperbolæ sunt quibus significat se omnem jam vitæ cogitationem abdicasse. Jun.

This Verse is of the same sence with the former; only here, Job breaks into an elegant variation of new metaphors, and hyperbolical expressions.

I have said.] That is, I have (as it were) called to, and saluted the retinue and attendants of Death, as my friends and kindred: As I have made my bed in the Grave, and as that is my house, so now I am finding out my houshold relations; I say to this, Thou art my Father; and to that, Thou art my Mother and Sister.

קרא Est clamare vocare appellare, & per electionem nominare: elegans prosopopeia, per quam Job tumultū alloquitur. Bold.

The word which we render, I have said, &c. signifies not barely to say, but to cry, or call out: I have called out to corruption: So Master Broughton, To the pit I cry, O Father; O Sister, O Mother, to the Worm: Not barely, I have said, but I cry; and not barely, I cry Father to the pit, but he adds also a note of exclamation, O Father.

Secondly, The word imports not generally a calling, or crying out, to any one that comes next, but to some special person, by way of election and choice, or to such as we know well, and are acquainted with, as the terms of Father, Mother, and Sister, imply.

Verbum קרא significat etiam occurrere alicui, nam occurrentem solemnis salutatione vel interrogatione aliqua proprio nomine appellare.

Further, The word signifies, not only to call aloud, and to call with election, but to go forth on purpose to call a Friend, or to invite him in: As when we see an acquaintance coming towards us, or our dwellings, we step out to meet and welcome him, so the word may bear in this place: As if Job seeing death drawing toward him, had gone out, and said, O corruption my Father, O Worms my Mother, my Sister, welcome, welcome; such an elegancy the word yields us.

I shall not here stay upon any anxious disquisition about the propriety of these relations, how Job calls corruption his Father, and the Worm his Mother and Sister, or in drawing out comparisons about them; we are to look only to a general proportion, not to an exact propriety in these words; there's no need to make out parallels between corruption and a Father, or between Worms and a Mother, or a Sister.

Only thus much may be asserted particularly.

First, He speaks thus to shew that he looked on death, not only not as an enemy, but not as a stranger. Death and he were well acquainted.

Secondly, He speaks thus to shew, that death was not only not a stranger to him, but as one of his kindred: He was upon as fair terms with death, as with Father and Mother.

Ut ostendat mortem sibi in votis esse, cunctis illum amicitiæ & necessitudinis nominis compellat. Pined.

Thirdly, Job speaks thus to shew, that he did not only look upon death as in a near relation to him, but as having a kind of delight and contentment in death: What is more sweet to a man, who hath been a long journey, and is returning home, then to think that he is coming to his Father and Mother, his Brethren and Sisters? As Nature gives us Kindred by blood, so it is a custom to adopt and stamp to our selves Kindred by kindness; one we call Father, and another we call Mother; one is our Brother, a second is our Sister, a third our Cozen, by the mutual tyes, or by the receits and returns of courtesie. Thus we are to take these compellations, as intimating with what spirit Job entertained the thoughts of death, even with no other then if he had been to fall into the embraces of Father, and Mother, and Sister: He said to corruption, as we should say to Wisdom (Prov. 7. 4.) Say unto Wisdom, thou art my Sister, and call Understanding thy Kinswoman, That is, Acquaint thy self with, and be familiar with Wisdom, so shalt thou keep thy self (which is both thy wisdom and thy happiness) a stranger, from the strange woman, Vers. 5.

Further, it may yet be enquired, what it is which Job calls Corruption and the Worm, I have said [to Corruption] &c. What is this corruption? There are two opinions about it.

First, Some interpret him speaking to the corruption, and Worms, which had already seized upon his body; for his diseases and ulcerous sores had bred corruption and worms: As if he had said, I may well call corruption my Father, for I am already full of corruption, I may well call the Worm my Mother, my Sister, for the Worms creep in and out at my sores continually; my body is as if it had lain already in the Grave, full of corruption and Worms.

שחת Fovea, corruptio, quod in fovea corpus corrumpitur.

Secondly, Others expound him speaking to, and of, the corruption and Worms, which waited his coming into the Grave. The word in the Text, which we translate Corruption, signifies also the Grave; because bodies do not only corrupt in the Grave, but quickly turn to corruption. As soon as a body is dead, it is a carkass; and after it hath been a while a carkass, 'tis nothing but corruption: Hence some render it, not, I have said to corruption, but to the pit, or grave: So Master Broughton, To the pit I cry, O Father; to the worm, O Mother, O Sister. The Grave is so proper a place for corruption, that 'tis proper enough to express corruption by the Grave.

And besides those Worms which are generated out of the putrefaction of mans body, there are Worms ready generated in the Grave to entertain us. Worms are the proper Inhabitants of the Grave; there they keep house, as Father, and Mother, and Sister, to welcome and embrace such as descend into it.

Master Fox reports of Doctor Taylor, a famous Martyr of Christ in Queen Maries time, who was burned at Hadley in Suffolk, that when he knew he should suffer death by fire, he said, I have been deceived my self, and I shall deceive many at Hadley; when some hearing this, began to hope he would recant, and shrink from that profession of the Gospel which he had made: At last he explained himself, I am a man of a very full fat body, which I had hoped, should have been buried in Hadley Church-yard, but I see I am deceived; and there are a great number of Worms there, which might have had good cheer upon my carkass, but I shall deceive them all, my body being to be burned. The Earth breeds Worms in its own bowels; and our body, which at the best and alive are but refined earth, being once dead yield another race of Worms. Job may be supposed speaking unto both, or either, I have said to the Worm, Thou art my Mother and my Sister.

We may hence Observe, That some Believers are so far from fearing, that they are familiar with death.

Other Texts in the former passages of this Book, have occasioned like Observations; yet as often as this occasion is renewed it will not be unprofitable to renew this Observation: To write the same things where we read the same things (yet the Reader will not find them the same) is not unprofitable.

I say, some Believers are familiar with death, I am far from saying, that he who is not, is no Believer: There are not in all the same degree of holiness; though holiness be the same in all; but a Believer may arrive at such a composure of spirit, at such a stature of holiness, as not to fear death. There are some Believers, (and it is their sin) who are but little acquainted with death, they seldom go out to the Grave, or look into the Pit they are going to; he that hath often conversed with death in the meditation (which is a Believers way) of the death of Christ, cannot be afraid to dye, if he know what the death of Christ means which he hath meditated upon. He that knows it throughly, may (as the Prophet speaks in another case, Isa. 11. 8.) Play on the hole of this Asp, and put his hand upon the den of the Cockatrice; yea, such a Believer may not only play and put his hand upon the Grave, which is the hole of this Asp, and the den of this Cockatrice, but he can play with the Asp it self, and take up the Cockatrice in his hand; with this Asp or Cockatrice he can sport himself as with a Brother or a Sister.

O how different are the thoughts of carnal men, and their words of death? How dreadfully do they speak and think of the Grave? An unbeliever saith of the Grave; It is a prison, not a house; he finds no bed in darkness, 'tis to him a Dungeon; he saith to corruption, Thou art my foe, and to the Worms, ye are to me as Feinds and Furies: He cannot bear the thought of them, much less their sight and presence. Saints speak courtingly of death; there is a kind kind of holy courtship in the language of Job: Agag (1 Sam. 15 32.) came out to Samuel delicately; for said he, Surely the bitterness of death is past: But he was deceived, for Samuel hewed him in pieces; and when he said, the bitterness of death is past, he meant death was past. He did not believe, but that death would be bitter whenever it should come; but he thought death was past for that time however, and so he came out delicately, he stood as a Courtier, yea, as a King before Samuel, because he had escaped (as he supposed) that King of terrors. Thus the Saints come out delicately indeed, and court it, in the very face of the King of terrors, for they know the bitterness of death is past, though they were assured they must dye presently: They do not say, Death is past, they know death will come, and they must dye, but the bitterness is past, the Gall and Wormwood is taken out; and upon this account they can say to corruption, Thou art my Father, and to the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and Sister.

Thirdly, Note, Corruption and Worms are the portion and companions of the dead.

Only Jesus Christ was exempt from this portion, who though he submitted himself to death for sinners, yet having no sin in himself, he was not at all subject to death, nor was it possible that he should be holden of it: He was the holy one, he had no corruption in his spirit, and therefore his flesh saw no corruption (Acts 2. 31.) But as for all flesh, they having corrupted all their wayes, their flesh shall see corruption in the end.

Take two Corolaries from this.

First, Let no man glory in bodily beauty, in honours, or alliances. Corruption will shortly seize upon the most beautiful body, Worms will crawl upon the smoothest cheeks, upon the fairest face, and into that mouth which now boasteth great things, and speaks so proudly; this earth must turn to earth, and then the greatest Kindreds, and noblest Pedigrees, will be lost or swallowed up in this, Corruption is my Father, and the Worm my Mother, and my Sister: Man is corruptible while he lives, and when he dyes he is corruption. Every man living is but a Worm; Jesus Christ, who abased himself to the lowest condition of man, saith, I am a worm and no man (Psal. 22. 6.) When man dyes, as he goes to the Worms, so he makes Worms; who would be proud of his flesh, did he know that 'tis but corruption and worms once removed, and that it must suddenly move back again to corruption and worms.

Secondly, Seeing death hath nothing of its own but darkness, corruption, and worms, which are all unpleasing, and a regret to flesh and blood, therefore live much in Christ, who only gives a remedy against all these evils: If we live in the Grave of Christ, that will make the darkness of our Grave light, and the corruption of it sweet unto us. He that upon good interest can say to Christ, Thou art my Father, thou art my Brother, thou art my All, can say rejoycingly to corruption, Thou art my Father; and to the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and Sister. Relation to Christ is so comfortable, that it overcomes the discomfort of our most unpleasant relations. That which raised the spirit of holy Job to these free complyances with death, was the light which he had (even in those darker times) about the Redeemer, of which, as the nineteeth Chapter gives us a clear and an illustrious proof, so the next Verse gives us more then an intimation.

Verse 15. And where is now my hope? And as for my hope who shall see it?

He that chearfully questions, Where is my hope? puts it almost out of question where his hope is.

Where is now my hope?] Had Job lost his hope, or was it to seek? David's enemies interrogate him (and that interrogatory was as a Sword in his bones, or as a Dagger at his heart) Where is now thy God (Psal. 42.10.) Their meaning was, Thy God is no where, he is not to be found, thou hast none to help, none to deliver thee: Job puts the question himself, and he puts it to himself, Where is now my hope? His meaning is not, that it was no where, but that it was not there where some would have it.

Hope may be considered two wayes, either as taken for a grace acting in us, or as taken for some good upon which that grace acts: Job's question concerns not hope as it is a grace acting in us; he that hath that hope knows where it is, and where it is once it abides for ever; Hope is no remover, it is an abiding grace (1 Cor. 13. 13.) Now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three: These are abiding graces; these must and shall keep house, not only in the Church militant in general, but in the soul of every true member of the Church: And if in reference to this hope, Job had questioned, Where is now my hope? He might have answered, It is in thy heart; the grace of hope dwells there. This grace of hope is no fading quality, but a setled power: Hope doth not alwayes act, but it alwayes is, where it ever was: It is not alwayes a lively hope, but it is alwayes a living hope. As Eliphaz checks Job (Chap. 4. 4.) Is this thy hope? So many a Believer deserves to be checkt and chidden, because his hope is not more strong and stirring, because his hope is so unlike hope, especially so unlike that hope, which he ought to have, after so much experience. What? Is this thy hope? Is this all? You have talked of hope all this while; is this all you have to shew for it? This is a poor piece of hope, a hope unworthy of thee. Some good men may justly fall under this check; and whereas hope maketh not ashamed, they may for a time be ashamed of their hope; yet it is with them as with those Trees of which the Prophet speaks (Isa. 6. 13.) Whose substance is in them, when they have cast their leaves: So the holy seed shall be, and is the substance of it; and though for a time it appear not, and so may bear this question, Where is it? yet it will appear again, and by bearing fruit, answer for it self, Here I am.

Secondly, Take hope for that good upon which our hope is set, or for the object of hope. There is a twofold object of hope.

First, Eternal, and heavenly.

Secondly, Temporal, and earthly.

Spiritual things are the hope laid hold upon (Heb. 6. 18.) That by two immutable things in which it is impossible for God to lye, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us: This Scripture teacheth us, that as there is a hope by which we lay hold, that's the grace of hope; so there is a hope upon which we lay hold, that's the good for which we hope. God himself, and all the good things of eternal life, which God hath promised, are this hope. This hope also Job had, and he knew where it was: As he knew he had the grace of hope in his heart, so that he had the choicest good of hope in Heaven; nor would he have parted with this hope for all the possessions in the World.

But as hope (whether in the object or in the actings of it) respects temporal, or earthly things; Job saith, And now where is my hope? That is, If I wait and hope about these things, my labour is lost, my hopes are vain and vanishing, yea, already vanished, as the next clause (which is of the same sence with this, and therefore needs no explication) further sheweth.

And for my hope, who shall see it?] That is, Who shall see that which you would have me hope for? You would perswade me that I shall be a great man; if I should take up such a hope, who shall ever see it made good, who shall see it fulfilled? No man shall.

And because the word which we translate Hope in both parts of this Verse, signifies also a Congregation, or the meeting of many things or persons together: That first and great congregation of waters, or rather the congregating of those waters is expressed by it (Gen. 1. 9.) and in a like sence 'tis used concerning persons (Jer. 3. 17.) Hence the whole Verse is thus rendred, And where now is my congregation? And as for my congregation, who shall see it? As if he had said, If ye ask after my congregation, or family, 'tis in the Grave; there's all that I look for, there's my Father and Mother, there's my Sisters, and will any man go down with me into those chambers of darkness to visit my congregation, to see my family: This is all the family which I have in my eye, and whose eye else is greedy to see this?

I might from this Verse turn back to that Observation lately given; That a true Believer is sometimes able to make triumphant reports about the wrack of his worldly hope; he can say, Where is it? And who shall see it?

With

with dry eyes, when the will of God removes it out of his sight.

David treating of the vanity of worldly things (Psal. 39. 7.) concludes in the midst of all his outward enjoyments, And now Lord, what wait I for? Where is my hope? Or, What do I hope for? ('Tis all one) my hope is in thee; not in the World, not after worldly things; he easily gave up his hope there: The more hope we have in God, the less we have in and about the creature. Job had much hope in God; but he had none, not only in, but none for the creature. All those hopes were in his sight, as himself was, dead or dying, and therefore fit only to be buried out of his sight, as he speaks in the next Verse.

Verse 16. They shall go down to the bars of the pit, when our rest together is in the dust.

Spes mea, omnia mea; recte in plurali dicit, significans non spem tantum sibi ab illis propositam sed & omnes alias spes hujus vitæ. Merc.

They shall go down.] Who? or what shall go down? There is no expres Relative in the Hebrew: They, that is (say some) these hopes: He speaks in the Plural number, as if he had said, All my hopes about this life are going down to the pit. The best of worldly hopes, and worldly things, are dying and perishing; mine are to me as dead and perished.

Secondly, Others understand it of Job himself; for the word which we translate Barrs, signifies also the members of the body: As if he had said, I my self shall go down to the Pit, or Grave.

בר Vectes significat, & ea omnia quæ velut vectes aliquid sustentant.

A third thus, They shall descend upon the bars of the Grave: The meaning is, Ye shall quickly see me and all my worldly hopes, which ye so much speak of, put together in a Coffin, and carryed out upon a Beir to the Grave for burial.

Aliqui Rabbini ad ipsum Jobum referunt, quod ipsius sulchra, i. e. membra, brachia, vires, robur descendent. Vectibus sepulchralibus descendent. Jun. Mox videbitis istas expectationes quas prædicatis, una cum corpore ferretro efferri in sepulchrum. Jun.

This going down to the bars of the Pit, according to our reading, imports, that he and his hopes should descend to the lower parts of the earth, the Grave, and be buried there; the Pit would shut him in, and make him fast enough. The Grave is a Prison, and there are bars or bolts belonging to that Prison which shut the Prisoners in; there's no breaking of that Prison: The Decree of God is the bar of the Grave, and his purpose locks it up till the day which himself hath appointed for the resurrection from the dead, and the judgment which is to follow. As the evil Angels are reserved in chains of darkness to the Judgment of the great day; so are the bodies of men chained and barred down in the darkness of the Grave, till God sends out the Arch-angel with the sound of a Trumpet to summon them to his Bar.

Per irrisionem hæc dicta sunt. Cajet.

Yet further, these words are interpreted as spoken in derision of those overtures which his Friends made to him about worldly happiness: As if he had said, You perswade me that I shall have much good in the World: Very well, let it be so; but do you think that I can carry my Goods, my Houses and Lands, my Silver and Gold, my Corn and my Wine, to make merry with in the Grave? Shall I, and the greatness you promise me, live together in the Grave, and make our abode in darkness? The Septuagint seem to favour that sence, rendring it, Shall my Goods go with me to the Grave? Or, Shall we descend into the dust hand in hand? When I surrender this battered Fort into the hands of death, shall I march out with bag and baggage to these Subterranean dwellings? The Apostle affirms, That we brought nothing with us into this World; and (he doth more then affirm) It is certain (saith he) we can carry nothing out (1 Tim. 6. 7.) And therefore what doth it avail a dying man to tell him of riches, seeing when he dyes he must leave all his riches.

An bona mea mecum ad infernos descendent, aut pariter super pulverem descendemus.

Mr. Broughton translates plainly thus, To the midst of the Grave all shall descend, when we shall go down together in the dust. From which our reading of the latter clause varies but a little.

When we shall rest together in the dust.] The word which we express by rest, is derived by some, from a root signifying to descend, or go down; hence the difference of translation. The Hebrew particle (im) which we render When, signifies also For, or For asmuch: Further, it is sometimes taken conditionally, for If, as also interrogatively for (utrum) whether; according to all which acceptions, this clause hath undergone a variety of reading.

But I pass them by, and keep to our own, When our rest together is in the dust, or, for as much as we shall rest together in the dust. Of this rest I have spoken before (Chap. 3. 17.) There the weary be at rest, thither I refer the Reader: We may also take Job's sence in this place, by that which he speaks so clearly out to this point (Chap. 30. Vers. 23.) For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living. I shall not stay here to draw out Observations; matter of this purport, about the certainty of, and about our rest in death, having occurred heretofore: All that I shall add for the close of this Verse and Chapter, shall only be an offer towards the resolution of a doubt, which may arise upon the whole matter of Job's continued resolves for death, and his refusals of any entertainment of the hopes of life.

Hence it may be questioned, Did not Job sin in giving up his hope, and in refusing to be comforted when his Friends, wise and godly men, laboured to assure him of deliverance?

I answer, First, Job was willing to be comforted, but he did not like their way of comforting, which was indeed a wounding; for the promises which they made him, did all along carry an implication of his guilt; they never promising him any deliverance, but upon the supposition of his repentance from those wickednesses, with which they charged him; whereas he utterly denyed their charge in the sence which they laid against him.

Secondly, I answer, We cannot altogether acquit Job from blame, in judging his state so deplorable and remedileſs. For though with an eye to the creature, and all second causes, there was no probability, or possibility for his recovery, yet Job should have raised his hopes upon the Power and All-sufficiency of God; he might have remembred, that as his affliction was extraordinary, and the hand of God very visible in it; so his deliverance also might have been as extraordinary, and that God could have put forth as strong, and as visible a hand to restore him, as he did to cast him down: 'Tis said of Abraham (Rom. 4. 18, 19.) that he against hope, believed in hope; nothing appeared for the support of his hopes, yet Abraham did not say, Where is my hope? Or why should I wait for Children? He considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old; neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: These natural impediments came not to his mind, while he had a word from the Lord of nature, He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in Faith, giving glory to God. But we may say of Job (from the continual tenour of his own answers) that he considered his own body as dead too much, and so attained not to Abraham's strength of Faith.

Yet we have three things to say for him: First, There was a great difference between his case and Abraham's; Job had no such ground of Faith as Abraham had; Abraham received a special, yea, an absolute promise from God, that he should have a Son; but Job received only a conditional promise from man, grounded upon the general promises of God, that he should be restored: This consideration abates much from the Objection of his unbelief; though it cannot be denyed, but his Faith might and should have risen higher upon the power of God, who as he was all-sufficiently able, so he did afterwards actually raise him up.

Secondly, The design of God being in Job's example to set forth a pattern of Patience; as his design was in Abraham's example to set forth a pattern of Faith; he was pleased to let Job's Faith run it self out about spirituals and eternals, not minding temporals, that so his patience might have a perfect work in bearing the full weight of his affliction to the end, while his Faith did not so much as put under a little finger to ease him with the least belief, that it should (as to this life) be taken off, or have an end.

Lastly, (As 'twas hinted) Job had much Faith to some purposes, though none to this; he had a full trust in God, though he should kill him; but he had no trust that God would not kill him: he believed God loved him while he did afflict him, though he did not believe that God would deliver him from his afflictions. As no mans Faith works alike at all times; so 'tis rare that any mans Faith works alike to all things: Some who believe and hope mightily for the things of Heaven, have but little, either Faith or Hope for earthly things: Not becauſe a Faith which ſerves for Heaven, is not enough ('tis rather more then enough) to ſerve for Earth: But becauſe moſt of thoſe whoſe Faith is ſtrong and much enlarged for Heaven, take ſo much ſatisfaction there, and are there ſo much at home, that they account themſelves Pilgrims and Strangers here, and are not much mindful (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Heb. 11. 15.) or deſirous of their earthly Countrey and concernments, What we do not much deſire to have, we do not much believe (though we believe) that we ſhall have it. A full ſoul, ſaith Solomon, loatheth the Honey-comb: Thoſe ſouls which are full of Heaven (though they do not loath, yet they) are not hungry after (though they can thankfully receive and enjoy) any Honey-comb of this World. No man having drunk old Wine, ſtraightway deſireth new, for he ſaith the old is better (Luke 5. 39.) Doubtleſs Job had drunk the old Wine of Gods favour and love in the Redeemer, and ſo his thirſt was much ſlacked, if not totally quenched towards the new Wine of a temporal reſtauration. And hence we may not only charitably, but more then probably conclude, That it was not for want of Faith, that Job did not believe or hope for what his Friends promiſed him, but becauſe he had employed his Faith upon better and more pleaſing promiſes.

Thus Job hath finiſht his anſwer to the ſecond charge of Eliphaz: And (through the help of Chriſt) ſomewhat is here tendered for the illuſtration and expoſition of it. His other two Friends, Bildad, and Zophar, ſtand ready to enter the Liſts with him, and to renew their charge; what they ſaid, and what anſwer they received, ſhall (if God continue life and ſtrength, with theſe peaceable opportunities) in convenient time be preſented to publick view.

JOB

CHRISTIAN READER:

To those especially of this CITY, who have been the MOVERS, and continue the PROMOTERS of this WORK.

GOD only wise, who caused his holy Word to be written aforetime for our learning and instruction, hath in all times appointed the Ministry of expounding and Preaching his Word, that it might be the better fitted for instruction: The business of the Expositor (or of the Preacher expounding) is to collect and give out the sence and meaning of the Word aright: The business of the Preacher (or of the Expositor preaching) is to divide the sence and meaning of the Word aright, giving to every one that portion which is proper to him; his proper Doctrine (of Truth) his proper Reproof (of Error) his proper Correction (of evil Manners) his proper Instruction (about holiness of Conversation) and all in Righteousness. While Jesus Christ himself was fulfilling his Ministry here on earth, he performed not only the office of a Preacher (Luke 4. 18, 19, 20, &c.) but of an Expositor also (Luke 24. 27.) Beginning at Moses and all the Prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself. The Scripture is indeed its own Expositor; dark Texts receive light from clearer, and those which are so plain that they need no Comment, are a Comment to those that need. But though the Word of God (as to truth and light) be (as God himself is) self-sufficient, and carrieth in some one or other part of it, the interpretation of other parts; yet as to man, there is much need of an Interpreter, for the due accommodation of any one part to the interpretation of another: For the Scripture is such an Expositor of its own hard Places, as it is a Judge of all hard Questions and Controversies, arising from, or grounded upon it: That is to say, A Normal, not a Personal Expositor. And therefore as the Father of Lights, from whom cometh every good gift, and every perfect gift, hath bestowed This very good and perfect gift, His holy Word upon us; so he hath furnished some with gifts, and sent them forth as Interpreters of it; yea, he hath sent forth his Holy Spirit, who is not only (as Elihu speaks (in this Book) of some choice-spirited man) An Interpreter, one among a thousand, but the only un-erring Interpreter. For as the Word of God is the only un-erring Normal Expositor of it self, so the Holy Spirit of God, whom Jesus Christ hath promised to send, and of whom Christ hath said, He shall take of mine, and shew it unto you, is the only un-erring personal Expositor of the Word; yet the Holy Spirit (as I may say) in person seldom doth it; but usually conveyeth the light of the Word unto man, by such men as himself hath first enlightned.

There want not some who would have the Word set nakedly before all, that so every man waiting for the light of the Holy Spirit, may make his own apprehension the interpretation of it; and 'tis true, that nothing is an interpretation to any man beyond or besides what himself apprehends; yet the apprehensions of this or that man, may be very serviceable unto many others, and are often the means which God useth and blesseth for the leading of their understandings into the way both of truth and holiness. Nor can they who are thus led, be therefore justly charged to see, spiritually, with other mens eyes, because others have been instrumental for the opening of their eyes; or that they see by other mens light, because others have been helpful in bringing them from darkneſs unto light ; no more then they can be charged to ſee, corporally, with other mens eyes, whoſe eye-ſight hath been cured (as a ſecond cauſe) by the skill of man ; or, that they ſee by other mens light, who ſaw nothing till a window was opened to them. For the light which any man brings and holds forth, becomes every mans proper light, who is enabled to receive it and ſee by it. The Goſpel is held forth to thouſands to whom yet it is hid ; the God of this world having blinded the eyes of their mind, leſt the light of the glorious Goſpel of Chriſt, who is the image of God, ſhould ſhine unto (or irradiate) them, that is, ſhine into them. So that every ſoul muſt have an internal eye or light given him, before he can ſavingly receive that light which is externally offered him ; and whoſoever thus receives the light offered, makes that as much his own (in his own capacity) as it was the offerers. And foraſmuch as there are many unſtable and unlearned ones (ſo the Apoſtle Peter expreſſeth them, 2 Pet. 3. 16.) who (at leaſt preſuming to ſee without, if not ſcorning to ſee by the light which others offer) wreſt not only the Epiſtles of Paul, in which (as the Apoſtle Peter there affirmeth) are many things hard to be underſtood, but all other Scriptures to their own deſtruction, it cannot be reaſonably judged a diſſervice either to God or to his people, to endeavour (in the utmoſt improvement of gifts and light received) a right interpretation of them. And though we dare not offer our interpretations under the title of Infallible, and ſo challenge a dominion over the faith of others, yet we may be helpers both of their joy and knowledge. We are commanded to try the Spirits whether they be of God (1 John 4. 1.) We muſt not reject all Spirits, becauſe poſſibly many are not of God. The Spirit of God is above all trial ; but there are Spirits (even the Spirits or ſpiritual gifts of all men) which muſt be ſubmitted to trial, and ſtand Probationers. And becauſe they are to be tried, therefore it followeth that they are to be uſed ; for to what purpoſe ſhould that be tried which is not to be uſed ? To try a thing or perſon, doth indeed ſuppoſe that there may be a failing in either ; but it doth not at all infer, that there is no uſe of either, but rather that both are uſeful : And if upon trial much be found which is unſound, and ſo to be refuſed, yet that which is found muſt be retained. Thus the Apoſtle directs (1 Theſ. 5. 21.) Prove all things, hold faſt that which is good.

What is preſented in the following Expoſitions, is not the impoſing of a ſence either upon the Word of God, or upon the underſtandings of men, but an humble tender of what the Expoſitor underſtands as the ſence of it, to the trial of all.

Some, I know, begin to ſay, that there is, or at leaſt, that ſhortly there will be little or no need at all of ſuch poor helps as theſe : Surely it will be the rejoycing of all who honour Jeſus Chriſt, and love his appearing, to ſee that day, not ſo much becauſe they may then take their eaſe, and reſt from theſe labours (for though the ſervants of Chriſt, through the infirmity of their fleſh, are often wearied at their work, yet through the ſtrength of his Grace, they ſhall not be weary of it) but becauſe when that which is imperfect, or (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, 1 Cor. 13. 10.) in part ſhall be done away, then that will be come which is perfect. Only my fear is that ſome are ſo buſie in decrying theſe things (which we readily acknowledge to have many imperfections in them) that for haſte they would do them away (in their own and others wrong) before that which is perfect be come unto us. Propheſie ſhall ceaſe, and knowledge (of this ſize, and as now attained) ſhall be done away ; but when theſe ceaſe, in order to God's appointment, thoſe weakneſſes and wants in the ſons of men ſhall ceaſe alſo, to cure and ſupply which, they were appointed by God. How happy and glorious a thing were it, if we could ſee this Age approve it ſelf ſuch as had no need to be taught ? or that the ſymptomes of the ſame ſickneſſes and impotencies both of Judgment and Practice did not now diſcover themſelves as formerly ? How many are there who ſpeak much of the holy and bleſſed Spirit (concerning whom we can neither ſpeak nor boaſt too much) who yet walk after the fleſh ? How many diſcourſe high (concerning which all our diſcourſes fall too low) of thoſe new Heavens and of that new Earth wherein dwelleth righteouſneſs, who yet defile and pollute the old with their unrighteouſneſs ? Where almoſt can we behold the Image of that Glory which we ſhould continually wait for, ſtampt upon the wayes of men ? And while the actings of men are every where thus low and earthly, doth the age look like that which is either actually above, or hath near out-grown teaching ? As for my ſelf, I deſire (ſhould I live to that day) when my Lord and Maſter cometh, to be found thus doing. It is dangerous to lay down or depart from the practice of known duties, upon the expectation of further priviledges; Or to say, we need not now do that which shortly (possibly very shortly) we shall need do no more. Each state hath its proper rules and helps, and to them we must submit, till we are removed out of such a state. 'Tis no wisdom for a dim-sighted man presently to throw away his Spectacles, though he be assured that within a while his eye-sight shall be cleared.

Christian Reader, let you and I be not only contented, but thankful that we may behold the Glory of the Lord in these Glasses, till himself lead us into his Glory, and give us the Top-stone of all Perfections, to see face to face. The furtherance of souls in the way to this Glory, is the design of this Work, which now by the assistance of God, is advanced half way; as for the other half (seeing no man can boast of to morrow, or knoweth what a day may bring forth) I can only say, that it is in my heart, if the Lord continue life and strength with the Call hitherto afforded, to advance with what speed I can (though I confess the best of my speed is but slowness) towards the finishing of that also. The travel of this sixth Stage, I leave with you, and both you and it to the blessing, and under the shadow of the Almighty, in whom I am,

Servant in this Work of the Lord,

AN

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Obſervations UPON THE EIGHTEENTH, NINETEENTH, TWENTIETH AND TWENTY FIRST CHAPTERS Of the Book of JOB.

CHAP. XVIII. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4

Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid;

How long will it be, ere you make an end of words? Mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak.

Wherefore are we counted as Beaſts; and reputed vile in your ſight?

He teareth himſelf in his anger: ſhall the earth be forſaken for thee? and ſhall the rock be removed out of his place?

ELIPHAZ having finiſhed, Bildad begins a ſecond diſpute with Job; Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid. Yet he rather reproves then anſwers; and returns invectives more then reaſons. Bildad ſtrikes here again upon the ſame ſtone, at which himſelf and his friends had ſtumbled before. His whole diſcourſe falls into three parts.

First, We have his Preface.

Secondly, The body of his Speech.

Thirdly, He winds up, and draws all together into a brief Concluſion.

His Preface is laid down in the four former verſes of this Chapter.

The body of his diſcourſe extends it ſelf from the fifth verſe incluſively to the end of the twentieth, in which his general ſcope is to deſcribe the miſerable condition of a wicked man: and he doth it under a threefold conſideration, as a threefold gradation of his miſery.

First, In his life.

Secondly, In his death.

Thirdly, After death.

So that living, dying, and dead, he is miſerable, and therefore altogether miſerable.

The concluſion of his diſcourſe is contained in the laſt verſe, in which he gives us the ſtrength of what he had ſaid, and re-affirms it; Surely ſuch are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

His general design and scope is to convince Job that he was a wicked man, because he suffered those things which none but a wicked man (according to his opinion) ever did, or should suffer. For the proof of this he proceeds in his former method, bringing nothing new for the matter, no new argument, no new medium, either to confirm his own position, or to infirm the opinion of Job; but cloathing his former reasons in a new dress, he gives us a very lively and pathetical description of the estate of a wicked man; upon which subject he had treated in the eighth Chapter. Only two differences appear between this and his first discourse.

Nova hic nulla: est tamen oratio Allegoriis & Metaphoris illustrius improborũ clades oculis subjicit. Merl.

First, At the eighth Chapter he sets out the happiness of a godly man in opposition to the miserable estate of the wicked; here he leaves out that part.

Secondly, At the eighth Chapter he useth many arguments to move Job to repent, and turn to God. He leaves out that work also here, not so much as once mentioning repentance, or exhorting him to return to God; as if he either thought it too late, or that Job's obstinacy was remediless, and the wound both of his outward and inward state incurable.

The first part or preface is spent in reproof, and we may observe five things for which Bildad reproveth Job.

First, He reproveth him for wording it, or for talkativeness, at the beginning of the second verse; How long will it be ere you make an end of words.

Secondly, He reproveth him of inadvertency, and carelessness, in the middle of the second verse; Mark, &c. As if he had said; You have been heedless all this while, you have not well attended what we have been about; Mark, and afterwards we will speak.

Thirdly, He chargeth him with contemptuous thoughts, and an irreverent estimation of his friends: (vers. 3.) Wherefore are we counted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight? Thou hast not only numbred us with, but below the lowest of the people; Thou either lookest upon us as if we had forfeited our reason and were not men, or had lost our integrity, and so were the worst of men.

Fourthly, He chargeth him with fury and impatience in the beginning of the fourth verse; He teareth himself in his anger; As if he had said; As thou hast torn our reputation, so thy own peace; thou art uncivil to us, and a torture to thy self.

Fifthly, He chargeth him with insolency and boldness towards God himself in the latter part of the fourth verse; Shall the earth be forsaken for thee, and shall the rock be removed out of his place? What! must God work wonders, and turn the world upside down for your sake? Dost thou think thy self a man so extraordinary, that the ordinary providences and dispensations of God, will not serve thy turn? Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? &c. These are the steps of Bildad's angry address to Job; Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said.

Vers. 2. How long will it be ere you make an end of words? &c.

There is some variety of conjecture who is here intended, or to whom Bildad directs his speech.

For the original is plural, as if he were not speaking to a single person, but to a multitude; How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? And it is questioned upon that ground, whether Bildad spake to Job alone or no.

First, Some conceive, that Bildad's discourse aims at Job, in comfort with Eliphaz, who spake before, as if Bildad had been angry with them both; because Eliphaz and he holding out so long a dispute, had hindred him from unburdening his mind, and offering his opinion; How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? As if he had said, Will you two have all the talk, shall not I and my brother be suffered to speak our judgments? How long will it be? Thus he is supposed to grow angry, not only with Job, but with his friend.

Secondly, Others think that Bildad spake only to his friends and companions in that dispute, and not to Job at all; as if he had altogether disliked the course which they had taken for Job's conviction; How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? As if he had said; Ye have not hit the point, nor stated the question right, ye do but speak words all this while, ye are not yet upon the matter. Others make it out thus; Why do you wrong your selves so much, and disparage your wisdom to talk with such a man as this Job is? A man of so little reason, and of so much passion; a man so obdurate in and addicted to his own way; a man so high in and stiff to his own conceit: do ye not perceive that ye labor in vain, that your words perish into air, and leave no impression upon this hardned man? doth he not cast your counsels behind his back, and refuse all your advices? therefore be ye advised, give over, make an end of words. Which way soever we take it, whether Bildad speak to Job in consort with Eliphaz, or only to his friends, the heat of his spirit breaks out at his lips. And his own words proclaim, if not his pride, yet his impatience, while he saith, How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?

Miror de vestra imprudentia, quod cũ perspicuum sit, vos inventũ verba proferre & laterem lavare, huic homini duræ cervicis satisfacere conamini. Bold.

Hence Note, Long disputes kindle passions.

In those acts wherein reason should do all, passion would do most, and comonly doth too much; hence, instead of arguing we fall to inveighing, and for real convictions give personal provocations. Most are so immoderate in disputation, that they need a moderatour, as much to quiet their spirits, as to state their questions and opinions. Solomon tells us (*Prov.*27.17.) that, As Iron sharpeneth Iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend. When we whet one Iron upon another, the edge grows keen; thus a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend. The word that we translate countenance, signifies also anger, or passion, because anger quickly appears in the face or countenance. Hence some render the Proverb, As Iron sharpeneth Iron, so a man sharpeneth the anger of his friend. He stirs up his passion, till he grows as keen as a knife, yea as a razor: opposition sharpeneth the spirit, and some have been so sharpened by it, that they come to sharps indeed, and when they have long contended by words, have fallen to blows.

This carries a fair sence, yet I conceive that clearest, which restrains these words to the person of Job alone. But then the query will be why he speaks in the plural number, How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?

Some answer, Bildad speaks to Job in the plural number, for honours sake, and in reverence to his person. I find very little reason for that, considering he speaks of him at so low a rate all the Chapter over.

Honoris gratia. Cajet.

Secondly, One of the Ancients tells us, Bildad spake in the plural number, because he thought Job was possest with an evil spirit; That evil spirit in the Gospel, being asked his name, answered, It is Legion, for we are many. Had Job been possessed with an evil spirit, he might well have been spoken to as many: I am sure, as more then a Good many. But I pass that.

Pravo spiritu comitatus. Bed.

Thirdly, It is conceived that Bildad speaks plurally, because Job had his assistants, seconds, and abettors in that dispute, who did sometimes put in a word, and help him at a dead lift.

Fourthly, I conclude, that he speaks to Job alone, in a word of the plural number, according to the common and familiar usage or idiom of the Jewish Language, rather then from any special respect intended to his person, or the plurality of his Assistants; How long will it be ere you make an end of words?

Quod cum solo Jobo disputans illum appellet numero multitudinis potius ad familiarem linguæ Hebraeæ consuetudinem, quã ad illius honoris grave aliquod momentum referendum est. Pined.

The matter of this first clause, hath been opened upon those words of Zophar (Chap. 11. 2, 3.) Should not the multitude of words be answered? and should a man full of talk be justified? Where twas shewed, that words without matter, a very, empty discourses are very burdensom to an understanding ear: How long will it be ere you make an end of words? There is the first charge, talkativeness or unprofitableness in his speech.

His second charge is carelesness, and neglect of what his friends were about to speak, or had formerly spoken.

Mark, and afterwards we will speak.

Instruite ut postea loquamur quod an tu nobis loquendi formulas præscribis? nec quicquam recte dictum censebitur nisi tu id probaveris.

Some interpret it ironically, as calling for his direction, not as desiring his attention; Instruct us, and then we will speak. As if he should say, Yes, do, prescribe to us what we shall say, put matter into our heads, and words into our mouthes; you were best take upon you to be our Teacher, and Master, as if nothing could be right, but that which you direct. But the word which we translate to mark, doth not intend intend direction to others, but attention in our selves; and not so much the attention of the ear, as of the mind, and heart, when the soul as it were sits upon a business, with its whole strength, and puts out all its powers, to what it is about: Understand, or mark, and afterwards we will speak. Now as the former clause was interpreted, either in reference to the friends of Job, or to Job himself, so is this also.

בין significat propriè intrinsecus mente considerare, & animū certa dispositione intendere. Merc.

They who expound Bildad in the former part reproving his friends, give the sence thus: Mark, and afterwards we will speak. As if he had said; O my friends, cease to utter your thoughts inconsiderately, speak no longer what comes next, but mark; sit down, and consider what you have to say; let us mark, and afterwards we will speak. Thus he reproves their rashness, as not having attended their own design, nor the intendment of Job in his foregoing answers. Elihu's zeal breaks out into such Language both against Job and his three friends (Chap. 32. 3.) Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram: against Job was his wrath kindled, because he justified himself rather then God. Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled; because they had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job. Job's friends found many answers, yet Elihu saith, they had found no answer; their answers were not judicious, or convincing (as he conceived) they did not hit the thing of the controversie: Such answers are no answers, unless we answer to purpose, we answer not at all.

Quis sit disputationis cardo nō satis attenditis. Bold.

In which sense Caiphas reproves the assembly of the Pharisees (Joh. 11. 49.) when they sate in counsel against Christ; and took into consideration what was best to do with him, who had done so miracles; You know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient that one man should die, &c.

From this exposition (taking the Text as referring to all his friends,) Observe Deliberate consideration must go before speaking.

We should first mark, and afterward speak. Every word should stay a while in the heart before it come at the tongue. So, nature seems to dictate; who (as we see in the fabrick of the body,) hath seated the tongue, and the heart at a great distance, that so we might take time to mould our words in our thoughts, and meditate our selves before we advise others. And least the tongue, (as Naturalists also observe) should be too nimble at its work, it hath a double hedge, or wall, one of teeth, another of lips to keep it in. The Apostle James (Chap. 1. 19.) gives this counsel; Be swift to hear, and slow to speak. Some slowness of speaking is no impediment, but the ornament of speech. There is an uncomely slowness of speech, such as Moses complained of (Exod. 4. 10.) Some have hearts and heads full of rich and rare commodities, who yet want utterance. But it is not only a duty, but our commendation to have a copie of our words, fairly written in our hearts, before we utter them at our tongues.

Non intelligis O Job; hinc tuis responsionibus saltas extra chorum, aliud nanq; nos agimus, aliud tu respondet. Pined. Surdo fabulā narrare.

Again, As these words are applied to Job, Mark, and then we will speak: As if he had said; O Job, we are not at all understood, no, nor well attended by thee; now do thy part, and we will do ours.

Observe, It is in vain to speak till men hear and compose themselves to understand.

Who would speak to him that hath no ears, or to him that hath not an attentive ear? while we speak to such, we do but tell Stories to a deaf man. He that hath an ear, must have a heart in his ear, else he heareth not. Some sleep at the Word with their eyes open, they sleep with a kind of attention; though they hear all, yet they mark little, and do nothing of that which they have heard: Such, when the Sermon is ended, may tell you somewhat of their own waking dream, but they cannot tell you a word, to purpose, of the most working doctrine. The Apostle exhorts to attend after we have heard (Heb. 2. 1.) which shews a double attention: First, An attention while we hear; Secondly, an attention to what we have heard. It is in vain to speak, if there be not both these attentions. Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed, or to mark the things that we have heard. Now, if we must mark the things that we have heard, surely we must mark things as we hear them: if we miss the first, we can never reach the latter; if we do not mark as we hear, we cannot mark the things that we have heard, that is, consider, and enter into a due meditation of them. Marking is properly a work within; hearing is a work without. The Psalmist (Psal. 48. 13.) calls us to mark the Bulwarks of Zion: Tell the Towers thereof, mark ye well her Bulwarks. The phrase is very significant, put your hearts upon her bulwarks; so the Hebrew. Now as you are to mark the Towers, and Bulwarks of Zion, by putting your hearts upon her Bulwarks, that is, by considering how many defences God hath for Zion, and Jerusalem, how many wayes of protection he hath for his people; This is the putting of our hearts upon Zions Bulwarks. Thus we ought to put our hearts upon the word of God, the voice that sounds in Zion. This is our marking it. Every Minister may say to his hearers, as Bildad to Job, Mark, and then we will speak. Words exciting attention, are as profitable, as words giving instruction and exhortation. This is the second fault he chargeth Job with, An un-attentive spirit, to what was spoken.

The third is,

Vers. 3. Wherefore are we accounted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight?

Vulgari dicterio bestiā vocamus hominē stupidum. Drus.

Wherefore are we accounted as beasts?] Here Bildad chargeth him with evil speaking, and with pride, as if he had looked upon them as beasts, and that he only was the man. We proverbially call a man that is either very stupid, or very wicked, a beast. (Psal. 49. 21.) Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish. He that wants understanding, is (as a beast) ruled only by affections, and passions: Wherefore are we accounted as beasts?

The Hebrew is singular, Wherefore are we accounted a beast before thee? The word Behemah is here used, Why are we accounted a Behemah, or beast before thee? As if all we did make but one beast; or had neither reason in us to judge, nor abilty to speak, which two distinguish man from a beast.

But why doth Bildad tax Job with such uncomely language as this? did he ever call them beast? Job never spake thus directly, but he did oblickly and equivalently, while he bids them (Chap. 12. 7.) Ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee; The Master is above the Scholar, and he that teacheth, above him that is taught. Hence, while Job sends his friends to School to the beasts, he secretly taketh them as more ignorant then beasts. He seems to speak this out (Chap. 17. 4.) Thou hast hid their heart from understanding. And again (vers. 10.) But as for you all, do ye return, and come, for I have not found one wise man among you. A company which hath not a wise man among them, may go for beasts, and will hardly be kept from doing like beasts. From these or the like speeches, Bildad raiseth this charge; Wherefore are we accounted beasts before thee?

But though Job spake thus, yet he did it not with a reproaching spirit, but only (in heat of dispute) to shew how they were mistaken; And as for Bildad, who makes this harsh construction, he should have considered what words he had given, as well as what he had received; he should have been patient in taking just reprehensions, who had given those which were unjust.

Now in that Bildad is netled at this, and takes it so hainously, Wherefore are we accounted as beasts?

Observe, There is nothing that men can hardlier part with then their esteem; and that which sticks most with them, is to be undervalued in the esteem of their parts and gifts.

Some account it a kind of happiness, and are well contented to be undervalued in their outward estates, they make some advantage of that undervaluing; They had rather be, then be accounted rich; but few love to be undervalued in their inward state; and some had rather be accounted wise and learned, then take pains to be so. He especially that bears himself up upon the reputation of his parts, cannot bear it, to be reckoned for less then he casts up himself; he cannot endure to be low in the eyes of others, who is high in his own. And indeed to be undervalued is a very great tryal. Hence we see the infinite self-denial of our Lord Jesus Christ, who made himself of no reputation; who did not regard for how little he was reckoned; Though he was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God, yet he emptied himself, and appeared in the form of a servant.

Again, Had Job spoken with an intent to vilifie his friends, this charge had come justly against him.

Hence Observe, To undervalue others, and to put upon them terms of contempt, is not only uncomely but sinful.

Christ takes notice of this (Mat. 5.22.) as a great breach of the law of love; Whosoever shall say to his brother Racha, (that is, witless, brainless, empty-head; such a one Racha signifieth) he that thus vilifies his brother, shall be in danger of a Council; but he that saith thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

It is a great folly to affect the name of wise, and understanding; as Christ chargeth the Pharisees (Mat. 23. 8.) Be not called Rabbi, for one is your Master, even Christ, and ye are brethren. The Pharisees were ambitious of titles, and loved to be applauded and pointed at, as the only wise men, as the Oracles of the times. Now as it is a vanity to affect such an opinion of our selves: so it is sinful to asperse any man, or to blot him (undeservedly) out of the good opinion of others. And because we are apt to run into extreams, sometimes to account men as beasts, and sometimes to account them more then men, therefore Christ corrects that humour also (vers. 9.) Call no man father on earth: for one is your father in heaven. But must we esteem all men alike? Is it not under a command; Honour thy father, and thy mother. And is not this true, as of natural parents, so of civil? How then doth Christ say, Call no man father; seeing to call any man father, is but to give him honour, and we are obliged by the letter of the Law, to honour every man who is our father? The meaning then of this prohibition, Call no man father, is, give no man power over your judgments or consciences, such as the father hath over the person of his child. The Apostle dehorts Saints (Ephes. 4.) Be not as children carried about with every wind of doctrine. A child is apt to receive every impression, or to think this or that so, because his father saith it: the reason and Authority of a father, will carry and sway a child which way he pleaseth. In that sence, Call no man father, honour no man so much, be not slaves to the opinions of others. As among the Papists, Friers are to their superiours or fathers; to question whose commands is a high presumption, to ask a reason, curiosity, to disobey breach of vow: their words must stand for a law, their opinions for Oracles; thus call no man father. Now as we must take heed of that extream, not to call men fathers, as if we were to live upon their authority: so take heed (on the other side) of slighting men, of accounting men beasts, of undervaluing them, and trampling them underfeet, both are equally to be avoided; give every man his due; neither have the persons of men (as Jude speaks, vers. 16.) in admiration, by reason of advantage; neither have the person of any man in contempt, that may be, both to your own, and to his disadvantage. Wherefore are we accounted as beasts before thee?

And reputed vile in your sight.

The word which we translate vile, hath a double signification, according to a twofold root, whence it may be derived. Some derive it from a root which signifieth to shut up, to close, to hide, to obscure a thing. And hence some of the ancient Rabbins, as also late Hebricians, render this part of the verse, not why are we reputed vile in your sight? but, why are we shut up in your sight? The meaning is, why are we reputed as men whose understandings are locked up, and whose minds are closed; as if a cover were put upon them, or as if we were hood-winckt? So it suites well with the former clause; Why are we accounted as beasts? and, why are we reputed as men whose understandings are shut up? They whose understandings are either shut up, or departed from them, may without any great disparagement be numbred among beasts. This also answers what Job spake of his friends (Chap. 17.4.) Thou hast hid their hearts from understanding, therefore shalt thou not exalt them.

There is a state, or sort of men, whose hearts are looked up, and hid. The Apostle affirms it of the Jews in general, When Moses is read, to this day there is a vail before their eyes. That is, upon their hearts, their hearts are shut up. And so Christ (Mat. 13.15.) describes them, from the Prophet Isaiah; The peoples heart is waxen gross, and their ears dull of hearing, and their eyes (that is, the eyes of their understanding) have they closed. The character of a natural man is thus given by the Apostle (Ephes. 4. 18.) Having their understanding darkned, or blinded. This is a good sense here; Wherefore are we reputed as men, whose understandings are darkned, and whose minds are blocked up?

But rather secondly, the word Tama, signifies defiled, unclean, or impure; Grammarians tell us, that from the Hebrew word Tama, the Latines have the word Tamino, which is used only in composition contamino, to defile, or pollute. And the word signifies, not any kind of defilement, or filthiness, but that which is most sordid, and excrementitious, most vile, and foul; as appears from the ceremonial Law, Levit. 15.2.

Some conceive that Job carries on the sense of this with the former clause; We are accounted as beasts, and reputed unclean before thee: That is, as unclean beasts, and that under a twofold notion. Either first, as beasts that lie in their dung, and filth, as Swine, and stalled Oxen, &c. Or Secondly, as beasts legally unclean; in the Ceremonial Law, beasts are divided into clean and unclean: some were clean, and they were for sacrifice; others were unclean, and they might not be offered in sacrifice. Taking the text under this interpretation, it carries the greatest diminution, of the credit, and goodness of his friends, as if he had reckoned them, not only among, but below many beasts. But I suppose we need not tie up the sence to the exactness of that allusion, Bildad's scope being only to complain of Job's unfriendly censure of him, and his friends, as if they had been not only ignorant in matters of doctrine, as beasts, but also sinful and unholy in matters of practise, as the worst of men; Wherefore are we reputed vile in your sight?

Now seeing the same word signifies polluted and vile too.

Observe, Every thing and person, which is defiled and polluted with sin, is also vile.

Baseness hath pollution in it, either moral or natural: He is not vile, who is low in birth, or low in estate; but in Scripture-stile, the vile person is the wicked person, the person polluted with sin. (Psal. 15.4.) In whose eyes a vile person is contemned. This vile person is not the poor man, but the wicked man. In which sense the Prophet Daniel foretels (Dan. 11.21.) That there shall stand up in his state a vile person. This vile person was a man in honour, a great King, who is there called vile, because he was a wicked King, a persecutor of the people of God: wickedness obscures all our greatness; nothing makes us truly honourable but grace; and nothing makes us truly vile but sin: what sin doth, that it is; if sin make a person vile, then sin in it self is most vile. We are usually more troubled at the effects, then at the nature of sin: but we should chiefly look to the nature of things. Sin it self is so vile, that whatsoever is vile, is but enough to be the shadow of it; it doth not reallize the vileness of it.

As grace is so excellent that all the excellencies in the creature are gathered together to shadow out what that is, (Ezek. 16.) I cloathed thee with broidered work, and shod thee with badgers skins, and decked thee with fine linnen, and I covered thee with silk, I decked thee also with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thine hands, and a chain on thy neck. And I put a Jewel on thy forehead, and earings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head. Here's a collection of the most excellent, and precious things in the world. And what are these? the shadows only of that grace which the Lord puts upon his people, when he hath taken them into covenant with himself: (vers. 8.) Then was the time of love, and I sware to thee, and entred into covenant with thee, saith the Lord, and thou becamest mine. Gold, and precious stones, shadow the state of the Church of Christ in the purest times, when abundance of grace and spirit shall be powred out, Rev. 21. On the other side, when the holy Ghost would shew what sin is, all the filthiness in the world is scraped and thrown together to do it: while the Prophet describes the state of a man in nature, he is compared to an infant in blood, and pollution, unwashed, unbound up. (Ezek. 16.4.) The Apostle gives us a like character of

of a natural man, (*Rom.*3.13.) His throat is an open ſepulchre: That which ſtreams out of his heart by his tongue and voice, is nothing but rottenneſs, and an unſavoury ſtench, even as out of a ſepulchre. The Prophet Ezekiel (*Chap.*22.18.) compares that people in their wickedneſs to droſs; Son of Man, the houſe of Iſrael is become to me droſs; all they are Braſs, and Tin, and Iron, and Lead in the midſt of the furnace; they are even the droſs of ſilver, or reprobate ſilver, Jer. 6.28. And which is worſe then this, the ſame Prophet (*Ezek.*24.10,11.) compares their corruptions to the ſcum of a pot; Heap up wood, and ſet it empty upon the coals thereof, that the braſs of it may be hot, and may burn, and the filthineſs of it may be molten in it, and the ſcum of it may be conſumed. Scum is the filthineſs of the pot; ſin is the filthineſs of the heart and life.

Verſ. 4. He teareth himſelf in his anger, &c.

O rapiens animam tuã. Heb. O tu, heus tu, qui teipſum præ ira dilanias feræ more. Merc. Jobum accuſat nõ tãtum iracundiæ, ſed etiã rabidi furoris. Tenetur à proximis & rogatur ut ipſe ſibi placetur, nã ſua labia mordet, caput quaſſat, veſtimẽta ſcindit & ſe in columnas impingit. Sen.

The Hebrew may be rendred by an exclamation, O thou who teareſt thy ſelf, or, O thou tearer of thy ſelf in anger, ſhall thé earth be forſaken for thee? So Pſal. 113.7. He raiſeth up the poor out of the duſt, or, O thou that raiſeſt up the poor out of the duſt! Read a like conſtruction in the Propheſie of Obad. verſ. 3. We render, He teareth himſelf. The word ſignifieth to tear after the manner of wild beaſts, to tear as a Lyon tears. Thus Bildad conceived Job enraged againſt himſelf, as a beaſt; anger having maſtered his underſtanding, and paſſion over-ſet his reaſon. He teareth himſelf. The Moraliſt deſcribes an angry man forcibly held by his friends, and they begging of him to be kind to himſelf; he bites his own lips, he rends his cloaths, and daſheth himſelf againſt the pillars; yet all anger is not thus angry: There are divers ſorts of anger.

Firſt, There is an anger with our ſelves, which is good and commendable; here Bildad rebukes Job for ſelf-anger; and therefore he ſuppoſed Job's ſelf-anger was not good. We are oftenеſt out, while we are angry with others, but we may ſoon be out while we are angry with our ſelves. Self-anger is good, when we are angry with our ſelves, either becauſe we have done that which is ill, or have not done ſo much good, or good not ſo well as we might. The Apoſtle numbers this among the effects of that Godly ſorrow which works repentance unto ſalvation, not to be repented of: Indignation and revenge are both the births of anger; both theſe are numbred among the effects of Godly ſorrow, 2 *Cor.*7.11. Indignation againſt others is ſeldom without ſin; and revenge, in our own cauſe upon others, is ever ſinful; Theſe are to be repented of, and therefore they cannot be the effects of true repentance. 'Twas then indignation and revenge upon themſelves, becauſe they had done evil, which the Apoſtle obſerved and commended as good in thoſe Corinthians.

Secondly, There is an anger with others, which is alſo good. It is a duty to be angry, when we ſee others act againſt or depart from their duty; He hath no zeal for God, who, on this ground, cannot be angry with man. And while the anger of man waxes hot, purely, upon this account, the Spirit of God is the fire which boils it up. We are angry for Gods ſake, when we are angry becauſe God is diſhonoured. This is a grave, ſerious, a vertuous, and a holy anger; while the Apoſtle gives a reſtriction to ſome anger (*Epheſ.*4.26.) he gives not only a permiſſion, but a command for this.

Thirdly, There is a pettiſh, or fooliſh anger; when we are angry with we know not what, and angry we know not why, angry with thoſe things which cannot intend us hurt; ſome are angry with the ſtone they ſtumble at, with the rain that wets them, with the wind that blows upon them; if they be not humor'd, they are angred. Jonas was angry when he ſaw a gourd withered, and a great City not deſtroyed.

Fourthly, There is a ridiculous cowardly anger, like that of a whelp, or cur, who barks, but runs away. As ſome are more afraid then hurt, ſo others are ſo much afraid, that you need not fear they will do you any hurt. Their anger is but a bluſter, and evaporates into words.

Fifthly, There is a ſlow, wrathful, revengeful anger; an anger which is ſteeped in malice; a ſevere tough anger; an anger, the coals whereof are raked up in the aſhes of a ſeeming forgetfulneſs, but with an intendment to break out into a conſuming flame. Such was that of Eſau againſt his brother Jacob, when he ſaid, The dayes of mourning for my father will come ſhortly, and then will I ſlay my brother. Father and brother ſhould have had but one funeral, if the reſolves of his revengeful ſpirit had not lain croſs to the counſel of God.

Sixthly, There is a vehement paſſionate furious anger, a raging anger, both towards others and our ſelves; with which Bildad here chargeth Job, He teareth himſelf in his anger.

This anger, though in a reaſonable creature, yet is unreaſonable; it knows no bounds, nor doth it keep any. Grammarians ſay, that ira the Latine word for anger, comes from ire, which ſignifies to go, and they give the reaſon, becauſe a man in anger goes out of himſelf, out of his wits, off from his reaſon; and when a man is pacified, and the ſtorm down, he doth redire ad ſe, return again to himſelf. Such anger is a ſhort madneſs, and madneſs is but a long anger. They who are fulleſt of reaſon, are furtheſt from this anger, and moſt diſpleaſed with themſelves for it, if at any time it appear upon them. Yet anger may be improved to excellent ſervices, not only as it warms the ſpirit to reſiſt that which is evil, but as it carries us on to good againſt reſiſtance; in which ſenſe one of the Ancients tells us, that as reaſon ought to be the Chariot-driver in man, and hold the reins; ſo the two horſes, that ſhould draw on the Chariot of man in all his actions, are the concupiſcible, and the iraſcible appetites; Theſe two as they are qualified, modified, and kept under the reins of reaſon, are of continual uſe, otherwiſe they break all, and our ſelves too; as here it is ſaid of Job, He teareth himſelf in his anger. Of this anger Note;

Zanch. in Eph. 4.

Plutar. hus.

Furious anger may hurt others, but it hurts our ſelves moſt.

None are more their own enemies then angry perſons are; Doſt thou well to be angry? ſaid God to Jonah; ſaith he, I do well to be angry even unto death, Jonah 4.9. He means it not only of being angry till he dyed, but of dying for anger. That muſt needs be hurtful, yea mortal to man, which carries in it a reſiſtance againſt the immortal God. Some anger is not only a grief for what is upon us, but a kind of ſtomacking at him who lays it upon us; if we do not confeſs it to be ſo, the Spirit of God knows it to be ſo, and tells us plainly it is ſo; and therefore ſuch anger cannot but hurt and tear our ſelves.

For the avoiding of this tearing, vexing anger, take theſe brief counſels.

Firſt, In provocations, have an eye upward; This will baſaſt the ſpirit, and make it ſteady; Heaven is above all ſtorms and tempeſts, and the more we converſe there, the leſs ſtormy are our hearts. David had provocation enough to make him angry, and boil up his paſſion to the height (2 Sam. 16.5.) Shimei curſed him, but he looked up, God hath ſaid to him curſe David; and then how calm, and meek was his ſpirit? As that is a good anger which is for Gods ſake, ſo, looking up to God will keep us from evil anger.

Secondly, Turn anger upon your ſelves; not to tear your ſelves (as Job is ſuppoſed here) but to conſider and reprove your ſelves: The more any man is acquainted with himſelf, the leſs angry will he be with others. A true ſight of our ſelves, ſhews us ſo much cauſe to be diſpleaſed with our ſelves, that we ſhall have little leiſure and leſs cauſe to be angry with our brethren. He that looks much into himſelf, will ſee ſo much to do, and to blame at home, that he will not find much to blame abroad, eſpecially he will not do it with paſſionate anger. Anger alwayes riſeth from ſome over-valuing of our ſelves; we think our ſelves ill dealt with, or dealt with below our worth when we are angry. Now he that knows himſelf fully, can ſcarcely think himſelf undervalued by any; he hath lower thoughts of himſelf, then other can have of him: There are not many receits for the cure of anger, better or more approved then this.

Thirdly, Correct your anger before you imploy your anger; do with this paſſion as Phyſitians do with their drugs; ſome drugs which are healthful for the body, excellent to purge and diſpel noxious humours; muſt yet before they are uſed, be corrected and receive ſome allay; you may poiſon the body with them elſe, and deſtroy it rather then repair its decayes: So in this caſe, your anger will tear, and undo you, unleſs you correct it, and take off the sharpness and virulency of it. And as you do with your horses, especially with stomackful horses; we first bridle and saddle them, and then ride them, else we cannot have them under command: Thus we must deal with anger; it is necessary to be angry sometimes; and he is a fool that cannot be angry at all; only get this wisdom, to bridle and saddle anger before you use it; lest it carry you away, and hurry you without any command.

Fourthly, Let not your anger hang upon your spirits, or continue with you: That's the Apostles advice, Ephes. 4.27. Let not the Sun go down upon your wrath. It is ill being in the dark with so bad a companion; Anger may pass through the heart of a wise man, but, Solomon saith, It rests in the bosom of fools. It is lawful to do some things, which to continue doing is unlawful; we cannot continue the actings of faith and love too long; But that Spirit which saith, Be stedfast in faith, let brotherly love continue; never said, be stedfast in anger, or let contendings among brethren continue. Anger against sin and enmity against the seed of the Serpent must continue, but the continuance of anger against any other, whether things or persons is sinful.

Fifthly, If you will avoid this anger, avoid the occasions of it. They that are subject to passion, should keep out of the way of passion. That King did wisely who when curious glasses were presented to him, broke them himself: And gave this reason, lest another breaking them it should provoke him to anger. 'Tis also very memorable, That when Cæsar had gotten the Cabinet of Pompey his implacable enemy into his possession, he would not look over his papers, because he would not discover that which might stir his passion, chusing rather to burn them, then to be burnt by them. 'Tis wisdom not to search into that which being found may over-ballance our wisdom.

Sixthly, Give a candid interpretation, both of words and actions; The glass through which we look, gives its colour to the object. Anger is usually blown up by misconstructions. What we judge ill meant, is always ill taken; Love thinks no ill, and therefore believes and hopes that all is well. Give that which troubles thee another name; if there be a mistake in it, yet say, it is thy friends infirmity, or that he did it out of ignorance; if what he spake pincheth, say it proceeded from familiarity, or freeness of spirit.

Seventhly, Give not an easie ear to reports; do not always hear what others say of thee, or what 'tis said they do. Many tear themselves with anger, when they hear themselves torn with slander; and while they have a curiosity to hear what others say of them, they want patience to bear what they hear. 'Tis better we should be in the dark concerning our own wrongs, then that we should wrong our selves by that passion which the light we get about them stirs up in us.

He teareth himself in his anger.

But was this justly charged on Job?

I conceive that his friend, (as in other passages, so here) sinned against the Law of Love, while he charged Job with so much anger. It is hard to distinguish trouble of spirit, from passion and distemper of spirit. Yet the testimony of God himself concerning Job, assures us that he was a meek man, a very mirrour of patience; which will not consist with this accusation in the hight and heat of it. And though it cannot be denied, that Job discovered some passion and impatience, in these conflicts, yet all put together, did not amount to this total sum; He teareth himself in his anger; much less to that unquietness and dissatisfaction, with which Bildad presseth him further in the latter part of the verse;

Hic loquendi modus hyperbolicus pro re impossibili usitatus est in omni lingua: qui tales expectat, in cœlo quærit pisces, in mari stellas; in Italia Tanaim, in Scythia Sanctos.

Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? and shall the rock be removed out of his place?

Here Bildad taxeth Job with pride, as before with anger, or rather with an angry pride; Shall the earth be forsaken for thee?

The words are proverbial, and in their general sence are appliable to any thing which is very hard, or to man impossible to be done. Such expressions are usual in all Languages. As when 'tis said, you may as well look for fish in the air, or for stars in the Sea, as to see this thing done. So here, this which thou desirest, is as likely to come to pass, as that all men will shortly remove from off the face of the earth, and that the rocks will move.

More particularly, some understand it thus; Doest thou think thy self such, or so great a man, that if thou die; and be taken out of the world, mankind shall die with thee, or that the earth shall be forsaken when thou leavest it? The Septuagint renders; What, if thou die, shall all under heaven want Inhabitants? Art thou the Atlas of the world? doest thou bear up the fabrick of it? must all things run to desolation, unless thou doest order and uphold them? why makest thou such a stir about thy afflictions, and thy death? Is there no man fit to dwell in this house, when once thou art turned out of doors? Job gave his friend such a sarcastical check (Chap. 12.2.) No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you. Here Bildad payes him in his own coyn, Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? &c. Thus he rebukes his pride, as if (according to this interpretation) Job had thought that the safety of the whole world were wrapped up in his: Or as if some prodigious changes must needs follow his change. Bildad was grown somewhat warm, and checks Job's supposed hight of spirit, with too much of his own. Shall the earth be forsaken?

Quid enim si tu mortuus fueris inhabitabilis erit quæ sub cœlo. Sept. Ita de tua morte & vita loqueris, ac si mortalium omnium salus & interitus ex te penderet. Pined. Nō sine fastu videtur Bildad Jobi fastum velle proculcare, at excandescerat. Parap.

And shall the rock be removed?] No such matter; how high so ever thy thoughts of thy self are, or how necessary so ever thou conceivest thy self to be, to the standing and continuance of the world. Yet know, the world shall continue when thou fallest, yea there shall not be the least stop observable in the whole course of nature, when thou hast paid thy debt to nature. Not only shall not the rocks be removed, but not a hillock, not a pebble-stone shall be taken out of its place, though thou be took and hurled out of thine. Indeed the world is indebted to Jesus Christ for its consistence, the earth had been forsaken, had it not been for him, and the rock had been removed out of his place. But the best and wisest of men may be spared, and no great hurt done.

Exponitur per Lyptotē, ubi minus dicitur quā intelligitur. Millies moriaris, num propter hoc mūdi cursus turbabitur? imo nec aut monticulus à vel calculus loco suo dimovebitur. Bold.

Secondly, For the clearing of this obscure passage, we are to recal to mind, that the state of the controversie between Job and his friends, was about the providence of God, and the dispensations of Justice; his friends said that good men receive good at the hand of God, and evil men evil. Hence they had all along charged Job for a wicked man, for an hypocrite; because he suffered such things. Now for as much as they asserted, that God laid evil upon evil men, and withal observed that Job was so impatient under his sufferings, tearing himself in anger, as if he had suffered unjustly; therefore Bildad speaks thus; Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? or, shall the rock be removed out of his place. That is, dost thou expect that God for thy sake should change that course which he hath setled as firmly as the rocks, or as the earth? Dost thou think to make God alter the method, either of his justice, or of his providence? thou mayest as well hope to turn the motion of the Sun, that the earth shall be forsaken, and the rocks removed out of their place, as to expect this. Friend! do not you think either to justle or dispute God out of his way. Hence Hæc sententia, quòd adversitates acciaunt pro peccatis firma est, sicut terra & rupes, nūquid ergo poterit removari propter tuas disputationes. Aquin. Per rupem deus est intelligendus quē immutabilem dicit instar immoti Saxi neque cōmovendum à loco judicii. Rab. Dav. Bildad se suosq; amicos rupes nominat, firmitur perstantes in sua opinione.

Thirdly, Some interpret the last clause of God himself, who had determined to chastise the sinfulness of Job; Shall the rock be removed out of his place? i. e. Shall God? God is often called a rock in Scripture, a rock is the Emblem of stedfastness. Dost thou think to remove God who is stedfast as a rock? or to put him besides his purpose by thy crying out of oppression, or crying up thine own innocency. For shame give over.

Fourthly, Others, by the rock interpret Job's friends, or the opinion which his friends held. As if he had said; The opinion which we hold concerning the punishment of wicked men, is as strong upon our spirits, and as much setled there, as the rock is in his place, and therefore thou shalt move us from our opinion, when thou hast removed a rock, which is numbred among things impossible, or extreamly difficult. All these interpretations center in one common sence: implying that the Lord having appointed wicked men to punishment, will no more change this appointment, then he will remove the rocks, or alter the whole state of things here upon earth. And Bildad seems to intimate that it is more unreasonable to divert the course of Justice, or to let the wicked go unpunished, then it is miraculous to overthrow the whole course of nature. Shall the earth be forsaken ken for thee? or shall the rock be removed out of his place? Hence we may learn this general truth, that God will not alter his counsels, nor the course of his providence for any mans sake whatsoever.

You may as soon say, he will alter the whole frame of heaven and earth, or that he will remove the rocks out of their place, as he will do it: the course of justice is as firmly setled as the course of nature is. It was indeed a mistake in Job's friends, to think because God hath setled a course of justice, that therefore he would never change the form of justice; for though all the ways of God are just, and he will do justice unto all; though we may (as the Prophet is charged peremptorily) say to the righteous, it shall be well with him, and wo to the wicked; yet he varies the manner, the means, the times, and seasons of executing justice, as seemeth best unto himself. The justice of God shall stand though the rocks remove, and the earth be totally forsaken; yet take heed of saying that justice hath forsaken the earth, or is removed, because we see it not acting in its wonted state and outward equipage. That which the Lord speaks to shew the unmovable setledness of his mercy, is as true in reference to the setledness of his justice, (Jer. 31.35, 36.) Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the Sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the Moon, and of the Stars, for a light by night; which divideth the Sea when the waves thereof roar; The Lord of hosts is his name. What follows? If those ordinances depart from before me, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a Nation before me for ever. As if he had said, when I change the ordinances of heaven, of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, then will I take my mercy from Israel; I will never do the one, therefore I will not do the other. The Lord promised at the renewing of the Covenant with man, Gen. 8. ult. That day and night, summer and winter, should not cease while the earth remained. Now saith the Lord, if you can make me to alter the course of the heavens, of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, then I may do this against my people. We have the like assurance given, Jer. 33.25. Where the Lord from that consideration of the setledness of the frame of nature, argueth the setledness of his own Covenant of grace, and promise of mercy to his people. Thus also we may argue, in reference to his justice, that you shall as soon get the stars blotted out of heaven, the rocks removed, the earth forsaken, as God will forsake the right distributions of justice towards man. It was said of a man, and he but a Heathen; That the Sun might as easily be stayed, or turned aside, as he from doing right. How much more is this true of the righteous God, with whom there is no shadow of turning? And though we cannot say to any man, as Job's friends to him; If God punish you not sooner or later here in this world, he must alter the whole course of his judiciary administrations; yet we may say to many, if God save you eternally, he must alter the whole course of his merciful administrations; he must make a new Gospel, yea a new Christ, if you attain eternal Salvation. For by the rules of the present Gospel, and by the way which Christ hath already manifested to save sinners, you cannot be saved, how much soever you presume of salvation: Shall the Gospel be forsaken for you, or shall the promise be removed out of its place, which as it is more immovable then a rock in helping those that turn to God and believe, (Isa. 54.10.) So it will move no more then a rock towards the help of those who still turn from God, and continue in unbelief. Shall the rock be removed out of his place? Thus much of the preface. Bildad hath spoken to the person, and reproved him; he now speaks to his cause.

VERS. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.

Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine.
The light shall be dark in his Tabernacle, and his candle shall be put out with him.
The steps of his strength shall be straitned, and his own counsel shall cast him down.
For he is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare.
The grin shall take him by the heel, and the robber shall prevail against him.
The snare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.

THE miserable condition of a wicked man is laid forth in this Chapter.

First, Allegorically.

Secondly, Plainly.

By way of Allegory to the seventh verse; and in plain expressions to the end of the Chapter. Here are four Allegories.

The first from light, vers. 5, 6.

The second from hunting and fowling, vers. 7, 8, 9, 10.

The third from Law-proceedings, or the manner of Process in Courts of Justice, vers. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

The last Allegory is taken from Husbandry, vers. 16.

The fifth and sixth verses contain the first Allegory; Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out. The Vulgar reads it interrogatively; Shall not the light of the wicked be put out? But the Original is absolute; The light of the wicked shall be put out. Nonne lux impii extinguetur? Vulg.

The first word hath an Emphasis in it; Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out. Yea, imports a vehement affirmation, carrying what is affirmed against all opposition (Gam) yea, it shall be thus (saith he) which specially reacheth two things. גם Gam, particula firmitèr corroborat prius dicta.

First, How much soever thou art angry with us for saying it, yet it shall be thus. Be thou as angry as thou wilt, thou shalt not help thy self: thou mayest entangle thy self more, but thou shalt not at all loosen thy self. A man that hath a burthen upon his back, cannot ease himself by striving and strugling with it; but the more he struggles, the more he is troubled.

Secondly, This yea, may bear respect to the exaltation of wicked men, to the height of their prosperity: yea, let them have gotten as high as they will, down they shall, as the Prophet Isaiah speaks of Lucifer, (Chap. 14.13.) Thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my Throne above the stars of God, yet thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit. The higher we build in our own thoughts without God, the lower is our fall, and the more unavoidable. Thou shalt be brought down. Or take the Allegory in the Text, how much light soever the wicked man hath, though he seem to have as much as the Sun, though he seem a fountain of light, yet out he shall, he shall be put out like a candle. Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out.

Here are four expressions about one thing; First, The light of the wicked shall be put out; Secondly, The spark of his fire shall not shine: Thirdly, The light shall be dark in his Tabernacle: Fourthly, His candle shall be put out with him: We are not curiously to insist upon distinctions, to find out the difference between light and a spark, between light and a candle, &c. Though a difference there be; yet I conceive the speaker did not so much intend that, but heaps up a great many words of a near alliance, or of one signification, the more to ratifie his assertion, that the thing should certainly be done. A wicked man shall be extinct, put him under what notion you will; let him have light, or spark, or candle, he shall go out in darkness.

But what is this light?

There are three sorts of light; First, Moral; Secondly, Spiritual; Thirdly, Civil Light.

Moral Light, is the light of wisdom, prudence, and understanding. And thus some of the elder learned Rabbins, and later Hebricians too interpret this Text. As if he had said, the wicked man shall be made a very fool, destitute of wit, reason, understanding, and ability to judge, or know what evil is upon him, or what is good for him: The spirit of counsel shall be taken from him. That's a sore judgment.

Secondly, There is spiritual light; and that is double. The light of the knowledge of God; and the light of comfort from God. The knowledge we receive from God is light. And the joy we receive from God is light. Some interpret the place of this spiritual light; Though a wicked man, an hypocrite hath a great measure of this light, yet his light shall be put out; as Christ threatens Mat. 13.12. & 25.29. To him that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance, abundance, but from him that hath not, shall be taken away, even that which he seemed to have. That light of knowledge, with which hypocrites seemed to shine, shall be taken away from them. Many hypocrites are irradiated with much light, and have great flashes or flushes of joy and comfort; these shall be taken away, their light shall be put out; yea their sparks shall die, they shall be left in utter darkness: though they compass themselves about with sparks of their own kindling, as the Prophet speaks, Isa. 50.10,11. Though this be a truth, yet (I conceive) it is not the thing that Bildad intended. But we are rather to take it for,

Lucis nominibus significatur quicquid lucet in oculis quicquid splendet in fortuna, &c. Merc.

Thirdly, A Civil-light, that is, the light of outward prosperity. And so these words are a gradation, teaching us, that not only whatsoever a carnal man reckons his greatest splendor, but what he calls his smallest ray of temporal blessedness, shall be wrapt up in darkness and obscurity. Outward prosperity, may be called light upon a threefold consideration.

First, Because as light refresheth and cheareth the spirits, (there is a terrour in darkness, and when light comes, we are freed from that terrour;) So doth outward prosperity, and the presence of worldly accommodations.

Secondly, Light helps us on in our work; no man can work, till he have either the natural light of the Sun, and fire, or some artificial light. Prosperity and peace carry us on in our worldly affairs. A man who hath much light of knowledge about him how to work, may yet have so much darkness of affliction about him, that he cannot work or move in the most prosper sphere of his Activity.

Thirdly, Light makes us conspicuous; we are seen what we are in the light. Thus outward prosperity makes men appear. Poverty is joyned with obscurity. What parts, or gifts, or abilities, or worth soever is in a man, he is scarce ever seen above-board, if he be under the straights of poverty and affliction. The light of the wicked shall be put out. I have heretofore spoken of the prosperity, and also of the decay of wicked men; therefore I shall not insist upon it here. Note, only first, That, cum רעץ sit activum & quodamodo intransitivum, recte dicere possis, lux impii extinguet se.

The glory of wicked men, their excellency, their light shall certainly come to nothing.

They shall be quenched as a fire of thorns (Psal. 118. 12.) which any man may suddenly quench, and if no man will, it will suddenly quench it self. Yet further. The word which we translate to put out, is active, or intransitive; so some render it here; The light of the wicked shall put it self out.

Hence Note, A wicked man is usually the cause of his own ruine.

He puts himself out: sometimes he makes his own tongue to fall upon himself (Psal. 64 8.) his tongue undoes him, and he is buried under a heap, or pressed to death under the weight of his own words. Sometimes his own strength undoes him; sometimes his wit and parts undo him; His great learning and abilities, prove his ruine; He dies as a fool dies, because he thought himself wiser then any living. The prosperity of the wicked is not like the light of the Sun, but like that of a candle, which consumes it self; and that, not only naturally, as all worldly things do, which will perish with the using, how warily soever we use them; but violently by their vain and unwary using of it. In this the justice of God is eminent upon wicked men: There was scarce a wicked man in the world ever extinguished, but he hath contributed, not only meritoriously (for so all wicked men are wholly the cause of it) but instrumentally to his own extinction: The wicked man is (felo de se) a murtherer, a destroyer, an extinguisher of himself: If all men should forbear him, or resolve to let him stand, yet he would work out his own downfal here, as well as he doth his own damnation for ever.

Again, The spark of his fire shall not shine.

'Tis the same thing; yet here is a progress in the sence: Besides Sun-light, there is fire-light, and candle-light. But if a man hath neither Sun-light, nor fire-light, nor candle light, then he is in darkness indeed. If he have no fire burning, yet possibly he may have a few coals, or sparks of fire: Wherefore to note the utter extinction of a wicked man, he shall not have so much as a spark of fire; The spark of his fire shall not shine.

Ex i'lo igne] fœlicitatis nõ relinquetur scintilla, neq; mica splendoris; extinguetur omnino.

It is a great abatement to be brought from Sun-light, to fire-light; For as the Apostle speaks in another case, (1 Cor. 15.) There is one Glory of the Sun, another of the Moon, and another of the Stars; and one Star differeth from another in glory. So we may say, there is one light of the Sun, another of the fire, another of the candle, and one candle differs from another in glory. Here is the Sun-light put out, and the fire-light, and the very spark of fire. So that the threatned destruction, or extinction of a wicked man shall be total, every spark of it shall expire. The rich man (Luke 16.) was destitute of all good, when he had not so much as a drop of water to cool his tongue. He that begged a drop, had not a drop. Now, as he that hath not a drop of water, is under the greatest drought: so he that hath not a spark of fire, is under the greatest cold or darkness: And as the Prophet speaks (Isa. 30.14.) to shew an utter destruction, under another notion about breaking a vessel; Because you have trusted in oppression and perverseness, therefore this iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall, swelling out in a high wall, whose breaking cometh suddenly at an instant. And he shall break it like the breaking of the Potters vessel that is broken in pieces, he shall not spare; so that there shall not be found in the bursting of it, a sheard to take fire from the hearth, or to take water withal out of the pit. I note it for that, He shall break the vessel; and so break it, that there shall not be so much as a sheard to take fire from the hearth, or a little water from the pit. When a vessel is so broken, that there remains not a sheard for any use, it is totally broken. What the sheard is to the vessel, that is a spark to the fire; the vessel is totally broken, when there is not a sheard left; and the fire is totally extinct, when there is not a spark left. So this carries not only some extinction of the wicked mans light, but the utter extinction of the least light of a wicked man.

Again, Consider the difference between these two, light and fire. Fire is proper to the house and family: lights shines abroad every where; which imports, that as the renown, fame, and glory, with which the wicked man shines to the world, shall be extinguished: So his fire, and his spark, that is, his family-glory and lustre shall be taken away; he shall be destroyed in his publick capacity, and in his private capacity; his glory abroad, and his glory at home; the Sun, with which he shines in the sphere of this publick employment, and the fire, with which he is warmed in the hearth of his private relations and enjoyments, shall be utterly extinguished.

He hath not yet done.

The light shall be dark in his Tabernacle.

Tum ipse, tũ ipsius domus ex illo splendore in densissimas miseriarũ tenebras incidet. Bez.

He had said before, His light shall be put out; why doth he say here, His light shall be dark? This seems less then he spake before.

I answer, no; here is still an increase of the sence. To say, his light shall be dark, is more then to say, his light shall be put out; As was shewed Chap. 10. 22. upon those words; where Job describes the darkness of the grave in pureft strains of Eloquence, and having said, vers. 21. It is the land of darkness, and the shadow of death, a land of darkness, as darkness it self, and of the shadow of death, without any order: He concludes, and where the light is as darkness. But some may say; If it be a place of darkness, as darkness it self, how can there be any light there? Why doth he say, the light there is as darkness, when he had said, there is nothing but darkness there? It is to shew, (as that place to which I refer was opened) that the grave is so dark, that even that which hath an appearance of light is darkness. Not only is the darkness dark; but the very light is darkness. Thus here, not only is the light of a wicked man put out, but the light of his Tabernacle (if there be any thing left there, that bears any imaginable likeness to it) shall be dark, or more like to darkness. Hence we may Note; That,

God will make the very prosperity of a wicked man an affliction to him.

His light shall go out, even to a spark; and if a spark of light remain, that shall be but darkness. He shall never enjoy good, if any good remain for him to enjoy. Though after great sufferings he may have some ease, yet that shall be

be a pain to him. As it is the priviledge of the Saints, that their darkneſs is light, their ſorrows joyful, their wants a fulneſs; ſo it is the curſe of the wicked, that their light is darkneſs, their joyes ſorrowful, and their ſinfulneſs a want. We may here remember that Argument of our Saviour, which I have formerly made uſe of (Matth. 6. 23.) If that which is appointed to comfort a man turn to his ſorrow, how great is his ſorrow? So that here is a peremptory excluſion of all that is, or can be refreſhing to a wicked man; his light is darkneſs to him; and his very bleſſings a curſe to him.

Laſtly, His Candle ſhall be put out with him.

The Candle gives an inferiour light; the Candle is a family, a houſhold light: When the Sun goes down, Candles go up; but when this mans Sun goes down, he ſhall not have the help of a Candle, as not the help of fire. Now he that hath neither the Sun to ſhine on him, nor the Fire to warm him, nor a Candle to ſtand by him, what a condition is he in? Which ſtill aggravates the affliction of a wicked man. Some refer it to that cuſtom of the Ancients, who ſet up many Candles, or Lights, when they made Banquets in the night. So, His Candle ſhall go out, is, he ſhall never make Feaſt more, nor have merry meeting with Friends more. But I rather take it in general, for all the uſes of Candles, not for that ſpecial uſe of Candles, Torches, or Lamps in great night Feaſts, when their multitude of blazes ſeemed to turn night into day, and to make darkneſs light. Taking Candle in the loweſt ſence, His Candle ſhall be put out with him, is, he ſhall not have ſo much as a ſingle Candle, not the ſmalleſt Candle, not ſo much as a Ruſh light left him. And this we find once and again in Scripture to expreſs the ſaddeſt calamity of a people (Jer. 25. 10.) when the Prophet deſcribes the deſtruction that ſhould come upon Jeruſalem; Moreover (ſaith he) I will take from them the voice of mirth, and gladneſs. And what more? The voice of the Bridegroom, and of the Bride; the ſound of a Milſtone, and the light of a Candle: That is, I will remove all their comforts; when the loweſt means of comfort (bread and candle-light) are removed, then all comfort is removed. So (Revel. 18. 23.) the deſtruction of Babylon is deſcribed; The voice of Harpers, and Muſitians, and Pipers, and Trumpetters, ſhall be heard no more at all in thee, and no Craftſman, of whatſoever Craft he be, ſhall be found any more in thee; and the ſound of a Milſtone ſhall be heard no more at all in thee, and the light of a Candle ſhall ſhine no more at all in thee: That is, Thou ſhalt be utterly overthrown, and ruined; where there is not ſo much as the light of a Candle found, what of mercy can be found? (Revel. 22. 5.) When the holy Ghoſt would expreſs a ſtate which ſhall need no creature-comfort, he ſaith, There ſhall be no night there, and they need no Candle, neither the light of the Sun: The Sun is the light of the day; and the Candle is the light of the night. Now as the full proſperity of a people is ſet out, when they ſhall have ſo much light, ſo much ſpiritual or glorious light, that they ſhall not need the Sun, nor the Candle: So the total ruine of Nations, or perſons, is ſet forth when they have neither Sun-light, nor Candle-light. Prov. 30. 13. The light of the righteous rejoyceth; but the lamp of the wicked ſhall be put out.

Illuſtrē cum tota meis convivia flammis Totque gerā mixos una lucerna vocor. Mart. l. 14. Ep. 41.

Antiquitus ante novas nuptas, lampades & tada accenſa præferri ſolebant.

Some interpret Candle and Light by Children or Poſterity; ſo they ſignifie (1 Kings 11. 36.) where God being about at once to puniſh, and to ſpare, ſaith to Jeroboam, I will take the Kingdom out of his Sons hand, and I will give it unto thee, even ten Tribes. And unto his Son will I give one Tribe, that David my Servant may have a light alway before me in Jeruſalem. We put in the Margin according to the letter of the Hebrew, That David my Servant may have a Lamp, or a Candle: That is, ſome of his Poſterity remaining and ruling in Jeruſalem; his line ſhall not be extinct. The Woman of Tekoa calls her Son, her Coal (2 Sam. 14. 7.) So they ſhould quench my Coal which is left, and ſhall not leave to my Husband neither name nor remainder upon the earth.

If we take in this Scriptural ſence of the Light and Candle in the Text, it enforms us yet more fully, that when a wicked man is extinguiſhed, all that is his ſhall be entinguiſhed; he, and his Wealth; he, and his Honour; he, and his Children; he ſhall periſh, and his Candle with him; his name ſhall be blotted out, and there ſhall be no memorial of him.

Laſtly, A Candle goes out two wayes, either when the matter is ſpent, and the fuel which it works upon conſumed. Thus every mans Candle goes out, his Candle waſtes; waſtes it ſelf while it ſhines on him. Secondly, A Candle goes out by violence, when it is blown out: So we muſt underſtand the Text; The wicked mans Candle ſhall not be left to conſume, and wear it ſelf out; he, and his; he, and his publick light; he, and his family-light; he, and his poſterity light ſhall be put out before they are waſted out. This Bildad reckoned as the portion of Job; and it is the portion of every wicked man; 'tis that which is due to him, that which he deſerves, though he doth not alwayes receive preſent pay according to his deſerts.

So much of the firſt Allegory, by which Bildad illuſtrates the dark condition of a wicked man, his light, the ſpark of his fire, and his candle are put out.

The Context of the four Verſes following, ſhew the miſery of wicked men, under a ſecond Allegory, of hunting and fowling; where we have to do with nets and ſnares, with a grin, and with a trap; all which are implements and engines belonging to Fowlers and Hunters, with which beaſts and birds are enſnared and taken.

The miſery of the wicked man is here ſet down two wayes.

Firſt, In general; The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened.

Secondly, We have the ſpecial wayes how this ſhall be brought to paſs.

Firſt, He ſhall bring himſelf into a ſnare, as is ſhewed in the latter end of the ſeventh Verſe, and in the eighth; His own counſel ſhall caſt him down; he ſhall be caſt into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a ſnare. The man runs into it alone; if there be none to drive him into the net, he will haſten into it; if no man ſet ſnares for him, he will ſet a ſnare for himſelf; he muſt be catcht. That's the firſt way, how his ſteps come to be ſtraitened, he himſelf ſtraitens them by his own counſels.

Secondly, If this wicked man ſhould not go into the ſnare, yet he ſhall ſoon be brought into it (Verſ. 9. & 10.) The grin ſhall take him by the heel, and the robbers ſhall prevail againſt him. The ſnare is laid for him by others, many are contriving the methods of his deſtruction; there are traps ſet in his way, and he cannot eſcape. So that either he ſhall do it himſelf, or if he do not, others ſhall. That's the ſum of this Context.

Verſe 7. The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened, &c.

This ſhews the judgment in general; all Beaſts and Birds taken in nets, or ſnares, are brought into a ſtrait; The ſteps of his ſtrength. By [ſteps] we are to underſtand his motions, his actions, his undertakings; whatſoever helps him towards his deſired end.

Impii greſſus ſunt actiones operæ deſideriâ & omnia quibus ad optatum finem contendebat.

And theſe are not ordinary ſteps, but the ſteps of his ſtrength; that is, his ſtrongeſt ſteps. Mr Broughton reads, His violent paſſages ſhall be ſtraitened: Steps of ſtrength, for ſtrong ſteps, is an Hebraiſm very frequent. And theſe ſteps of ſtrength may be,

Firſt, The ſtrength of his mind, and wit, there lyes much ſtrength within; man orders and layes his deſigns by the ſtrength of his underſtanding.

Secondly, The ſtrength of his authority; for therein a mans ſtrength lyes too; let ſuch a man have never ſo much civil power, he ſhall yet be ſtraitened.

Thirdly, The ſtrength of his body, or of his hand; the ſteps of his outward ſtrength as well as of his inward, and authoritative ſtrength, ſhall be ſtraitened.

Fourthly, A man ſets ſteps of ſtrength, or adds ſtrength to his ſteps, by his friends and relations, by his alliance and confederates, by the helps and aids, by the ſeconds and aſſiſtants which he hath abroad in the World. Every ſtep which ſome men ſet, is upheld from without, they go not alone. We may underſtand the Text in any of, or in all theſe wayes. The ſteps of ſtrength, or the ſtrongeſt ſteps which he ſets by the ſtrength of his underſtanding, or by the ſtrength of his authority, or by the ſtrength of his body, or by the ſtrength of his friends, and relations, the ſteps of all theſe ſtrengths ſhall be ſtraitened.

Further,

אוֹן Significat potentiam illam quæ conjuncta esse solet cum dolore, quem quis peccando sibi vel alii infert. Bold.

Further, The original word signifies not ordinary strength, or strength in general; but that strength which is usually accompanied with trouble, and with that trouble which flows from, or is the issue of sin; a painful strength. For as many have painful weaknesses upon them; so some have painful strength. And hence also the Hebrew word signifies riches, or power, which are unjustly gotten, and as unjustly kept. This kind of strength, is strength with a pain; when a man gets and maintains what he hath gotten by sin. And there are none who have had so much pain with weaknesses, as some in all Ages have had with strength. The steps of his strength shall be straitened.

Straitened] To be straitened in common Scripture-phrase, signifies only to be afflicted; Mr. Broughton renders it by the word distressed; His violent passages are distressed. And hence Christ (Luke 12. 50.) speaks of his sufferings, or of the pre-apprehensions of his sufferings, what effects they had upon him; I have a Baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened, till it be accomplished. Did not John baptize Christ in Jordan some years before? What was this Baptism?

There is a threefold Baptism: First, The Baptism of water: Secondly, The Baptism of the Spirit: Both these Baptisms Christ had been baptized with: He was plentifully baptized with the Spirit, and he had been baptized with water in Jordan. But there is a third Baptism, that is, the Baptism of Blood, or the Baptism of suffering, and that is it which Christ spake of there; he had not yet been so baptized, drenched, or washed in blood, in his own blood, as he was soon after in the Garden, and upon the Cross. This was the Baptism that he was to be baptized with: And, saith he, How am I straitened? That is, How is my soul afflicted at the approaches and appearances of it? How am I besieged with it? For to that the metaphor may allude. The same word is used (Luke 19. 43.) where Christ foretells the destruction of Jerusalem; Thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee (they who are thus kept in are straitened) in on every side. It may refer also to the shutting up of a beast in a pound, or to a woman in travel, who when her pains take hold upon her, how sore are her straits? All shews how great a stress, and distress was upon the soul of Jesus Christ, because he had then such a baptism to be baptized with.

So then, to be straitened is to be afflicted. Outward afflictions are straits, either upon the body, or estate; and the very foresight of these put many to inward straits.

And hence (on the other side) to be enlarged, signifies prosperity, or a good estate. We have David so expressing himself (Psal. 31. 8.) Thou hast set my feet in a large room. Again (Psal. 66. 12.) We have gone through fire and water; but thou hast brought us forth into a wealthy place; which some translate, into a roomthy place: That is, into much prosperity. Solomon (Prov. 4. 11, 12.) gives us a negative to this in Job, When thou goest thy steps shall not be straitened: That is, Thou shalt not be afflicted, or thou shalt not come into any trouble. When Isaac's servants had digged a first and a second Well, the Herdsmen of Gerar contended about it, saying, The water is ours. Then his servants digged a third Well, and for that they strove not; therefore he called the name of it Rehoboth, that is, room; for now, said he, the Lord hath made room for us (Gen. 26. 22.) We may say of all our comforts, and mercies, Rehoboth, here is room; but of all our afflictions they are straits. So that, The steps of his strength shall be straitened, is neither more nor less then this; he shall be brought into trouble.

Hence Observe, First, Who is it that is threatened with these straits? It is the sinner, the wicked man here spoken of, he is the subject of the whole Chapter: Then learn, Sin brings into straits.

There are none brought into such straits, as they who walk in the broad way. If you would be at liberty, keep in the narrow way, and walk, as they who are bound. None are freer from bondage then the Servants of God (indeed none are at all free but they) yet none are more bound then they. As for those who would have more room for their steps, then the Commandments of God afford, they shall have but little room for themselves. They will be found sooner or later in the stocks, or in the net, in the snare, or in the grin, who walk loosely. Sin brings us into a two-fold strait.

First, Into straits of mind; a man shall not know what to do, who doth he cares not what. Thousands have run themselves into these straits, who had room enough in the World; they walked which way they would, they washed their footsteps in Butter, and the Rock poured them out Rivers of Oyl; yet how have their poor souls been straitened by turning aside after vanity.

Secondly, Sin straitens the outward man, the body is brought into prison, into deaths, and dangers. For one who is brought into straits for his Conscience, there are hundreds who are brought into straits by acting against Conscience. Some are brought into straits for doing their duty; but most for doing against duty: With whom are Prisons peopled, are they not with those who break their bounds? Who are generally in the straits of poverty, while they walk abroad, are they not such as walk disorderly? 'Tis sin which usually cloatheth a man with rags, and (though some are fed by it) which snatcheth the bread out of his mouth: Who are they that are brought into the straits of a shameful death, and fall under the strokes of Justice? Are they not such as transgress the rules of Justice, and practically oppose Government?

I grant there is a strait into which some are brought by the closeness of their walking with God, yea, by the enlargedness of their hearts towards God. Paul was in such a strait (Phil. 1. 23.) Then a man is in a strait when he knows not what to chuse; I am in a strait between two; Why? I know not which to chuse, whether to live or dye: It was the height of his grace which put him into this strait: But O the straits that men are brought into by the lowness and baseness of their spirits, their wickedness entangles them in such straits, that they know not how to live, and yet are altogether unfit to dye.

Further, The providence of God hath cast many into straits too. Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 20. 12.) was brought into a great strait when he said, Lord, we know not what to do, but our eyes are towards thee. When wicked men bring themselves into straits, they either despair of help, or their eyes are towards the creature for it. But when God brings his own people into straits, their eyes are towards him for help. The providence of God brought Jehoshaphat into those straits; and the providence of God brought him out of them, and gave him not only enlargement, but renown and glory: God can quickly recompence us for all the evils which he layes upon us, but sin cannot. Sin can wound, but it cannot heal; it casts into straits, but it cannot enlarge,

And sin brings not only wicked men, but even good men to straits, even to great straits. What was it that brought David into that condition (2 Sam. 24. 14.) when he said, I am in a great strait? Was it not his sin? When he would needs be numbring the people, and pride himself in the multitude of that Nation which he governed, and commanded; this humbled him into a grievous strait. And what was his strait? It was a hard election that God put him upon, whether he would chuse Pestilence, or Famine, or Sword; one of those three he must; such a liberty of chusing is a sad restraint. Our wills are then bound, when they have a freedom to make such a choice. Thus David was hampered, when he went beyond his line. Sin will bring Saints to straits, much more will it bring wicked men to straits.

God sometimes brings his own people to straits when they sin, that he may keep them from further sins: (Hos. 2. 6.) I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall (that is, I will bring thee to straits) that thou shalt not find a path. God brought them into the straits of affliction, that they might not wander into straits by transgression. It is better to be straitened with a hedge of Gods making, then with a hedge of our own making. The care of God makes a hedge to keep us from sin. Our sin makes a hedge (not as the efficient, but as the procuring cause) to curb our carelessness. The Word of God is one hedge, his Rods are another. It is best to be kept within bounds by the former; but 'tis well if the latter keep us in. The steps of his strength shall be straitened.

Secondly,

Secondly, Note, Wicked men shall be straitened when they are in their strength, and judge themselves furthest off from straits.

To have said he shall be straitened when he is weak, when he is low, and poor, had not been much: but here he speaks of God, acting like God, against wicked men; when they are in their strength, and flourish, and verdure, and greenness, then they shall wither; when they think they have most room, and are at greatest liberty, both in their estates and spirits, then they shall find themselves shut up (as it were) in prison. There is a Text (Job 20.22.) which is very clear to this sence, I will but name it here, because it will come shortly to a fuller handling, where Zophar speaking of the Hypocrite, saith, In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits; that's an amazing expression. Here he saith, The steps of his strength shall be straitened; that's very much: but there, In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits. See the difference between the Saints and wicked men; between upright-hearted godly men, and wicked false-hearted Hypocrites. Paul saith (in a higher sence, 2 Cor. 12.) When I am weak, then am I strong. But when a wicked man is strong, then he is weak; and when he walks at large, then he is in straits; that is, weakness surprises him in his strength; and straits attend his greatest enlargements. The steps of his strength shall be straitened.

Thirdly, Note briefly this, There is no strength of the creature that can protect it from the wrath, or from the judgment of God.

Let him step as strongly as he will, if he be against God, God can straiten him quickly: As he saith of Sennacherib, I will put my hook in his nose (2 Kings 19.28.) He thinks himself a Leviathan, Who (as he is described Chap. 41.27.) esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood, darts are counted as stubble, he laugheth at the shaking of the spear. One would think then that there is no putting of a hook into the nose of this mighty Monster, no drawing him up with an Angle; yet the Lord will put a hook in the nose of Leviathan, and pull him up with a single hair, as if he were but a Sprat: The Leviathans, the Elephants, the Lyons, are as nothing before Jehovah. Can thine heart endure? or can thine hands be strong in the dayes that I shall deal with thee? saith the Lord to Jerusalem (Ezek. 22. 14.) No, they cannot. For then the Dukes of Edom shall be amazed, the mighty men of Moab trembling shall take hold upon them, &c. Exod. 15. 15. Hannah concludes in her Song (1 Sam. 2.) By strength no man shall prevail; man cannot prevail over other men by strength, much less shall man deliver himself by strength from the hand of God. How great soever the single or united strength of the creature is, if it be strength against God, a strength acting against the design of God for his people; fear not, the steps of that strength shall be straitened. It is no matter what the strength of any creature is, if the strong God be with us, he can quickly straiten it, The steps of his strength shall be straitened.

And his own counsels shall cast him down.

There are two things by which man supports himself, two pillars, like the two pillars spoken of in Solomon's Temple, Jachin and Boaz, which signified, He shall establish and strength. There are two pillars, of Nations and Persons; First, Power; Secondly, Policy or Counsel. Counsel is as much a mans strength as his strength is. Now that it might appear, that a wicked man shall have all his props pulled away, and all his pillars thrown down: As 'twas shewed in the former part of the Verse, that his strength shall not help him, so here, 'tis shewed that his craft and counsel shall not. And this is spoken not barely, but with an aggravation: For first, That his counsel shall not help him, is bad enough; but His counsel shall cast him down, and that is far worse: Secondly, It had been a sore affliction to have said of his counsel, as he said of his strength, it shall be straitened, or overthrown, but he saith that which is far more afflictive, his counsel shall overthrow him, His counsels shall cast him down. Thirdly, It had been a great judgment to have said, his counsel shall be cast down; but it is a far greater to say, His counsel shall cast him down. There is no difficulty in these words; therefore I will but give you two or three Notes upon them.

First learn, The vanity of all helps without God.

Strength cannot prevail, and counsel shall not. Gods counsel cannot be thrown down, and therefore it will hold us up from falling. But that counsel (and such is the best of mens) which may be thrown down it self, can never keep us from falling. As riches profit not in the day of wrath (Prov. 11.4.) so wisdom and wit shall not prevail in the day of wrath. Though you could give counsels as deep as Hell, yet they cannot protect you from a Hell of troubles here, or a Hell of torment after. There is no trusting to any thing without God, if these two pillars be pulled away, strength and counsel, upon what basis shall a man establish himself.

Again, Here is not only shewed the inability of counsels to support a man; but here is shewed the activity of counsels against a man, his counsels shall cast him down.

Hence Observe, God turns the counsels and projects of wicked men upon their own heads, or against themselves.

This shews the extream vanity of humane policy, as separated from holy Policy, or from the Wisdom which is from above; seeing it is not only unable to help us, but it doth us hurt. As that which shews the extream wickedness of mans heart by nature, is this, that it is not only unable to do good; but it is vehemently active against good, and sets it self against the whole Law of God, and would overthow it, or cast it down. Nature doth not only pull her hand from the work of God, but puts out her hand to resist it. So that which shews the extream vanity of the counsels of men is this, that they are not only weak to help them, but strong to ruine them. The Psalmist tells us (Psal. 64. 8.) God shall shoot at them with his Arrow suddenly, so they shall make their own tongues to fall upon themselves; all they that see them shall flee away: (A Text formerly toucht at, yet consider it again) How doth a mans tongue fall upon himself? Or if it doth, what hurt is there in that? What weight is in a mans tongue? It is a little piece of flesh, there is not a bone in it; and I am sure it can break no bones where it falls. The tongue is here taken tropically for words spoken, or counsels given by the tongue. So that when he saith, Their tongues shall fall, his meaning is, their counsels shall fall upon themselves, and be their fall. It is an old Adage, Evil counsel is worst to the counsellor. It may do hurt to those against whom it is given; but it shall certainly do them hurt by whom it is given: (Psal. 7. 15.) He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made; his mischief shall return upon his own head. The making of a pit, is only the laying of plots, or the setting of designs to do mischief; these shall be most mischievous to the designers. (Psal. 9. 17.) The Lord is known by the judgment which he executes: That is, It appears God hath done it, he doth it so exactly: Why? He gives instance in the latter end of the Verse, The wicked is snared in the work of his own hands: That is, His own counsels shall cast him down. (Prov. 26. 27.) Who so diggeth a pit, shall fall therein; and he that rolleth a stone, it shall return upon him. Doth every man fall into the pit that he digs? Is every man bruised with the stone that he rolls? No; There may be just cause to dig pits. The meaning is, he that digs a pit to catch others. But shall every one that digs a pit to catch others, fall into it? I think not so neither. We may as lawfully dig pits, that is, set counsels to take some men, as we may dig pits to take wild Beasts, Foxes and Wolves, or any hurtful Creature that would annoy mankind. But the wicked man, who digs a pit for the innocent, who prepares mischief for those that have done him no wrong, shall fall into the pit himself. And he that rolls a stone: That is, He that would roul a stone upon a just man (for you may roul a stone upon a wicked man, and bring the wheel over him; but he that rouls a stone, or that moves every stone to bring some evil upon a righteous person, this man) shall feel the stone returning upon him; that is, his own counsel shall cast him down.

Consilium malum consultori pessimum.

Some of the Ancients have observed from the phrase of

had built a house, or had a house built) other hands had pluckt it down over her head, but it is far greater misery when a woman shall be so foolish as to pluck the house down upon her own head; this is the judgment that God leaves many worldly wise men and Polititians to, that when they have plotted a great while to pull the house upon the heads of others, it falls upon their own heads; and when they have prepared snares, set their nets, and are waiting to catch their prey, they are ensnared, and their own feet cast themselves into the net.

שבב significat quicquid in modum retis perplexum & implicatum est.

And he walketh upon a snare.

That's the second Branch: Mr. Broughton renders, He walketh upon the platted grin. The sence is near the same with the first, and therefore I shall but touch it. The former word noted a more violent and sudden action, He is cast; here, He walketh: Walking is an ordinary pace, and implyes an ordinary course of life. Now when it is said, He walks upon a snare, it shews, that as (in the former clause) a wicked man often falls suddenly and violently into danger; so his whole life is a life of danger; the wicked man lives, but he lives miserably, he lives in the midst of a snare. Some interpret this as a proverbial speech; To walk upon a snare, is like that of walking upon burning coals, or upon fire, both are proverbial, for extremity of danger.

Est proverbiale periculi, sicut ambulare super prunas. Drus.

Hence Observe, That an ungodly man is oft-times secure, but never safe.

Is he safe that walks on snares? whose ordinary course is upon the borders of death? Such is the walk, and the way of an ungodly man; while he would avoid, he falls into the pit; when he thinks himself most sure, then is he nearest confusion; He walks upon a snare. Indeed, every thing that a wicked man hath, or that he sets himself about, is a snare unto him.

First, His Table is a snare; when he comes to his Table, and there finds comfortable provision, the fat and the sweet upon it, then he rejoyceth in his portion, and saith, Soul take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry; yet the curse overtakes him there, His Table is made a snare, and that which should be for his good, is to him an occasion of falling (Psal. 69. 22.) It is a sore evil, when there is no bread upon the Table; but when a Table full of bread is a snare and a famine to us, that is far worse.

Secondly, His riches are a snare to him: That which a rich man counts his strong Tower, becomes his strong Prison. (1 Tim. 6. 9.) They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare (his riches are a snare, a greater snare then poverty) and into many foolish hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.

Thirdly, His wit, parts, and learning, are a snare, for which he is so much admired in the World; O he is a very witty man, a wise man, a man of a deep reach, a notable head-piece, what a nimble, what an eloquent tongue hath he? See how gracefully he expresses himself; yet all this is a snare; it had been better for him if he had been a fool, or dumb, then to have had all that wit, those great abilities, considering how he hath imployed them. A carnal man presumes to ensnare all the World with his wit and words, and these are often a snare for others, but chiefly for himself.

Fourthly, All his Relations, his Wife, Children, Friends, all the comforts that he hath in the World are snares to him.

Fifthly, Religion, so far as he professeth it (a wicked man may make profession of Religion (I say) his very Religion) is a snare: Religion as the World bears, and as many conceive, the notation of it, hath its name (a religando) from binding; Religion is a bond, it should be a bond to all men, but it is a snare to wicked men; it should be a bond to tye them fast to God, to tye them to duties, to tye and hold them in the way of holiness; but it is only a snare bond to wicked men; their outward profession causeth them to flatter themselves in their inward corruption, and they take to themselves by so much the more liberty in evil, by how much they give up themselves the more to a kind of bondage in doing good.

Sixthly, and lastly, Which is more then all, Christ is a snare to a wicked man; when he hath Christ in his mouth, when he talks of Christ, he doth but walk upon a snare. If the Son make us free, we are free indeed; but none are more really in bondage, then they who are but seemingly freed by the Son. To those that believe, Christ is precious; but to the unbelievers and disobedient, he is a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, that they may stumble and fall, and be broken (1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.) What a woful condition are such in, who not only cast themselves into a net, into troubles and vexations, but whose highest injoyments, temporal and spiritual, their profession of Religion, yea, their pretensions to Christ himself, are a continual walking upon a snare.

Bildad proceeds yet further in the explication of this Allegory.

Verse 9. The grin shall take him by the heel; and the robber shall prevail against him.

We saw the wicked man catcht in his own snare before; now here is a snare laid for him: His overthrow is discovered two wayes in this ninth Verse.

First, A secret evil is set for him; The grin shall take him by the heel.

Secondly, Open violence shall ruine him; And the robber shall prevail against him.

The grin shall take him.] The word signifies not only to take, but to hold that which is taken, and to hold it so as not to let it go, to hold it firm and strongly, to keep in safe custody. As the Spouse speaks of Christ (Cant. 3. 4.) I caught him, and I would not let him go. It is this word; now as the soul putting forth faith upon Christ, doth not only take him and lay hold upon him, but layes hold so, as not to let him go, sticking close, and cleaving to him. Strong faith doth this, such as her faith was when she said, I caught him, and held him, and would not let him go: so evil doth not only take, but hold the wicked fast, so fast, that it will not let them go; that's the meaning of the word.

The grin shall take him by the heel.] Before he spake of a net, and of a snare, now of a grin. Here are all sorts of hunting, and fowling instruments heaped together for the compleating and furnishing of this Allegory. Here we have the grin.

The Original root signifies to blow or puff with the breath; so the word is us'd (Prov. 29. 8.) Scornful men bring a City into a snare; so we translate; it is the word which is here translated grin; and we put in the Margin of our Bibles opposite to those words, Bring a City into a snare, or, Set a City on fire; because proud scornful men will not give over contentious speaking, till they blow the spark into a flame, and so set a whole City, yea, Kingdom on fire; or as some render it, till they blow it up, as a House or Tower is blown up by the violence of Gun-powder. That City and State is indeed brought into a snare, which is thus blown up or set on fire by the unquiet breathings and vexings of scornful men.

Exsufflant urbem.

The word also signifies to whistle softly, because Fowlers and Hunters use to draw the prey into the danger of the grin by a kind of soft musical whistle. And indeed every man is brought into the grin or snare by a whistle; that is, by some enticing fallacious voice, tempting him to sin. And hence the same word signifies both.

Sibilo utuntur Aucupes.

The grin shall take him by the heel.] The heel is taken four wayes in Scripture.

First, For the whole body; as in the third of Genesis, and the sixteenth verse, Thou shalt bruise his heel: The Serpent bruised the whole body of Christ, or (as some understand the heel in that Text) the whole humanity of Christ, which is but as the heel to his divinity: The divine nature being far more excellent then the humane, which alone suffered. For though he suffered who had two natures, yet but one did suffer.

Secondly, The heel is taken properly and strictly for the lowest part of the body; Jacob took his Brother by the heel (Gen. 25. 26.) Thus here. For a grin is usually set to catch by the heel, not by the head, or other members of the body.

Thirdly, The heel is put tropically for the actions and motions of this life, (Psal. 49. 5.) Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the iniquities of my [heel] shall compass me about? That is, When my sin, or failings in what what I have done, come to my remembrance, or are chastened upon me; every mans heel hath some iniquity. As we shall have some dirt cleaving to our heels while we walk in a dirty world; so there is some dirt, some defilement, upon all our actions, which we may call, The iniquity of our heel.

Fourthly, In a tropical sence, the heel signifies the latter part of a mans life, or old age; so some will needs understand it here; as if the sence were thus, Though the wicked man prosper a great while, the first, the fore-part of his life, yet towards the heel of his life, that is, the latter end of his life, before he come to his grave, he shall be catcht, some mischief shall fall upon him, or he shall fall into mischief; he may prosper a great while, but the grin shall catch him by the heel, it will have him towards the end of his life. But I pass that.

And the Robber shall prevail against him.] Mr. Broughton reads it, The Savage shall lay hold on him: The word which we translate Robber, signifies any wild barbarous sort of men, who live out of rule and order; properly a man that lets his hair grow disorderly, because Robbers and violent persons use to let their hair grow so, either to disguise themselves, or terrifie others. Some by the Robber, understand the poor; others, his rich Creditors; we, in pursuance of the Allegory, may call the Robber the Hunter, or the Wood-man, who sets the grin, and layes the snare, this man, this cunning Hunter prevails against him. When the Hunter hath set his grin for the Bird or Beast, as soon as they are caught, he comes in and prevails upon them. The grin doth not kill, but hold fast till the Hunter comes. The grin shall take him by the heel, and the Hunter, or Robber, shall prevail over him. So we translate the word (Job 5. 5.)

Constringens prævalet ei horridus: nimirum venator sive auceps. Jun.

Further, the word signifies also a thirsty one; hence the Vulgar translates in the abstract, Thirst shall prevail, or wax hot upon him, putting the abstract for the concrete, thirst for the thirsty one, Thirst shall prevail against him; which is thus explained, The wicked man is caught by the grin or toyl, and there he vexeth himself till he is weary and thirsty; as Beasts that are caught in a toyl, vex themselves, and labour till they pant and breath for life, and are very thirsty: Thus the wicked man shall be caught in a grin, wherewith striving to get loose, he becomes the more troubled: It comes near the same sence in general, which soever of these we take, namely, that the wicked man, as he runs into the snare, so there he shall perish; he shall be held fast till the Hunter makes an end of him, and he that sets the snare destroyes him. Which falls in with the former interpretation, that the Lord in justice against wicked men, orders both the grin to catch, and the Hunter, or Robber, to prevail.

Exardescet contra eum sitis. Vulg.

Verse 10. The snare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.

Here are two words of a different root; for though we translate snare, as in the former Verse, yet the Original varies; our language is not copious enough for the Hebrew in this particular. The word which here we translate a snare, signifies properly a cord, or rope, and it comes very near in sound to our English word, Cable, which is a great rope, because ropes and cords straiten and hold fast as a snare doth. The word is metaphorically applyed to cruel Creditors, who will be sure to tye their Debtors fast as with a cord, that they shall not get loose: It signifies also a pledge, or an earnest; because that tyes us to performance.

חבל Funis à stringendo seu ligando.

The other word which we translate a trap, is derived from a root which signifies to catch, to snap suddenly; The trap is laid in the way; that's another engine by which hurtful Creatures are taken by Hunters. Here are variety of expressions, all tending to the same thing. Read the like congregating of these words, Psal. 140. 5. Isa. 24. 17, 18.

מלברח à capiendo לכד enim capere denotat. Omnia quæ ad rete pertinent hic cõgeruntur, & per elegantem expositionem eadem fere res pluribus sententiis amplificatur. Pined.

The trap is laid for him in the way.] That is, it is set cunningly, closely, and secretly, it is hid for him; so some translate.

And how is it hid?

It is a hidden trap two wayes.

First, By the cunning skill of him that layes it: He layes it with care; and that it may not be discovered, he covers it with leaves, or shadows it with boughs.

Secondly, It may be said to be hidden in reference to their blindness who are taken with it: To a blind man all dangers are hidden dangers; they are laid close though they be laid open; especially when there is a Judiciary blindness upon men; that is, when God blinds them on purpose that they may fall into the net and the snare. Solomon tells us, (Prov. 1. 17.) In vain is the net spread in the sight of any Bird; therefore snares and traps are laid in secret; for, In vain is the net spread in the sight of any Bird. Which may be taken two wayes.

First, We may refer the word, in vain, to the Bird; as if he had said, It will not help the Bird, or cause the Bird to withdraw from the danger, though the net be spread in his very sight. The Bird is so hungry after the Corn strowed by the net, that though you lay the net in his sight, yet it is in vain, the Bird will come and venture for the Corn: We may exemplifie it thus, That when men are given up to any lust, it is in vain that the net is spread in their very eye; though they see the danger of sin, and be told of it; though it be said, if you go there, you perish; if you go in such a way, you will be damn'd and undone; though the net be laid in their very eye, yet it is in vain, for they see the bait, and they must go forwards, pleasure and profit, upon which lust is set, carries them on against all counsel and perswasion. Thus it is in vain to such silly birds, they get no good by it, they will not be warned, though the net be spread in their very eye, (Isa. 26. 11.) Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see it: So it is in this case, these fools will not see what they do see; they are so blinded with somewhat that sin promiseth, that though they be told of the danger, they will not take notice of the danger. When man is departed from God, who is light, he sees no danger, no evil, though he see it. He hath no spiritual, yea, no rational sight of that, of which he cannot but have a sensitive sight. He falls into the snare which he sees, yet (which aggravates his misery) he knows not that he is fallen.

But rather secondly, In vain is the net spread in the sight of any Fowl: That is, It is in vain for the Fowler; for if the Bird see the net, he will hardly come into it; therefore it is that Fowlers make it a great part of their art to keep the net and snare secret. And Solomon intimates, that if any man hearing of the danger, withdraw not, he is more a fool then a Bird, for he will not come into a seen danger. Who can pity those who are taken in a trap which they saw, and yet would not avoid: They who perish upon these terms, seem to be in love with perishing. The trap is laid for him in the way.

From all laid together, the net, the snare, the grin, the trap, and the snare a second time, all prepared for the wicked man, Observe, First, Wicked men are catcht at unawares.

A trap, a snare, a net, note surprisal: These are like Stratagems or Ambuskadoes in war. It is one thing to meet an enemy in the open field, and it is another thing to lye in ambush and use stratagems to take him. Snares take unawares. Solomon (Eccles. 9. 12.) speaks of the misery of man, Man knows not his time: as the Fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the Birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them; the snare takes suddenly, it gives no warning, there is no prevention, no fence against it.

Secondly, Observe, Wicked men are usually taken when their hopes are highest, when they think themselves in the very enjoyment of their own desires, and the possession of the good they have a long time look't for, then God takes them away, and destroyes them.

The ground of this Observation is, because snares, grins, and traps are baited with meat or some thing that is pleasing to the Creature: To be catcht in a trap, is to be catcht with a pleasant morsel. The Bird looks to be well fed, else he would not be ensnared; he seeks for meat where he finds a trap. As the table of some wicked men becomes their snare; so many run into a snare while they they think they are coming to a full and well-furnished table. Hence it is, that when wicked men are neareſt their hopes, then good men may be furtheſt from fears; for their hopes, or the things that they hope for, are but as baits to entice them into a snare; they are catching at the bait, and think nothing of the snare. When they shall say, peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them (1 Thes. 5. 3.) Upon the wicked he shall rain snares (Psal. 11. 6.) When it rains we expect plenty, the Clouds usually drop fatness. The wicked mans cloud drops leanness, and rains a shower of snares upon his head. Thus when men are lifted up with hopes of great worldly enjoyments, when they say the day is their own, they are but running into the net, and the grin will catch them. True Scripture-hopes never make us ashamed; but pure Creature-hopes ever leave us disappointed, and while they offer us a bait, leave us in the trap.

Non est quod nos terreant improborum insolentes minæ; cum enim tuta omnia sibi pollicentur & aperto victu jamjam prædam videntur, tum capiuntur, &c. Merl.

Thirdly, Note, When wicked men are once catcht, they cannot deliver themselves.

Snares are set for such Creatures as cannot easily be taken, they are so swift of wing, or foot, that you must take them at an advantage, or you cannot take them; but the wings of the Fowl, and the strength of the Beast, avail them not, when the trap hath taken them. Wicked men have usually great abilities, they are swift of foot, and nimble of wing; it is hard to take them, their power and policy are their security; but when the Lord brings them into a snare, neither wings, nor feet, neither strength, nor swiftness, neither wit, nor greatness shall be able to deliver them. I (saith the Lord, Amos 2. 9.) destroyed the Amorite, whose height was like the Cedars, and he was strong as the Oaks, yet I destroyed his fruits from above, and his roots from beneath.

Fourthly, Observe, A wicked man when he is taken in a judgment, the more he stirs to deliver himself, the more he is intangled.

Thus 'tis with Birds or Beasts taken in a net or a toyl: Wicked men are as a wild Bull in a net (Isa. 51. 20.) they tumble and toss to get out, but their bands are made the stronger, by their stirring, and their attempts to escape danger, engage them faster in it.

Fifthly, Grins, and snares, and traps are all artificial, Nature doth not set them, the skill and industry of man sets and layes them.

Hence Observe, God prepares instruments to take wicked men with.

He hath his Hunters, and his Fowlers, he hath men skilful to destroy all sorts of wild Beasts, who rise up to annoy his people. Some men are wild beasts, tearing and spoiling all that come within their reach, they are Wolves and Foxes, ravenous Birds and Vultures; for these the Lord hath Hunters, and Fowlers, that can set traps, and grins, and spread nets to take them, they have an art in it. The Prophet speaks to this allusion, (Jer. 16. 16.) Behold, I will send for many Fishers, saith the Lord, and they shall fish them; and after I will send for many Hunters, and they shall hunt them from every Mountain, and out of the holes of the Rocks. Nimrod was a mighty Hunter before the Lord: The Lord had him in his eye, or he did not fear to hunt and oppress in the eye of the Lord (Gen. 10. 9.) The Lord hath his Hunters, and his Fishers too; the true Ministers of Christ are Fishers of men; and the false Prophet was called, A snare of a Fowler in all his ways, Hos. 9. 8. As God hath Fishers to catch the souls of men for good; so he hath Fishers to catch the bodies and powers of men for their destruction and hurt, when they use their power to the hurt of his. He hath all sorts of Crafts-men at his call. In the first of Zachary (Ver. 18, 20.) there are four Carpenters (some read Smiths) What to do? To break the horns: That is, The Powers that vexed the Saints, that pushed Judah and Israel. When Tyrants put forth their horns, God gives commission to his Carpenters and Smiths to come with Hammers. And when men begin to play the Foxes and the Wolves among his Sheep, he sends his Hunters, with nets, and snares, and traps to spoil these spoilers.

Sixthly, Observe from the accumulation or heap of words here used, nets, and snares, and grins, and cords, and traps, why all these? Do they not intimate to us,

That, God hath many wayes, variety of wayes, to catch and take evil men with?

If the net should not take, the snare shall; if not that, the grin shall; if not the grin, the cord shall; if not that, the trap shall: It is threatened in the Prophet, He that flyes from the Lyon, the Bear shall take him; he that flyes from the Bear, a Viper shall sting him. His avoiding of one danger shall be his falling into another; and while he thinks to put-run his trouble, he runs into it. As God hath infinite wayes to do his people good (he hath more wayes of blessing and delivering us then one; though he can make any one way do it, yet he hath variety.) And as the Lord pardons sin abundantly (Isa. 55. 7.) or multiplies to pardon, that is, he pardons more then one sin, and pardons more then one time; he multiplies acts of pardon. So the Lord hath many wayes to vex and afflict wicked men; he hath variety of judgments, a treasury, a magazine stored with them: He can set up ingine after ingine, instrument after instrument, if one fail, another shall fulfil all his pleasure. Sword, famine, pestilence, poverty, captivity, are all at his command: He can punish abundantly, or multiply to punish; he can multiply punishments both of a new kind, and of the same kind. He can add a snare to a net, a trap to a snare, a grin to a trap, or he can set up more nets, more snares, &c. till all the wild Beasts and ravenous Birds be taken.

Retis, cassis, laquei funiculi, decipulæ nominibus utitur ut doceat innumeras esse in manu dei rationes quibus homines suæ ferocitate ac rapacitate aliis molestos capiat, & captos laceret. Merl.

Lastly, Observe, Wicked men are to be numbred amongst wild and hurtful creatures.

I note this from the allusion of hunting and fowling; they are either wild or hurtful creatures for whom we set snares and traps; no man sets a snare to take a Sheep, or a grin to take a Chicken. Beasts and Fowls that will not come to hand, or that prey upon those which come to hand, we destroy with nets and traps. God would have us see what wicked men are in the provision he makes to take them; they are of a wild nature, they are such as care not for community, all their care is for themselves alone. Such is the nature of all wild and savage creatures, they live to themselves, they make not a common stock, nor look to the publick, but every one is for himself. (Nah. 2. 12.) They are called Lyons, Who tear in pieces enough for their Whelps, and strangle for their Lyonesses, and fill their holes with prey, and their dens with raven: And that's all the care they take; just enough for their own Wives and Children, who are there called their Whelps and Lyonesses; just enough to fill their own holes or houses, let others be as empty as they will, what's that to them. Let the publick shift for it self. Such possibly will pretend the Commonwealth, but they intend only their private wealth, or the publick no further then themselves are concerned in it, or may gain by it. Is it not just that these men should be brought into a snare, that every one should set up a trap, and use means to catch them. For as he is a good Commonwealths-man that feeds the Sheep, and takes care of Oxen; so he is a good Commonwealths-man too, that sets a snare for Foxes, and destroyes the Wolf. As in a spiritual reference it is a part of our duty to take the Foxes, as well as to feed the Sheep; so also in reference to civils. They who are like wild natural brute beasts, of a savage and hurtful quality, are as the Apostle Peter speaks (2 Epist. 2. 12.) made to be taken and destroyed. God hath raised them up (as he saith of Pharaoh) even for this same purpose, that he might shew his power in them.

Thus far Bildad describes the wicked mans fall, under the Allegory of Hunters and Fowlers, with their snares, traps, cords, and grins.

VERS. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

Terrors shall make him afraid on every side, and shall drive him to his feet.
His strength shall be hunger-bitten; and destruction shall be ready at his side.
It shall devour the strength of his skin, even the first-born of death shall devour his strength.
His confidence shall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, and it shall bring him to the King of terrors.
It shall dwell in his tabernacle, because it is none of his: brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.

THis Context contains the third Allegory, under which Bildad shadows out the miserable state of a wicked man, man, which he doth with a very tragical stile, in allusion unto a proceeding at Law, as divers Interpreters state the intendment of these words. And this is pursued and set forth gradually three wayes.

Allegoria ab exemplo forensi reorum, qui gravissimis criminibus tenentur. Jun.

First, By those perplexities, griefs, and gripings which follow the wicked while they live (Vers. 11, 12.)

Secondly, By the torments of their dissolution, (ver. 13, 14.) where we have the first-born of death, and the King of terrors, to whom the man is brought to receive his doom.

Thirdly, From that wrath and vengeance which is poured out, not only upon their persons, but upon their estates, houses and families, when they are dead, and taken out of the world, Ver. 15. It shall dwell in his tabernacle (when he shall be cast out of his dwelling, and) brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.

That I may not interrupt the opening of these words in making out the Allegory upon every passage, I shall shew it briefly upon the whole in five particulars.

First, A wicked man is here compared to a notorious Malefactor, whose crimes render him as obnoxious to the Laws of man, and the severest sentence of a bitter death.

Terrores sunt quasi apparitores & lictores regis cujus meminit (v. 14.) Jun.

Secondly, The terrors and distractions spoken of in the eleventh and twelfth Verses, are as the Sergeants and Officers of the Court, who prosecute Offenders, to arrest or apprehend them, and so to bring them to Justice.

Thirdly, The troubles which this wicked man is cast into, shadow out the smart upon his body, fines and confiscations upon his estate, which in legal proceedings are inflicted upon Offenders.

Fourthly, Death it self, which is the chief and sum of all punishments, is here compared to a dreadful King, or to a King of terrors, who is as the Judge before whom this Offender is brought for his tryal, and final sentence.

Fifthly, The abiding of evil upon his Tabernacle, and the pouring out of destruction, expressed by brimstone scattered upon his habitation, is an allusion to that part of the Judgment which is pronounced upon Malefactors, whose houses are pull'd down, when themselves are put to death, and their dwelling places made for ever inhabitable. Nettles shall possess their pleasant places, thorns shall be in their tabernacles (Hos. 9. 6.) The place that harbour'd such wretches in former times shall be unfit for man to dwell in; only wild beasts, The Owl and Schrich-owl shall rest there, and find for themselves a place of rest (Isa. 34. 14, 15.) for, Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.

In all this Bildad secretly strikes through the sides of innocent Job; he is the mark at which his parable aims. Bildad had heard Job complain; First, Of terrors (Chap. 6. 4. & 7. 14.) and now he leaves them as his portion. Secondly, He had heard him complaining of spoiling and desolation (Chap. 16. 7, 11.) and now he tells him of destruction at his side, and of a desolate Tabernacle. Thirdly, He had heard him complaining of pains and dolor upon his body (Chap. 9. 17, 18. & 10. 16, 17. & 13. 25, 26. & 16. 13, 14.) and now he tells him, That the strength of his skin shall be devoured. Fourthly, He had heard Job speaking of himself as a dying man, as a man already arrested by death, as a man for whom the graves were ready, and he saying to corruption, Thou art my father, &c. and here he tells him of the first-born of death, and of the King of terrors.

From all which Bildad seems to argue the matter thus against him in the present Allegory.

Only wicked men are terrified and tormented with fears of destruction, with the killing thoughts of the first-born of death, with the dreadful apparitions of the King of terrors.
But thus it is with thee by thy own confession.
Therefore thou art a wicked man, thou art an hypocrite, and unto thee of right all these evils do belong.

So much of the Allegory in general.

I shall now open the terms and parts of it distinctly.

Verse 11. Terrors shall make him afraid on every side.

The word which we translate Terrors, signifies extream terrors, such as put a man out of his wits, or make him not himself: Thus it is said (1 Sam. 16. 4.) concerning Saul, that The Spirit of the Lord went from him, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled or terrified him.

There is a twofold terror:

There is a terror from without, and a terror from within.

Terror from without, is the evil which we feel; the terror from within, is the evil which we suspect or fear.

The Text is chiefly to be understood of the latter sort of terrors, Terrors shall make him afraid: Though he be full of outward trouble, yet inward trouble shall be most troublesom and vexatious. The deadly arrow shall dwell in his side, and the sorrows of death shall take hold of him, before death comes near him. He dyes alwayes, that lives alwayes in the fear of death.

These terrors are conceiv'd by some to be nothing else but the afflictions, twitches, and stings of Conscience, which Heathen Poets call Furies: These they fancied continually hurrying and vexing notorious offenders, bloody and treacherous men. Such they supposed possest with Furies, which were nothing else but disquietments of Conscience, when guilt rising up, looked gastly upon them, and stared them in the face.

Nos generaliter quoscunque terrores intelligimus etsi magna ex parte illi per Satanã suscitentur. Merc. Terrores sunt Dæmones, Rab. Sel.

Others interpret these terrors of Devils, or evil Spirits; Terrors shall make him afraid: That is, evil spirits terrifie him. This differs little from the former; for he may truly be said to be hurried and vexed with Devils, who is terrified with his own evil Conscience: That Conscience which hath nothing of God in it, hath much of the Devil in it, and is an open Court for evil Spirits.

Yet we may further distinguish of three sorts of terrors.

First, There are terrors from God, and these the Saints, the best on earth may be filled with. (Psal. 88. 15.) Heman complains, From my youth up, while I suffer thy terrors I am distracted. Thy terrors, that is, the terrors which thou (O God) sendest or inflictest.

Secondly, There are also the terrors of Satan: As God sets himself against his people; so he lets Satan loose upon them, who can easily dart terrors into their spirits; as God shoots in his poysoned Arrows, so doth the Devil too; God doth it as a Judge, the Devil as an Executioner.

Thirdly, There are terrors of Conscience; Conscience performs many parts in man: First, Conscience acts the part of an Observer, or Watcher: Secondly, Conscience acts the part of a Witness, and brings evidence against us; Thirdly, Conscience acts the part of a Judge, and pronounceth sentence: Fourthly, Conscience doth the office of a Tormentor; Conscience it self can punish those, whom it adjudges to punishment: Conscience gives deeper wounds then Care, and may well be compared to the Vulture, which Heathens feigned eating out the heart or liver.

All these terrors make wicked men afraid: God terrifies some immediately; others are terrified by Satan; and a third sort by the gripes and convulsions of their own Consciences. Or we may joyn all together, God awakens Conscience, and gives Satan liberty to terrifie sinful men.

Hence Observe, A wicked man is subject to continual terrors.

Terror doth not alwayes seize upon him, but it alwayes may; there is no keeping off terrors, unless sin be taken off; unpardoned sin pursues with fear; guilt and terror are as the shadow and the body: as by the shining of the Sun, the body casts a shadow; so by the darkness of sin guilt causeth terror.

There is a threefold terror upon a wicked man.

First, There is a terror rising from the evil which he actually feels; whilst he is pained, he is afraid, and is jealous that his present sufferings are but the earnest of those which are to come, or but the fore-tasts of a fuller cup of sorrow.

Secondly, There is a terror from the evil which he really foresees; though at present he feels nothing, yet he foresees much; and while he is at ease, he doubts and suspects he shall not.

Thirdly, There is a terror where there is no real evil either felt or foreseen, but only imagined. The figments of the brain trouble as much as visible or sensible troubles; no fear is more terrible, then that which is a fear of nothing: Evils which are not, nor ever shall be, render our lives as burdensom, as those which are. Of such terror the Psalmist speaks (Psal. 53. 5.) There were they in great fear; Where was that? In ſome place of great danger ſure, or in the valley of the ſhadow of death: The Pſalmiſt tells us; There were they in great fear where no fear was.

But can a wicked man be any place where no fear is?

I anſwer, Where ever he is there is a fear that he might fear; but he is often there, where there is no ſuch fear as he feareth; his uſual fear is no fear, or the thing which he fears is meerly a fancy, a ſhadow of fear; that which he fears he would not fear, did he but know what he feared; There were there in great fear where no fear was. They ſhall fly (ſaith the Scripture) at the noiſe of the ſhaking of a leaf; that is, they ſhall fear where no fear is: There's no hurt in the falling of a leaf, much leſs in the ſhaking of it: and therefore no real fear, or nothing to be feared.

Put theſe three together, and it muſt needs be that the life of a wicked man under ſin and guilt is ſubject to continual terror; what with the trouble he feels, and what with the trouble he really foreſees, and hath juſt cauſe to fear, and what with thoſe troubles that he fancies, fearing where no fear is, he muſt needs have a life full of terror; or, as the Text ſpeaks, Terrors ſhall make him afraid on every ſide.

Again, Conſider the miſerable ſtate of this wicked man is not deſcrib'd by outward evils, which vex the fleſh, and are grievous to ſence, as poverty, ſickneſs, pain, but by terror, which is an affliction upon the ſpirit.

Hence Obſerve, That terrors are worſe then troubles; the fear of evil is more grievous then the feeling of it.

The dread of an enemy is more killing then an enemy: The Lord aſſures Iſrael (Exod. 23. 28. and Deut. 7. 20.) I will ſend Hornets before thee, which ſhall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite before thee. Theſe Hornets may be taken properly; God who ſent an Army of Lice and Flyes to deſtroy Egypt, might much more uſe Hornets, which are a more terrible Creature, and have a more cruel ſting, to ſubdue the Canaanites: Yet the Hornets may be rather taken metaphorically, for the ſting and terror wherewith God did ſtrike the hearts of thoſe enemies; I will ſend a Hornet before you: That is, terrors. Which we find fulfill'd (Joſh. 24. 12.) I ſent the Hornet before you, which drave them out from before you, even the two Kings of the Amorites; but not with thy ſword, nor with thy bow. What theſe Hornets were is plain in the ſecond Chapter of Joſhua, verſe 11. where Rahab the Harlot made this acknowledgment, That the fear of them was fallen upon the people of the Land, and that their hearts did melt becauſe of them. Before ever Iſrael did ſtrike a ſtroke, they overcame; before ever the Canaanites ſaw the Hoſt of Iſrael, they fled before them. God ſent an Army of fears before the Army of the Iſraelites; Your fear is fallen upon us. Fear is a cruel Hornet, it quickly ſtings to death. It is ſaid (Heſt. 9. 2.) The fear of the Jews fell upon all people; fear overcame them firſt, and then the Jews overcame them, putting in execution the Kings commandment; They laid hands on ſuch as ſought their hurt, and no man could withſtand them. They who cannot withſtand the fear of an enemy, ſhall never be able to withſtand the enemy himſelf.

Now, as when a people are taken with the terror of an enemy, the enemy needs not take them; they are conquered without fighting, and beaten without a battel. So diſmaying fear of any kind, or from any other cauſe, doth the like; when that once takes hold upon the heart, 'tis no matter whether the evil it ſelf ever come in ſight. For as joy and comfort are better then thoſe things from which they reſult. Paul ſpeaking of thoſe dark times and places, when and where Goſpel-light had not ſhined, yet adds (Acts 14. 17.) That God did not leave himſelf without witneſs, in that he did good, and gave us rain from Heaven, and fruitful ſeaſons, filling our hearts with food and gladneſs. Food is a great mercy, but gladneſs is a better. Some have been ſatisfied with gladneſs, who have not been fill'd with food (Hab. 3. 17.) but no man was ever ſatisfied with a fulneſs of food, while he was empty of gladneſs. David prayes, Lord reſtore to me the joy of thy ſalvation (Pſal. 51. 12.) The joy of ſalvation is more refreſhing then ſalvation; though a man be in the ſtate of ſalvation, yet if he have not the joy of it, what is ſalvation it ſelf to him? As we may have many outward temporal mercies, and yet not have the joy of them; ſo we may have ſpiritual and eternal mercies without that joy which is annexed to them. David had the ſalvation of God, his ſoul was in a ſafe ſtate, he was not fallen from Grace, nor out of the love of God, yet he wanted the joy of it. Now (I ſay) as the joy of ſalvation to our feeling, is better then ſalvation it ſelf, and the gladneſs we have with our food, then our food; ſo the terrors, affrightments, and amazements which come with any judgment, are more afflictive then the judgment; and God can ſeparate theſe two when he pleaſeth. For as God can give a man food, and no gladneſs at all, riches, and no comfort at all; ſo he can give trouble and no terror, affliction and no fear at all. Many a good man hath had abundance of the one, and not the leaſt touch of the other. But as trouble is the portion of a wicked man; ſo terrors uſually accompany his troubles, if they come not before his troubles.

Again, The words, On every ſide, are an alluſion to a beſieged City. As Chriſt threatens Jeruſalem (Luke 19. 43.) The dayes ſhall come upon thee, that thy enemies ſhall caſt a trench about thee, and compaſs thee round, and keep thee in on every ſide: Thou ſhalt not be able to eſcape any way, there ſhall be no path, no port open; ſo here, terrors ſhall make him afraid on every ſide, his ſoul ſhall be ſo ſtraitly beleagerd with armies of evils round about, that he ſhall not have the leaſt hope to make an eſcape. This is the height of the miſery of a wicked man. It is ill to have terror on any ſide; but to have terror on all ſides, how terrible is it? The Prophet Jeremy gives Paſhur that wicked falſe Prophet this doom (Chap. 20. 3.) Thy name ſhall not be call'd Paſhur (he would give him a new name, what was that?) but Magor-miſſabib (the word of the Text) fear round about; which way ſoever thou looke ſt, thou ſhalt ſee fear, or thou ſhalt have viſions of amazement round about thee.

Yea, A man that is under the guilt of ſin, hath fear not only round about him, but above, beneath, and within him; he hath terrors coming upon him from above; The wrath of God is revealed from Heaven againſt all unrighteouſneſs; he hath terrors from beneath, Hell ſmoaks up wrath againſt him, and vomits conſuming fire to burn him up; he hath a ſpring of fear within, his own ſpirit is reſtleſs, and meditates terror every moment. Now he that hath terror falling from above, riſing from beneath, ſpringing from within, and begirting him round on every ſide, ſhall never want his belly-full, his heart-full of terror.

A Believer may have much terror upon him, and manifold terrors about him; but he is not beſet with terror on every ſide; he hath ever ſome paſſage, ſome way free; when many doors of hope are ſtopt, yet he ſees ſome open; or if none appear open, yet he hath hopes to ſee thoſe blocks and bars removed. At leaſt he hath courage to venture, though he hath but litte hope to ſpeed. When he is at worſt, he argues it as the Leapers did (2 Kings 7. 4.) If we ſay, we will enter into the City, then the famine is in the City, and we ſhall dye there; and if we ſit ſtill here, we dye alſo.

Thus many times a godly man is put to it, if I go ſuch a way, I ſhall dye, I ſee no hopes; or if ſuch a way, I ſhall be loſt too, I ſee no hopes. But though death waited upon theſe two propoſals of the Leapers, yet then they had a third which gave them ſome glimmering beams of light, ſome remote appearances of life. Now therefore come and let us fall unto the hoſt of the Syrians, if they ſave us alive we ſhall live; and if they kill us, we ſhall but dye. As if they ſhould have ſaid, We cannot make an abſolute concluſion either for or againſt our ſelves, if we go out to the Syrians; come, we will try and put it to a venture, at the worſt we can but dye, and 'tis poſſible, that we ſhall live.

Thus at the worſt, a Believer hath ſomething, upon which he can pitch, if not with a probality, yet with a poſſibility of eſcape and deliverance. And if we ſhould ſuppoſe his terrors on every ſide, ſo that the creature can yield him no poſſible relief or remedy, yet the way upward is open, and he can ſend to Heaven for help and comfort, when the earth ſhews him nothing but terror on every ſide. When he walks in much darkneſs of ſpirit, and ſees no light, light, even then the Prophet counsels him, To trust in the Name of the Lord, and stay upon his God (Isa. 50. 10.) And though God seem to cloud his face, and cloath himself with thunder against him, though he seem to forbid his trust, and to beat him off when he stayes upon him, ye he can plead interest, when he hath no evidence, and sticks to the Covenant of his God, when he hath no encouragement from God. Saints had rather trust and stay upon an angry God, then a pleased creature. And hence the Apostle when he speaks of the forest temptations which befall the Saints, yet assures them (1 Cor. 10. 13.) That as there had no temptation taken them, but what was common to man; so, that God was faithful, and would not suffer them to be tempted above what they were able, but would with the temptation also make a way to escape, that they might be able to bear it. Here is a comfortable word, though you have terrors on every side, yet you shall escape; you shall have strength to bear it, while it is upon you, and you shall not always bear it: God can and will make a way for his to escape; only a wicked man is so compassed about and made afraid with terrors on every side, that he shall not escape; though, as it follows in the last words of the Verse,

They shall drive him to his feet.

There are different readings of this clause.

Constringent eum pedes sui: ut pedibus in terram allidatur & prosternatur.

First, Thus, His feet shall break him; or he shall stumble so hard (through his fear) against the ground, that he shall fall, and his feet (by reason of his fall) shall break him. As if he had said, When he assayeth to flee away from terrors, he shall break himself by falling, not deliver himself by fleeing.

Secondly, Mr. Broughton renders, They shall press him at his feet: That is, Where ever he goes terrors shall press him: As if he had said, If this man, who hath terrors round about, and on every side, should at any time make an escape, and break through them, yet terrors shall press him at his feet; where ever he goes, terror will follow and overtake him. To press a man at his feet, as to tread upon a mans heels, may be taken as a proverbial speech, noting a very hard and a close pursuit.

Disjicient eum ad pedes ejus. Jun. i.e. fugientis & vagabundi vestigiis insistunt, donec sistunt ipsum regi. Id.

A third renders it thus, And shall cast him down at his feet; Terrors shall make him afraid on every side, and cast him down at his feet: At whose feet? It is resolved thus; At the feet of the King of terrors, or, of the Judge. This man thinks to make an escape, and get out of the hand of trouble, but terror shall arrest him, and cast him down bound at the feet of the Judge.

The sence is fair from each of these three rendrings, but I rather take a fourth.

Huc illuc vagus & errabundus præ metu: nullo loco possit subsistere, ubique obversante ei terrore.

They shall drive him to his feet. That is, They shall make him flee or run for it: Terror shall hurry him up and down, and even drive him to his feet. While his mind is unsetled and cannot rest, his body shall not. His heart wanders, and so do his feet. He cannot stay any where, because whersoever he comes, terrors follow and dog him; he may change his place, but he cannot change his company; in what place soever he is, terrors are with him; these presently drive him to his feet, he would out-run his terrors, or find a place, where they should not find him, but he cannot.

The approach of terrors have a different effect, as persons differ.

First, They drive some to their defence.

Secondly, They drive others to their feet.

When terrors and troubles appear to men of courage, and of a sound mind, they go to their Arms and Weapons, they stand upon their guard. (Hest. 8. 41.) As soon as Ahashuerosh had granted the Jews liberty to defend themselves against their enemies, they presently gathered together, and stood for their lives; they gathered themselves together; they did not run away, they were not driven to their feet, but to their hands. Their enemies had authority to destroy them (for the Kings Writ was not withdrawn; only he sent a second Writ whereby the Jews had liberty to defend themselves) terror was on every side, yet they gathered together to stand for their lives, and to oppose their enemies.

Thus when terrors appear and draw near the innocent, God gives them a spirit and power to stand upon their guard, and to withstand their dangers. But when terrors meet guilty consciences, they drive them to their feet, they see no hope nor help, but in running away, and that shall not help them neither. Such was the judgment upon Jerusalem, as Christ intimates (Matth. 24. 20.) when he bids them pray, That their flight might not be in winter, nor on the Sabbath-day. This implyed, that their best help should be in their flight, and their strongest refuge in running from the danger: The terror which made Cain afraid on every side, drove him to his feet; his own tongue could not conceal the course which his heart intended; I shall be (saith he) a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth (Gen. 4. 14.) The terror which pursued our first Parents after they had sinned, drove them also to their feet; Adam and his Wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord among the Trees of the Garden (Gen. 3. 8.)

Hence Note, Flight is an argument of guilt.

When troubles drive us to our feet, not to our hands, when we dare not resist our dangers, but run from them, in such cases, either our dangers are extream great, or which is worse, our spirits are extream little, and our fortitude nothing at all. It is a miserable safety which is sought by running away; such fear shews the mans condition to be worse then his affliction. God threatens his own people, that if his fear did not keep them from sinning boldly and presumptuously against him, their own fear should make them run cowardly and basely from the face of their enemy; they should be driven to their feet, not to their hands for help, and they are but miserable helpers: They that flee, flee in confusion, and so may as well run upon the danger as from it; they may soon run into their hands whom they fear; but they cannot get out of the reach of their fear. When the spring of fear is within our selves, we cannot be delivered from fear, until we are delivered from our selves.

Thus the righteous God either keeps wicked men in on every side, as close prisoners, that they cannot flee, or else being driven to their feet, they flee and run from that which such as they cannot escape, as is further evident in the next Verse.

Verse 12. His strength shall be hunger-bitten, and destruction shall be ready on his side.

ידוי ירעב אנן erit fames opulentia ejus.

The Hebrew is very elegant, and speaks in the abstract; His strength shall be famine; not famished, but famine; his strength shall turn famine, or famine shall be his strength. We render, fully to the sence of the Text, His strength shall be hunger-bitten.

There are two opinions about this Strength, what is meant by it.

First, Some understand it of his Children. As if having shewed calamity falling upon his person in the former Verse, he intended here to shew the calamity of his Family. His strength, that is, his Children, shall be hunger-bitten. And the reason why this word is applyed to Children, is, because Children, especially the first-born, are their Parents strength, (Gen. 49. 3.) Jacob saith of Reuben, Thou art my first-born, my might, and the beginning of my strength, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power. All Children are their Parents strength, in reference to their birth and generation; Dutiful Children are their Parents strength, or a strength to their Parents by defence and preservation. (Psal. 127. 4, 5.) As Arrows in the hand of a mighty man, so are Children of the youth; happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them. Arrows are offensive weapons; yet because that which smites our enemies, is a means of safety unto us, we may well call these living Arrows our defence. Jacob called his youngest Son Benjamin, The Son of the right hand; as hoping (say some) that Son would prove a strength, or as his right hand to him; yet that phrase doth rather speak the nearness and dearness of that Son to him, whom he would love and take care of, as of his right hand.

And thus we may interpret it here, His strength shall be hunger-bitten: That is, Want shall enter into his Family, and eat up his Children: This curse is at once propheſied and threatned (Psal. 109. 9, 10.) Let his Children be fatherless, and his Wife a Widdow: Let his Children be continually vagabonds, and beg; let them seek also their bread out of desolate places. It is an affliction when Children are left fatherless, fatherless, and the Wife a Widdow; but for Children to be hunger bitten, and to beg their bread, or to eat their bread precariously, meerly upon courtesie; this is a great judgment: As it is a truth, that the children of many wicked men are hunger bitten; so some Expositors fix upon this interpretation as the truth of this place. But I rather keep to the first channel, that the description of the wicked mans personal evils is here continued; and therefore,

Secondly, By Strength, understand his riches, his fulness and worldly abundance; his very abundance shall be resolved into want. This Hebrew word is sometimes translated riches or substance (Hos. 12. 8.) And riches are elegantly called strength.

First, Because riches strengthen a man to attempt great matters; they make him daring and venturous. He that hath a full purse, and a great spirit, what will he not enterprize?

Secondly, Riches are a strength of defence, or as a strong Tower (especially in the opinion of worldly men) to protect against the assaults of trouble, and the approach of dangers.

Both these wayes riches are a mans strength. But in both these the wicked rich man shall be shorten'd, his strength shall be hunger-bitten.

Hence Note, Creature-fulness cannot preserve from want, creature-strength cannot preserve from weakness.

Eleganter robori tribuit, quod ipsimet impio erat tribuendum. Merc.

He saith not, the strong man shall be hunger-bitten, but his strength shall, and his very plenty shall be famine; the blessing of God gives plenty in famine, or sufficiency in want; but where the blessing of God is wanting, there is a want in all outward sufficiency. Christ tells the Devil in answer to his first temptation in the fourth of Matthew, Make these stones bread; it is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. A man may have bread, and yet not live; he may fill himself with all manner of worldly comforts, and yet be comfortless. (Luke 12.) The life consists not in abundance. A full Purse, or a full Table cannot maintain life. The Promise is, (Psal. 33. 19.) That God will deliver the souls of his from death, and keep them alive in famine. As God can deliver his in death, and continue life, without the means of life; so he can let a wicked man famish in fulness, as well as take away his fulness. Which latter Hannah in her Song (1 Sam. 2. 5.) speaks as an experience, They that were full have hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry, ceased: That is, The rich had not so much means left as would feed them with ordinary bread, much less with dainties and curious fare; they hired themselves out for bread; they were forced to work for a living, yea, to sweat for a crust. 'Tis extreamest famine, when they that have bread enough, cannot fill themselves; but 'tis extream famine when they who were full have no bread. The Prophet threatened famine in that extremity (Isa. 5. 13.) Their honourable men are famished, and their multitude are dryed up with thirst. If there be any water to be had, the multitude, the common sort will have it; water is a common commodity (even as the air is) and usually lyes in common to all. And if there be any bread to be had, great and honourable men will have it, though the poor starve. Therefore to say, Their honourable men are famished, argues the greatness of a famine. And that's the reason which some give of David's choice (2 Sam. 24. 14.) when God offered him, which he would of those three Judgments, War, or Famine, or Pestilence; he chose the Pestilence; and gives the reason, Let us fall now into the hand of God, whose mercies are great; but let me not fall into the hand of man. He durst venture himself rather to the Sword of God, then to the sword of man; not as if he thought, that man could strike harder, or wound deeper then God; but because he knew God would temper his strokes with mercy, which man would not. And yet David makes choice of that judgment, which put him in equal hazzard of falling by it, with the meanest of his Subjects. For had he chosen the Sword, the King might have secur'd himself in some strong Fort or City; thousands of the people might fall by mans sword, and his person not come near the danger. Again, if he had chosen famine; David being King would not want, as long as there had been a bit of bread to be found in the whole Land. The famine might have glutted it self upon multitudes of his people, while he, possibly, might have had a plentiful, at least, a sufficient Table. Therefore David to shew the ingenuity of his spirit in this election, chose a judgment, to escape which his outward Greatness and Power gave him not the least advantage; He putteth himself meerly upon the mercy of God, who chuseth to be punished by the immediate sword of God: Whereas if the sword of man or famine be sent against a Nation, Princes can make the best shift to avoid the danger in the one, and hunger in the other. For as (according to that of the Prophet) when the poor can get no water; so when the great and the rich can get no bread, then famine hath its full scope, rides (as it were) in triumph, and hath done its worst.

His strength shall be hunger-bitten.

Yet this hunger is not to be confined literally to the want of material food: For while the man continues in his strength, and hath all creature-comforts about him, somewhat pincheth and pines his spirit, he is vexed and hunger-bitten in the midst of plenty.

Hence Note, A wicked man is never satisfied.

The righteous shall abide satisfied, there shall be no hunger upon his spirit: Dissatisfaction is the hunger, contentment is the fulness and satiety of the soul. Many are hunger-bitten, who have more bread then they can eat. Was it not so with Haman? We read him boasting of a banquet, yea, making proclamation of his strength, power, and greatness (Hest 5. 11.) Haman told them of his glory, and of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the King had promoted him, and how he had advanced him above the Princes and servants of the King; and he said moreover, yea, Hester the Queen did let no man come in with the King unto the banquet which she had prepar'd, but my self; and to morrow I am invited unto her also with the King, &c.

This man had all the honour and power, which that mighty Monarch could pour upon him; nevertheless, we may report him hunger-bitten, as appears in the next Verse; Yet all this (saith he) availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sit at the Kings gate. As if he had said, What though I and the King banquetted with the Queen to day, and shall to morrow, yet it is not only hunger, but death to me to see this man thrive whom I would not have live. Thus because he could not have his will upon an honest man, to subdue and destroy him, all that he had was nothing to him, for it availed him nothing. What we account doth us good, is to us (how good or great soever it is) no better then nothing.

There is such a spirit in wicked men, though they live upon the fairest terms in the world, though they be quiet and peaceable, and have profits and pleasures more then they can mannage, or tell what to do with, yet all is nothing, unless they can have their wills upon such as stand in the way of their pride and ambition. What tell ye me (saith such a one) that I have a great estate, that I may take my fill of pleasure, unless I may also take my fill of revenge, and throw down every man that stands not by my favour, or with my interest. Nor is it any wonder, that wicked men are never at rest with what they have; seeing it is not possible that he who makes the world his all, should ever be satisfied, if he had all of it, much less (which is all that any man but the first ever had, or I believe ever shall have) with a piece of it. Ahab had a Kingdom, he was rich and full; yet though he had the fulness of a Kingdom, he was hunger-bitten for a Vineyard (1 Kings 22.) This is a sore judgment, and it is daily inflicted upon the spirits of many wicked men; they have bread enough, riches enough, gold and silver enough, yet they are bitten with hunger after some forbidden fruit; which if they get not, all is lost to them which they have gotten. And as somewhat which they want, hinders their enjoyment of all they have: so somewhat which another man hath, hinders them more then all their own wants. Such a man prospers, and is in power; this bites their souls, this gnaws their bowels, and they cannot be quiet. His strength shall be hunger-bitten.

And destruction shall be ready at his side.

The

The word which we render destruction, signifies vapours, ascending up from the earth, condensed into a cloud: and (among the Rabbins) it is usually applied, to any (as we speak) misfortune, or calamity, which comes suddenly and falls down upon us like a cloud when it melts and dissolves into a storm-shower; Any unexpected evil may well be called destruction wrapt up in and dropt from a cloud. Destruction shall be ready prepar'd or fixt; so the word is rendred, (*Psal.*108.) O God, my heart is fixt, or my heart is prepar'd. So here, destruction prepared, or ready at hand, it is not to be now debated or resolved on, what it shall be; That's done long ago. Some interpret this readiness, in allusion to a judiciary tryal, where the penalty is set and determined by the Law. Destruction is ready according to Justice for the offender: It is ready, as it follows in the Text.

propriè vapor & nubes quæ sursum attollitur, unde pro infortunio & calamitate, quæ super aliquem ut nubes quædã incidit sumitur. Merc. Forte parata, destructio est pœna & supplicium constitutũ legibus, & præparatum sontibus. Pin.

At his side.] Some of the Rabbins who interpret the former word Strength, for Children (as was toucht before) in pursuit of that, interpret his side, for, his wife. The Hebrew word signifies either the side or the rib; hence 'tis rendered, Destruction shall be ready at his rib, or, upon his rib; that is, destruction shall be upon his wife, who was a rib taken out of Man (*Gen.*2.21.) Thus the Rabbins descant upon it; His strength, that is, his children shall be hunger-bitten, and destruction shall be ready at his side, that is, it shall wait upon his wife whether soever she goes. So here is a description of compleat destruction. The wicked man, in his person, as also in his wife and children shall be destroyed.

Others expound it only of wounds in his own side or rib. In the book of Samuel we read of wounds given, under the fift rib, because there wounds are most killing and deadly.

Effractor paratus ad costas. Cajet.

Another reads it in the Concrete, not destruction shall be ready at his side, but the Destroyer shall be ready at his side; His enemy shall wait on him to destroy him. But the abstract hath a greater force and elegancy. To say, destruction shall be ready at his side, is more then to say, the destroyer shall be ready at his side.

Therefore Fourthly, All that I conceive lies in this expression, (Destruction shall be ready at his side) is this, to shew that he shall have a sudden and an unavoidable destruction; for those evils which are at our side, are so near us, that we can hardly acquit our selves of them. Evils at a distance may be avoided, but if they come up close to our very sides, how can we escape?

Latrones dicti sunt quasi latrones, latent enim ad insidias & ex latere adoriantur. Habere aliquid ad manũ & ad latus utrumq; significat habere aliquid proximũ. Bold.

Some Criticks tell us, that latro the Latine word for a thief, is quasi latera, because he lies by side of a man, he skulks in a bush, or rides close by the travellers side, talking with him, and then falls upon him; that's also the elegancy of the Hebraiism.

Hence Observe, First, God hath destruction ready for evil men; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready; he hath also prepared for him the instruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows against the persecuters, (Psal. 7.12,13.)

When we see a bow bent, and the shaft pull'd out of the quiver, and put upon the string, then a man is ready to shoot; Divine destructions may be acted as soon as threatned, they are not to prepare, but prepared.

When the Lord denounceth eternal judgement upon wicked men, he saith; Go to the fire that is prepared for the Devil and his Angels; The fire is made, the treasure of wrath is full. As the mercy of God is a ready mercy, and as his pardons are ready for his people; his pardon and mercies are not to seek, he hath them at hand, he is good and ready to forgive, (Psal. 86.5.) Whereas most men, though they will forgive, yet they are not ready to forgive, they are hardly brought to it, though they do it at last. But God is ready to forgive; he hath (as it were) pardons ready drawn (as a man who would be ready to do a business, he will have such writings as concern the passing of it ready) there is nothing to do, but to put in the date and the name; yea indeed the date and the name are put in from all eternity. Thus the Scripture speaks to shew how forward, God is to do good; He needs not fit his heart to it, his heart is ever in the exactest fitness. Now as God hath mercies ready for his own people, so he hath destructions as ready for the wicked. They are as ready as if he had made, and kept them by him ready made from everlasting.

Again, As a godly man is usually ready to do good, O God, my heart is prepared (saith David) so God is ready to bring evil upon them who continue to do evil; and therefore fear not when you see men ready bent and set to do mischief, their destruction is more ready then they are to destroy, and God can bring destruction upon them in a moment.

Secondly, Note, Destruction comes suddenly upon wicked men, and surprizes them unawares.

Christ will come at last upon all the world suddenly, but the surprizal shall only be upon wicked men. The Apostle shadows this in two Allusions, (1 Thes. 5.2,3.) For your selves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night; for when they shall say, peace and safety, then suddain destruction cometh upon them as travel upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape. The thief gives no warning, and the travel of a woman with child, many times gives as little.

Now as in the great day of Judgment, God will come as a thief, and as pain upon a woman with child; so also in the lesser dayes of judgement, those of this life.

Observe, Thirdly, There is no running away from that destruction which God sends.

Can a man run from his side? destruction is at the side of a sinner; where ever his side is, there destruction is; Evils which have a Commission from above, never fail to find the offender; we may escape the evil which man plots, man may make ready a thousand deaths for us, and we out-live them all; as Paul saith of himself; In Damascus, the Governour under Aretas the King, kept the City with a Garrison, desirous to apprehend me: And thorow a window in a basket, was I let down by the wall, and escap't his hands. Paul got clear away, though man laid destruction at his side; but if God lay destruction, there is no window to get out at, nor basket to be let down by; we can neither stand before the judgements of God, nor outrun them.

Vers. 13. It shall devour the strength of his skin.

The thirteenth and fourteenth verses contain the second degree or step of the misery of a wicked man. It shall devour the strength of his skin. Destruction was ready at his side, in the former verse, now it devours; the word signifies to swallow up at a bit, and so to devour as to consume and bring to nothing; it notes those consumptions which fire and sword make. They are terrible consumers, cruel devourers; these shall devour like a hungry monster.

בדי עורו

The strength of his skin.] The Original word which we translate strength, signifies properly a bough or branch of a tree; it signifies also the bar of a door.

And hence it is that some render, It shall devour his branch; and by this branch the members of his body may be meant, because as the body of a tree shoots forth branches, which are as its members, so the body hath many members, which are as its branches, and so the same word may very well serve both.

Comedet vectes cutis ejus, comedet vectes ejus primogenitus mortis. Jun. Devoret pulchritudinem ejus. Vulg. Mors devoret speciosa ejus, 70.

Again, Others translate, It shall devour the bars of his skin; bones are as the bars of the skin, and therefore the strength of the skin, like bars, the bones bear up and support both skin and flesh.

The strength of his skin.] The Vulgar reads, It shall devour the beauty of his skin; the strength, say we, the beauty saith he. The Septuagint follows that reading, death shall devour his most beautiful things, or those things which were most amiable and pleasant in his eye.

Our reading is very suitable both to the context and to the original word; for the members of the body are the strength of it, and the bars of a door are the strength of it; therefore, it shall devour the strength of his skin, contains and takes in both.

It shall, what shall? What is the antecedent? Some say the devourer is famine, of which he spake in the former verse; His strength shall be hunger-bitten; famine shall devour; famine is a great devourer, famine eats up both the strength and the beauty of the skin, it sucks the marrow of the bones, all fade before the face of famine, (Lam. 4. 5.)

Others understand destruction or misery in general, as the devourer, destruction shall be ready at his side, it shall devour. That is, destruction shall devour the strength of his skin; so it is only a repetition of the same thing, with an elegant force and heightning of the sence.

The first-born of death shall devour his strength.

The thing to be opened in this latter branch (the sence being the same with the former) is, what we are to understand by the first-born of death, and how this phrase and form of speech is us'd in Scripture; There are divers opinions about it.

First, One of the Rabbins conceives, that it is to be expounded by an Hypallage; as if the first-born of death shall devour, were put for Death shall devour his first-born: That is, his strength, as the first-born is called. But we need not make such an inversion in the words; and therefore,

Mors devoret primogenitũ ejus. Rab. Dav.

Secondly, This first-born of death say others, is the Devil, because he was the author of death, he brought death into the world, for he brought sin into the world, he by temptation, and Adam by hearkning to the temptation. The Apostle makes the derivation of death from Adam, (Rom. 5. 12.) Death entred by one, and we may safely derive its pedegree yet higher by one; for death entred that one, by the Devil.

Again, The Devil may be called the first-born of death, because he hath the power of death in his hands: So the Apostle, Heb. 5. 14. For as much then as the Children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the Devil. He that hath the power of death is the first-born of death. The Devil hath the power of death, not as if the Devil could by his will cause men to die, or pass a sentence of death upon them; for this is too high a priviledge for the Devil, he hath no such power of death; It is the sole priviledge of God himself to have this power of death. The power of death, and the power of life are committed to Christ, whom he will he slayes, and whom he will he makes alive. But the Devil is said to have the power of death as Christ gives him a Commission, arms him with a power to inflict death upon wicked men and unbelievers; or he hath the power of death, not as a Judge, but as an Executioner; He is therefore called (Revel. 9. 11.) in the Hebrew Abaddon, and in the Greek Apollyon, that is, the Destroyer, or, if you will, the Executioner, the Hangman. God puts the business into his hand, therefore he it is that hath the power of death. Some of the Hebrews say upon that place, that God doth set some special evil Angel over some wicked men, he puts the power of death concerning them into his hand; and so he is the first-born of death; but I shall not stay upon that.

Angelus morti præpositus vel mortis princeps, cui à domino potestas data est homines interimendi. Merc.

Thirdly, Others by the first-born of death, conceive that we are to understand the disease which first seizeth upon the body before the man dies; for death when it seizeth upon the body, appears first in a disease or a distemper, and so the disease is as it were the eldest son of death. The disease being that which death sends forth and necessarily follows, it is therefore called the first-born of death; as it were death it self; for those things which are near accomplishment, though they are not fully accomplisht, receive the name, title, or denomination of the thing accomplished. As a man contending with another, if we see he hath a great deal the better of him, though the other make resistance, yet we say, he hath the victory over him: And as Christ himself (Joh. 19. 30.) when he was alive upon the Cross, strugling and striving with the powers of darkness about the deliverance of Man, crys out, it is finished: and yet the work was not then done, it was not finished till he died indeed; but because he saw he had the better of the day, and he was assured that he should carry it through, therefore thus he spake before the work was totally and compleatly finished. So a disease, a malignant disease, a mortal disease, taking hold upon any man, may be call'd the first-born of death; that is, such a disease as death hath begotten; or you may call it death it self, because death will certainly and suddenly follow.

Primogenitus mortis est morbus gravissimus. Rab. Jos.

Morbus gravissimus, à quo mors abest proximè ex usu scripturæ mors appellatur, quod enim parũ differt à forma perfecta illius sibi nomen vendicare solet. Sanct.

Fourthly, The first-born of death, say others is that trouble of mind, that anguish or sorrow which death sends as a harbinger to take up its lodging in the spirit of a wicked man; The afflicting fore-thought of death, is a death, or the first-born of death.

Primogenitus mortis est mœror animi quem mors præmittit ut sibi præparet hospitium. Cajet.

Fifthly, Some take the first-born of death, to be an early death, or death in the flower and strength of age.

Sixthly, The first-born of death, is some unusual or extraordinary death; that is, look upon that death which is most deadly, that death into which many deaths are collected, that death which is (as it were) an aggravation of all that is in death, this death is the first-born of death: hence it is that the vulgar translation reads, not, the first-born of death, but the first-born death; that is, whatsoever death is more deadly, and bitter, more cruel and painful, that death, which among all the wayes of dying, carries away the preheminence, that death, which is the very strength of death, and hath in it a double portion of dying, that's the first-born of death. And so the first-born of death, is nothing else but a proverbial speech for an extraordinary death, for an extream bitter death; For as it is among our children, there is the first-born, the eldest, and then the younger, as they stand in their degree, but among them all, the first-born is chief; so here, That death which among all other deaths is the chiefest, such a death is the first-born of death, and such a death shall sieze upon the wicked man. And hence also Mr. Broughton (as I conceive) avoiding the letter of the Original (which he seldom doth, yet here he doth it,) instead of the first-born of death, saith, a strange death shall eat the branches of his body. And we find in Scripture this usage of the word applyed to others, in whom there is an eminency, or a high degree in any kind, though not literally the first-born, because the first-born hath the preheminence above the rest of his Brethren; As Jacob saith of Reuben, his real first-born; Thou art my might, and the beginning of my strength, &c. And the Law provided, that a double portion should be given to the first-born, yea though he lay under some accidental disadvantages, (Deut. 21. 17.) He shall acknowledge the Son of the hated for the first-born, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath; though he were a son of a wife that he hated, yet this must not be pleaded as a bar to his priviledge. Though the mother was hated, yet the son must be honoured. Where note (by the way) that he speaks comparatively of hatred, that is, though she were a wife whom her husband did not love with strength of affection, yet if she hath born him his strength, his first-born, he must acknowledge his right, by giving him a double portion. According to this Analogy we are to understand the Prophet Isaiah speaking of the first-born of the poor, (Chap. 14. 29, 30.) Rejoyce not thou whole Palestina, because the rod of him that smote thee is broken; for out of the Serpents root shall come forth a Cockatrice, and his fruit shall be a fiery flying Serpent, and the first-born of the poor shall feed, and the needy shall lie down in safety. The first-born of the poor, is not to be interpreted of the eldest son of the poor; but by the first-born of the poor, the Prophet means those who were most poor, extreamly poor, those who were so far from having a double portion of worldly things, that they had no portion at all. Or they are called the first-born of the poor, because they had only a double portion of want and poverty, or were oppressed under the very strength of it.

Primogenitus mortis est mœror animi quem mors præmittit ut sibi præparet hospitium. Cajet. Primogenita mors est, quæ naturalis ætatis prævenit finem. Aqu. Liran. Primogenitus mortis est proverbiale dictum, pro morte nõ vulgari sed violenta & maxime Horrenda. Primogenita mors. Vulg. Primogenitus mortis est mors quæ præ aliis mortibus, tãquã fratribus, in enecando duplicẽ veluti & potissimam potestatem habet. Scriptura ob maximã primogenitorum præ aliis filiis privilegia vocare solet primogenitũ quicquid in suo genere aliis antecedit. Bold.

Now, to shew that God would raise his Church, and lift her up, and give his afflicted people deliverance, he assures them, that the first-born of the poor, that is, such as were doubly poor, doubly afflicted, should feed and be comforted. Thus, in the twelfth of the Hebrews, vers. 22, 23. Believers are all called the Congregation of the first-born; But ye are come to Mount Sion, and unto the City of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of Angels, and to the Assembly and Congregation of the first-born, &c.

Cœtus sanctorum quos primitivos appellavit, nõ quod omnes primi natura solverint matrũ uteros, sed quia major honor primogenitis lege tribuebatur, eorum præstantiam significavit per hanc Appellationem. Theod. in 1 Coloss.

Why the first-born, not because all believers, all Saints are elder brethren, or such as were the first-born of their parents; for the first-born may be an unbeliever, and the younger may be a Saint, a believer. But he calls them the Congregation of the first-born, because they shall all be dealt with as the first-born, they shall all be lookt upon as the strength of Christ, and all shall have a double portion, tion, they ſhall all have that honour which the firſt-born hath, a fulneſs of excellency and dignity; hence their title, is, the Congregation of the firſt-born.

So we are to underſtand that of the Apoſtle, (*Coll.*1.18.) where we find two expreſſions, ſtanding directly oppoſite to this in the Text; he calls Chriſt the firſt-born from the dead: He is the head of the body the Church, he is the beginning, and the firſt-born from the dead. As Bildad here ſpeaks of the firſt-born of death, or the firſt-born death; So Chriſt is called (as it were) in way of oppoſition, the firſt-born from death. Chriſt is called the firſt-born from death, not only becauſe he was the firſt that did ariſe to an immortal life, (ſome there were that did riſe before, as when Chriſt died the graves were opened, and ſome aroſe, but Chriſt was the firſt that did ariſe to an immortal life) and ſo he was (in a ſence) begotten and born again; there was an heavenly nativity in his reſurrection, therefore he is called the firſt-born from death, death gave him up, and was delivered of him for ever. Now (I ſay) Chriſt was not only called the firſt-born from death, (upon this account) but becauſe he was the chief, (as it were) the exemplar and leader in the reſurrection, he was the higheſt in the reſurrection, and his reſurrection was moſt glorious. Thus he was the firſt-born from death, he aroſe with the greateſt glory and preheminence.

In the fifteenth verſe of the ſame Chapter, Chriſt is called the image of the inviſible God, the firſt-born of every creature; that is, the higheſt, the fulleſt of glory among all creatures; for we are here to take heed of the ſence of the Arians, and others that follow them, who take hold of this Scripture, where Chriſt is called the firſt-born of every creature, as if the ſence were only this, that Chriſt is the chiefeſt creature (though it be a truth, that according to his humane nature he is a creature, and ſo the chiefeſt creature, but they reſtrain it to the whole perſon, as if he were only the chiefeſt of creatures) and not God at all. For he is not only in his humane nature the chiefeſt creature, but according to his Divine Nature, the beginning of all the creatures; ſo he is called (*Revel.*3.14.) The beginning of the creation of God, which we may explain by, the firſt-born of every creature; he is the beginning of the Creation of God, not principium principiatum only, the beginning begun. Chriſt may be called the beginning of all the creation of God, becauſe God looked on him firſt: but alſo he is principium principians, the beginning of the creation, becauſe every creature had its beginning from him. Chriſt is the active beginning, or beginner of every creature; For as the Evangeliſt John gives it out (*Chap.*1. verſ. 2,3.) The ſame was in the beginning with God; All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made. Again, the Lord ſpeaking of David to the height in the Letter, and of Chriſt in the figure, ſaith, (*Pſal.*89.27.) I will make him my firſt-born, higher then the Kings of the Earth; that is, he ſhall be my chiefeſt, my higheſt, my only one. Thus as the firſt-born among the living, or from the dead, ſtill denotes the choiceſt of thoſe who live, ſo the firſt-born of death, is the chiefeſt, the higheſt, the ſtrongeſt death that any man dies when he is gathered to the dead.

Luſtly, Some labour much to fix it upon a particular death, and would ſhew us what this firſt-born of death, this moſt deadly death is; and upon debate, the vote caſts it upon famine; which ſome conceive alſo moſt proper to to this place, in reference to the words before, His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten, deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide. The firſt-born of death; that is, (ſay they) Famine, the chiefeſt of deaths ſhall devour his ſtrength, and make an end of him: For though we may ſay, there are as many deaths as there are diſeaſes and wayes to death, yet there are three great deaths, which do as it were ſtrive for preheminence; Firſt, Sword; Secondly, Plague; And Thirdly, Famine; theſe are, as it were, the firſt three among the Deſtroyers of mankind: ſometimes in the Prophets God puts a fourth, and ſaith, My four ſore Judgements; as if they were Judgments above all the reſt: and then I remember the evil beaſt comes among them; but ſword, peſtilence, and famine are the firſt three, and according to this opinion famine is put for the firſt of the three, the chiefeſt of the three, like the Tachmonite (2 *Sam.*23.) I find one Interpreter ſo confident of it, that he ſaith without all doubt by the firſt-born death, he means famine, which is not an infirmity or a diſeaſe tending to or giving us warning of the approach of death, but is it ſelf a continued death, and the moſt bitter death. And indeed the Prophet Jeremy in his Lamentations ſeems to give the preheminence to famine; They that be ſlain with the ſword, are better then they that are ſlain with hunger; for theſe pine away, ſtricken through for want of the fruits of the field, (*Chap.*4.9.)

Dubio procul illa primogenita mors eſt famis, quæ non eſt infirmitas vel morbus ſed continua mors, quâ non datur amarior, &c. Bold.

But I rather take it of any ſort of death, as it is heightned and made grievous by circumſtances, then conclude or faſten it upon any one ſort of death; For as any kind of ſin may by circumſtances be ſo aggravated, and made ſo exceeding ſinful, that it may juſtly deſerve to be ſtiled, The firſt-born of ſin; ſo likewiſe may any puniſhment or death, which is the wages of ſin.

Hence Obſerve, The Lord hath various degrees of Judgements, and of deaths, to pour out upon the wicked.

Some deaths are but like younger Brethren, others are like the firſt-born. It is with puniſhments and judgments as it is with ſins, there is a difference in the degrees of them; though all ſins be of the ſame quality, yet all are not of the ſame quantity. Upon ſome ſins the ſinner layes out his ſtrength, and commits them with all his might, theſe may deſervedly be called the firſt-born of ſin, and ſuch ſinners the firſt-born of ſinners; as Polycarpus anſwered Marcion the Heretick when he came into his preſence, and asked him if he did not know him; Yes, ſaith he, I know thee well to be the firſt-born of Satan. Now, I ſay, as there are degrees in ſin and ſinners, among whom ſome are as the firſt-born, ſo there are degrees in puniſhment; and therein lies the exactneſs of Juſtice to apportion and meaſure out to every one according to his ſin, whether in practice or opinion. To give alike judgments upon all offenders, would be very unlike to Juſtice; And there would be much inequality in ſuch equality. The Lord tells Babylon, who was the firſt-born of ſinners, (*Iſa.*47.9.) Judgments ſhall come upon thee in their perfection; perfect judgments are the portion of a perfect ſinner; where there is a compleatneſs of wickedneſs, there the compleatneſs of wrath ſhall be powred out, even the firſt-born of death.

Ἐπιγινώσκω τὸν πρωτότοκον τοῦ σατανᾶ. *Euſeb. lib.*4. *Eccl. Hiſt. cap.*13.

Now, as the firſt-born is our ſtrength, (which is obſervable) 'tis added in the Text; The firſt-born of death ſhall devour his ſtrength.

Hence Obſerve, That all the power of man fails before the meſſengers of the wrathful power of God.

Strength ſhall go forth to devour ſtrength; Though ſin be armed, though an aſſociation, or an hoſt of ſinners be in Arms, and ſtand upon their guard, though the ſtrength of each one among them be the ſtrength of ſtones, and his fleſh of braſs, as Job complained his was not (*Chap.*6.) yet God can provide a judgement that ſhall devour it all at a bit, and ſwallow it as a morſel, he can have a firſt-born judgement to diſpatch the firſt-born, the ſtrength of ſinners. The Prophet Iſaiah in a holy ſcorne invites all the enemies of the Church to joyn forces and councels, to put their ſtrength and their wit together: Gather together on heaps, O ye people, and gird your ſelves, (and again he ſaith) gird your ſelves. Of all ſtrength, united ſtrength is the ſtrongeſt; united weakneſs is very ſtrong, how ſtrong then is united ſtrength? Hence Polititians adviſe (divide & impera) divide your enemies if you would conquer them; but the Lord needs not take his enemies at an advantage, and therefore he ſaith; Gather together, gird your ſelves, and ye ſhall be broken in pieces, (Iſa. 8.9.) Make your ſelves as ſtrong as you can, ſee if I cannot devour your ſtrength. Do your worſt againſt me, and the beſt for your ſelves, yet all ſhall be brought to nought. Creatures may be dealt with, and kept out, but there is no fortifying againſt the Almighty. When the Lord comes to aſſault or batter, then all our ſtrong Holds, even our ſtrongeſt hold ſhall be, as the Prophet ſpeaks (Nahum 3.12.) as the firſt ripe figs, which if they be ſhaken fall into the mouth of the eater; and by how much any man is the more confident, that his ſtrong hold, will hold out in the day of aſſault or battery, by ſo much the ſooner ſhall it be rendred up or beaten down, as it follows in the next verſe.

Verſ. 14. And his confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, and it ſhall bring him to the King of terrours.

As if he had ſaid, though this man was ſo ſtrong, that he grew confident, (ſtrong men are uſually confident) yet not only his ſtrength, but, his confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle.

His confidence.] The word ſignifies ſuch an aſſurance and acquieſcence of ſpirit, as puts a man out of doubt; A man of confidence hath no fear, either of danger or about ſucceſſe; He is not afraid that the danger will come, or that the ſucceſs will not; he ſits down ſecure, and feels not the leaſt pain of ſo much as one jealous thought. Confidence is the mother of ſecurity, and the daughter of pride.

His confidence ſhall be rooted out.] He doth not ſay, it ſhall be ſhaken, weakened, or much abated, but it ſhall be rooted out, or grub'd up. The wicked mans confidence is compar'd to a tree that takes root, and ſpreads it ſelf in the ground, that grows up and ſends forth goodly fruitfull branches; but when he hopes to devour the fruit, the firſt-born of death devours his ſtrength, and his confidence ſhall be rooted out; to root out, notes total deſtruction.

Hence obſerve, The worſt of men are apt to be confident of good things.

Such a one Bildad deſcribes in this Scripture, and yet he is full of confidence. None have ſo great hopes, as they who have leaſt reaſon to have any. Some wicked men have a plerophorie (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks) their ſayls are fill'd with confidence, they are ſure of good things in this life, and of eternal life, they are high-built in hope, but they have no ground, no foundation for their hope. Theirs is a meer preſumption, who are full of ſin, and yet full of hope; full of wickedneſs, and yet full of confidence: Saints who are full of holineſs, are yet often full of fear; full of ſincerity, yet full of doubts. Fancies of faith are eaſily gotten, and as eaſily loſt. Many are high-flown, who never knew what the laying of a good foundation means. His confidence ſhall be rooted out.

Note, Secondly, The confidence of wicked men ſhall be deſtroyed totally; it is rooted out.

The confidence of a godly man may be ſhaken, and much unſetled: now he is well aſſured, and anon he queſtions all, but his confidence ſhall never be rooted out. (Pſal. 112. v. 10.) The deſire of the wicked ſhall periſh; That is, thoſe things that he is moſt deſirous of. His deſires live, yet they live as a puniſhment, not as a bleſſing, becauſe the thing he deſires, dyes; His deſires ſhall periſh.

As his deſires periſh, ſo his confidence ſhall. The thing that he was confident of periſheth, and at laſt confidence it ſelf, both root and branch, act and habit, is rooted out. Solomon (Prov. 10. 20.) by way of oppoſition ſets the one over againſt another; The hopes of the righteous ſhall be glad; That is, he ſhall ſee the thing he hopes for, or the thing he hopes for ſhall come to paſs, this will make him glad. When the man who hopes is glad, then his hopes are ſaid to be glad; but the expectation of the wicked ſhall periſh; that is, the thing he expects ſhall periſh, and then his expectation ſhall periſh too, he is weary of expecting, he waits no longer. Faith is the ſubſtance of things hoped for: but he that hath no faith, how can his hope have any ſubſtance, i.e. He can have no true hope in the good of the promiſe, who hath no true faith in the truth of the promiſe. Unleſs faith live, hope muſt needs give up the Ghoſt, or be as the giving up of the Ghoſt.

A godly mans hope fails not, becauſe his faith doth not; the thing he expects may fail, worldly things fail him often, and ſo may his preſent ſenſe of ſpirituals, yet his expectation fails not: when nothing appears to ſenſe, his hope is vigorous, and his confidence retains not only life but ſtrength. But when the ſence of what a carnal man would have, is loſt, his confidence is alſo loſt; when the one goes, the other ſtays not long behind. If our confidence be rooted in the earth, 'tis no wonder, if it be rooted up. Where the wicked mans confidence ſpoken of in this Text was rooted, will appear yet further from the next enquiry. His confidence ſhall be rooted out.

Whence? from what ground, where was his confidence rooted? The text ſaith;

Out of his Tabernacle.] The Tabernacle undergoes here a threefold interpretation.

First, Some conceive that this Tabernacle is his body; He truſted much in his ſtrength, in the ſtrength of his body, as much as in any other ſtrength. Now (ſaith he) his confidence ſhall be rooted out of this Tabernacle; he thought he had ſuch ſtrength, ſuch a good conſtitution of body, that it would have ſtood like a Caſtle againſt all batteries; but it proved a Tabernacle, whoſe ſtakes are quickly pulled up. The body of man is compared in Scripture to a Tabernacle; And the Septuagint clearly adhere to this tranſlation, rendring it thus; Health ſhall be broken off from his Tabernacle; that is, his body ſhall decay. Paul (2 Corinth. 5. 4.) We in this Tabernacle groane; That is, in this body. I ſhall ſhortly lay down this Tabernacle, ſaith Peter, (2 Epiſt. 1. 14.) that is, my body. The Lord Jeſus while he was in the world did but tabernacle with us a while; The Word was made fleſh, and dwelt among us, (Joh. 1. 14.) He dwelt amongſt us as in a Tabernacle.

Rumpatur de tabernaculo ſuo ſanitas. Sept.

The body is called a Tabernacle; firſt, becauſe it is weak; ſecondly, becauſe it is moveable. When a Tabernacle is reported for ſtrength or continuance, 'tis extraordinary. (Iſa. 33. 20.) Look upon Sion the City of our ſolemnities, thine eyes ſhall ſee Jeruſalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that cannot be removed, and the ſtakes thereof can never be taken away, neither ſhall any of the cords thereof be broken. This is a ſtrange kind of Tabernacle, this Tabernacle may goe for a houſe, yea 'tis better then any houſe, a Tabernacle that ſhall never be removed. The Prophet ſpeaks thus by way of oppoſition to common worldly Tabernacles; Tabernacles were ordinarily removed and taken down, their ſtakes were ſoon pull'd up, and their cords broken. But Sion at laſt ſhall be ſuch a Tabernacle as ſhall not be removed. But how ſoon is the Tabernacle of mans body removed? the ſtakes thereof are eaſily taken away, and the cords thereof broken; There is no truſting to it for a day, yet the wicked man truſts to it, as if it were ſet up for Eternity. Here's his confidence, he thinks to live long, that his body ſhould hold out in all winds and weathers, but down it ſhall, dye he muſt. Let not the ſtrong man glory in his ſtrength, but let him that glorieth glory in the Lord.

Secondly, By Tabernacle we may (according to Scripture) underſtand The place of Worſhip; ſo his confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, is as if it had been plainly ſaid, All the confidence (he may pretend to have very much) that he hath in God ſhall faile him. The wicked mans confidence grows ſtrong upon this conſideration, that he frequents the Tabernacle, that he goes to the publick worſhip, and applies himſelf to a bodily exerciſe in outward ordinances; Thus 'twas with the Jewes (Jer. 7. 3, 4.) their confidence was rooted in the Tabernacle, and at laſt it was rooted out of the Tabernacle; they cryed, The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord are we; they thought to carry it againſt all, becauſe they were a Temple, a Tabernacle, and they had the pure inſtitutions of worſhip among them. In this they truſted and were rooted, when there was falſe ſwearing and lying among them, when they committed abomination againſt God, and dealt falſely with one another, yet then their confidence was in the Tabernacle. Some think Bildad aymes particularly at the Oratory or publick place of worſhip, which Job had formerly frequented, and in which he had a great name; With this his friend checkt and upbraided him, that now his confidence was rooted out of his Tabernacle. Eliphaz took him up thus in the 4th Chapter, Is this thy fear and thy confidence? thou buildeſt much upon thy religious attendance at the Tabernacle, that thou art a worſhipper, yet God hath rooted out thy confidence, and manifeſted that thy Religion is vain. Saints are planted in the houſe of God, (Pſal. 92. 13.) they have a kind of rooting there; but though the Tabernacle be a good rooting place, yet we cannot root firmly there, unleſs we are rooted in Jeſus Chriſt. To root in Tabernacle-work, or in the bare uſe of ordinances, as if that would carry it, and commend us to God, when there is no heart-work, when there is no looking to the power of godlineſs, and to communion with Chriſt; what is this but building upon the ſand? Many come often to the Tabernacle, who are meer ſtrangers to Chriſt; they uſe pure ordinances, but are themſelves impure.

pure. These may have a great name in the Tabernacle for a while, but God blots their names, and roots their hopes out of the Tabernacle, yea he pulls them from the horns of the Altar, or slayes them there, as Solomon gave commandment concerning Joab. Many shall say, Lord, Lord, have we not prophecied in thy name? &c. To whom Christ will profess, I never knew you, depart from me ye that work iniquity, (*Mat.*7.22,23.) That Text is this second interpretation of the Text in hand, and speaks to us fully what it is (in this sence,) for any man to have his confidence rooted out of the Tabernacle.

Yet, thirdly, I conceive we are to expound this Scripture of a vulgar Tabernacle; and then his confidence shall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, is no more but this, it shall be rooted out of the place where he dwells; as if Bildad had said, the wicked man hath a great deal of confidence in his outward state and worldly prosperity, in the riches, honour, and greatness of his house, yet all these shall fail him; And then the act of trusting is put for the thing trusted unto; His confidence; that is, that which he confided in, shall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, he trusted in and boasted of the multitude of his riches, when suddenly they made themselves wings, and fled away.

Hence Note, First, There is no assurance of earthly things.

Confidence in that which perisheth in the using, must needs perish when we come to use it.

Secondly, Observe, Where a wicked mans greatest confidences are, there his greatest disappointments are.

The world is his God, the earth is his hope, his Taberbernacle is his delight; As his Tabernacle is full of the creature, so he is full of confidence in his Tabernacle; There he lives, and there he loves, yet nothing can protect him from utter extirpation, when the wrath of God begins to dig about him; His confidence shall be rooted up.

This Bildad further aggravates in the last part of the verse;

And it shall bring him to the King of terrours.

It shall bring him.] What shall bring him? his broken confidence will do it; when confidence is spoil'd, man is amazed; This brings to the King of terrours.

And who is this King of terrours?

The King of terrours.] A strange title! We have heard and read of many titles given to the Kings of the earth, but rarely, if at all, of such a one as this.

Who is this King of terrours, this black Prince, or (as some translate) Prince of clouds and darkness? because darkness and clouds are full of terrour.

Principem Dæmonũ intelligit, sicut poetæ Plutonem regem inferni finxerunt. Rab. Sel.

It was shewed before that some interpret the first-born of death, to be the Devil, because he hath the power of death. The same opinion concludes The King of terrours to be the Devil, or Beelzebub the Prince of Devils. As the Poets fabled Pluto King of those infernal Territories.

Scriptura aliquando poeticè loquitur. Merc.

The Scripture speaks sometimes poetically, yet alwayes holily and spiritually.

Rex terrorũ videtur phrasi Hebraica dici maximus & potentissimus terror, qui inter cæteros principatum tenet. Pined.

Secondly, The King of terrours, is strong and mighty terrour. As the first-born of death, notes the most deadly death, so, the King of terrours according to that Hebraism notes those terrours which are most terrible. Such terrour as overcomes, subdues, and keeps down all other terrours, and makes them as subjects to it, such a terrour as is chiefest and greatest among terrours, that is, the King of terrours.

Nomen substantivũ genitivi casus & numeri multitudinis junctũ alteri substantivo singularis numeri vices gerit superlativi. Bold.

This Hebraism is frequent in Scripture, in the language whereof a man of bloods is a most cruel bloody man, and a man of deceits, is a man exceeding deceitful; and a man of sorrows (as Christ is called Isa. 53.3.) is a man full of sorrow; and a woman of fornications, is a woman extreamly immodest, and given up to unclean desires. Hence this general rule, That a substantive of the genitive case plural, joyned with another substantive of the singular number, doth increase and aggravate the sence, and stands in the place and force of the superlative degree.

Again, As because of the excellency and preheminency of the first-born; every thing which doth excel in any kind, may be call'd the first-born; so by the like proportion, because of the eminency of a King, that which is great in any kind, may be called King. In this sence (Job 41.30.) the Whale is called King over all the Children of pride, because he is a creature of a vast and mighty body, and is described full of contempt, and prouder then the proudest. (1 *Sam.*25.36.) The feast that Nabal made is said to be like the feast of a King, that is, a great feast. In that sence, great terrour may suitably be called here, the King of terrour. Some labour much to place it upon a particular; and say, the King of terrours is death; and so according to legal proceeding, which was toucht at the beginning, we have the wicked man now brought unto execution; Destruction shall be ready at his side, it shall devour the strength of his skin, the first-born of death, (a strange way or kind of death) shall devour his confidence, and root it out of his tabernacle, and he shall be brought unto the King of terrours, to death it self; there's an end of him. The Philosopher (in this sence) call'd death the King of terrours, when he called it the most terrible of terrible things; there we may rest the interpretation of this Scripture, he shall bring him to the King of terrours, that is, to death, or to his last end.

Calcet super eum quasi rex interitus. Vulg.

There is another reading which I find much insisted upon by the Latine Translator, who saith not as we, It shall bring him to the King of terrours, but terrour shall tread upon him as a King, or, destruction as a King shall tread and trample upon him; and so it is an allusion to those Kings, Emperours, and great ones of the world, who prevailing over their enemies were wont to tread upon their necks; we find Joshua commanding the people of Israel to tread upon the necks of the Canaanitish Kings, in token of the victory obtained over them, (Josh. 10.22.) And as God in his providence gave them power to set their feet in triumph upon the necks of Kings, so it was a Custom among the ancients, when victorious Princes led captived Princes in triumph, to lay them prostrate on the ground, and tread upon their bodies, or go over their necks, in token of their total overthrow and subjection. Thus (according to the present reading) death and destruction like a conquering King shall tread upon the wicked man. This heightens the sence still, to tread and tramp'le upon another, is a note of absolute Conquest. (*Psal.*91.13.) Thou shalt walk upon the Lyon and Asp, the young Lyon and Dragon shalt thou tread under thy feet; Thou shalt tread upon them, not accidentally, as a man treads upon an Adder or a Serpent in the way; but his meaning is, thou shalt intentionally tread upon them like a Conquerour, thou shalt tread upon them to testifie thy dominion over them. So (*Luk.*10.19.) When the Lord Jesus gave that promise to his Disciples that they should do great things, he saith, And you shall (saith he) tread upon Serpents, that is, you shall have power to overcome whatsoever may annoy you; serpentine power is all hurtful power, whether literal or mystical. As the Apostle assures all believers, (*Rom.*16.20.) God shall tread down Satan (that old Serpent) shortly under your feet. Thus death or destruction shall tread upon the wicked like a King.

Calcare aut conculcare vincentis, & triumphantis est. Mos erat apud Imperatores Constantinopolitanos ut captũ hostem & humi distentũ in illius cervices & collũ insultando conculcarent. Cedrenus.

Taking this King of Terrours for death; which interpretation I pitch upon, Observe, That, Death is very terrible.

It is the King of terrours; It is very terrible under a threefold consideration.

First, It is terrible, if we consider the Antecedents, the fore-runners, or harbingers of death, which are pains, sicknesses and diseases, these are terrible.

Secondly, It is terrible, if we consider the nature of it; What is death? Death is a disunion; all disunions are troublesom, and some are terrible. And as some disunions are terrible, so those are most terrible which rend that from us which is neerest to us. The disunion of neerest friends, of a loving husband and wife, how grievous are they? Now death makes a disunion of those that are nearer then husband and wife, even of soul and body. These are (as I may say) more then married together; Husband and wife are one flesh, but soul and body are one person. This marriage-bond is broken by the violence of death.

And not only is death a disunion, but it is also a privation: every privation hath some terribleness in it, but this is not an ordinary privation, this is a total privation.

Death is such a privation, as from which there can be no return according to nature, this makes it very terrible; and as it is a total privation of life, so of all those things which appertain to life, all worldly riches, all worldly relations, all worldly comforts, all worldly honours are removed by death; it lays all low, it equalls the highest with the lowest; death is the greatest Leveller, as the Poet saith; death levels Scepters and Plow-shares, it makes all alike.

Mors sceptra ligonibus æquat.

Thirdly, There is a terribleness in death in regard of the consequents; rottenness and corruption consume the dead, and darkness covers them in the grave. These natural consequents of death are terrible.

But death is yet more terrible if we step beyond this natural consideration of it; this makes it terrible to Heathens, who lookt no further then the grave: but to look on death as the fruit or wages of sin, and as sin is the sting of death, this renders it most terrible. We may make a threefold gradation of the terribleness of death.

First, To godly men; Secondly, to moral men, who live without any great wickedness, yet still in a state of nature; Thirdly, to wicked men, who have an awakened conscience as well as a conscience extreamly guilty.

Death is sometimes a King of terrours, very terrible to the godly; though they have reason to look on death (in a sence) as the King of Comforts, because when they die they enter upon the enjoyment of their highest comforts, yet, I say, death strikes them with some terrour; especially in two cases.

First, Death is terrible to a godly man, when his spiritual estate is unsetled; indeed when he sees all cleer between God and him, then well-come death, there's no terrour in it; the paleness of death pleaseth him better then the purest beauty that ever he saw in the world: but when the soul cannot see an interest in Christ, when the conscience is ravell'd, and the actings of faith stopt, then the heart is full of fear. He that is in a good estate, is not alwayes in sight of it; This darkness breeds doubtings. That which is not seen, gives us no more comfort, then that which is not at all.

De non existentibus & non apparentibus eadem est ratio.

Secondly, Death may be terrible, as a King of terrours to a godly man, not only when his spiritual estate is unsetled, but also when his worldly estate is well setled, when he hath deeply engaged in the creature, and his earthly mountain (as he apprehends) stands strong. Some godly men have much in the world, and that may quickly have too much of them. Now, if once we over-reckon the creature, though but a little, and cleave, though but weakly, to the world as our friend, we shall reckon that as our enemy, which (as death cannot but do) separates us quite from the world. We may observe some who judge that their spiritual estate is very well bottom'd (they have no fears about it) and yet the fear of death takes hold upon them, because their outward estate is so well bottom'd; they are not much taken with the pleasures of heaven, because they live pleasantly on the earth; it is their sorrow to leave the world while they find so much joy in it; and they are hungry after life, because full of the things of this life. The Apostle speaks of some (Phil. 3. 19.) Whose end is destruction, and whose glory is in their shame; But I may say of godly men, they ought to be ashamed of this sorrow, seeing their end is salvation. How dishonourable is it, that they should reach so greedily after a life which they cannot hold, whose faith hath laid hold upon eternal life?

Secondly, To meer moral men, death is properly a King of terrour; they who cannot see any good in death, cannot but see it an evil to die. Now it is impossible that they should see any good (except the stop of present evils) in their own death, who are not spiritually acquainted with, and in some degree experimentally interessed in the death of Christ.

Thirdly, Death is most terrible to those who though they have the knowledge of God, and outwardly profess the Gospel of Christ, yet walk contrary to it. Death is not half so terrible to a moral heathen, as to a wicked Christian; their consciences are convinced, they understand what death is, and what follows death. Heathens live so much in the dark, that they see little of that, which is the terrour of death. But enlightned Christians (though continuing in the darkness of sin) have heard and know that there is a Revelation of wrath from heaven against all unrighteousness. And that after death they must appear before the righteous God in Judgment. They have learned, that death cuts down unbelievers as fewel for the fire; that being carried out of the world, they are cast to hell. And that as present death is the wages of sin, so the greatest part of that wages is paid in eternal death.

To close this point, seeing death is the King of terrours, it should be our study, as it is of our wisdom, to make this King of terrours, a kind of King of comfort to us. Many believers have attained to this. And there are many considerations held out in the Gospel, which ease the pains of death, and set the soul above the terrour of it. Natural men can say, All must die; why should any man fear that which is common to all men? The natural man can say also, that many indure more pain while they live, then all the pains of death. These poor shifts the natural man can make to stifle the terrour of death. But a believer moves upon higher principles. As

First, That death cannot at all break the bond of the Covenant between God and us; the Covenant is alive though we die. (Mat. 22. 31, 32.) I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. They were dead, when God spake this. Now saith Christ there; God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all are alive to him, even the dead are alive to him; as their souls are alive, so their bodies are as living bodies to him, and though rotting in their graves, he owns them as much as when flourishing in stately pallaces. The relation of God to Abraham was as strong when he was dead as when he was alive; I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.

Secondly, Though death breaks the union between soul and body, yet death cannot break the union between the soul and Christ; this also out-lives death: For as when Christ died, death could not break that hypostatical union between the divine nature and the humane nature; though death disunited the soul and the body of Christ, yet it did not disunite God and man in Christ. So though death triumph over the natural union of soul and body, it can never break the mystical union between Christ and the soul; the union between Christ God-man and a believer is inviolable, therefore why should they who believe fear death.

Thirdly, The Apostle tells us plainly, that there is no terrour in death, while he assures us that the sting of death is out; and if death have no sting, it hath much honey for believers. Jesus Christ our true Sampson hath slain this Lyon, and brought us a honey-comb out of the carkass. Christ hath been the death of death for us, and why should that have terrour in it, which hath no life in it? We say the living Lyon is not so terrible as he is painted; what terrour then is there in a dead or in a painted Lyon?

Fourthly, The Scripture often calls death a sleep, a rest; And what terrour is there in rest and sleep? what trouble in going to bed? And this sleep must needs be sweet, because it is sleep after labour, yea after sore labour, as Solomon speaks of the rest of a labouring man.

Fifthly, As it puts a period to our worldly comforts, so to all our sorrows, and we have no reason to be sorry for that; It puts an end to our few dayes, and to our many troubles, and we have no reason to be troubled at that. And as it is an end of that sorrow and trouble which sin began, so it is a beginning of that happiness and joy which Grace begins, and shall never end; it is the privation of our loosable habits, but it occasions the fruition of those that shall never be lost. It is the opening of the door to eternity, and therefore,

Sixthly, It is call'd a going to God, in whom we shall have an eternal injoyment. Death is often in the Old Testament called a going to our Fathers, or, a gathering to our Fathers; but know that as death is a going and a gathering to our earthly Fathers, so it is a going to our God, and a gathering to our Father in heaven.

Seventhly, This may abate the terrour of death; It is a dying to live, as well as it is a dying from life: we die from a life, and we die to a life, and the life to which is better then that from which we die. The Grave is our long home, but it is not our last home; we shall rise again and live for ever. As Christ argues (*Joh.*12.24.) concerning his death; Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it remains alone, but if it die it brings forth fruit. A man dies as a Corn dies, which dies so as to spring out into a blade, and then to bring forth the ear, and at last full corn in the ear. Indeed if a man were to die, and there rot and never rise more, this were terrible; but to die only to live, and to die from a miserable life that he may live a joyful life, to die as a grain of wheat dies, to grow up in greater beauty then he had, yea in a glory that he never had, why should there be any terrour in this? Though in it self considered, as also to wicked men, death be a King of terrours, yet all these considerations laid together, are enough and enough to perswade the Saints to better thoughts of it, and that Christ the Prince of life and King of Comforts, hath desposed this King of terrours; so that as sin shall not, so death shall not have dominion over us: and though our flesh cannot rest in this hope, (in which Christ rested) that God will not suffer us to see corruption, yet we may fully rest in this hope, that our flesh should be freed from corruption.

Some heathen tyrants were wont to scorn Christians, who believed a Resurrection, when they fled to avoid death and persecution; Why are you (said they) so sparing of a life, which (you say) will return again. And indeed why should we be sparing of our lives, when we know we shall receive them again with advantage? why should we be afraid to let that go which we cannot loose?

For as we should not be over-careful to retain that which we cannot keep, nor spend many thoughts upon that which is gone with a thought; so we should not be over-careful to keep that, which when we have parted with out of our own hands, we know how to commend to a safe hand, even to him who will as surely return it safe into our hands, as he at first put it into our hands.

Thus Bildad brings Job to execution, and leaves him in the hand of the King of terrours, Death, yet (as he conceives) misery is not come upon him to the utmost. There is (as I may say) a divine Fate attending the wicked man after death, his troubles die not when himself dies; evil shall survive him, and dwell in his family, when he is turned out of his dwelling; Though this evil man shall know his place no more, yet misery shall know his place, and abide there too, as it follows, It shall dwell in his Tabernacle, because it is none of his, &c.

Vers. 15. It shall dwell in his Tabernacle, &c.

It shall.] What shall? Who is this inhabitant, or this tenant? who lodges there? who is it? It shall dwell. There is neither person nor thing expresst, and the conjectures are various in making out an Answer to this Question, Who dwells there?

First, The Text is read, not as if others should dwell in his Tabernacle, but as if some of his should dwell in the Tabernacle of others. So the Chaldee Paraphrast, who finding the Hebrew for dwelling, to be of the Feminine Gender, tells us, that 'tis the wife of that wicked man who was driven out of his dwelling, and at last taken hold of by the King of terrours; and so whereas we say, It shall dwell in his Tabernacle, because it is none of his; He saith, His wife shall dwell in a Tabernacle which is none of his. And in compliance with this rendring, he expounds the words as an argument of that misery which should fall upon the family of this wicked man; A misery so great, that his wife should not have a house of her own to dwell in, but be forced to dwell in a Tabernacle which was not his: that is, to be either as a servant, or at best but as a sojourner in another mans house. It is an affliction for any man, when he dies, to leave a wife, and not to leave her a room of his own to live in.

Uxor ejus habitabit in tabernaculo non suo. Chald.

Habitent in tabernaculo ejus socii ejus. Vulg.

Secondly, The vulgar reading carries a good sence, but departs too much from the original. Thus; His companions shall dwell in his Tabernacle. Some expositors who favour that translation, take no small pains to fit this to the Text, and to find out who are meant by these companions.

Some say, his friends, who were formerly his companions, they shall come to his Tabernacle, lamenting their loss, and mourning for him. But that's an honour rather then a judgment to the dead.

Others say, These companions are the worms, Worms shall dwell with him in the grave. But that cannot be a special matter of judgment neither, because it is common to all mankind; when any man dies, worms are his companions; or he may say (as Job said, *Chap.*17.14.) To the worm, thou art my mother and my sister.

Therefore, thirdly, It is concluded, that by his companions are meant such as sometimes dwelt about him, or near him: Those neighbours, whom he living had oppressed, and wronged, vexed, and expulsed out of their dwellings, even they shall come when he is dead, and take possession of his dwelling, they shall enter upon all. Master Calvins translation comes near this explication; He that is none of his shall dwell in his tent; He joyns those words which we set last (and render, Because it is none of his) to the first part of the verse, and gives them not as a reason why evil should dwell in his house, but as a description of that person, who should dwell in his house; He that is none of his shall dwell in his tents; that is, the man that had nothing to do with him, or was a meer stranger to him, shall come and dwell in his tent. As if he had said; Neither his wife, nor his children, nor any of his kindred shall possess what he hath purchased, strangers shall take it, and divide it among themselves; he that is none of his shall dwell in his tent. And that's the judgment threatned, (*Deut.*28. 30,31.) Thou shalt build houses, and shalt not dwell therein; thou shalt plant vineyards, and not gather the grapes thereof; thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof. It is a great evil when he that is none of ours, that is, a meer stranger dwells in our tents, and eats up those good things, which we provide for our selves and families. Thus the Lord tells the Inhabitant of Mareshah, that he will bring them an heir, (Micah 1.15.) and who was this? not one of their blood and linage, but a stranger, the Assyrian should be their heir, and make himself Lord, by the sword, of all their possessions.

Secondly, We may carry the interpretation more generally. For seeing that the punishment of a wicked man after death is here described, the meaning appears thus; It shall dwell, &c. That is, destruction or misery shall dwell in his house. We read before, Destruction shall be ready at his side; now, It shall dwell in his house. As if he had said; the destruction and misery I speak of, shall not only be personal, and fall upon the wicked man himself; but it shall be, as it were, hereditary, it shall descend and fall upon the head of all those that belong to him: misery shall inhabit his fair Pallaces.

Habitabit in tentorio ejus cuncta rum rerum interitus. Theod.

Another keeping this way of interpretation, fixeth it thus; Fear, or the King of terrours, shall dwell in his Tabernacle. But whether we say, destruction, or fear, shall dwell there, it matters little; for the difference is not considerable between these inhabitants, the one being the issue or consequent of the other.

Habitabit in tentorio ejus timor. Vatab.

A third saith; Want shall dwell in his Tabernacle; nothing, or have nothing shall dwell in his Tabernacle; which is made out by reading the words, Mibili lo, for a nominative case: Mibili lo shall dwell in his Tabernacle, that is, Want, or, nothing to him; he shall have nothing remaining in his Tabernacle; when his person is gone, his estate shall be gone too; nothing shall dwell there; his house shall be full of want, repleniſhed with emptiness; scarcity shall be the furniture of this mans habitation; his house shall be (according to that description of the earth, before the Lord put that rude heap into this exquisite method) without form and void; emptiness and confusion shall lodge in his house for ever.

Nobis videtur מבלי לו pro nominativo esse. Græce sic aptius reddi potest, οὐκήσει ἐν τῇ σκηνῇ αὐτῆ τὸ μέλλον αὐτῷ, sc. ὑπάρχειν vel ut Theodotio reddit, ἀνυπαρξία, inopia. Coc. Habitat in tentorio ejus nihil habere. Habitabitur à fera aliqua & bestia sanguinaria.

Lastly, It shall dwell; That is (as some conceive) some wild beast, or noisom creatures shall dwell in his Tabernacle; When one beast is out, many other beasts shall come in; It shall be dwelt in by Satyrs and Serpents, &c. And this is very consonant to other Scriptures. For we find it threatned as a judgment upon wicked places, that the wicked being thrust out, wild beasts should succeed them, and hateful birds make their nests, where men of such hateful conditions nested. (Isa. 13. 19, 20, 21, 22.) Babylon shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the Shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures, and Owls shall dwell there, and Satyrs shall dance dance there. And the wild beasts of the Islands shall cry in their desolate houses, & Dragons in their pleasant pallaces, and her time is near to come, and her dayes shall not be prolonged.

Again, Isa. 34.11. &c. The Cormorant, and the Bittern shall possess it, the Owl also and the Raven shall dwell in it, and he shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness. And thorns shall come up in her Palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof, and it shall be an habitation for Dragons, and a Court for Owls. The wild beasts of the desert shall also meet with the wild beasts of the Island, and the Satyr shall cry to his fellow, the Shrichowl also shall rest there, and find for her self a place of rest. There shall the great Owl make her nest, and lay and hatch, and gather under her shadow: there shall the Vultures also be gathered, every one with her mate. See how large the Spirit of God is in describing these uncouth Inhabitants. When wicked men are gone, then wild beasts, Owls & Satyrs, whatsoever can be afflictive, or unwelcome to the spirit of man, is sent in to take up its lodgings and guest it in the houses of that sinful generation.

I find a learned Commentator, who collects this from the latter part of this clause, from Mibili lo, which we render, Because it is none of his: he finds these wild beasts in that expression, and therefore he doth not take the word Mibili, for an adverb negative, as we do, but for a none, signifying corruption, or putrifaction, from the Hebrew word Bahah to decay or wax old. So the word is used (Isa. 38.17.) from the pit of (Beli,) destruction, or corruption. Thus some render in the sixth Chapter of this Book, *vers.*6. Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt? Can that which is unsavoury, Mibili, through the corruption of salt, or which having been salted is now corrupted, (can that) be eaten? as was shewed upon the place. Now taking that translation, here is a plain description of noisom creatures, or vermine, dwelling in the wicked mans house. As if to the question, Who shall dwell there? This answer were returned; There shall dwell in his Tabernacle, whatsoever is engendred of corruption, or filthiness, whatsoever derives its pedegree from, or is the off-spring of any nastiness or uncleanness, adhering to and remaining in his Tabernacle, this is the Tribe that shall dwell there. As if he said; When he is gone out of his house, the stink, corruption, and filth that he left behind him, shall breed filthy creatures, nasty monsters enow to inhabite his Tabernacle; we know many noisom creatures proceed from putrifaction, such as are mice, rats, and spiders, as Naturalists observe, and experience teacheth.

Thus we see what variety of conjecture there is about the antecedent of this word, who are the tenants of this wicked mans house when he is ejected. If we follow our translation, that leads us to the third interpretation before given; It, that is, destruction, or want shall dwell in his Tabernacle.

Observe Hence, The wrath of God dwells in the house, and upon the estate of a wicked man, when he is cast out of it, dead and gone.

That's the scope of the verse; and these various interpretations meet in this one sence, that there is a wrath abiding in this wicked mans house. Whether his companions, such as were none of his, strangers dwell in it; or fear and destruction dwell in it, or wild beasts dwell in it, or vermine dwell in it, whosoever of these are the tenants, and possessors of his house after him; this is the meaning, that the wrath of God dwells there. As Christ speaks of unbelievers; He that believeth not is condemned already, and the wrath of God abides upon him, Joh. 3. It dwells with or inhabits him; it is an abiding wrath. So, here; It shall dwell. He doth not say, some evil shall fall upon his habitation, some evil shall happen to him: but he useth a word that notes the perpetuity of it, It shall dwell. It shall not come, and lodge for a night, or sojourn for a week, or a moneth; but there it shall dwell, it shall be an inhabitant; wrath shall continue upon it.

As blessings abide upon the Tabernacles and dwellings of the people of God; they do not only happen in sometimes, but they take up their abode in them. The houses of the Saints are the dwelling places, or the abiding places of mercy. Mercy hath no where else to rest, but in such houses and hearts. So destruction, and wrath, wild beasts, and whatsoever discovers it self in a way of judgment, is the portion of evil men while they live and shall take possession of their houses when they die. When their bodies are past feeling, their estates, possessions and families shall feel the wrath of God. It shall dwell in his Tabernacle,

Because it is none of his.

There are divers translations of this clause. I shall touch only upon three.

Propter non ei. Reg. Ex non ei. Cajet. Non existente in eo. Pagn. Qui non est. Vulg.

First, Some render it, who is not; Thus the vulgar; His companions shall dwell in his Tabernacle, who is not. And so the words are a description of man, vile and base. For as either things which are low in the esteem of men, are said not to be, (1 Cor. 1.28.) God useth things which are not, to bring to nought those things which are. Now, I say, as base things are said not to be, so are base men: and then the Tabernacle of him who is not, is the Tabernacle of a vile person. Or it is a description of one who is dead. Death is often noted in Scripture by a not being, Jer. 31. *Rachel weeping for her children, because they are not, would not be comforted, Revel.*17.8. The beast which was, and is not; That is, who is dead and gone, his power is broken. So, *Ezek.*28. 19. Thou shalt be a terrour, and never shalt thou be any more; That is, thou shalt die.

Secondly, Thus; It shall dwell in his Tabernacle, because it shall no more be to him; That is, his Tabernacle shall no more be for his use or habitation, therefore destruction or wild beasts may dwell in it, or take it up.

Nō ei amplius deserviet suum tabernaculum. Pined. Eò, quod non sit ipsius. Vatabl. תבלי sæpè causam subindicat, ut min sit ex. q. d. ex eo, quod non est ipsius. Non est ipsius, quia illud rapuit, i. e. rapto construxit. Merc. Significat merito impii domum ad alienos transfiturā, quod ipse illā non suis sumtibus, sed alienis dispendiis ædificarit.

A third renders as we; or we from him; because it is none of his. The negative particle, is also causal. And then the sence is this; It shall dwell in his Tabernacle, because it is none of his; That is, he never got it honestly. So our late Annotators give the sence; He did not come truly by it. This exposition is clear, as giving an account why judgment dwells in a wicked mans house when he dies, even because it is none of his. It was unduly gotten, and unjustly kept. So, here is a correction, he calls it his Tabernacle, in the former part of the verse; but now he saith, it is none of his. For this Tabernacle was set up by oppression, bribery, and injustice, and so maintained. He built his house by unrighteousness, and now he is gone, nothing shall dwell in it but misery and judgment. When the earthly house of his personal Tabernacle shall be dissolved, the Tabernacle wherein his person housed, shall be left utterly destitute.

Hence Observe, First, That which a man gets unjustly, is none of his, he hath no right to it.

Man hath no right to possess that which he hath obtained unrighteously. The Apostle speaking to the Church of the Thessalonians, (2 Thes. 3. 12.) directs all in their callings to be diligent, and laborious; and why? if a man be idle, and negligent, and will not take pains in his calling, all the bread he eats he steals, it is none of his: therefore he adds; We command, and exhort you, by the Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness he work, and eat his own bread: they who do not work, eat the bread of other men, that is, the bread to which they have no title. As our sweat and labour are the best sauce to our meat, so the price which we must lay down for it, else, it is none of ours. Indeed a man may be unable to work, much more to sweat for his bread, and yet the bread which he eats may be his own. Such a one hath a right to every mans bread, and every man is bound in that case to relieve him. 'Tis Idleness, not inability, which is the thief. But he that hath ability to labour in his calling, and is idle, all the bread which he eats is stollen, 'tis none of his own. Hence we may infer, if a man meerly upon his idleness may be said to steal all the bread he eats, as having no right to it, much more that bread is not his own, that is wrung out of the hands, and pulled out of the teeth of others. That which is gotten by grinding the faces of the poor, or by doing wrong to the rich, this bread is not our own; Houses and Lands so gotten, are not our own. That which is justly gotten is a gift from God, but that which is gotten unjustly, is stoln from men. Deceiving is thieving.

Secondly, Observe, That which is unjustly gotten, shall not be kept.

All worldly things perish with the using, but such worldly things usually perish before we or ours can use them. Hence we have that dreadful sentence, (*Jer.*22.3.)

Wo

Wo to him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by robbery, that useth his neighbours service without wages, and giveth him not for his work; that saith, I will build me a wide house, and large chambers, &c. This wo doth not only belong to those who build houses by that which they get unrighteously, but it belongs to all who have any thing in their houses which is gotten unrighteously. House is not taken strictly for the dwelling place, (though that be a truth) but any thing that a man possesseth, or enjoyeth, or is part of his inheritance, is his house. Wo to him that builds a house by unrighteousness. Why? what wo shall be upon him? This shall be his wo, himself shall not long inhabit the house which he hath built, and the wrath of God shall inhabit it long when he is out of it; destruction shall dwell there, because it is none of his.

Bildad goes further to shew the misery of this man. Not only shall destruction and misery dwell there, because the house is none of his; but Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.

As if he had said, either the estate of a wicked man shall be conveyed over to, and possessed by strangers; or if not, yet it shall perish, it shall be consumed as with fire, and brimstone, from heaven; Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation. These last words of the Allegory, shew the extremity, the utmost of the judgment; Brimstone is a dreadful word, it hath a savour of hell in it, the savour of eternal death in it; Brimstone shall be scattered. And it is conceived, that Bildad in this, either intimates the manner of that judgment which God sent upon Job in the first Chapter, when the fire of God fell from heaven, and consumed his sheep. Fire from heaven is a sulphurious fire; Here Bildad seems to say, Thou art the man; on thy habitation brimstone was scattered, thy flocks of sheep were burnt with fire from heaven.

Non dubiũ quin in Jobum contorqueat cujus facultatum pars igni cælitus delapso consumpta fuit. Merc.

Or, That, he in this minds Job of the terrible judgment of God upon Sodom, and Gomorrah, of which we read (Gen. 19.24.) whom God consumed from heaven by raining down brimstone upon them; Brimstone was scattered upon their habitation. So the meaning is; The dwelling of this wicked man, shall either pass away to others, or misery shall dwell in it, or it shall be utterly consumed by fire; Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.

It is very frequent in Scripture, when any great judgment is spoken of, to allude to the dealing of God with Sodom, and Gomorrah, in scattering fire and brimstone. Deut. 29. 23. The whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that is not sowen, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath, Psal. 11.6. He shall rain down upon the wicked, fire and brimstone, this shall be the portion of his cup, Ezek. 38.22. Isa. 34.9. Isa. 13.9. Jer. 49.18. In all these you shall find an allusion still made to the consumption of Sodom and Gomorrah. When God threatneth to bring a total consumption upon a people, and to destroy them utterly from the face of the earth; then (saith he) I will do to you as I did to Sodom, and Gomorrah; that is, according to the Text, scatter brimstone upon your habitations.

Secondly, The scattering of brimstone is conceived by others, to note that special judgment, Barrenness: his beautiful habitation, (so the word signifies) or (as we may extend it) all his possessions, his fruitful fields and pastures, his goodly hills, mountains, all these beautiful things, shall be as if brimstone had been scattered upon them; that is, they shall be barren, God shall strike them with barrenness, and they shall bring forth no fruit at all. (Deut. 29.23.) Brimstone and barrenness go together; The whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, it is not sowen, nor any grass groweth therein; so the scattering of brimstone is of the same signification as sowing with salt, Judg. 9.45. For no sooner had he spoken of brimstone and salt, but presently adds, it is not sowen, nor grass groweth therein: as if he had said, it shall be desolate and uninhabited. The Land of Sodom, and Gomorrah (Gen. 14.) was like Eden, the Garden of God; but as soon as God had scattered brimstone upon it, it was like a desolate wilderness, or fruitless desert. The apples of Sodom are a proverb, to this day, for fruitless fruit, or a shew only of fruit: No fruit (say some) grows there to ripeness or perfection. Or if brimstone speak not barrenness in general, yet (as others restrain it,) barrenness as to him and his, who was thus cast out of his possession. The land of a wicked man may bear fruit, and yet be as fruitless to him, and his, as if it were sowed with brimstone instead of corn; he shall never have the crop, or harvest, or revenue of it, he shall never eat of the fruit of it, though others do, and though possibly it continue as fertile, and be improved as much as ever. A land flourishing with milk and honey to others, may be to former owners as a land whose streams are turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, as the Prophet speaks (Isa. 34.9.)

Sulphur est symbolũ sterilitatis.

Salsugo, quia sal exugit omnem terræ succũ.

Thirdly, Others conjecture, that this scattering of brimstone implies only that his house should never be inhabited any more, because brimstone is of such an ill savour, that it drives away both man and beast.

Fourthly, That it is a description of that mourning, or of those terrible cries and lamentations which should be made for him at his funerals. Some of the ancients observe, that it was a custome in times of extream mourning, to scatter brimstone, and things of ill-savour, to afflict the smell, as it is to wear black Garments to afflict the sight. Or the reason of scattering brimstone at his burial, may rather be given as an argument of his dishonour, he being a man whose very memory did stink. And therefore whereas sweet spices and odours are properly burnt at the funerals of such whose names and memorials are as a box of sweet ointment powred out, this man's Tabernacle (after he is dead,) shall be perfumed with brimstone; while he breathed in it, though his manners left an ill savour there, yet he took care to keep it sweet; but when he hath breathed his last, then (according to that which is spoken, Isa. 3.24. of the proud women of Israel) It shall come to pass, that instead of a sweet smell, there shall be a stink. As he lived wickedly, and died miserably, so he shall be buried ignominiously.

Est circumlocutio luctus domesticorum in obitu patris familias odores tetros & fœtidos adhibentium in signũ mœroris, sicut etiam nigræ vestes sumuntur à lugentibus. Aquin.

Ad extremã funeris ignominiam pertinet. cum enim in funere divitis aromata cremarẽtur, hic succedit teterimus sulphuris fœtor. Cajet.

But I rather take the former interpretation, that this scattering of brimstone, either notes the extremity of the judgment in general: Or in particular, that barrenness shall be the portion of his posterity, when once the wrath of God hath siezed on and swept him away. And so it gives a sutable close to this third Allegory of the wicked man, prosecuted in a legal way, to whose doom or sentence this is added, that his house shall be pull'd down, or consumed with fire, that nothing may remain his of him, but a perpetual execration of name and wayes.

Postquã causa cognita ab illa adjudicata sunt bona immittuntur lictores ad incendendas ædes ejus in facti perpetuã memoriã. Jun.

Hence Observe, God hath judgments of all sorts and sizes for wicked men.

He hath Sodoms-judgments, such judgments as were poured upon Sodom, for high offenders, for Sodom-like sinners; He hath not spent all his fire and brimstone upon that City; brimstone shall yet be scattered upon the habitation of the wicked. And this notes,

First, The suddenness of the judgment. The Sodomites were surprized, when destroyed; they expected it not; The Sun rose upon Sodom, saith the Text, there was not a cloud threatning rain, they did not suspect a shower of water, much less did they see a cloud or suspect a shower of fire and brimstone, when God destroyed them.

Secondly, It notes the unavoidableness of it; for who is able to withstand burning brimstone, or to withdraw from that calamity, which drops from heaven? Our houses may shelter us when it rains water, but when it rains fire, our houses are no shelter.

Thirdly, It shews the immediatness of the judgment; The text saith only, that brimstone shall be scattered, but by whom, it saith not; if no hand of man appear against the wicked, God will; when none can deal with them, God can. God only appeared in the destruction of Sodom, and Gomorrah. All creatures are as ready at Gods call for the services of wrath and vengeance, as of mercy and salvation. If he do but hold up his finger, fire and brimstone are at hand to consume, as showers of rain to comfort the habitations of the world. Thus much of the third Allegory contained in these five verses. The wicked man was first apprehended by the messengers of death, and then brought to death that King of terrours; being dead, his goods are confiscate, others enter upon his estate, and brimstone is scattered on his habitation. Here's compleat wrath, and judgment in perfection.

Vers. 16. His roots shall be dried up beneath, and above shall his branches be cut off.

This is the fourth Allegory, taken from a tree. Men are often in Scripture compared to trees; all sorts of men, good men, bad men are so compared. Good men are compared to trees flourishing by the river side, (*Psal.*1.) Wicked men are also compared to flourishing trees, but with this difference, they flourish only for a while; but godly men are as trees that flourish continually, (*Psal.*92.14.) They shall still bring forth fruit in old age.

In this text the wicked man is compared to a tree; and he is compared to a flourishing tree, he hath both root, and branches, yet he is near declining, yea he is not far from destroying.

His root shall be dried up beneath.] He had a root; what was his root? The root of this wicked man, may be taken two wayes.

First, For those secret counsels, purposes, and designs which he layes for himself, these are to a man as his roots. A mans estate and affairs are setled and fastned by counsel, as a tree is by the roots: the root also which maintains and feeds his affairs and designs is counsel. So some interpret this place, his root shall be dried up; That is, his counsels, his under-ground-plots and projects which he laid deep, and low, quite out of sight, as the root of a tree is, these God will dry up, he shall see them come to nothing.

Secondly, By the roots in this Allegory we may understand more generally any thing by which this wicked man thought himself strong, or secure: For that is the use of a root. A root to a tree is as the foundation is to a house, the strength of it. His root is whatsoever may strengthen, and hold him fast, whatsoever may keep him in his state, and greatness. Thus not only his contrivances, and counsels, but his riches, and relations, his correspondencies, and allies, whatsoever we may put the notion of strength upon, all that is his root, by that he is upheld, and by that moisture is sent forth into all his branches. But there shall come rooters to his root, they shall grub, and stock him up, they shall take that from him in which his strength lay, and from which his enlivening moisture came.

And above his branches shall be cut off.] The word that we translate branch, signifies, a crop or a harvest; the fruit of a tree is the crop of it. You see compleat misery in this Allegory; root and branch, is all that a tree hath; and to be cut off root and branch, is to be utterly cut off. If the root be dried up, though the branches be not cut off, yet the tree withers and dies. Or if the root be not dried up, yet if all the branches be cut off, there's no beauty in it, nor can it bring forth any fruit; A trees bears not at the stock, but at the branches; 'tis but a stump if the branches be cut off.

But take it, as here, in both, and then the judgment is universal; what hath a tree left, when it hath lost, both root and branches. (*Mal.*4.1.) Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an Oven, and all the proud, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble, the day comes that shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts, it shall leave them neither root nor branch; That is, it shall totally consume them. As it speaks perfect mercy when both root and branch prosper (2 *King.*19.30.) And that remnant that shall escape of the house of Judah shall again take root downward, and bear fruit upward; So it shews the compleatness of a judgment, when there shall be neither root nor branch. The branches of man, are whatsoever man put's forth, to shew his excellency or vertues, his pomp or splendour by. Some interpret branches for children. So they are called, *Psal.*127. Thy children shall be as Olive branches, &c. And then his branches shall be cut off, is, his children and posterity shall be cut off. This also argues the greatness of the judgment.

Others by branches, understand his desires acted, or the work he had begun, and put forth: The motions and puttings forth of a man's spirit in actions, are like the branches of a tree: The thoughts of man in the Hebrew are expressed by a word which signifies the boughs of a tree: the fruits which our thoughts shoot, blossom, and bring forth, are our actions. Thus as the wicked man's root, his plots and designs shall be spoiled below; so the branches which shoot out from him into action, shall be broken off; and God will say to this man, as Christ to the Fig-tree, (*Mat.*21.19.) Never fruit grow on thee more. The root shall be dried up beneath, and the branches shall be cut off above.

Some understand this more literally, his root, and his branches, that is, his trees shall bear no fruit, or he shall be deprived of their fruit; the estate which he hath abroad in the field, his lands, and woods, his Gardens and plantations shall be destroyed: according to that (*Deut.*28.16.) Cursed shalt thou be in the field; that is, thy cattel shall miscarry, thy corn and fruits shall wither; or as we may apply that of the Prophet Isaiah (which is spoken (I conceive) of the general consumption which should come upon that people and their posterity) to this particular Judgment of spoiling all the hopes of fruit in the field. (*Chap.*5.24.) Therefore as the fire devoureth the stubble, and the flame consumeth the chaff, so their root shall be rottenness, and their blossom shall go up as dust. The root is fruit (in potentia remota) at a distance, the blossom is fruit (in potentia proxima) at next door, or the immediate antecedent of fruit; the Prophet to shew that there was no hope of fruit remaining, shews that both their remote and their neerest hope of fruit should be removed.

Nihil non peribet è rebus impii, peribit quod latet (radix) & quod eminet, ramus.

Hence Note, Wicked men may be fully furnished with means for the attaining of their ends.

Here are roots, and branches, deep counsels, high actings, many strengths, which are to the wicked man as the foundation is to the house, and as root and branches to the tree. The Prophet (*Psal.*37.35.) speaks under this similitude; I beheld the wicked like a green Bay-tree, O how he flourished! yea you may behold him sometimes, as an Oak of Bashan, as a Cedar of Lebanon; He casts forth his roots (in worldly and civil things, as a godly man doth in spirituals,) as Lebanon (Hosea 14.5.) that is, mighty roots: and his branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the Olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon. It is no unusual thing to see the worst of men thus rooted, thus branched, yea and (for a while) fruited too.

Secondly, Observe, When wicked men are in their greatest strength and beauty, when they have both root and branches, then judgment comes upon them.

The strength of man cannot protect against the justice of God, sinners shall feel the impressions of his anger; not only shall their goodly branches feel it, but their strongest roots. What root can keep its earth, when God raiseth a wind, and sends out his storm? What branch can keep either leaves or fruit, when God sends out his blasting mildew? (*Psal.*37.35.) David speaks of such a goodly flourishing-tree; I have seen the wicked in great power, there is his root; spreading himself like a green Bay-tree, there are his branches; yet he passed away, and lo he was not, yea I sought him, yet I could not find him. And the very interpretation which the Psalmist makes (in another place) of all the flourishing of wicked men, of their strong roots, and goodly branches, is, that they shall be rooted up; When the wicked spring as grass, and all the workers of iniquity flourish. What is the meaning of this? how may we interpret this? It is that they shall be destroyed for ever, (*Psal.*92.6,7.) And that which is spoken of mankind in general, is most true of this sort of mankind. *In the morning they are like grass that groweth up: In the morning it flourisheth, and grows up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth, Psal.*90.6. The strongest of men are but as grass, in the morning they grow; The best of their worldly beauty is but like grass, for both they and it, they and their glory are cut down and wither in the Evening. At what time soever man is cut down, it is his Evening; but to shew that man shall not continue long, he is here measured by the length of an artificial day, whereof the evening is rather the limit, then a part. Now if the beauty of all men be thus subject to a sudden decay, how much more they and theirs, who are the special objects of the wrath of God, because of their special sins. The Prophet Amos seems to imply, that the Amorites had some hopes to withstand their overthrow, and preserve themselves from a fall: Yet I destroyed the Amorite before them. What was this Amorite? His height was like the height of the Cedars. There was his flourishing branch. And he was strong as the Oaks (deeply rooted) yet I destroyed his fruit from above, and his roots from beneath, (Chap. 2. 9.) Though he were in height like the Cedar, though he were for strength like the Oak, yet up came his root, and down came his top. The creature is no match for the Creator. There is no securing our selves against God, when he comes to take vengeance; both root, and branch, beauty, and strength must wither, and dry up before his consuming jealousie.

over-

Hitherto Bildad hath covered and wrapt up his meaning in Allegories; in the allegory of light; in the allegory of hunting, and fowling; in the allegory of a judiciary proceeding; and now in the allegory of a tree. In all which, though there be much variety of usefull meditations for us, yet they all meet in this one great conclusion, that God hath prepared, and will certainly bring forth ruine and destruction for the portion of wicked men.

VERS. 17, 18, 19, 20, 21.

His remembrance shall perish from the earth: and he shall have no name in the street.
He shall be driven out from light into darkness, and chased out of the world.
He shall neither have son, nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.
They that come after him shall be astonied at his day, as they that went before were affrighted.
Surely such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

WHat the Disciples said to Christ, Joh. 16. 29. the same may we to Bildad about this shutting up of his discourse; Now speakest thou plainly, and no parable. These words are the plain English, or the explication of what he had delivered under the vayle of those Metaphors and Allegories already opened.

In them Bildad shadowed the estate of a wicked man; and here he sets it in the open light.

In the context of these five verses, we have three things especially to take notice of.

First, A description of the misery of a wicked man in the 17, 18, 19. verses.

Secondly, We have the effects which this shall produce, vers. 20.

Thirdly, The conclusion or upshot of all, in a rhetorical exclamation, vers. 21.

The misery of this wicked man is set forth three wayes.

First, By his dishonour, vers. 17. His remembrance shall perish, he shall have no name.

Secondly, By his death, or banishment, vers. 18. He shall be driven out from light to darkness, he shall be chased out of the world.

Thirdly, By the desolation of his family; He shall neither have son nor nephew, nor any remaining in his dwellings, vers. 19.

The effects which follow this great misery of the wicked man, at the 20*th* verse, are considerable two wayes.

First, What effect it shall have upon those that come after.

Apodosis sive accommodatio superiorum Allegoriarum ad thesin de statu improbi, ut obliquè perstringat Jobum. Jun.

Secondly, What upon those that went before, or that lived with him; the one shall be astonished, and the other affrighted.

The conclusion of all is; Such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

I shall briefly pass the misery of this wicked man in those three verses, because it is only the exposition of what we had before under allegories.

Vers. 17. His remembrance shall perish from the earth.

Dicitur memoria alicujus perire pro eo quod est in aternum ab hominum recordatione divelli. Bold.

This some take from the former verse; His root shall be dried up beneath, and his branches shall be cut off above. When root and branch are gone, then the memory of all is gone: what can remain when both these are removed?

The perishing of his remembrance, notes the utter extinction of his remembrance, as Chap. 3. 3. Job wisheth that the day might perish wherein he was born; his meaning is, that it might no more at all be remembred; so here, His remembrance shall perish.

And he shall have no name in the street.

No name.] The Hebrew is, There shall not be a name to him. By name, in Scripture, is meant honour or estimation among men; For wicked men have a name remaining; but it is an ill name, a name of dishonour, a blemish. So that when he saith, He shall have no name, the meaning is, he shall have no good name, or no honourable name remaining. Better have no name, then an ill name. Cain hath a name, and so hath Pharoah in the old Testament; Judas hath a name, and so hath Demas in the new, but they are all names of dishonour, and so no names. It is usual in Scripture to put the name for renown, and men of name by an hebraisme are men of renown, Numb. 1. 16. we render, These were men renowned: The Hebrew is, These were men of name. These were the renowned of the Congregation. These were men of name in the Congregation. Numb. 16. 2. And they rose up before Moses with certain of the children of Israel, 250 Princes of the assembly famous in the Congregation, men of renown, or, men of name. The Apostle (Rom. 1. 1.) is conceived to advance the honour of his Apostleship, when he saith, Paul called to be an Apostle. So we translate it, called to be; the Greek is, Paul called an Apostle: that is, Paul whose name is Apostle. Which may be taken according to this hebraisme, as a vindication of himself from that dis-repute which was cast upon him by many among the Romans. Therefore (saith he) Paul named an Apostle, or, he that hath this honour to be an Apostle writes to you. Paul was not ambitious of his own honour, but zealous, lest the Gospel which he preached should be contemned through the contemptibleness of him whose office and charge it was to preach it.

Non nomen ei. Heb. Nomen in scripturis famam & celebritatem denotat.

Viri nominati. Onkelos. Hi vocati Synagogæ. Sep. Elegantèr observant Scholia Græca vocem ὀνομαστοὶ significare nobiles, qua ratione Paulus dicit quòd sit vocatus Apostolus, i. e. Apostolus ille nominatus & celebris, ut evangelium ex prædicante ignobilitate non fieret contemptibile. Pined.

In the Text, His remembrance shall perish, is therefore put before he shall have no name; because a name is that by which we are remembred; The name of a man is his memorial. See both joyned together concerning God himself (Exod. 3. 15.) Thus thou shalt say to the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: this is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all Generations. That is, by this name I will have a memorial, or be remembred to all Generations. A man of no name, and a man of no number, are proverbials for a man of no esteem.

He shall have no name [in the street.]

In the face of the street; so saith the Original: that is, among men he shall have no name: men meet in the street, in publick places, there they discourse both of things, and persons. This man shall have no name there; or if he be there spoken of, (as one of the Ancients glosses the place,) men shall turn away their heads at the mention of him; they shall turn away with indignation, as if an ill savour distempered the ayre every time he was spoken of.

Super faciem plateæ Heb. Superficies cujusque rei, facies vocatur. Drus.

Hence note, It is the punishment of wicked men to have their names dye when they dye, much more while they live.

A good name among men, is a great blessing: and hence it is a great sin to bear false witness against another, because that takes away his good name. A false witness speaks to the discredit of his neighbour, and sets a brand of disgrace upon his name. If a good name were not a precious commodity; if to be remembred among men were not a great honour, this were not so great a sin. The memory, or name of the wicked shall rot, Prov. 10. 4. He doth not say, his house, or his body shall rot, though they must, but his memory shall rot; that is, either it shall not be remembred at all, or when ever it is, it shall be remembred as a rotten thing.

Good men, usually, have an ill name among many in the world, and indeed they can scarce be good, of whom all speak well; yea the best may for a time have a blot upon their name among those that are good; but commonly their blot is given by those that are evil. And it is some addition of honour to be ill spoken of by those that are evil: For as it is a discommendation to be commended by such, and a kind of disrespect to be respected by them, so it is our commendation to be diſcommended by them, and an argument of our integrity, when they condemn us But it is a precious priviledge to have a name with thoſe whoſe names are precious, and to be eſteemed by thoſe who are juſtly had in eſtimation. Further, though the name of a good man for a while be under a cloud, yet his light breaks forth again; and though all the while he lives, his name ſuffer among many, yet when he dyes, his name revives among all. How precious was the name of Paul, to the Saints in his dayes? how precious is it among all true Saints to this day? yet while he lived, he was accounted by moſt, as the off-ſcouring of all things! Reproached Saints recover honour when they dye, whereas the names of wicked men who lived in honour, fall under reproach when they dye. A good man's name is beſt when he is dead: A wicked man may have a name while he lives. Nero is now called a Tyrant; if any had called him ſo while he lived, he could not have had ſafe living in any part of the world. But though flatterers cry up wicked men while they live, in hope to get by them, and though the ſincere dare not cry them down, fearing to be ruin'd by them; yet when they are in their graves, they have no name in the ſtreets, but a name of diſgrace.

Again, Obſerve; To want a name among men, is moſt grievous to a wicked man.

Loſs of credit and eſtimation among men, is an affliction to any man, but moſt to wicked men; when they loſe their name here, they have loſt it every where: They have no name in heaven, there they are men of no name; if they loſe their name on earth too, then they are men of no name indeed. Though a Godly man ſhould have no name on earth, yet he hath a name written where it ſhall never be blotted out; his name is written in heaven. Chriſt would have us rejoyce in this more then in all worldly names, (Luk. 10. 2,3.) when his Diſciples rejoyced becauſe they had power over evil ſpirits, and could cure all diſeaſes, ſo that their name was up in the world, and 'twas talked of in all places, what mighty things they had done, and Chriſt denied not that it was an honour to be impower'd for the doing of thoſe great things, Yet (ſaith he) rejoyce not in this, but rather rejoyce that your names are written in heaven. Now, I ſay, as the Saints ſhould rejoyce in this honour, that their names are written in heaven, above all their rejoycings in an earthly name; and ſhould not onely out-joy worldly joyes, but even joy them out, with the joy they have in God. So, though the Saints have no name upon earth, though their name be written in the duſt, yea though an evil favour be ſcattered upon their name, yet they have cauſe to rejoyce that their names are written in heaven, that their names are enrolled among Saints and Angels, among Patriarks, and Apoſtles; that their names are fixed where the names of the greateſt Potentates in the world (who know not God) ſhall have no place. 'Tis then a ſpecial evil to wicked men to loſe their name in this world, becauſe when they have loſt that, they have loſt all: And when they have loſt it here, they can find it no where. And we may take notice, that whereas the ambition of carnal men layes it ſelf forth in nothing more then to provide for the perpetuating of their names in the world, that yet they loſe their deſign, their names being blotted out, and their memorial loſt in the world. The natural Hiſtorian obſerves of thoſe famous Pyramides, which were ſet up in Egypt; that though the work was ſtupendious, and admirable, and is remembred by many ancient Writers; yet (ſaith he) it doth not appear among all thoſe Writers, who were the founders of thoſe Pyramides. Upon which he gives this obſervation, That by a juſt judgment, their names who raiſed thoſe amazing or rather mad ſtructures, are buried in an eternal night of forgetfulneſs, or (as this Text ſpeaks) their remembrance is periſhed from the earth. And as this befel thoſe ſons of ambition, who intended to make themſelves famous with poſterity, by erecting thoſe vain-glorious fabricks; ſo much more will it fall to their lot, who hope to make themſelves famous, by wicked works, by injuſtice, tyranny, and oppreſſion, by voluptuouſneſs, intemperance, or any other abomination. The Lord will ſend a rot upon ſuch names, and their memory ſhall periſh for ever. This is the firſt judgement threatned; He ſhall not have an honourable mention among men; He ſhall have no name in the ſtreet.

Cum ſcriptores plurimi de tribus illis malibus inſania multa prodiderunt, inter omnes tamen illos non conſtat à quibus facta ſunt, juſtiſſimo caſu obliteratis tantæ vanitatis Authoribus. Plin. l. 36. c. 12.

The ſecond is;

Verſ. 18. He ſhall be driven out from light to darkneſs, and chaſed out of the world.

He ſhall be driven.] The word notes a forcible violent or compulſory act, he ſhall be driven, like a beaſt againſt his will, or whether he will or no. But what ſhall drive him, or who ſhall drive him? The Hebrew is plural, and the verb which we read paſſively, is active; ſo it is rendred by a learned tranſlator, They ſhall drive him. But who are theſe Drivers? who they are is not expreſt. Some underſtand his troubles, and ſorrows, they ſhall drive him from light to darkneſs, he ſhall dye under the preſſure of his afflictions. Expellent eum. Mont.

Others refer it to God himſelf, who is the ſupream diſpencer of judgments; He ſhall be driven by God, or God ſhall drive him from light to darkneſs, and chaſe him out of the world. But whether we apply it to God the efficient, or to thoſe afflictions which are the inſtrument of his expulſion, the ſence and tendency of the Text is the ſame.

He ſhall be driven, [from light to darkneſs.]

From a threefold light to a threefold darkneſs; firſt, from the light of honour, to the darkneſs of diſgrace; ſecondly, from the light of life, to the darkneſs of death; thirdly, from the light of temporal felicity, to the darkneſs of eternal miſery and condemnation: whither ſoever, or into what eſtate ſoever he goes, He ſhall be driven. So the wrathful dealing of God with the wicked is expreſt in Scripture. Some conceive, that the Goſpel-language alludes to this paſſage of Bildad. (Mat. 8. 12.) The children of the Kingdome ſhall be caſt out into utter darkneſs. The Jewes were children of the Kingdome, and they thought themſelves heirs of the Kingdome; yea, they preſumed, as if the Kingdome had been entailed upon their perſons, becauſe they were Abrahams poſterity; yet ſaith Chriſt, even you, for all your confidences, ſhall be caſt into utter darkneſs; that is, to hell, where there is nothing but darkneſs, or you ſhall be caſt quite beyond the verge, or utmoſt bound of the Kingdome. The Kingdome hath light all over, but beyond the Kingdome there is no light; being then caſt out of all hopes to enter the Kingdome, they muſt needs be caſt into utter darkneſs, or into that darkneſs, which is without. And as thoſe children of the Kingdome, ſo all unprofitable ſervants are under the ſame doom, Matth. 25. 30. And again, (Matth. 22. 13.) Bind him hand and foot, and caſt him into utter darkneſs; there ſhall be weeping, and wayling, and gnaſhing of teeth.

Videtur Bildad id maxime ſignificare, quod omnibus improbis evenit. Omnes autem improbi non ita puniantur in hac vita, ſed omnes tandem detrudentur in tenebras exteriores. Coc.

We may expound the wicked man in the Text, driven from light to this darkneſs. Not onely is he driven from the light of honour, to the darkneſs of diſgrace, and from the light of life, to the darkneſs of a temporal death, but to the darkneſs of eternal death, which is utter darkneſs.

And chaſed out of the world.] This clauſe is of the ſame mind with the former; To chaſe, as to drive, notes a violent purſuit; and he is chaſed not onely out of the ſociety of his friends, or out of the Land where he lived, but out of the Land of the living.

Hence note; Wicked men do not go, but are violently caſt out of the world.

He is chaſed as a wild beaſt; He hath no mind to go out of his fat paſture, from the place he knows, to a place he knows not. (Luk. 12.20.) It is ſaid of the rich man; This night ſhall they fetch thy ſoul from thee. He did not reſign, and give it up, but he was driven from it, or it was drawn from him; either of which is to be chaſed out of the world. This is the wicked mans ſecond woe.

יגרוהו fugabunt eum נדד vagatus eſt.

Behold, A third;

Verſ. 19. He ſhall have neither ſon nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.

This verſe extends the curſe upon him in reference to his poſterity. There is nothing difficult in theſe words; here's total eradication; not onely ſhall he have no ſon, but no ſons ſon. And when he ſaith, nor ſon, nor nephew; it is not to be taken ſtrictly; but as including all his kindred, in what degree ſoever. It is as much as to ſay, he ſhall have have none of his lineage remain, all shall be extinct. Again; He doth not say, he never had son nor nephew, but he shall not have; there shall none remain among his people.

And not onely shall he have no kindred remaining among his people; but he shall not have any remaining in his dwellings: That is, not any friend, not any acquaintance, not any that bears good will to him. A mans children are neerest, and then his nephews; then profest friends, acquaintance, and familiars. But when neither son, nor nephew, nor any friend remains, this is a sweeping Judgement, a very besome of destruction. It leaves none remaining

In his dwellings.] Or in the place of his peregrination and sojourning in this world, as the word imports. In this Bildad strikes at Job, and wounds the heart of the good man; from whom God had taken all his children; as if he had plainly said; God hath dealt with thee as with a wicked man, thou hast neither son nor nephew among thy people, nor any remaining in thy dwellings. But passing by this supposition in reference to Job; we may take up a point or two, as it concerns wicked men in general. First note;

The children and posterity of wicked men, are swept away for their fathers wickedness.

Though children shall not be punished for their fathers sin, if they repent, and return to God; yet greater evils fall upon children who do not repent, because of the iniquity of their fathers. Yea good children who walk with God, may have some touch, though not in wrath to them, yet in wrath to their fathers, because of their evils. I have met with this before, and therefore onely touch it.

Secondly, Observe how he puts this as a special judgement belonging to wicked men, for though sometimes it be the lot of godly men, to have neither son, nor nephew, nor any remaining in their dwellings (Some good men never had son or nephew, and others have been bereaved of all they had) yet this is not so great an affliction to a godly man, as it is to the ungodly. For he that can call God father, and speak to Christ as his brother, he that is allied to all the Saints in heaven and earth, in a spiritual relation, hath no want of natural relations, though he hath them not: it is no great matter to him, though he have neither son nor nephew, who is an adopted son of God.

As before, in reference to honour, and renown; a godly man can spare his honour and credit in the world well enough; because he hath so good a name in heaven; he is so well reported of with God, that if the wicked trample his honour in the dust, and reproach him here on earth, he hath no reason to be discomforted. So, he can spare, and be without the outward blessing of sons and daughters, of nephews and friends, because he hath higher alliances, and a more noble consanguinity, as the Prophet speaks; God hath given him a name better then that of sons and daughters, (Isa. 56. 5.) But for a wicked man, if he want sons, and nephews, to inherit his estate, and to carry on his part in the world; he hath nothing to relieve that want. He that is childless, and Christless too, hath reason to weep for his children, and not be comforted, because they are not. The fruit of the body was put among the promised blessings to the Jewes, (Deut. 28. 11.) Children are the comfort of their living parents, and the continuance of their name and memory when they die. That promise (Psal. 72. 17.) speaks this fully; His name shall endure for ever; his name shall be continued as long as the Sun; men shall be blessed in him; all Nations shall call him blessed. The Hebrew is; He shall be as a son to continue his fathers name for ever. So we read in the Margine. Some render the place; His name shall be sonned, or sonnified, If I may speak so; that is, his name by many sons shall be continued. This was a prophecy concerning Jesus Christ. As if the several acts, (so some interpret it) and passages of Christs life should be as so many sons, to declare his name to all Generations. But we may rather interpret it of the seed, or children of Christ: his name is continued by sons: he hath a mighty seed, and, He shall see his seed, (Isa. 53. 10.)

Filiabitur nomen ejus. Mont. i. e. multi filii nomen ejus deducent in omnes Generationes, vel ita celebria erunt Christi gesta, ac si singula opera essent filii, qui sunt memoriale sui parentis. Pined.

In the first ages of the world, either not to have a son, or to have a son die before the father, was an unheard of affliction. One of the Ancients hath observed, that there is not in the Geneallogies before the floud, nor in some generations after, mention of any father, whose son died before himself. But as all had sons, so their sons out-lived their fathers; God giving that as a special comfort to those ages. The first son that died before his father, is recorded (Gen. 11. 27, 28.) Now these are the Generations of Terah, Terah begat Abraham, Nachor and Haran, and Haran begat Lot: and Haran died before his father Terah, in the land of his nativity. It seems to be noted as a strange thing never heard of, nor mentioned in the Book of God before, that the son should die before the father. And, saith my Author, it is to be considered, that this Terah, whose son Haran died before him, was not onely a worshipper of Idols, but (as it is conceived) an inventer of Idols; This was the onely man upon record, whose sons death prevented his in those elder times. And in all times it hath been numbred among the afflictions incident to sinfull man, when any son dies before the father, much more when the father hath no son remaining when he dies.

Deus in solatium naturæ largiebatur primis seculis, ut nullus filius moreretur ante patrem, donec in supplicium Idololatriæ Thare pater Abraham primus puntus est morte filii sui adhuc vivens. Epiph. lib. 1 contra Hær. Author & artifex fingendi Idola. Id. Quidam resurrectionem aliam non admittebant quam eam, qua consebantur rursus vivere in ipsis filiis parentes mortui. Epiphan.

Epiphanius in his Writings against heresies reports that some held no resurrection, but the rising up of the fathers in their children; when the father dies, the child rises in his place; this was their resurrection. Though this were a gross heresie, yet there is a truth in it; the father riseth in his child; parents have a kind of resurrection in their children, and while they live parents can scarcely be said to be dead: upon this account the greatness of the affliction riseth yet higher, he that hath neither son nor nephew remaining in his dwellings when he dies, may be accounted more then dead.

This is the third evil that Bildad sets down as the portion of the wicked man, who, as he shall be driven out of the world himself; so his posterity shall be blotted out.

He proceeds to shew us what effect this, with the forementioned judgments, should have upon the spirits of the living, what the sight or report of these terrible judgments will work, both in present and after ages.

Vers. 20. They that come after him shall be astonished at his day, as they that went before were affrighted.

For the opening of this verse, we may enquire; first, whom he means by, They that come after, and, they that went before him; secondly, what by his day; thirdly, what by astonished and affrighted.

אחרונים Novissimi

They that come after him, &c.] Those that come after, and those that went before, are all men. If it be said, how could they that went before him be affrighted at his day? they that never saw his day, could not be troubled at it?

I answer; The Original word doth not signifie strictly such as live before we live, but such, who though they were born before us, yet are alive while we live; that is, men more ancient then our selves, and yet our contemporaries; so here, they who went before this wicked man, are such, who though they were born before him, yet lived with him, and saw the judgments of God upon him: So the meaning of it is onely this, That as they who lived at that present when God brought those evils upon him were affrighted; so they that come after shall be astonished at him. That is, the one was affrighted at the sight of those judgments, and others shall be astonished at the report, and hearing of them. So our translators expound those words in the margine; They that went before him, that is, they that lived with him shall be affrighted. This sence is also expresly given by Mr. Broughton; As they at present took an horror.

Again, These termes, They that went before him, and they that come after him, may refer not only to time, but to degree. That is, those that went before him in estate, and honour; and they that come after him in estate, and honour. As if he had said, high and low, rich and poor, his superiours and inferiours, one and other shall be astonished and affrighted at the terrible fall of this man; when first and last, high and low are afflicted, all are.

They that come after him [shall be astonied.]

The Original word which we render astonied, signifies to to admire greatly and silently. Silent admiration is astonishment; it signifies also to be wasted and made desolate. And so strictly that astonishment is meant, which ariseth from the sight or view of places or persons made or left desolate. In the 143 Psalm, ver. 4. David saith, (as we translate) My heart within me is desolate: another translates; My heart within me is amazed. Thus here the desolation of the wicked shall be so great, that they who hear the report of it, or behold the ruines of the place, where once he dwelt and flourished, shall stand amazed; even as they who lived to see it acted upon him שׁעה Apprehenderunt Horrorem. Mont.

Were affrighted. The Hebrew is, They took hold of fear, or Horror; which is equivalent with this; Fear or Horror took hold of them, or seized upon them like an Armed man. Yet some of the Jewish Doctors think that Bildad spake thus industriously; using that phrase; They took hold of fear, rather then this, Fear took hold of them; to intimate, that when they saw such judgments, they were even active to stir up fear in themselves, or to over-awe their hearts with fears, and turn to the Lord, lest the same calamities should also befal them; according to that, Luk. 13. 3. Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. They that went before him were affrighted

De die ejus. i.e. de judicio domini revelato in eum ob exitium ejus, id enim dies significat. Merc.

At his day. But, what day is this? This day, is his black day, the day of his calamity. It is frequent in Scripture to put the word day alone, without any addition, to note an eminent evil day. The patience of God bears long with the wickedness of man, but it will not bear alwayes. (Psal. 37. 13.) The Lord laughs at him: for he sees that his day is coming. While the wicked plots against the just, hoping to have the day against him, and gnasheth upon him with his teeth, as being vext and filled with envy that he hath a day for himself; while he is thus busie against the man whom God loves, God makes sport at him; The Lord laughs at him, (and saith, as it were, let him plot, let him go on,) because he sees his day is coming: What day? The day of his ruine, and destruction; this shall suddenly come upon him. In the same sence the word is used (Psal. 137. 7.) Remember O Lord the children of Edom, in the day of Jerusalem. Was this the day of Jerusalems triumph, and glory? no, it was the day of Jerusalems misery, and sorrow; it was the day, when the children of Edom cryed; Rase it, rase it, even to the foundations thereof. In the Prophecy of Obadiah (vers. 12.) Thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy brother; That is, upon the day of his affliction, or upon the affliction of that day. What! may we not look upon the afflictions of our brethren? yes we may, to pity, and compassionate them, but we must not look upon them with pleasure or delight, with contempt or scorn, as the Edomites did; thou shouldest not have looked scornfully, or contentfully upon the afflictions of thy brother: The day of thy brothers affliction should have been a sad day to thee.

Thus it is frequent in Scripture to call the day of affliction a day emphatically. And so we may interpret that of the Apostle, (1 Cor. 3. 13.) where he deciphers several sorts of doctrines, under those allegorical expressions of gold and silver, of wood, hay, and stubble. Now (saith he) every mans work shall be tryed, it shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it. What day? the day of tryal; he puts the day alone, for the day of tryal, or of judgment, when God shall come to lay the work and the rule together; when he shall bring stubble, &c. and the fire together; the day of tryal shall discover, and make manifest what every mans work is. So here, They shall be astonished at his day; that is, at the day of his affliction.

Dies in quibus impius feliciter vivit, commodato habet & quasi alienos non proprios.

Further, this is called his day, to note, that it is his of right, or that it is his due. For all the good and comfortable dayes that he lives, are borrowed dayes, they are but lent him, onely the evil day, is his day; that's his own.

The Lord will send such judgments upon the wicked, as shall be an astonishment and an affrightment to those who behold or hear of them.

As the works of mercy which God hath done for his people are wonderfull, (Psal. 78. 4. Psal. 107. 15.) And as God hath wonderfull mercies and blessings in store for his people against that great day of his appearing; he will then come to be admired in all them that believe (2 Thes. 1. 10.) That is, he will do such things for believers as shall be both to their own and others admiration: So his works of judgments shall be admired too; He will make the plagues of the wicked wonderfull. The Lord threatens (Deut. 28. 59.) I will make thy plagues wonderfull. Such was the desolation prophecied against Tyrus (Ezek. 27. 35.) All the inhabitants of the Isles shall be astonished at thee; their Kings shall be sore afraid. They shall not be afraid of thee, but for thee. They shall not be afraid of thy standing, but at thy overthrow. So (Ezek. 32. 10.) at the fall of Egypt, Tea, I will make many people amazed at thee, and their Kings shall be horribly afraid for thee. When I shall brandish my sword before them, and they shall tremble at every moment, every man for his own life in the day of thy fall, &c. See how the Merchants shall be astonished at the fall of Babylon (Rev. 18. 11, 15.) The judgment upon Jezabel (2 King. 9. 37.) is expressed by some translators in the language of Astonishment, The carkass of Jezabel shall be as dung in the field in the portion of Jezreel: So that they shall not say, this is Jezabel. Thus we translate: others render it; The carkass of Jezabel shall be as dung in the field in the portion of Jezreel; So that they (being amazed) shall say, Is this Jezabel? What, is this Jezabel? is she become as dung in the face of the field, who so lately sate upon a throne: what, is this she that painted her face, and looked so delicately out at the window, the great commandress in Israel, is this Jezabel? Thus they wonder. The judgement denounced upon the house of Eli, made the ears of those that heard it tingle, (1 Sam. 3. 13.) That which makes the ear tingle, will also make the heart tremble, and amaze the hearer.

Obstupentes qui præter ibant, dicebant, illa Jezabel?

Now Bildad shuts up his argument, having thus laid down the lot of the wicked, and set it out in several portions; he gives (as it were) a confirmation to all, he puts his seal to it. As if he had said, I have not spoken at randome, I have not spoken what may be; but I have spoken that which shall be, this shall certainly come to pass. And if others shall be astonished who hear or see onely, how shall they who bear and feel those calamities?

Vers. 21. Surely, such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

Surely He concludes confidently; What I have spoken, I will stand to for a truth; thus it shall be. When Ahasuerus (in the Book of Hester) advanced Mordecai, and set him in royal apparel upon the best horse, he (according to Hamans counsel) caused it to be proclaimed before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the King delights to honour. So here Bildad having shewed the wicked man in a compleat equipage of misery, stript of all his comforts, and good things, and not so much as a good word left him from any man; but all men standing amazed and astonished at his downfall, he seems to proclaim, Thus shall it be done to the man whom God resolves to dishonour: thus shall it be done to the man whom God dis-favours and frowns upon; such are the dwellings of the wicked, this their end.

Hence note; We may certainly conclude, that the estate of a wicked man is miserable.

As some Believers have an assurance for themselves personally, that it shall be well with them; so we may be assured in reference to the present state of a wicked man, that it shall go ill with him and his; Such are the dwellings of the wicked. Though we cannot conclude concerning the person of a wicked man, that he shall be cast away for ever, for tis possible he may repent and be saved, yet as to his present state, and to his person as continuing in that estate, we may with assurance, conclude him undone for ever. The Prophet Isaiah hath this charge from the Lord, (Isai. 3. 10.) Say to the righteous, it shall be well with him: for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him: for the reward of his hands shall be given him; and that reward is woe. The reward put into the hand of a wicked man is such as the work of his hand is; he is a worker of iniquity, then what can his reward be, but woe and misery? Such as a mans way is, such will his end be; If the premises be false and unsound, the conclusion cannot be safe and good. As by a mans fruit we may know what he is, so what he shall be, unless he be changed from what he is. Such are the dwellings of the wicked.

And

And this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

Periphraſis impii qui Deum nec novit nec colit, nam colit qui novit, unde pii vocantur יהוה יודעי noſcentes domini. Druſ.

In theſe words we have the character of a wicked man; the man who knows not God, and the wicked man, are the ſame. No wicked man knows God, and every man that knows not God is wicked. Theſe are termes convertible. This is the place of him that knows not God. There is a fourfold not knowing of God.

Firſt, There is an utter not knowing of God, or a total ignorance of God. He muſt needs be wicked and walk in darkneſs, that hath no light at all of the knowledge of God.

Secondly, They are ſaid not to know God, who have but a falſe or an erroneous knowledge of God: wrong knowledge is a kind of ignorance; they who know not God, as God, and as God hath declared himſelf to be known, theſe know him not. Now as they who are under a night of total ignorance, ſo they who have an unſound knowledge, and live under a falſe light, are numbred with the wicked; for where there are falſe principles, and apprehenſions of God in the head, there cannot be a right frame of heart towards God.

Thirdly, There is a practical not knowing of God, and that is moſt proper to this place (though both the former may be underſtood.) Some have a notional knowledge of God, and that (poſſibly) a right notion, their underſtanding is not wrapt up in errour; yet they may be numbred among thoſe that know not God, becauſe they act contrary to their knowledge. Of theſe the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Tit. 1. 16. They profeſs that they know him, but in their works they deny him; This knowledge is practical ignorance. We read of ſuch in the Epiſtle of Jude (ver. 10.) who what they know naturally as bruit beaſts, in thoſe things they corrupt themſelves; That is, they live not according to natural principles: as they ſpeak evil (the former part of the verſe rebukes that) of thoſe things which they know not, ſo they do evil about, or in thoſe things which they know. Their knowledge is according to the light of nature, but their actions are againſt the light of nature. They know onely as beaſts do, naturally, but they act contrary to this knowledge, which beaſts do not. Now as a wicked man corrupts himſelf in that which he knows by nature, ſo he may corrupt himſelf in that which he knows by doctrine, or inſtruction. And in this reſpect, though he have a higher knowledge then a beaſt, yet he is but as a bruit beaſt in his knowledge; or as the Prophet ſpeaks of thoſe in his time, (Jer. 10. 14.) He is bruitiſh in his knowledge. To have notions according to knowledge, and actions according to ignorance, is to be bruitiſh in knowledge. And I conceive the Apoſtle aymes at theſe, (1 Cor. 15. 34.) Awake to righteouſneſs, and ſin not (the Greek is, awake righteouſly, that is, give your minds and endeavours unto righteouſneſs) for ſome have not the knowledge of God: I ſpeak this to your ſhame. He writes not of thoſe that had no knowledge of God; but either of thoſe who had an erroneous knowledge, or rather, of thoſe that lived in wayes of unrighteouſneſs againſt their knowledge, as the immediate fore-going words intimate; Awake unto righteouſneſs: for ſome have not the knowledge of God: That is, they have not ſuch a knowledge of God, as keeps them to the rule of righteouſneſs. Here again is practical ignorance, or a not knowing of God, when he is known. How great a wickedneſs this is in ſuch as have ſcriptural revelations of God, we may eaſily collect, when we find God charging it as a piece of wickedneſs upon the old Gentiles, who had onely natural revelations of God, that is, onely ſo much knowledge of God as might be pickt out of, or learned by an attentive ſtudy in the book of the creature. (Rom. 1. ver. 21.) Becauſe when they knew God, they did not glorifie him as God, neither were thankfull, but became vain in their imaginations, and their fooliſh heart was darkned; and becauſe (though they had a knowledge of God in them, yet) they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, or to acknowledge God, as we put in the margin of our Bibles (ver. 28.) this provoked God to give them up to vile affections, and to a reprobate mind. We may take meaſure of the ſin by the puniſhment. Spiritual judgements are worſe then corporal. To be given up to vile affections, is more penal then to be given up to the vileſt enemies; yet thus were the Gentiles plagued for ſinning againſt that light which the creature ſheds forth concerning God; then what will their plague be, who ſin againſt Scripture-light, and are ſuch as know not God in their own works, when they know him in his word?

Fourthly, There is an affected not knowing of God, or (as we may expreſs it) a ſtudied ignorance of God; For as we all ought to know God, ſo ſome ſtudy to be ignorant of God, and to keep out the knowledge of holy things. And as, to all, it is a burden to get knowledge, ſo, to many, knowledge gotten is very burdenſome. Man cannot ſin ſo eaſily in the light as in the dark; he puts himſelf hard to it to ſin, who ſins againſt what he ſees. And therefore that they may have liberty to ſin, they have no will to ſee. Such are deſcribed (Job 21. 14.) They ſay to God, Depart from us, we deſire not the knowledge of thy wayes. Thus as ſome in their practice oppoſe the good which they know, ſo others refuſe to know what is good, that they may the more freely practice evil. And when any man hath long oppoſed light received, he grows unwilling to receive light. He follows on to be ignorant of God; and at laſt is willing to believe, There is no God. He that cares not what God ſaith, will not care much to ſay, there is no God. Atheiſm riſeth from prophaneneſs; and he that blaſphemes the word of God daily in his converſation, will at laſt blaſpheme the being of God in his opinion. Theſe know not God indeed, who know not that there is a God; and into this the affected ignorance of God will quickly caſt the wiſeſt (who are ſuch) among the ſons of men.

cognitio hæc quæ impio negatur eſt practica quædam ſapientia quæ in divino cultu conſiſtit in pietate, & in guſtu quodam & quaſi ſapore divinæ bonitatis.

We may take in all theſe ſorts of not knowing of God, into the interpretation of this Text; but ſpecially the third, and fourth; ſuch as know God, yet walk contrary to him; or ſuch as refuſe to know God, leſt they ſhould be troubled to walk according to their knowledge. And indeed a wicked man may have the higheſt knowledge of God, on this ſide the love of God, and obedience to his will, which is attainable; he may have any knowledge of God, but that which gives an experimental taſte and reliſh of the goodneſs of God, or that God is good. And hence it is that he ſometimes hinders his own proficiency in the knowledge of God, leſt if he knew as much as he could, he ſhould be hinder'd from doing (what he hath a mind to) evil as he could.

Hence note; Firſt, Wickedneſs and ignorance go together.

In ſcriptura ſacra illa ignorari cenſemur, quæ cognita nullum nobis uſum attulerunt, quomodo dicimus illa non audire quibus non obedimus. Sanct.

Dicit eos Deum non noſſe, qui in peccatis perſeverantes, Deum ſic norunt, ut ejus penitus oblivi videantur. Bez.

Where there is only an invincible Ignorance of God, that is, ſuch an ignorance as the man cannot help or avoid, there is nothing but wickedneſs; much more where there is this profeſſed ſtudied ignorance. When the Prophet Hoſea ſets forth the great iniquity of that people, he gives this in the cloſe, as the cauſe of all, (Hoſ. 4. 1.) The Lord hath a controverſie with the Inhabitants of the Land; becauſe there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the Land. It is ſtrange that the Prophet ſhould bring in ſuch a charge againſt Iſrael; What could he ſay more of the Philiſtims, of the uncircumciſed Nations, and rude Barbarians, who ſate in darkneſs, and in the valley of the ſhadow of death? What could he ſay more againſt them, then that there was no knowledge of God in their Land? could he ſpeak thus truly to the people of Iſrael, and Judah, Gods own people? Was there no knowledge of God in their Land? This cannot be underſtood of a total Ignorance, or as if there had been none at that time who publiſhed the truth, or knowledge of God in that Land. But the meaning is, either that there was not much knowledge of God in the Land; (for in Scripture that which is not in ſome competent meaſure what it ought to be, is ſaid not to be at all) or though they had the knowledge of God, yet they oppoſed the receiving of it, at leaſt they were not zealous to promote it, nor carefull to walk up to it. Now though a land were full of knowledge, as the waters cover the Sea, yet (in ſuch caſes) we might ſay, There is no knowledge of God in the Land. This want of knowledge cauſed that plenty of ſin, and over-flowing of wickedneſs, for which God had a controverſie with their Land. We have ſuch a character of ſinfull times given (2 Chron. 15. 3.) Now, for a long ſeaſon, Iſrael was without the true God, and without a teaching Prieſt, and without Law. They were not totally deſtitute of theſe, but comparatively; There was a great neglect of teaching and expounding the Law; and then there was ſo little of

God

God among them, that they were ſaid to be without the true God. Wickedneſs and ignorance grow up together; ignorance is the mother of prophaneneſs, not of devotion, as the Popiſh teachers (with ignorance enough) perſwade their deluded Votaries. The Pſalmiſt (Pſal. 14. 2.) joynes theſe two together; There is none that underſtandeth, or that ſeeketh after God. Would you know the reaſon why they did not ſeek God? it was becauſe they did not underſtand: and (verſ. 4.) Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge, who eat up my people as bread, and do not call upon the Lord; As if he had ſaid, if they had but a little true knowledge among them all, they would not thus greedily devour my people; they made no bones of oppreſſion, they ſwallowed the poor as pleaſantly as bread, they did they cared not what, when they knew not what they ought to do. The flood-gates of wickedneſs are open, where the door of knowledge is ſhut.

When Chriſt tells us (Joh. 17. 3.) This is eternal life to know God, and Jeſus Chriſt whom he hath ſent. Why doth he ſay, this is eternal life, but becauſe it ſets us in a frame of holy life? It works grace, and therefore it is glory. It is a holy life to know God thus, therefore it will be a happy life. As to know God is eternal life; ſo not to know him is eternal death. He that knows God, loves him, and he that loves him keeps his commandments, (Joh. 14.) and they that do not know God, do not love him; and they that do not love him, do not keep his commandments. Many ſin againſt their knowledge, but they cannot avoid ſin, who have no knowledge. The blind eat many a fly, yea poyſon inſtead of bread.

Further, Some underſtand this Text of the knowledge that God hath of man; not of the knowledge that man hath of God; reading it thus; This is the place of him whom God doth not know. It is a truth both wayes: for they that do not know God, are not known of God. It is as true a character of a wicked man that God doth not know him, as that he doth not know God. But doth not God know every man? How then is it ſaid that God doth not know a wicked man? As men are ſaid not to know God, when they do not love and reverence him, when they do not fear and obey him; ſo God is ſaid not to know thoſe men whom he doth not love nor approve. (Mat. 7. 24.) Depart from me ye workers of iniquity, I know you not. Wicked men do not know God obedientially, and God doth not know wicked men favourably; and whether we ſay of a man he knows not God, or of God that he knows not ſuch a man, it equally ſpeaks him a wicked man.

Laſtly, Whereas Bildad (as his friends before him) makes ſo large a deſcription of the ſtate of a wicked man, and of the portion due to him; firſt, in allegories, and then in plain words, inſiſting upon and repeating it again and again. It is queſtioned by ſome, why his and their ſpirits were drawn forth ſo frequently and unanimouſly to ſpeak of this matter? I anſwer; This might be, firſt, to undeceive the ſimple, who are ready to call the wicked happy, becauſe of their preſent proſperity; Secondly, to conquer the unbelief of moſt who can ſcarcely be perſwaded, that ſin will be ſo bitter in the end.

Many hope to thrive by wickedneſs, and not a few are afraid they ſhould be undone by keeping cloſe to the wayes of holineſs. Therefore the Lord doth ſo often thunder by the voyce of his ſervants, and reveal his wrath from heaven againſt all unrighteouſneſs; Therefore he hath cauſed the penmen of the holy Scriptures to write the evil of it (as it were) in letters of blood, and to give teſtimony, that it hath ſhed the blould of thouſands already, and will deſtroy all eternally who turn not from it.

Take this anſwer more fully in the following obſervation.

The heart of man is hardly brought to believe that God will indeed pour out wrath upon ſinful men.

As it is a hard thing to believe that God will pour out ſo many bleſſings on his own people: ſo to believe that God will pour out ſo many vials of miſery upon wicked men. Therefore as we hear of the promiſes again, and again; and God oft repeats his mercies to perſwade us that he will indeed perform what he hath ſpoken: ſo we hear threatnings again and again, to overcome the unbelief of wicked men, or to make all know this ſad truth; Woe to the wicked, woe to the wicked. If the heart were ready to receive this, it would not be ſo often repeated. Few would take God at his word if he had ſpoke this but once. God ſpake to man in the ſtate of perfection; In the day that thou eateſt thou ſhalt ſurely die. No, ſaith the Devil, and the Woman beſieves him, it ſhall not be ſo: the threatning was but once given, and it was not believed at all. The heart of man doth hardly cloſe, either with promiſes or threatnings. Again, God doth it to render wicked men more unexcuſable. If he had ſpoken but once, if there had been but one word of threatning againſt ſin all the Bible over, ſinners had been without excuſe; but how ſhall their mouths be ſtopped, when theſe threatnings are ſo often renewed? when every Page of Scripture teſtifies the deſtruction of wicked men, and ſeals wrath upon them, if they go on in their wickedneſs. How deeply ſhall they be condemned when they are condemned by the mouths of ſo many witneſſes? David ſaith, (Pſal. 62. 11.) God hath ſpoken once, twice have I heard it, that power belongeth unto God; the meaning is, either that God ſpake that often, or that David heard it often, though God ſpake it but once; that is, he throughly weighed and conſidered it, at once ſpeaking, that power belongeth to God. A holy heart hears that twice, that God ſpeaks but once; Grace hath a quick ear, it makes us, as the Apoſtle James ſpeaks, (Chap. 1. 19.) Swift to hear; but God ſpeaks twice, and thrice, yea a hundred times, to wicked men, and they will not hear once; Then how great will their judgement be, and how will their mouthes be ſtopt, becauſe they ſtopt their ears? Hath not God ſaid it again and again; This is the dwelling of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God? Hath he not ſpoken it in figures, and allegories? Hath he not ſpoken it in plain words, and in examples? hath he not ſpoken it in bloud? hath he not ſpoken it in fire, in ſword and famine? How often hath he made his wrath ſmoak, yea blaze and burn before the eye of ſence? how often hath he made ſinners ſmell the brimſtone of his diſpleaſure?

Have they not heard of, have they not ſeen the deſolations which ſin hath made? how it hath left thoſe places which were as the Garden of God, like a waſte or wilderneſs? Have they never read or heard of the old world drowned with water? Have they never heard of Sodom and Gomorrah conſumed with fire? Have they not heard of Pharoah over-whelmed in the red Sea, for vexing the people of God? and of Korah, Dathan and Abiram ſwallowed up alive by the earth for their murmuring againſt Moſes? Whole volumes of examples have been collected, wherein the threatnings of God againſt ſin have been made viſible in the ruine and downfall of ſinners themſelves, and in the rooting out of their poſterity. As therefore the Apoſtle argues from the holy lives and happy deaths of the old Patriarchs and others enumerated in the eleventh Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, ſo may we from the unhappy deaths of many whoſe lives have been unholy in all ages; Seeing we are compaſſed about with ſo great a cloud of witneſſes, let us lay aſide every weight, and the ſin which doth ſo eaſily beſet us.

If ſinners go on, after all this, what can they plead, why their dwelling ſhould not be made deſolate? or why themſelves ſhould not be condemned for ever?

Thus far Bildad's ſecond diſcourſe with Job, wherein he ſeverely reproves him of wickedneſs, and ſets before him, the wofull concluſion of the wicked; How grievous and wounding his words were to Jobs ſpirit, how unſuitable to his condition, how unappliable to his perſon, will appear in the opening of his pathetical Anſwer in the following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIX. Vers. 1, 2, 3.

Then Job answered and said;

How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words?

These ten times have ye reproached me; ye are not ashamed that ye make your selves strange to me.

BIldad's sharp reproof of Job in the former Chapter, procures from him a sharp reply in this from Job; whose whole discourse declares him the object of mans pity, and God the object of his faith; the sum of his answer to Bildad, is to shew how hardly (yea, as he thought how inhumanely) he had hitherto been dealt with; and that upon a four-fold consideration.

First, As he was afflicted.

Secondly, As he was their friend.

Thirdly, As he was innocent, not conscious to himself of any evil that he had wilfully committed against God, or of any wrong done to man.

Fourthly, That they used him thus unkindly while he professed full hope in God, notwithstanding all the calamities which God was pleased to lay upon him.

There are three parts of the Chapter; in the first he very accurately and tragically (as some expres it) amplifieth his own sad estate; and this is carried on from the beginning of the Chapter to the twenty third Verse.

Secondly, He holdeth forth, and maintaineth his own integrity, both by a vehement desire, and an assured hope of his resurrection and appearance before God at the tryal of the last judgment, Vers. 24, 25, 26, 27.

Thirdly, He exhorts his Friends to desist, and repent, lest they draw down the judgments of God upon themselves, in the two last Verses: But ye should say, &c. ver. 28. and ver. 29. Be ye afraid of the sword, for wrath bringeth the punishment of the sword, that ye may know there is a judgment.

From these parts of the Chapter laid together, we may collect the general sence of Job's Argument, in answer to Bildad, thus;

Bildad endeavoured to prove, that Job was a wicked man, because he was burdened with affliction; Job answereth, I indeed endure those afflictions, which for the matter are the portion of wicked men, yet I am not wicked, as my own Conscience, full of peace and hope in God, doth assure and witness to me; therefore the induring of greatest afflictions, is no sound proof that a man is wicked; nor do these afflictions befal such only as are wicked. The proposition, (namely, that he himself was under the pressure of great afflictions) is clear in the first part of the Chapter, from the sixth to the twenty-third Verse; the Assumption, that he himself was not a wicked man, he proves by his faith and hope in God, laid down to the life, Vers. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27. The Conclusion or Inference is implyed.

Job leads us to the description of his afflictions by a pathetical Preface, wherein he taxeth, and reproveth his Friends two wayes: First, By shewing their severity against him. Secondly, By supposing his own guilt against God. He reproveth them by shewing their severity against him three wayes.

First, That they had troubled him long, in the second Verse; How long will ye vex, &c. Vers. 2.

Secondly, That they had troubled him who was troubled before; How long will ye vex my soul? In the same Verse: As if he had said, My soul was vexed with afflictions, why have ye vexed me, who came to comfort me.

Thirdly, That as they had done it long, so they persisted still in doing it; Vers. 3. These ten times have ye reproached me; you are not ashamed, that &c. q. d. ye did it, and ye do it.

His second way of reproving, is by a supposition of his own guilt: Suppose I have sinned, suppose I have erred, ver. 4, & 5. if I had done so, yet surely ye ought not to carry your selves thus towards me; there is some other way of dealing with an afflicted friend, though faulty, then that which you have yet hit on; therefore he goeth on to tell them, as what his case was, so how they should have handled the matter with him; Know that God hath overthrown me, &c. Ver. 6. Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me (ver. 21.) As if he had said, While the hand of God was overthrowing me, your hand should have been supporting me, and your hearts pitying me. So much for the opening of the whole Chapter, which lets in some light to the understanding of each particular.

Docet minimè æquos in se fuisse tam graviter ipsum insectando etiamsi sceleris reus esset. Merl.

Verse 1, 2. Then Job answered, and said, How long will ye vex my soul?

How long?] The Question concludes against his Friends, that they had vexed him already too long; it argues also, their perseverance in troubling him; so the word is frequently used in Scripture: David speakes much to this sence, Psal. 4. 2. O ye sons of men, how long will ye love vanity? How long will ye turn my glory into shame? That is, How long will ye go on dishonouring me? And in Psal. 13. we have this, How long, four times repeated in two verses, while David complained of his affliction, How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord? For ever? (That's long indeed.) How long wilt thou hide thy face from me? How long shall I take counsel in my soul, having sorrow in my heart daily? How long shall my enemies be exalted over me? Here are four times how long, to shew that David's trouble had continued exceeding long.

How long will ye vex my soul?] The word which we translate to vex, signifies an internal trouble, such as ariseth from the contempt and scorn that others put upon us; many know by experience (though grace sets them above it) how much their spirits are burdened when they are contemned: They who are duly honoured, have a weight in them; and they who are (though undeservedly) contemned have a weight upon them. The word signifies also simply to grieve (Lam. 3. 32.) for it is applyed to the act of God; The Lord will not cast off for ever, but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion, according to the multitude of his mercies; for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men. So the word is used again (Lam. 1. 12.) Was there ever sorrow like to my sorrow, which is done to me in the day wherein the Lord hath afflicted me? The Vulgar reads, In the day wherein the Lord hath gathered my grapes, or fruits? As if the Church had said, I was once like a fruitful flourishing Vine, but now the Lord hath stript me of all my glory, and left me naked and bare, as a Vine after the Grapes are gathered. So Isa. 51. 21. Zeph. 3. 18. The afflictions of the Church and People of God in their saddest sorrows, are expressed by this word, Notat internam animi mœstitiam, illam præsertim quæ ex contēptu quodam, vel severiore alicujus increpatione verbo aut opere nascitur. Pined.

Vindemiavit. Vulg.

How long will ye vex my soul?] The word vex, alone had signified the vexation of the soul; but when he adds soul, it increaseth the signification of the word, to say, You have vexed my soul, is more then to say, You vex me, though that be the meaning of it; so that here's the deepest sorrow, that which toucheth not only the flesh, and skin, but that which pierceth to the very soul: As 'tis said of Mary, A sword shall pass through thy soul: That is, Thou shalt be deeply wounded.

Addendo, animam meam, vis orationis augetur & penetrans gravisque mœstitia indicatur. Bold.

In that he complains, How long will ye vex?

Observe, First, The length or continuance of an affliction is more grievous to us, then the weight and burthen of it.

He doth not say, how much? or how great? but how long? A light burthen carried far is heavy; what then is an heavy burthen carried far? The length of the cross grieves more then the breadth or bulk of it. The souls under the Altar cryed (Rev. 6. 10.) How long Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on earth? So David, Psal. 120. 5, 6. My soul hath long dwelt with them that hate peace: He did not complain that he had been amongst those that hated peace; but that he had dwelt long with them; he could not get free from that hateful company. (Dan. 8. 13, 14.) The question is put concerning the affliction of the Church (How long?) As if it would render her affliction shorter, but to know how long it should continue, especially to know that it should not continue long; Then I heard one speaking, and another Saint said unto that certain Saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the Sanctuary and the Hosts to be trodden under foot? As if he had said, Might we but know when this desolation should end, it would be some comfort in the midst of that desolation; And he said unto me, until two thousand and three hundred dayes, then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed: Though this answer had much obscurity in it, yet it had some comfort in it. To hear of a period of our troubles, though we can scarce pick out the time of that period, is some abatement of our troubles. It troubles us to stay long from the enjoyment of good; but it troubles us much more while we are long, and know not how long we shall be under the indurance of evil. Many are ready to say in these troublesome times, if we could but see an end of our troubles, if we thought there would be an end of these wars, we could more chearfully bear the expence both of our blood and treasure. When will there be an end? But what is all this length to the endless length of those troubles, which are the portion of impenitent sinners? What will they say, where good shall never be injoyed, and evil for ever felt? How long, will be the Cry in Hell for ever. How long shall we indure? When will this end? No date, no period can be set to the how long of that misery. And this makes every moment of misery as miserable as the eternity of it. And indeed, every moment of an eternal misery hath an eternity in it: As every moment of eternal mercies is like an eternity of mercy.

Secondly, Observe, Those afflictions pain us most that reach our spirits.

The soul it self cannot be pained; it being a spiritual substance, hath nothing to do with sensible passions; yet pain and trouble in their effects, grief and sorrow, may quickly pass through the flesh to the spirit: There are some evils which do not make so much as a skar in the flesh, which make deep wounds in the spirit. Christ sweat drops of blood in the agony of his soul, before any hand touched his body; and some evils make deep wounds in the flesh, which make not the least scratch upon the soul; yea, the soul may rejoyce, triumph, and glory, while the body is martyred and torn in pieces. But those afflictions which wound and vex the soul, are most grievous; as those mercies are sweetest, which refresh the soul, and comfort our spirits; many enjoy mercies which comfort and refresh their bodies, but they know not what it means to have their souls comforted. Now as those comforts are most comfortable which comfort the soul; so those sorrows are most sorrowful which afflict the soul: O, saith afflicted Job, Ye vex my soul; were it but my flesh which the Devil wounded at the first, I could bear it: The Sabeans took Job's estate away, and Satan smote his body from the crown of the head to the soal of his foot with botches and sores; but his Friends gave sorer wounds, they vexed his soul by their unkindnesses, and we shall see his soul wounded farther by and by; now only remember that soul-wounds are the sorest wounds.

Thirdly, Compare this vexation of Job's soul with the intention of Job's Friends in visiting him, as hath been toucht before upon some other passages of this book; they did not plot upon him to vex him; nor had they a design to trouble him, doubtless the men had upright hearts, and feared God; they came really to comfort him, and do him good; yet all the pains they took with him, was only a pain to him, His soul was vexed. We may intend comfort to our friends, and yet only trouble them; we cannot give our actions that effect which we design them to: Job found it so in his Friends. And he might say to them, you came to comfort me; if vexing a soul be comforting it, you have comforted me with full measure: But call you this comforting an afflicted friend? Is this the lifting of him up that is fallen? Only God can make our counsels and our persons comfortable to others: As for us we may speak words in the matter comfortable, as well as in our intendment, and yet no comfort come to those we have a mind to comfort. (Isa. 50. 4.) Thou hast given me the tongue of the learned, that I may know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary: To comfort is a gift of God, a spiritual gift; and as a power to comfort, so the present act is the special gift of God; a man may have the gift of applying the consolations of the Gospel, and yet not give comfort. God hath charged the use of all Gospel means upon us, both to save and comfort our souls; but he hath reserved the fruit and success of both in his own power. We must at once shew our diligence about the means, and our dependance upon God for the end. How long will ye vex my soul, Hoccine est mœstum consolari?

And break me in pieces with words?

The word that we translate, to break in pieces, notes a very vehement breaking, to break with extream violence, to break and bruise; as seeds or spices are bruised in a Morter, to pound to dust or powder. The word is used for the breaking of the heart with godly sorrow: Sorrow is a breaker, it breaks no bones, but it breaks the heart. Worldly sorrow breaks the heart to death; Godly sorrow breaks the heart to life, (Isa. 53. 15.) I dwell with those that are of an humble and contrite or broken spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the spirit of the contrite ones. The sorrows of Jesus Christ are expresst by this word, (Isa. 53. 5. & 10.) He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; and in the tenth Verse, Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him, he hath put him to grief. Thus the spirit of Job was bruised and broken: But, what was the instrument of his breaking? Was he broken with clubs and staves? No, but with hard words and severe rebukes. How long will ye break me in pieces

דכא verbum vehemens. Metaphora à contusione granorum in mortario.

With words?] Job doth not title their words, he saith not, ye have broken me with hard, cruel, or bitter words, he saith only, Ye have broken me in pieces with words, leaving us to consider what words were fit for such a work; soft and kind words may melt the heart; but those are hard and harsh words which break it.

Hence Observe, Unkind and hard words make deep wounds, and break the heart.

Words are full of power, both to wound and to heal, to break and to bind up, to grieve and to comfort: As the word of God hath an Almighty power to break the heart; so the word of man hath a mighty power to do it. Some are more troubled with what is said to them, then with any thing that is done to them: Unfriendly and reproachful speeches have lain heavier upon them, then the heaviest of other pressures.

Nihil sic hominis affligit animum ut sermo durus. Orig.

David had many hands against him, but he was most afflicted with the tongues which were against him; As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproached me, while they say daily unto me, where is thy God? Psal. 42. 10. And as God works upon the heart with two sorts of words: Sometimes with soft words, such are his promises: Sometimes with hard words, such are his threatnings. So also (in his proportion) doth man; man hath his soft words, and they are of two sorts: First, Friendly words: Secondly, Flattering words; both these insinuate and soak into the spirit of man. Secondly, Man hath his hard and bitter words; these vex and break the heart, and are written (as I may say) upon the broken pieces and splinters of it, as with a Pen of iron, and the point of a Diamond, there's no getting them out again, till grace get them out, or holy patience

patience wear them out. Cruel words are the heightning of cruel actions (Mat 5. 10, 11.) When Christ had said, Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousnes sake, it follows, Blessed are ye when men revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsly. The blessing is promised not only to those who suffer evil done to them, but to those who suffer evil spoken against them. Hard words are numbred among our hardest tryals: The Apostle (Heb. 10. 32, 33.) exhorts the Saints to call to remembrance the former dayes, in which, after they were illuminated (that is, after they had received the light of the knowledge of Jesus Christ) they indured a great fight of affliction; they who receive the faith, must expect a fight; they might have been in the darknes of unbelief and ignorance long enough without a fight of affliction; but as soon as ever they were illuminated, the Prince of darknes stirr'd up a war against them: What the war was he tells us at ver. 33. Partly while ye were made a gazing-stock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly while ye became companions of them that were so used. He calls the bearing of reproaches, a great fight of affliction.

Πολλὴν ἀθλησιν, Ingens, certamen. Bez. Magnum dicit quod multum ex proprietate vocis Græcæ possis dicere, quod ingens est exaggeratio contumeliæ, quasi cum multis hostibus confligat qui cum una contumelia depugnat. Pin.

The word which we render great, doth not signifie so much the greatnes of any one, as the concurrence of many afflictions: As if he had said, Ye indured a multitude, or manifold fights of affliction. He that indureth hard words, fights with a numerous Host; words come thick, and like an Army renew the charge: He contends with many enemies at once, who is assaulted with reproaches. And he is a strong man, that is able to stand these assaults, or receive these charges, and not be broken. Job was a strong man both in faith and patience, yet he was broken, his peace was much broken, yea, his spirit was broken; Ye have vexed my soul (saith he) and broken me in pieces with words.

Job proceeds to shew us particularly what kind of words his Friends spake, they were unkind words; and more,

Verse 3. These ten times ye have reproached me, ye are not ashamed to make your selves strange to me.

Here is an army of evil words, These ten times, &c. What? just ten times? Did Job keep tale, and score up the unkind words of his Friends? Were his reproaches just ten? We use to say, 'Tis unfriendly to keep account of kindnesses done to our friends; but it is more unsutable to the laws of friendship, to take an account of unkindnesses received from friends. The less we remember them, the better is our memory. Why then is Job so exact and particular in this unfriendly Arithmetick? These ten times ye have reproached me.

Numerũ denariũ strictè accipit Cajetanus. Ipsas Jobi responsiones ei redundasse in confusionem asserẽs.

Some conceive that Job speaks to the very letter, that when he saith, ten times, he means ten times, and only ten times, neither more nor less. Which number is made up thus; Five times his Friends had spoken, and five times Job had spoken, here were ten speeches; He was reproach'd as well when himself spake, as when they spake; his own answers were reckoned to his dishonour by his Friends, as he reckoned their replyes: But I pass this.

Notæ multitudinis solent per hyperbolem usurpari; it'd ut Decies significet ultra decẽ plurima, quamvis res ipsa infra decem constiterit.

Further, we may make it out thus; that in each single answer made by his Friends, there was a double reproach, or much reproach, therefore he reckoneth every one of them for two: We find in Scripture, that the word ten is used in a kind of Hyperbole; yea, though the number of the thing done be under ten, or less then ten, yet it's said to be done ten times, only to shew that it hath been done oftner then it should, or when it should not have been done at all. So some understand that speech of Jacob to his Wives (Gen. 31. 7.) complaining of the harsh dealing of Laban, Your Father hath changed my wages ten times. 'Tis not probable (though some attempt to prove it) that Laban did actually change his wages so often; yea, 'tis conceived that he changed his wages but twice, ver. 8. yet Jacob saw so much unkindness in that twofold change of his wages, that he saith, He had changed his wages ten times.

Ea latini Decumana vocarunt quæ excellentissima & amplissima in suo quaq; genere effent. Decumanus fluctus. Decumana Ova.

Further, Ten times may be taken indefinitely for many times. It is usual among the Latines to express any unusual greatness by the number ten, and so doth the Scripture too: (Eccles. 7. 19.) Wisdom strengtheneth more then ten mighty men which are in the City; that is, more then many, or then all the mighty men in the City: Wisdom is better then the weapons of war. The Law given about the keeping of the Ammonite out of the Congregation, is thus expressed (Deut. 23. 3.) An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the Congregation of the Lord; even to their tenth generation, shall they not enter into the Congregation of the Lord for ever. The tenth generation is not to be taken terminatively to their exclusion from the Congregation, as if at or after the tenth generation they might enter in; but the tenth generation is named to shew, that they should not be received in for many generations, yea, that they should not at all be received in; for so the latter branch explains it, They shall not be received to the tenth generation into the congregation of the Lord, no not for ever.

Again, To shew the greatness of the famine that God would bring upon his own people for their great sins, 'tis said (Levit. 26. 26.) When I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one Oven: As if he should say, when Corn is plentiful, two or three women fill an Oven, but when I have broken your staff of bread, then (such shall be the scarcity of Corn, that) ten women, that is, many women may put your bread into one Oven, and not fill it, neither shall ye be filled, as the next words assure us, They shall deliver you your bread again by weight, and ye shall eat and not be satisfied. So the word is used (Numb. 14. 22.) Where the Lord complains, Ye have tempted me now these ten times. Thus when Nehemiah would shew how unceasant the enemies were in bringing sad reports to terrifie them, he saith (Chap. 4. 12.) Ten times ye have said from all places, they will be upon you; that is, ye have often said we should be surprised and cut off by such a time. Once more (Zach. 8. 23.) The glory of the Jews in the latter dayes is thus described, It shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold (out of all Languages of the Nations) on the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, we will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you. Ten men, that is, many men, even multitudes of men shall desire favour and friendship with the Jews; We will go with you, we will be on your side, for we have heard that God is with you.

Note by the way, 'Tis good being with those with whom God is, as 'tis best of all to be with God.

All men ought, ten men (saith that text) shall desire to be with the Jews, when God appears among them. Rev. 2. 10. Ye shall have tribulation for ten dayes; that is, for many dayes, or for a long time. So here, These ten times have ye reproached me; that is, ye have reproached me very often, I know not how often; he puts it in such a number, as may note any number, yea, that which is only not innumerable; Who is able to number the reproaches ye have put on me? The number ten, seems to go burdened with innumerability, because it brings forth the greatest numbers: When, in numbring, unities arise to the number ten, we can go no further, but by resuming unities, and adding them to ten. So that, ten being the greatest simple number, and all compound numbers being renewed at ten, the number ten stands as the chief, and contains the greatest numbers. Ye have reproached me ten times.

Hic numerus videtur infinitate gravidus, eò quòd omnes numeros quantùcunq; maximos gignit. Bol. Denarius numerus ut qui numerandi finis sit videtur maximus: nam cum ad decem pervenitur, ulterius non itur, sed iterum resumitur unitas & denario adjungitur. Semper ad usque decem numero crescente venitur: principium spatiis sumitur inde novis. Ovid. Fast.

Ye have reproached me.] The word signifies such a reproach, as not only puts a man to shame, but makes him greatly ashamed. So the word is used (Ruth 2, 15.) Let her glean among the sheaves, and reproach her not; we put in the margin, shame her not; say not that she stealeth, for if a gleaner come into a field and glean among sheaves, 'tis suspected that such a one stealeth. Therefore Boaz gave this as a special priviledge to Ruth, let her come among the sheaves, it shall be no stealing to her, reproach her not with it, put her not to shame. Thus while Job saith, Ye have reproached me, the meaning is, ye have endeavoured to put me to shame, as if I were a wicked man, a thief, or a murtherer, and this (though once had been too often) ye have done ten times, or often times.

We may consider these words: First, As they set forth the sin and unkindness, or rather the sinful unkindness of Job's Friends: Secondly, As they set forth the grace and patience of Job, or rather that special grace of patience.

First, As they set forth the sin of Job's Friends in the frequent and often repeated unkind carriages of that visitation. These ten times, &c.

Observe, To fall often into the same sin, is a great aggravation of sin.

To reproach, or to do evil once, is too oft; but to do it often, ten times, how much evil is in that? One of the greatest burdens which we can put either upon our own sins, or upon the sins of others, is the number of them. An evil act single is heavy, what then are many bundled up together? As it is one of the greatest heightnings of the mercies of God, that he is pleased to do us good often, who have not deserved that he should do us good once, that we should have as many and manifold mercies, so those mercies daily renewed upon us, and sent in fresh every morning; so, that which heighteneth sinful actings against God or man, is the frequency of them, that they are renewed every day, or often in a day. (Luke 17.4.) If thy brother trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent, thou shalt forgive him: Christ puts it upon the number, If thy brother trespass seven times in a day, it is no great matter to forgive a brother, who offends once a day, or who offends us but seldom; but if he offend seven times in a day, here is the greatness of his sin in trespassing, and the great tryal of our charity and patience in bearing and forgiving. Peter put this Question (Matth. 18. 21, 22.) Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him, till seven times? As if he had said, A sin so often repeated is very great, and will put me to the exercise of all the love I have in my heart to forgive it. And though he thought this a very hard task for his grace to go through with, to forgive to seven times, yet he hath a harder task set him in the reply which Christ makes (ver. 22.) Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee until seven times, but until seventy times seven. Peter's seven is multiplied to seventy seven; in which as we learn that the multiplication of sin is one of the greatest aggravations of it; so likewise is the multiplication of forgiveness: He that multiplies to sin, sins abundantly; and he that multiplies to pardon, doth (as God, Isa. 55. 7.) pardon abundantly.

Secondly, If we consider the state of the men whom Job charged to have reproached him ten times, they were good men.

Hence Observe, That a good man may fall often into the same error.

He that is upright may do amiss again and again, he may ten times wrongfully reproach man, and as often act disobediently towards God; it is no great matter to hear vile wretches speak evil and do evil an hundred times. They must needs do much evil, and do evil often, who being themselves evil, cannot but do evil, or do evilly whatsoever they are doing. But 'tis very sad (though very possible) when we see those who are good, yet do evil, especially when we see them do it often. It should keep the best humble, that still (by reason of their in-dwelling corruption) they are subject to fall into sin, and it should keep them watchful that they fall not.

Thirdly, Observe, Reproaches make breaches.

He said before, You break me with your words, now he shews plainly what those words were, reproachful words; reproaches make outward breaches between friends, but he that is reproached, finds a breach within. Sorrow breaks him, and shame breaks him. That which causeth shame hath sorrow in it: When Paul wrote sharply to the Corinthians, he saith, I write not these things to shame you, but as beloved children to warn you. We rebuke offenders, that we may make them ashamed, but not to shame them; but reproaches are cast upon others, to shame them, not to make them ashamed. Among all the tryals which Jesus Christ underwent to break and bruise him, reproach was one of the greatest. (Psal. 22. 6.) I am a worm and no man, a reproach of men, despised of the people: Christ was not only reproached among men, but a reproach of men, he was, as it were, reproach it self. The Prophet (Isa. 50.6,7.) foreshewed the wonderful tryal of his patience, in bearing shame, I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; I hid not my face from shame and spitting, for the Lord will help me, therefore shall I not be confounded; therefore have I set my face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed: They did what they could to make Christ ashamed, they reproached and reviled him, yea, they condemned him as a wicked man, therefore it follows in the eighth verse, He is near that justifieth me, who will contend with me? Let us stand together, who is mine adversary? Let him come near to me. As if he had said, I am not afraid, either of his tongue, or of his hand, of what he can say, nor of what he can do.

Fourthly, Observe, It is usual for them to be much reproached amongst men, who are most precious with God.

None receive more contempt on earth, then they whose names are written in Heaven; God hath reserved abundant honour for his people in the next life, but he often gives them up to reproach in this The men of the world cannot but despise those who are in esteem with God; for as 'tis in things, so in persons; The things which are highly esteemed among men, are abomination to God; and the things that are highly esteemed by God, are an abomination among men; so those persons who are highly prized with God, are an abomination with men: Should the worth of Saints be taken by the rate-book of the world, how vile were their price? To how low and poor a market would many precious souls come? The Apostle concludes concerning the old Saints and Worthies among the Jews (Heb. 11. 38.) that the world was not worthy of them; yet they were adjudged unworthy to live, or have a room in the world.

'Tis sad when good men, who are precious, yea, who rule with God, are reproached and reviled by the world; but it is most sad when one good man reproaches another: 'Tis a grief to hear those who are vile, revile, and throw dirt in their faces, whose faces shine through that beauty and comeliness of grace which God hath put upon them; but to see one Saint throw dirt in the face of another, to bespatter and bemire the credit of another, by Pen or Press, by words or gestures, this is a grief indeed, this is a lamentation, and ought to be for a lamentation among all the people of God, as it is (and will be while it is so) a rejoycing to the world that lyes in wickedness. But though now some of the Saints may say (with Job) to their brethren in the same faith, These ten times have ye reproached us, yet we have a promise that a time is coming when they shall not so much as once in one thought reproach one another; Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim any more (Isa. 11, 13.)

Lastly, As these words refer to the grace and patience of Job.

Observe, 'Tis perfect patience when we can indure reproaches, especially many foul reproaches.

It is a work of patience to indure but one reproach; but when we indure many reproaches, then patience hath a perfect work; as it shews the miserable perfection of a man in sin, to persevere in sinning, or as it argues the perfect hardness of a mans heart in sin, to sin after he hath been ten times or many times reproved; so it shews the perfection of a man in patience, to continue patient after he hath been ten times reproached. This answers that Rule of suffering given by Christ (Matth. 5. 39.) I say unto you that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also: That is, When ye have received one wrong, be ye not meditating how to revenge that, but be ye preparing how to receive a second. Though Grace doth not bid us invite injuries, yet it teaches us to bid them welcome. These ten times have ye reproached me.

And are not ashamed, that ye make your selves strange to me.

The word that signifies to be ashamed here, is of a milder and gentler signification, then that we had before for reproach or shame. As if he had said, Ye have reproached me, as if ye intended not only to make me ashamed, but to confound me with shame; but you who have reproached me are not ashamed at all, you have not the least tincture of a blush appearing in your faces, though you have gone about to fill my face with shame, and my heart with sorrow.

Further, The word signifies such shame or blushing as causeth a stop in the work or enterprise which we have in hand. Many would go on in doing good, and not a few in doing evil evil, were they not ſhamed out of their purpoſes. How holy in outward profeſſion and performances would ſome be were it not that they fear ſhame, this ſtops them in their courſe, and turns them out of the way. Hence that ſevere threat (Mark 8. 38.) Whoſoever therefore ſhall be aſhamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and ſinful generation, of him alſo ſhall the Son of man be aſhamed, &c. Chriſt our Lord foreſaw, that as many would take up the profeſſion of the Goſpel for their credit, ſo many would withdraw from it for fear of ſhame. Now as many turn from keeping the holy Commandment for ſhame; ſo many are kept from breaking the holy Commandment only for ſhame. How unholy, how vile would they be, were they not aſhamed that it ſhould be known that they are ſo? Thus ſhame is the check of ſin. But ſaith Job to his Friends, Ye are not aſhamed; there is not ſo much as any ſhame upon you, cauſing you to bluſh at what you are doing, or to deſiſt from doing yet more. Ye are not aſhamed.

Verbum aliquanto lenius quam superius; q.d. cum vestris me approbriis vehementer pudefaciatis, vos neque leniter erubescitis. Pined.

Verbum hoc afferre videtur eum pudorem, quo quis deterretur ab aliquo opere faciendo. Pined.

That ye make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

תזהירון Multas patitur interpretationes.

The word which we render to make ſtrange, is found only here in this ſence all the Bible over, yet it undergoes (according to the various apprehenſions of the learned in the Original Language) much variety both of tranſlation and of interpretation, yet none of them hurt the ſence of the Text, and may all ſtand with the truth of that which is here aſſerted.

Quod apparentis mihi. i. e. apertè averſamini.

Firſt, Some render it thus, Ye are not aſhamed that you ſhew your ſelves openly againſt me; q. d. Are ye ſo bold and confident, as to ſpeak evil of me in my own hearing? It were much for you to vent ſuch words behind my back, but are ye not aſhamed to ſpeak thus to my face?

Quòd obſtupeſcatis mihi.

Secondly, Others give it thus, You are not aſhamed to ſtand wondring and gazing at me, as if I were ſome ſtrange Monſter never ſeen before: As ſome men are wondred at for their noble actings, ſo others for their extream ſufferings.

הכר Arabicè ſignificat ſtuporem. Rab. Jona. Significat etiam Arabicè, ſubſannare. Multa ſunt Arabica in hoc libro. Merc.

Thirdly, The word in the Arabick (with which the language of this Book of Job often mingles) ſignifies to ſcorn or deride; in anſwer to which our Text is read, Are ye not aſhamed to jear and jeſt at me in my miſery? He hath expreſly charged his Friends with mocking, more then once before, and 'tis not improbable, that he doth touch it here again. We cannot but ſpeak much and often of that, which grieves us much.

Obſtrmatis vultûm in me. Rab. Joſ. Kinch.

Fourthly, One of the Rabbins ſpeaks Job's meaning thus, Ye are not aſhamed to harden your faces againſt me: He that hath no compaſſion towards man, hardens his face as well as he that hath no repentance towards God. He that hardens his face againſt a man, hath alſo hardened his heart: The ſhew of the countenance teſtifies the frame of the Spirit. A man doth not (uſually or naturally) look or ſpeak hardly till he thinks hardly. Thus Indurati eritis mihi. Mont.

Montanus tranſlates, Ye are indurate againſt me: And ſo Mr. Broughton, But ye harden your ſelves againſt me, ye take no pity of me.

Opprimitis me. Vulg. Ἐπικεῖσθε μοι, incumbitis mihi. Sept.

A fifth reads, Ye oppreſs me; the Seventy, Ye load me, ye lye hard on me, or, ye are not aſhamed to lay your whole weight upon me.

כרה Significat. 1. Fodere. 2. Inſtruere convivium. 3. Emere vel cauponari.

Once more, Others deriving the word from a root which hath three ſignifications, apply them all three to this place.

Firſt, To dig, making the ſence thus, Ye are not aſhamed to dig me; that is, to pierce and wound me: So the ſufferings of Chriſt upon the Croſs are prophetically deſcribed, (Pſal. 22. 16.) They pierced (or they digged) my hands and my feet.

Secondly, To make a feaſt or a banquet. So 'tis uſed (2 Kings 6. 23. Job 40. 3.) and then the ſence appears thus; Ye are not aſhamed to feaſt upon me: That is, to make your ſelves merry with my ſorrow, to feed upon my troubles. What he ſpeaks at the twenty-ſecond Verſe of this Chapter, hath ſome correſpondence with this reading; Ye are not ſatisfied with his fleſh: As if he had ſaid, The ſorrows of my fleſh, or my outward ſufferings are not enough to content and fill you, and therefore you ceaſe not to fill my ſoul with ſorrow.

Cauponari aliquem eſt abuti alio

Thirdly, The word ſignifies to buy, to barter, to bargain and ſell for gain: And then, this is the ſcope of his reproof; Ye are not aſhamed to make merchandize of me: That is, You deal with me, as with a man whom you might uſe at pleaſure, as if I were to be bought and ſold, at any rate, as if I were ſo contemptible, and of ſo cheap a credit, that I were fit only to ſerve turns, or an object for every one to play upon. We ſay of a man that is abuſed, or wronged, either through treachery or revenge, either to make ſport or profit for others, This man is bought and ſold; every one makes his advantage, and takes his penny-worths out of him.

All theſe tranſlations yield a ſence ſutable to the ſcope of this Scripture, yet, I conceive, ours is more proper then any of them all, and is approved by many learned Interpreters as the beſt, Ye are not aſhamed to make your ſelves ſtrange to me. As if he had ſaid, Ye are my friends, and kindred, I have been long acquainted with you, yet now ye ſtand off, and keep your diſtance, as if I and you were ſtrangers, and had never known or heard of one another until this day, or as if you were much my ſuperiours, and ſo 'twere too much condeſcention in you to be familiar with me. So the word is uſed (Gen. 42. 7.) Joſeph knew his Brethren when they came to Egypt for bread, but he made himſelf ſtrange, he diſſembled his knowledge, or forced himſelf to a neſcience of them, he would not be known that he knew them, he made himſelf ſtrange to them, as if he had been ſome other man. Joſeph had abundance of kindneſs in his heart towards his Brethren, and therefore did (with State-Art) but feign a ſtrangeneſs: Job feared his Friends had no kindneſs at all in their hearts towards him, but were as real in their ſtrangeneſs, as if they had been very ſtrangers. Ye are not aſhamed to make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, It adds to the ſinfulneſs of the evil we do, not be aſhamed that we have done it.

It is good to be aſhamed when we have done evil: Shame is a good effect of a bad cauſe; ſhame is the fruit of ſin: Till there was ſin in the World, there was no ſhame in the World; and ſin will make them aſhamed for ever, who ſin now and are not aſhamed. They who have not the ſhame of repentance, ſhall have the ſhame of puniſhment. As the people of God have this promiſe, that they ſhall never be aſhamed by the diſappointment of their hopes; ſo they have this promiſe alſo, that they ſhall be aſhamed repenting of their ſins. And indeed to confeſs or bewail ſin, and not to be aſhamed of it, is not repentance, but impudence. It is one of the greateſt deſigns of Satan at preſent to ſeparate ſin and ſhame, to make men at once bold and wicked. And he ſo far prevails with ſome, that they are ſo far from looking upon ſin as their ſhame, that they count it a kind of honour; and as the Apoſtle gives the character of ſuch brazen faces, with tears in his eyes, (Phil. 3. 19.) They glory in their ſhame; that is, what they look upon as their glory, is indeed their ſhame. The Prophet alſo ſpeaks of theſe (Iſa. 3. 9.) The ſhew of their countenance witneſſeth againſt them, they declare their ſin as Sodom, they hide it not: How did Sodom declare her ſin? Sodom did not declare her ſin as Nineveh, Repenting in duſt and aſhes: Sodom did not declare her ſin as they that are truly humbled before the Lord declare theirs, who, to uſe the Prophets language (Iſa. 43. 26.) Declare that they may be juſtified; but Sodom declared her ſin impudently, ſhe cared not who ſaw it, or who knew it: How ſad is it when Jeruſalem patterns her ſelf by Sodom? Jeremy complains of this (Chap. 6. 15.) Were they aſhamed when they had committed abomination? Nay, they were not at all aſhamed, neither could they bluſh: They who harden themſelves becauſe they would not bluſh, ſhall at laſt be ſo hardened that they cannot bluſh. Shame is the leading act unto repentance; they that are aſhamed of their ſin, are in a good way to turn from it. And hence ſhame is put ſometimes for repentance; What fruit have ye in thoſe things whereof ye are now aſhamed (Rom. 6. 21.) That is, whereof ye now repent, and from which ye are converted. The repentance of Ephraim is ſo deſcribed (Jer. 31. 19.) Surely after I was turned I repented, and after that I was inſtructed, I ſmote upon my thigh, I was aſhamed, yea, even confounded, &c. 'Tis beſt to do ſuch things of which we need not be aſhamed; but they that have done evil ſhall do well to be aſhamed. Job ſuppoſing his Friends had done ill in making themſelves ſtrange to him, charges this upon them as an aggravation of it, Ye are not aſham'd to make your ſelves ſtrange to me?

Secondly, From the matter about which they ought to have been asham'd, their strangeness to him; Ye are not asham'd that ye make your selves strange to me.

Observe, To be strange to friends, specially to godly friends, is an act that we ought to be asham'd of.

It is a shameful thing to be asham'd of friends, especially of godly friends: This shame might justly fall upon many at this day; what strangeness is there between friends, and godly friends? Such as heretofore lay in one anothers bosom, are grown so strange, that they cannot stay with content in one anothers sight, they will scarce look upon one another, who not long since (at least in profession) dearly loved one another. They who met purposely to speak one to another, will scarce speak to one another when they meet accidentally. Yea, they who should be ready to dye for one another, can hardly live by one another. When shall we be ashamed of this strangeness? When will the love of many which hath waxen cold gather heat again? 'Tis Englands sin at this day, Strangeness among the Saints; they who profess themselves to be all acquainted with, and Friends to Jesus Christ, are unfriendly and unacquainted among themselves. They who are near to God, behold each other afar off. Were it not monstrous, if one member of the body should withdraw offices of love from another member, or should be as a stranger to it? These unnatural distances among the members of the same mystical body, are too open either to be hid or denyed. Is it not a reproach to Christianity, that they who indeed are members of the same Christ, should act as if they were not members of the same World. To how many thousands of Saints may we say, as Job here, Are ye not asham'd to make your selves strange one to another? And consider this further, if strangeness, if a meer withdrawing of converse be so uncomely that Christians ought to be asham'd of it, what then is that which is the root of it, alienation to affections? If Christians have cause to blush when they are not free and open-hearted one to another, how ought they to be confounded, who are guilty of heart-burnings and bitterness of spirit one against another? If we ought to be ashamed that we are not kind to one another, that we are not ready to do one another good, how should we be asham'd to be cruel to, or to devise evil one against another? Strangeness is not the doing of evil, but a suspension from doing good, or from shewing wonted respects. Now if it be a shame not to do good, how should we be asham'd of doing evil to our Brethren?

Thirdly, We may consider Job not only as a friend, and as a godly friend, but also as an afflicted friend, as a man almost overwhelmed with sorrow.

Then observe, It is a shameful thing not to own a good man when he is in a low, or in the lowest condition.

Job knew the time when enough would own him, when enough would visit him, and were ambitious of his friendship; but being upon the dunghil, few would come at him, and none cared for his soul. Strangers desire the favour of those who are in prosperity, and neareſt friends will shew themselves strange to those that are in adversity; but is it not their shame to do so? Paul speaks it to the high commendation of Onesiphorus (2 Tim. 1. 16.) He oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain: Many are much ashamed to look upon a godly friend in chains; as they are afraid to wear a chain for godliness. No man was ever more proud of his own golden chain, then some are ashamed of the iron chain of others. When Jesus Christ was apprehended and under his sufferings, this temptation went high even upon his own Disciples and Servants, whom he had often forewarned of sufferings, and instructed how to suffer, (Matth. 26. 56, 58.) Then all the Disciples forsook him and fled. They who before forsook all and followed him, now forsook him and fled: Neither was this the act of some one or two, but of all the Disciples. Then all the Disciples forsook him. And though Peter followed him, yet his following was as bad as a forsaking, for he followed him afar off (ver. 58.) And when he was come near into the house, he did worse then forsake him, he denied him and forswore him. Peter made himself so strange to Christ, that he professed strongly, yea, with an Oath, I know not the Man: As if he had said, If you will not take my word, I will swear I know him not; O what a distemper of spirit did fear bring him to? How was his spirit overwrought with worldly shame, when he wrought all these sinful coverings, that he might appear a stranger to Jesus Christ? O Peter, wast thou not ashamed to shew thy self strange to Jesus Christ when he was afflicted, who was therefore afflicted to make us who were strangers, and afar off from God, near unto him and his friends? It is no easie thing to be acquainted with the cross of others; how hard will it be to be acquainted with our own cross? If men be strange to their friends when they are afflicted, O how strange will they be to their own afflictions? When there is no suitableness in our spirits to suffering and affliction, we cannot sute with those that suffer and are afflicted. The Man in the Gospel (Luke 10. 30.) travelling from Jericho to Jerusalem, fell among thieves, which stripped him of his rayment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead; then cometh a Levite and a Priest, and what do they? do they own the Man? No, they go on the other side, as if the Man had been sick of the Plague, and they durst not come near him for fear of infection; they saw him in that lamentable pickle, and passed by, they would not do the office of a Neighbour (that's the intent of the Parable, to shew who is a Mans Neighbour) if the Man had been mounted on his Horse, riding gallantly on the way, possibly the Priest and the Levite would have joyn'd with him, and have said, Sir, whither travel you? They would have fallen into discourse with him, as a Man of their own Tribe, and have gone to the same Inn with him; but seeing him lye wounded, and groveling upon the high-way in his blood, they made themselves strange to him. As men naturally shun their own afflictions, so those that are in affliction: 'Tis against the light and common principles of Nature to do so; yet naturally Men do so. And because 'tis against the light of Nature to do so, therefore 'tis a shame to do so. And if it be against the light of Nature, and the principles of Morality, how much more is it against the light of Grace, and the principles of Religion, when this strangeness is shewed to those who have Grace, and are indeed religious? 'Tis a Gospel-duty to do good to all, but especially to the houshold of Faith: They break all the bands and tyes of love, who refuse to do them good that have received and express the tokens of divine love; or are strangers in affection to them, who are of the houshold of Faith. Every godly Man may say to his uncharitable brethren, as Job did here to his friends, Are ye not ashamed to make your selves strange to me? Thus Job hath reproved his friends undeserved severity, and he reproves them yet further in the next words, upon supposition that he had deserved it.

VERS. 4, 5, 6.

And be it indeed that I have erred, mine error remaineth with my self.
If indeed you will magnifie your selves against me, and plead against me my reproach.
Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net.

IN the fourth and fifth Verses of this Context, Job proceeds to reprove his Friends severity towards him, by way of grant, or supposition. He reproves them, not only, because they dealt thus with him who was innocent; but he supposes or grants (though he yields it not) that himself had been an offender, or had erred, and yet shews that their proceeding with him was justly offensive and erroneous.

Verse 4. And be it indeed that I have erred, &c.

He useth a figure in Rhetorick called concession, when the Respondent is willing to grant more then the Opponent can prove, and gives that which is disadvantageous to his cause, upon confidence of the righteousness of his cause, or when he yieldeth as much as his Adversary desireth, Concessio est cum aliquid etiam iniquum videmus causæ fiducia pati. Quint.

Professus sum integritatem meam, sed ut illam tacear, & confitear me errando provocasse iram Dei an continuò dignum est vobis ut miserias accumuletis misero. Pined. Non importat deficere vel errare per ignorantiam.

and

and yet maintains what himself desireth. Be it indeed that I have erred. As if he had said, I have often professed (and still do) mine own innocency; but because I see you are very greedy to charge me with, and convince me of an error, I will be silent in that point, and suppose, what you cannot prove; put case it be so, that I have erred, yet you have erred more in your carriage towards me: my error doth not justifie you in what you have spoken and done to me: Though I by sin have provoked God to anger, will that bear you out in your anger against me? Must you needs smite me with your tongues, because he hath smitten me with his hand? Will you add misery to him that is in misery?

Fsto ignoravi. Vulg.

Be it that I have erred.] Some render, Be it that I am ignorant, or have been ignorant. So the Vulgar.

The word in the Hebrew signifies two things.

First, To be ignorant.

Secondly, To be in an error, or to fall into error through ignorance. (Psal. 19. 12.) Who knoweth the errors (or ignorances) of his life?

The force of this word was opened (Chap. 6. 24.) Therefore I shall not here stay upon it.

Be it that I have erred.] We may take it three wayes.

First, Be it that I have erred in judgment, and think amiss.

Secondly, Be it that I have erred in word, and have spoken amiss.

Thirdly, Be it that I have erred in action, and have done amiss. Lay the supposition thus large, be it that I have erred in opinion, in speech and practise, yet what have you gained, or how can ye be excused?

We may consider this clause first in it self, and then in relation to this dispute.

Be it that I have erred.] In as much as the same word signifies both ignorance, and error, it may suggest this note to us.

Ignorance and error are very near akin, yea, ignorance is the cause or mother of most errors.

Ignorantiæ duæ pessimæ filiæ falsitas & dubitatio. Aug. l. 22. de Civit. dei ca. 22.

Ignorance is the Mother of two very uncomely Daughters, as one of the Ancients long since observed. The first Daughter of Ignorance, is named Dubiety or doubtfulness, which is a constant wavering in opinion. A knowing Man hath a setled judgment, but an ignorant man (though he may be stubborn and wilful, yet he) cannot be fixt, or steady. The second Daughter of Ignorance is named Falsity or error, which alwayes settles us (if ever it be setled) in that which is unsound. It may be hard to convince a knowing man of his error, but he that knows no reason, will not be convinced by reason. Error strictly taken, proceeds ever from ignorance; for he that maintains either an opinion or a practise against the light of his knowledge, is more then in an error; 'tis obstinacy in him, as it refers to practise; 'tis heresie in him, as it refers to opinion.

Secondly, Job supposed that which might very well be, while he said, Be it that I have erred; he did not suppose an impossibility.

Hence Observe, It is common to man, to the best of men, to godly men, to be in an error.

A godly man should not suppose himself an Heretick; who as he usually errs against light, so he alwayes delights in his error; but he may suppose himself erring for want of light. They who in this life have most light in them, have also much darkness in them; and we are apter to follow the darkness of our own spirits, then the light of Gods Spirit. He that thinks he cannot err, reckons himself for more then a man. And while we confess that either we have, or may err, we do but confess that we are men. Yea, as he that saith, He hath not sinned, so he that saith, he hath not erred, hath no truth in him. A denial that we have erred, is the grand error; and there are none so stiff in that denial, as they who are most erroneous. While there remains any corruption in the will, the understanding cannot be wholly free from corruption. While sin hath any part in us, it may act it self in every part. Though some (possibly) do not err, yet 'tis too much for any man to say so of himself; no man is exempt from a possibility of erring: Till we arrive at perfect purity, we shall not arrive at infallibility.

Thirdly, Note, Concessions are sometimes the strongest refutations.

We may unanswerably convince others of an error, by supposing that we have erred.

Lastly, Take this brief Note also, It may be our wisdom to give another leave or scope to say, that we have erred when we have not: but it is our sin to charge our selves positively with error, when we have not erred.

It is one thing to let it be supposed that we have erred when we have not, and another thing to say we have erred when we have not. No man hath liberty to charge himself falsly, to take that sin or that error upon his own account, whereof he is not guilty. Yea, we ought to be more careful that we bear not false witness against our selves, then against another. Every man (next to God) owes most duty and respect to himself. And as we must not suffer the glory of God, or the credit of our brethren to be diminished, so neither must we suffer our own. We may let others work upon a supposition of that which is not; but we must not make positions either concerning our selves or others of that which is not. We may speak it Rhetorically, but we must not speak it Logically, that we have erred when we have not. Thus Job speaks, Be it indeed that I have erred.

Mine error remaineth with my self.] This sounds like an aggravation of Job's sinfulness; If he had said, Be it that I have erred, yet I am now willing to renounce and depart from my error; or suppose I have erred, I will now disclaim and recant mine error; this had sounded well. But to say, Be it that I have erred, mine error remaineth with my self, seems to imply a love to error, a hugging, and an embracing of it. We say, It is incident to man to err, but to persevere in error, or willingly to let error remain upon us, is diabolical and wicked. How is it then that Job saith, Mine error remaineth with my self?

Humanum est errare, in errore perseverare est diabolicum.

The word that we translate remain, signifies, to dwell, to tarry, to rest, to take up a nights lodging. All which expressions seem to meet in this, that he was willing his error should not be transcient but permanent; not as a passing stranger, but as a welcome friend. We have the word (Jer. 4. 14.) where the Prophet chargeth this upon Jerusalem, O Jerusalem wash thine heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved: How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge (or rest) with thee? The best have vain thoughts, passing through them; vain thoughts will come and knock at the door for entertainment; but to open the door and receive them, to like and lodge them, this argues a heart not washed from wickedness. But did Job's error thus remain and lodge with him?

Mecum manebit, dormiet, manebit, pernoctabit, habitabit, hæc omnia significat verbum לון.

There are three or four Interpretations in answer to this.

First, Thus, Mine error remaineth with my self. If I have erred, mine error will not hurt you, it hurts no body but my self: What need you be so angry with me for mine error? You shall not answer for it; you shall not suffer for what I have done amiss: So divers give the sence. But this, according to ordinary understanding, is very unbecoming a gracious spirit. As Job tells his Wife (Chap. 2.) when she advised him to curse God, and dye, Thou speakest like one of the foolish women. So, according to vulgar sence, it might be said, that Job in speaking thus, spake as a foolish man, who when he is told of his faults, saith, What is that to you; my faults shall not dammage you. Thus wasters and rioters misspending their estates, being told of it, or reproved for it, answer, Why do you meddle with us? you shall not smart for what we do: Such is the language of foolish and vain men, who have neither honesty to do well, nor can be ashamed when they do ill. Such answers speak a man who hath neither any love to holiness, nor abhorrence of wickedness: For as it argues a sinful frame of heart to let another lye in sin, or to say, what is it to me that my Brother sinneth, he may look to himself, Am I my Brothers keeper? So when a man saith, Why do you trouble your self about my sin? What is that to you? Let me alone, take you no care of me; Mine error remaineth with my self.

In me stat iste error illiusque punitio, quid ad vos? nihil vos læsit.

Talis responsio est illius, qui neq; pudoris habeat illum nec virtutis studium. Sanct.

Sinete me luere pœnas erroris mei, ego sum qui ob eum pudet malo quæ patitur perferre, quam eorum contumelias audire. Merc.

Yet

Yet some who maintain this explication, make a favourable construction of it. As if he had said thus, To bear the worst that my error can bring upon me, is not so bad as your severe dealing with me; your reproaches and censures grieve me more, then all my afflictions; 'tis more troublesome to hear what you will say to me, then to feel what God doth to me. All the evil which I suffer from his hand, is not so heavy as your tongue, his blows are not so bitter and smarting as your words. But I pass that.

Non propter eos ab opinione mea discedam quam vos errorum appellatis, Lab. Sect.

Secondly, One of the Rabbins interprets it in the future, thus, Be it that I have erred, I am resolved to err still, or my error shall remain with me. As if he had said, That which you call an error, I am purposed to hold still. As Paul professed (Acts 24. 14.) After the way which they call heresie, so worship I the God of my Father. So Job spake here according to the tendency of this interpretation. Job was not resolved to stick to an error indeed, but (saith he) if you call this an error which I have maintained, I am resolved to maintain it, I will not be driven from my opinion, because you have branded it for an error. This, where it hits right, is a just and vertuous pertinacy.

He that judgeth himself to be in the truth, should not leave it because others call it error.

As we should not take up error, because some (possibly wise and learned Men) call it truth; so neither should we let go or depart from that which is truth, because many (possibly wise and learned Men too) call it error. As we ought to try all things, so to hold fast that which is good, whosoever would pull it from us. The evidence which any way or opinion hath from the Word of God, and the clear light of our own Consciences, may bear us out against any contrary evidence or contradiction of man. It becomes the people of God, to be meek and yielding, that a little Child may lead them (Isa. 11. 6.) in the right way; yet it becomes them as well to be so stout and true to the Truth, that the greatest Men in the World should neither lead nor force them out of it.

Thirdly, The words are expounded as a redargution of his Friends insufficiency in arguing with him; Mine error remaineth with me: That is, You have not yet removed mine error, nor convinced me that I am out of the way. All that you have said, doth not satisfie my Conscience, nor give me any light to change my judgment. You have spoken much, but you have proved little; your reasons are more in number then weight; I find not my self at all pressed with them, nor hath mine opinion received any dammage, much less a downfal by them. If I have erred, mine error remaineth with me, safe and untoucht, for any thing you have hitherto done or said. Job spake this sence before (Chap. 6. 25.) How forcible are right words, but what doth your arguing reprove? This is a fair Interpretation.

Hence Note, Many are bitter against those whom they suppose to be in error, whom yet they have not proved to be in an error.

Job's Friends had reproached him ten times, but they had not answered him to purpose once. He had store of hard words from them, but few sound arguments. It is an easier matter to be angry with error, then to argue against it. And the reason why many are so angry, is because they have so little reason. Much passion and little reason usually dwell together. They will often be most earnest against an opinion, who have least to say against it.

Fourthly, The words are interpreted with reference to that which follows, (Ver. 5.) If indeed ye will magnifie your selves against me: As if he had said, Let it be granted, that I am in an error, and not only so, but that mine error remaineth, that I persist in mine error after all your counsels and admonitions; yet, ye ought not to magnifie your selves against me, or trample upon me. Though you cannot all this while gain me from mine error, and make me sensible of my mistake, yet you may not (without just blame) thus reproach and throw dirt upon me.

Hence Note, He that cannot be convinced nor reclaimed from his error, must not presently be insulted over and reproached.

Though he that is an Heretick after the first and second admonition, is to be rejected (Tit. 3. 10.) yet every one that is in an error ought not. The Apostle gives an excellent Rule (2 Tim. 2. 24, 25.) The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth. I shall touch at this again by and by.

Vers. 5. If indeed you will magnifie your selves against me, and plead against me my reproach.

As this Verse may be connected with the former in the sence last given, so with the following Verse; Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net; and then the meaning is this; Let it be granted that I am in an error, If ye (upon that ground) magnifie your selves against me, and plead against me my reproach, then know that God hath overthrown me, and he hath compassed me with his net. There's an answer for you: This may put you to silence, and stop your mouths, both from villifying me, and overvaluing your selves. As if he had said, The hand of God is upon me, why do you lift up your heads against me? Doth it become you to greaten your selves, because God hath made me little? Or to heighten your spirits against me, when God hath laid me low?

If indeed you will magnifie your selves against me.

The word which we translate to magnifie, refers both to words and works, signifying as to act highly, so to speak big, to boast and vaunt. We magnifie God, not by making him Great, but by making it appear how great he is. But when Man magnifies himself, either he would make himself appear greater and better then he is, or he would make his fellow-brethren appear less and worse then they are. (Psal. 35. 26.) Let them be ashamed, and brought to confusion together that rejoyce at mine hurt; let them be cloathed with shame and dishonour that magnifie themselves against me. While David prayed that these self-magnifiers and admirers might be brought to shame, he plainly intimates, both that they had taken more honour to themselves then was their due, and that they had taken that from him, which was his due. Thus he pleads with God again upon the same account (Psal. 38. 16.) For I said, hear me, lest otherwise they should rejoyce over me; when my foot slippeth, they magnifie themselves against me: As if he had said, Lord, hold me up and establish my goings, for if I slip, mine enemies think they stand the faster, and if I fall, their pride riseth. Once more, he complains of the insultations of his false friends in the day of his distress. (Psal. 55. 12.) It was not an enemy (that is, an open enemy) that reproached me, then I could have born it; neither was it he that hated me (that is, who professed hatred) that magnified himself against me, then I would have hid my self from him. While David's professed or secret enemies magnified themselves, they ever lessened, and abased him.

חגלי a גרל in hiphil, Magnificavit, auxit, magnificè egit, magna locutus, gloriatus fuit. Shind.

Thus here; If indeed ye will magnifie your selves against me, if ye will grow upon me, or (as we say) crow over me in words; if ye will flourish it in high language, and come with full mouth against me, then know, &c. Master Broughton refers it to their whole carriage, rendring it thus, And truly ye deal stately over me.

Quandoquidem vobis visum est arrumnas meas Grandiloquentia tanta describere, &c. Bez. Ingrandescitus. Heb.

Hence Observe, First, Man is apt to magnifie himself over those that he supposeth fallen into error, or whom he sees fallen into trouble.

Man is ready to think highly of himself, when he beholds another down. We see this in that great case (about which the Apostle enlarges his discourse, Rom. 11.) between the Jews and Gentiles. The Jews were fallen, they were as branches broken off: The Gentiles, who were a wild Olive-tree, were graffed in among (or for) them, ver. 17. The Apostle had a jealousie that this priviledge would swell the Gentiles into great thoughts of themselves, and into a contempt of the Jews, and therefore he cautions them (vers. 18.) Boast not against the branches; that is, against the branches that are broken off. For if thou boastest, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee? But it may be objected against the Apostles way of arguing; Why, what if they did not boast? Should they then bear the root, and not the root them? Surely whether they boasted or boasted not, they they being branches, the root must bear them, and not they the root. I answer, The Apostle doth not at all suppose, that if they did not boast they should bear the root, but uses this as an argument why they should not boast against the branches which were broken off, even because themselves, though graffed in, yet were but branches, and therefore they did not bear the root, but the root them. Now there is nothing more uncomely then to boast against that thing or person whith beareth us up, or against that which receiveth no benefit from us, but we receive much from it. As the Apostle speaks in the close of the seventeenth verse; Thou with them partakest of the root and fatness of the Olive-tree. By the Olive-tree, we are to understand the visible Church of God (Jer. 11.16.) The Lord called thy name a green Olive-tree, fair and of goodly fruit. The root of this Olive-tree was Abraham, by vertue of the Church-covenant in Christ, which was made first, by name, with him, who is hence also called the Father of the faithful. Yet (in passage) take this caution, Abraham was not the root of the Olive-tree (the Church) by way of communication, as if either Jews or Gentiles did receive any sap of spiritual life from him, as branches do of a natural life from the root; for thus Jesus Christ alone is the root of the Church, or of all Believers; but Abraham was and is the root of the Olive-tree only in a way of Administration. The Lord calling him forth as the first Man with whom he was pleased to treat, and enter that Covenant with, which yet was originally, and (as I may speak) radically made with Christ, in the behalf not only of ordinary Believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, but even of Abraham himself. Thus I have stept a little out of my way, to shew in what sence Abraham is called the root of the Olive-tree. The fatness of this Olive-tree, is all the outward Priviledges and Ordinances instituted, together with the inward Graces promised. Of this root and fatness the Gentiles did partake, being taken into the visible Church, from which, before, they were aliens and strangers. Now though the Gentiles were thus estated through free Grace in the priviledges of the Jews, yet Paul foresaw that they instead of thankfulness to God for the mercy bestowed on them, would be ready to exalt themselves against the Jews, who for a time, through their own unbelief, were cast down and broken off; and therefore he saith, Boast not against the branches. And again (ver. 20.) Be not high-minded, but fear; As if he had said, Thy state is high, let not thy mind be so too: The Jews are fallen, and unless thou walkest in holy fear, thou canst not stand. The Apostle gives another instance of mans readiness to exalt himself against those that are weak in faith, as before against those who were fallen through unbelief. (Rom. 14. 3.) Let not him that eateth, despise him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not, judge him that eateth; for God hath received him. Here are two sorts, him that eateth, and him that eateth not: He that did eat was the strong Brother; he that did not eat was the weak Brother. Now the strong who had a clear light about Gospel-liberties, and was fully convinced that the difference of meats was taken away by Christ, seeing his Brother scrupled, and forbearing to eat, judged him presently as weak, and so was ready at once to despise him, and magnifie himself. These two may easily enough be distinguished, but they are never separated. He that thinks lightly of another, hath alwayes high thoughts of himself. A despiser of the least of his brethren, is no small man in his own opinion. Paul being informed that the strong (among the Saints at Rome) despised the weak, did not only forbid them in this third verse, but chides them at the tenth verse, Why dost thou judge thy Brother? Or, Why dost thou set at naught thy Brother? And as he took down the Gentiles, Chap. 14. with Be not high-minded, but fear. So he doth these, with We shall all stand before the Judgment-seat of Christ. As if he had said, We must all be judged by One, and therefore let not any one be so busie in judging: To love is our duty, to judge is Christs prerogative, let us be more in charity, and less in censure.

Paul also intimates this harshness of spirit towards a fallen Brother, in the dealing of the Corinthians with the incestuous person, whom himself had ordered to be cast out of the Church, and given up to Satan (1 Cor. 5. 5.13.) He perceived their spirits too high against him, and therefore in the second Epistle he mollifies and moderates them (Chap. 2. 6.) Sufficient to such a man is this punishment which was inflicted of many; do not punish him still, do not imbitter your spirits against him; Ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, least he be swallowed up with over-much sorrow (ver. 7.) We cannot have over-much faith in God, we cannot have over-much love to God; the greatest abundance of these is no excess, but we may have over-much sorrow; and though we cannot be too pressing upon Saints to believe, and love, yet we may be too pressing upon sinners to mourn and sorrow. Wherefore (saith the Apostle) I beseech you to confirm your love towards him. Carry it meekly, mildly, and gently with your formerly offending, but now deeply humbled and repenting Brother; do not magnifie your selves against him, who hath abased and laid himself low before you.

Secondly, Observe, It is very sinful to magnifie our selves against those that are fallen.

First, Such forget their own frailty, how apt they are to fall. We should be taught by the failings of some, what we may be tempted to do, as well as we should be taught by the holy actings of others what we ought to do. That corruption, that temptation which hath prevailed against thy Brother, and cast him down, may prevail against thee too, and cast thee down. Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth (not insult over his Brother that is fallen, but remember that himself may fall, and) take heed lest he fall; as the Apostle gives us warning (1 Cor. 10. 12.)

Secondly, Such forget that themselves have fallen into other sins or errors, and possibly into the same: Some who are deeper in sin and error of another kind, then their Brethren in those charged upon them, or proved against them; yet cannot contain from over-acting in censures upon them: Yea, sometimes they who have fallen into the very same sin, and have been chief in it, will yet heighten themselves against those who have sinned with them, till they are awakened to consider their own sin. Judah had defiled Tamar (Gen. 38.24.) yet as soon as they brought word that Tamar was with child, Burn her (saith he) to the fire with her presently. Thus he condemned her, being himself guilty of the same fault. He was a most severe Judge of that crime in her, for which it doth not appear that he ever so much as question'd himself, though the principal. The Scribes and Pharisees (John 8. 5.) haled the poor Woman taken in adultery before Christ, they called for Justice, and urged the Law. Yet it should seem that they were as bad as she or worse; for when Christ said, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her, they went out one by one, being convicted within their own consciences, which secretly suggested, that they could not throw a stone at her for that offence, but they must also hit themselves. How sinful is it to vex and judge others for that, of which our selves are guilty, and have never asked forgiveness. But suppose a man were free from that spot, which he sees his Brother hath taken, and is defiled with. Yea, suppose him as far from a possibility of taking a sinful spot, as the holy Angels confirmed by Grace, yet it were sinful even for him to magnifie himself against those that are fallen into sin. Doth God insult over poor sinners? No, he pities and he spares them. The Lord doth not magnifie himself against any who are fallen, unless such as being fallen, rise up and magnifie themselves against him by their impenitency and presumption. Now doth God (against whom man offends when he falls) pity him, and deal tenderly with him, and shall man insult over an offending Brother? It is our duty to bewail and pray for those that fall, to help, and counsel them up again. To bless God who hath kept us from those snares and temptations, with which, as we see others are, so our selves might be overcome. Such thoughts will keep us from swellings and self-magnifyings against our Brethren, though they have erred, yea, though their error remaineth with them. If ye will magnifie your selves against me,

And plead against me my reproach.] Some render the whole verse thus, Should you magnifie your selves against me, and plead reproachfully against me? you should not; 'tis not only beside, but against your duty to do so. Increpatis probosè non spiritu lenitatis.

Hence

Hence Note, We may reprove, but not reproach an erring brother.

Omnis reprehensio vacare debet contumelia.

We should have a respect to the credit of our Brother, while we are rectifying either his conscience or his conversation; and while we take care to save his soul, we must not be careless of his name, or destroy his reputation. Reprehension should not savour of reproach. Our zeal for God must be mingled with pity towards man. The Apostle gives that Rule (Gal. 6. 1.) Brethren, If a man be over-taken in a fault, you that are spiritual restore such a one (set him in joynt again. How? With a rough hand? No,) with the spirit of meekness; Do not plead against him his reproach. Do not charge his sin upon him, as if his sin were not common to man; Do it considering thy self, lest thou also be tempted. Deal clearly, and faithfully, but not reproachfully with him; Restore him with the spirit of meekness. Paul was unwilling to deal severely with the faulty Corinthians, and therefore he, as it were, puts it to their choice, and even begs of them to prevent his coming among them with a rod in his hand (1 Cor. 4. 21.) What will ye? Shall I come to you with a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness? Now surely, he that was unwilling to chasten them with the rod of reproof, had no will to sting or bite them with the Scorpion of reproach.

Again, Reproach may be taken for affliction it self: And then the sence riseth thus; as if he had said, Suppose I have erred, and that mine error remaineth with my self; Will you plead my afflictions against me as an argument that I am in, or remain in an error? So Mr. Broughton renders it, You bring my wretched case as an argument against me. Afflictions are often called in Scripture, reproaches; because they are charged on the afflicted as a reproach. Thus Rachel speaks (Gen. 30. 23.) God hath taken away my reproach: That is, My affliction of barrenness, which was objected against me as a reproach. The same Elizabeth (Luke 1. 25.) She having conceived hid her self five months, and said, God hath taken away my reproach. So (Ezek. 36. 30.) the Lord promiseth his people, that they shall receive no more the reproach of famine among the Heathen: For when the Heathen saw the people of God in outward wants, and eaten up with famine, they at once blasphemed the holy Name of God, and reproached them; See what a God ye serve, you that would be esteemed the darlings of heaven, see your condition, your God suffers you to starve, to be hunger-bitten: Therefore they are comforted with this word, You shall not suffer the reproach of famine among the Heathen: implying, that the Heathen usually reproached them in times of famine and affliction.

Hence Note, Affliction layeth us open to reproach.

And that is one of the greatest burdens of affliction. The old Poet could say, That poverty had nothing more grievous in it then this, that it leaves men under disgrace, and exposes them to scorn. Worldly men esteem others, by their lands, and riches, not by their goodness, or the grace of God.

Secondly, Note, We are apt to plead the evil which any man suffers as an argument of his sin.

The reproach or affliction which Job suffered, was all the argument and proof which his Friends could produce against him. They brought no witnesses to accuse him, but what they found upon him, his poverty and diseases. Job's uprightness had never been questioned by them, if he had not lost his riches. Other passages of this Book, have yielded the like Observation, and therefore I only touch it here; and as Job's Friends insist often upon the same arguments for substance, so also doth Job upon the same answers and replies. Job hath already told his Friends more then once, in effect, what he is about to tell them in the next Verse.

Verse 6. Know that God hath overthrown me, and compassed me about with his net.

Will you plead my reproach, or my affliction against me? If you will, I desire you to consider whence or from what hand my affliction comes; Know that God hath overthrown me.

Know.] There is sometimes a threat, always a reproof in this form of speaking. Know, is, I would have you know, or you shall know to your cost. It usually implyes a teaching by correction, yea, by destruction, not by instruction (Exod. 7. 5.) When God saith, The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, He means, they should know it to their sorrow, or by their sorrow: As if he had said, You will not acknowledge it, but you shall know that I am the Lord; you shall know by your own punishments that I have power both to command and punish. We have a like expression (Psal. 9. 20.) Put them in fear, O Lord, that the Nations may know themselves to be but men. But were the Nations unskill'd in this piece of knowledge? It is indeed a very hard thing for a man to know himself; but, it seems, very easie for any man to know that he is but a man. The Orator saith, There was never any Nation so rudely barbarous, but knew there was a God; and surely there was never any Nation so blindly ambitious, as not to know themselves to be but men. The Psalmist therefore doth not suppose that they thought themselves more then men in the constitution of their nature, but in the institution of their lives. They think themselves Gods, who either will act by their own rules, or are confident they can give success to their own actions; when men either do what they please, or think they are able to carry whatsoever they do, then they forget that they are but men. Hence David prayes, O Lord, put them in fear, dash their counsels, break their plots, then the Nations will know, that is, thou shalt make them know that they are but men. So here, Know that God hath overthrown me, is, as if he had said, You have not taken notice of this, I have spoken of it before, and you would not receive it, you have acted towards me, as if God had nothing to do in bringing me thus low. Therefore I warn you again, Know that God hath overthrown me: I tell you, it is your error and sin, to charge my afflictions upon the account of my sin, Know that God hath overthrown me. He hath done it, who may do it to an innocent, and yet be just himself. And seeing God hath done it, how know you that he hath done it, because my sin provoked him to do it, rather then because himself (for ends best known to himself) was pleased to do it?

Mira sabet hac loquendi formula.

Know that God hath overthrown me.

The word translated overthrown, signifies in its root, to turn a thing aside, to put it out of the way, as also the making of a thing crooked; and in the Noun, that which is crooked, Lam. 3. 36. He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men. To crush under his feet all the prisoners of the earth, To turn aside the right of a man before the face of the most high, To subvert a man in his cause, the Lord approveth not. The Lord doth not subvert or overthrow a man in his cause. God did not overthrow Job's right, but his state. The Vulgar translation speaks that in the Letter (and the Original will bear it) Know, that God hath not afflicted me according to justice. Yet that reading doth not charge injustice upon God, for that were blasphemy: But the sence is, he hath not done it according to the way of men, or the ordinary course of Justice between man and man. God acts that justly towards man by his prerogative, which between man and man were perverting of Justice. Hence the Lord himself tells Satan (Chap. 2. 3.) Thou movedst me to destroy him without cause. To destroy a man without cause, is to pervert Justice. In that sence we may understand Job here; Know that God hath overthrown me: As if he had said, He hath not dealt with me by the common rule of legal proceedings, but according to the pleasure of his own will. God never doth any man, nor hath he done me any injustice; yet mans justice is not the square of what he hath done to me; therefore you are quite besides the business, when all along you charge me with sin, and error, as the reason of all my sufferings; Know that God hath overthrown me. First, Job speaks this declaratively, not complainingly; he affirms God had done it; but he did not murmur because he had done it.

עִוְּתַנִי a עָוַת perdere, pervertere, ex sua proprietate afferre, videtur curvitatem quandam & perversitatē deviantem à recto. Verbum hoc distorsionem non modò à statu fœlici & cōmodo, sed ab æquo & recto significat; sed Jobus de statu, non de jure loquitur. Coc. Quod non æquo judicio afflixerit me. Vul. i. e. cum sim innocens me tanquam impium afflixit, idq; præter modum. Merc.

Hence Note, A godly man freely and chearfully owns the hand of God in all his troubles.

As when he is raised, he owns the hand of God delivering and restoring him; so when he is overthrown, he owns the hand of God smiting and casting him down. We honour

nour God as much by looking to him as the Author and Orderer of our afflictions, as of our conſolations; of our loſſes, as well as of our gainings; of our overthrows, as well as of our victories. The Confeſſions of the Church run fully in this ſtream, Pſal. 44. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14. Thou haſt caſt us off, and put us to ſhame. Thou makeſt us turn back from the enemy. Thou haſt given us like ſheep appointed for meat. Thou ſelleſt thy people for nought. Thou makeſt us a reproach to our neighbours. Thou makeſt us a by-word among the Heathen. An evil heart obſerves not the hand of God, either eſtabliſhing or overthrowing. The Prophet ſpeaks this fully (Iſa. 26. 11.) Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not ſee: What had the hand of God been doing that they were thus wilfully blind, and would not ſee? The tenth verſe tells us his hand had been doing good; Let favour be ſhewed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteouſneſs, &c. in the Land of uprightneſs will he deal unjuſtly, and will not behold the Majeſty of the Lord. Now as wicked men will not ſee the hand of God in favours, ſo not in judgments. Their ſight is bounded with ſecond cauſes; the Creature is their Horizon, and ſhuts them in, they ſee nothing above or beyond it. 'Tis the malice of this man, or the unfaithfulneſs of that man, which hath overthrown them. 'Twas the negligence of thoſe they implyed as inſtruments, or the activity of thoſe that were oppoſite to them, 'twas a chance, or their ill fortune, upon which they have miſcarried. God is not in all their thoughts.

Secondly, Job tells his Friends, God hath overthrown me, that he might abate the keenneſs of their ſpirits towards him, and to move compaſſion.

> Hence Obſerve, We ſhould take heed of troubling or grieving them, who are already grieved and troubled under the afflicting hand of God.

And if it be unnatural and uncomely to grieve thoſe who are in ſorrow, what is it to rejoyce at their ſorrow? The wiſdom of God gives caution againſt this, even in the caſe of an enemy, (Prov. 24. 17, 18.) Rejoyce not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thine heart be glad when he ſtumbleth; (Why not? The reaſon is ſubjoyned) Leſt the Lord ſee it, and it diſpleaſe him, and he turn away his wrath from him: That is, The Lord will take it ſo ill at thy hand, to ſee thee rejoycing at the fall of thine enemy, who hath been overthrown by his hand, that he will turn his wrath upon thee inſtead of him.

Fourthly, Job ſaith, God hath overthrown me; to ſhew his Friends, that there was no neceſſity why they ſhould charge him with wickedneſs, becauſe he was overthrown.

> Hence Note, God may, and oft doth overthrow his choiceſt ſervants, and ſpoil them of all outward comforts, without reſpect to their ſinfulneſs.

When we ſee man puniſhed by man, we may well conclude he is a tranſgreſſor, becauſe no man hath power to afflict, or to overthrow an Innocent: Man hath no right to ſmite his Brother, either in body or eſtate, but for his fault. But when God ſmiteth man, we cannot conclude unerringly, that he doth it for his faults or errors. Know that God hath overthrown me,

Metaphora à re venatoria.

And compaſſed me with his net.] It is a Metaphor from hunting. The Church bemoans her ſad condition in this language (Lam. 1. 13.) From above hath he ſent fire into my bones, and it prevaileth againſt me; he hath ſpread a net for my feet. Thus Zedekiah is threatened (Ezek. 12. 13.) My net alſo will I ſpread upon him, and he ſhall be taken in my ſnare.

פצור à radice צור ſignificat rete vel etiã arcem & munitionem altiſſimam & fortiſſimam.

The Hebrew word which we tranſlate Net, ſignifies alſo a Tower, or Caſtle, or Fort. A learned Interpreter contends earneſtly for this tranſlation: And gives Reaſons why it ſhould be rather tranſlated Tower, then Net. Firſt, From the words following in the next verſe, where Job ſpeaks of himſelf as if he were crying out at a priſon window, Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard. Secondly, Becauſe at the eighth verſe he ſpeaks of darkneſs ſet in his paths; which ſuits better with the metaphor of a Priſon-tower, then of a Net. But whether we render Tower, or Net, the meaning is the ſame: And by both, afflictions are underſtood. And when he ſaith, He hath compaſſed me with his net, he ſhews the extenſion or largeneſs of his affliction; for as when promiſe is made to him that truſteth in the Lord, That mercy ſhall compaſs him about (Pſal. 32. 10.) the meaning is, that he ſhall have many and manifold mercies, compleat and perfect mercies. So that's a compleat affliction which compaſſeth us about, as a net doth a bird or beaſt that is enſnared in it.

> Afflictions may be compared to a net for divers Reaſons.

Firſt, Becauſe there is a contrivance in them, a divine hand doth as it were weave divers providences together, and knot them one with another, to make up an affliction. The Lord uſeth a kind of holy art and ſkill in the preparation of our troubles. There is as much wiſdom ſeen in framing and forming of our afflictions, as there is mercy and kindneſs in working our deliverances and ſalvations. Hence alſo the Church compares them to a building, which is an artificial pile or Fabrick, He hath builded againſt me (Lam. 3. 5.)

Secondly, Afflictions are like unto a net, becauſe moſt men fall ſuddenly into them, and are taken unawares. Job indeed ſaith of his affliction (Chap. 3. 25.) The thing which I greatly feared is come upon me; and that which I was afraid of is come unto me. It ſeems he was jealous of a change; and though his mountain was ſtrong, yet he ſaid not (as David once did) I ſhall never be moved. But uſually men put the evil day far from them, and look no more for trouble then the ſilly bird doth for the net when ſhe is caught with it.

Thirdly, Afflictions are like a net, becauſe we are entangled with them; we are entangled with doubts what to do, yea, in affliction we are ready to ſay, Lord, we know not what to do. If we know and are reſolved what to do, then we are apt to be entangled, either with cares how, and by whom to get it done, or with fears, that when all is done, it will not be ſucceſsful and effectual for our deliverance.

Fourthly, Afflictions are like a net, becauſe we being once entangled in them are held faſt, and cannot get forth, till God, who hath compaſſed and taken us with his net, be pleaſed to open it, and diſingage us from our entanglements. The bird cannot get out of the net till ſhe is taken out. We bring our ſelves into trouble, but unleſs the Lord bring us out, there we ſtick. As our eternal, ſo our temporal ſalvations are of the Lord. The nets of affliction which God makes are ſtrong enough to hold the ſtrongeſt. His nets are not like the Cobweb or Spiders net, which detain the weak Flyes, but are eaſily broken by the greater or leſſer Fowls. Though a wild Bull come into Gods net, as the Prophet ſpeaks (Iſ. 51. 20.) yet neither his might nor his madneſs can help him out. It was noted, in opening the Original word here uſed for a net, that it may ſignifie alſo a Tower, or a Fort. The ſame affliction is both a Net and a Fort; a Net, becauſe it entangles; a Fort, becauſe it holds us faſt.

Fifthly, As afflictions are like a net, becauſe they entangle and hold us faſt; ſo, becauſe the more we ſtrive to looſen and free our ſelves, the more we are entangled, and the faſter held. There is no getting out of, no, nor getting any eaſe in affliction by ſtruggling. 'Tis beſt for us to be quiet and patient. Not but that we may ſtir heaven-ward by earneſt prayer to God; yea, and earth-ward too in the diligent uſe of lawful means with man to free our ſelves. The ſtirring and ſtriving which ſtraitens the net of our affliction upon us, is only our diſpleaſedneſs and impatience with it, or againſt God, who hath caught us in it. Or it is our ſtriving to get looſe by the uſe of creature hands and helps alone, without dependance upon, or application made to God. Such ſtirring as this will indeed entangle us, and when we have ſtirr'd thus the moſt we can, we ſhall find our ſelves the more entangled. When God compaſſeth us with his net, we muſt neither ſit ſtill ſullenly and negligently, nor move impatiently and unbelievingly. Let us give God glory (as Job did) in our net, and he will not only give us eaſe, but ſet our feet in a large place.

VERS. 7, 8, 9.

Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: I cry aloud, but there is no judgment.

He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass; and he hath set darkness in my paths.
He hath stript me of my glory, and taken the Crown from my head.

THe words contain a part of Job's renewed complaint, and continue the aggravations of his sorrow. Having said in the former verse, That God had overthrown him; that he had compassed him with his net; here he tells us two things.

First, What course he took to relieve himself in that miserable condition; He petitioned and complained earnestly, and he cryed out so loud, as might make all amazed, and look out, Behold, I cry out, &c. And he did not (as some) cry out before he was hurt, or complain without cause. He was pressed to it by the oppression that was upon him; Behold, I cry out of wrong.

Secondly, He tells us what success his suit or petition had; I am not heard, saith he, in the first part of the verse; and he adds, there is no judgment, in the second.

Verse 7. Behold, I cry out of wrong, &c.

He did not only cry, but he cryed out, and that aloud.

Behold.] Is a demonstrative Particle. Some render the Original as a conditional; If I cry out of wrong there is none to hear. As if he should say, It is my misery that I suffer wrong; but this is a greater misery that I find none to do me right in my sufferings; If I cry out of wrong (there is none to hear, or) I am not heard. All my crying avails me nothing; every ear is shut, and every hand turn'd against me.

We may here conceive Job under a twofold notion. Either,

First, As a poor prisoner crying through his grates, or out at the window, telling the passengers of his doleful condition, that he is shut up within those walls, and irou grates, that he hath been oppressed by hard-hearted Creditors, and that after so many months or years of imprisonment, he can get none to right or deliver him out of their hand.

Secondly, Some conceive him under the notion of a wounded or diseased man, confined to, or shut up in his Chamber, to whom when Physitians or Chirurgions come to apply medicines and means for his cure and healing, he cryes out, they torture and trouble him, they hurt and vex him, they are cruel to him, and will kill him. The Patient cryes out of wrongs, but the Physitian will not hear him: He that is to have his flesh lanced, laments pitifully, yet he is lanced; he whose flesh is to be cauteriz'd, complains sadly, yet the fiery Instruments are applyed to him. The Artist must shew a kind of cruelty as well as skill, else the cure is not wrought.

Thus Job is here represented, as under the Physitians hands, though indeed an experiment was to be wrought upon him rather then a cure. To take an experiment of our graces may put us to more pain, then the cure of our corruptions. An experiment (I say) was to be wrought on Job to exercise and try him, and he cryes out of wrong, as if their purpose had been to cut his throat, or at least to undo him for ever in this World.

Behold, I cry out of wrong.] The word which we translate to cry out, signifies, properly, that cry which is caused by the enduring of extream pains of body, or anguish of mind. Yet some apply it to the vehemency of his spirit, in disputing and pleading with his Friends (Disputants and Advocates often fall into heats and passionate exclamations.) Behold, I cry, in this dispute and plea, urging Arguments for my self, and making my defence, yet none regards. I can neither find an equal Judge, nor a faithful Advocate. But I rather restrain it to that cry, which the rack of grief and sorrow forced from him, I cry out,

Of wrong.] The word signifies any kind of oppression or injury. Here it may be questioned; First, Of whom? Secondly, To whom Job made this cry? He cried out of wrong. Who wronged him? Or wherein was he wronged?

I answer, The wrong he cryes out of, was received of men; he doth not challenge the Almighty, that he had wronged him: He indeed speaks it out plainly in the former verse, God hath overthrown me, and compassed me in his net, yet he doth not charge God foolishly, as 'tis said in the first Chapter, as if he had done him wrong. The wrong of which he complains was done him by men, and those men his Friends; they wronged him by their hard speeches, and unkind usages (ver. 2.) How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words? These ten times have ye reproached me. That reproach was the wrong he complained of. But to whom did he complain?

First, He complained to men, he told his Friends how they had wronged, and censured him, but they would not hear.

Secondly, He complained to God of the wrong done him by men; but as then he did not hear.

I am not heard.] Or as 'tis translated by many, I am not answered; the word signifieth both to hear, and to answer, the work both of the ear, and tongue. And the reason (as some tell us) why in the Hebrew one word serves both, is, because there is such a comexion and nearness of relation between the ear and the tongue: So that he who doth not answer, is supposed not to hear; and he that doth not hear, cannot make answer. In nature, usually, they who are deaf are dumb; and when a man to whom we speak makes us no answer, we ask him, what, do you not, or can you not hear? I cry (saith Job) but I am not heard.

We are not to take hearing strictly; For the Lords ear is not heavy that he cannot hear; and Job spake loud enough for men to hear. The Lord hears the least whisperings, the least breathings of the soul. He doth not only hear our lowest speech, but he hears our very thoughts. Thoughts are the first-born of the soul, the language of our hearts. This language of our hearts is as loud in the ears of the Lord, as thunder is in ours. Yea, he understandeth our thoughts afar off (Psal. 139. 2.) That is, long before we think them. He to whom all times are the present time, cannot but know that which to us is future, and he from whom all things receive their being, understands those things which as yet have no being. Now, if God understand our thoughts at this distance, even before we think them, then surely he hears all our words (which are thoughts formed and made up) as soon as we have spoken them.

And if so, then hearing (in the Text) is not to be taken for receiving the sound of words, but for the return which is made to the words which are received. To be heard, imports help, or the giving out of that help, mercy and deliverance, which is desired and asked, whether of God or man. To be heard in prayer, is to be answered in prayer: To be heard when we cry, is to be relieved when we cry. Thus, saith Job, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: That is, I have no ease, no comfort, nor is any deliverance wrought for me. David, as the figure of Christ, gives glory to God, because he had been thus heard; Thou hast heard me from the horns of the Unicorns (Psal. 22. 21.) That is, Thou hast delivered me from the horns of the Unicorns. To be among the horns of the Unicorns, is a proverbial speech, for being encompast with greatest danger. The horn is sharp and strong, and the Unicorn is fierce and terrible; so that to be heard from among the horns of the Unicorns, is to be rescued from deadly danger.

This in the Psalm is of the same sence with that of Paul, (2 Tim. 4. 17.) I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion: Nero was this Lion, before whom when Paul first appeared, he had no second; At my first answer (saith he, ver. 16.) no man stood with me, notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion: That is, When I was ready to be devoured by the bloody Tyrant, I cryed to the Lord, and he heard me.

So then, when he saith, I am not heard, it may be referred (as his cry was.) First, To men. Secondly, To God. I was not heard by men, they did not right me as they ought; I was not heard by God, he did not rescue me as he was able, or as he might. Take it first, as his not being heard, refers to men.

Hence Note, Men are very deaf usually to the cry of the oppressed and grieved.

There are two voices at which the ear of Nature is exceeding deaf, or thick of hearing.

Ob violentiam quæ mihi fit vociferor ad Deum. Drus.

Exaudire & respondere clamanti est adesse laboranti & opem atque salutem afferre. Est enim hujusmodi responsio non tam verbo, quam re & auxilio præstito. Pined.

The

The first is the voyce of holy counsels; when God speaks, many are as the deaf Adder, who stops her ear, and will not hear the voyce of the Charmer, charm he never so wisely.

Secondly, At the voyce of humble complaints, when the poor and distressed speak, many turn away their ear, or turn a deaf ear.

And there are (upon the matter) the same reasons why the counsels of God, and the complaints of the poor are not heard.

First, God commands both, and the heart of man naturally withdraws from the command of God concerning man, as much as from that command which immediately concerns himself.

Again, They who hear the counsels of God, are more engaged to obey them, and walk up to them. Many could be swift enough to hear, as the Apostle James exhorts (chap. 1. 19.) if that would serve the turn, but they are slow to do. Barely to hear the sound of words, is no great burden to the ear, and 'tis none at all to the heart; but hearing carries an obligation to practise, yea, to hear indeed is to practise; and therefore counsel is not heard.

So, hearing the complaint of the poor, ingageth to relieve and help them, to supply their wants, and redress their injuries; yea, to hear their cry indeed, is to relieve and help them; therefore they are not heard. While Solomon in his Book of Proverbs, shews the danger of not hearing the cry of the poor, he also implies the commonness of it (Prov. 21. 13.) Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard. He that hath a stone in his heart, or whose heart is a stone, hath also (as we say) wool in his ears at the voyce both of God and man.

Secondly note, Not to hearken to those that cry out of wrong, is very sinful, a very crying sin.

God in judgment burdens them with oppressions, who neglect the cry of the oppressed; the greatness and provocation of the sin, may be read in the threats denounced against it, and in the judgments executed upon it. It is not enough (though it be more then many can say) for a Magistrate to say by way of challenge (as old Samuel did, 1 Sam. 12. 3.) Whom have I oppressed? unless he can also say, When did I not hear the cry of the oppressed? It is indeed most sinful to make the poor cry, but not to hear their cry, is very sinful. To deliver the poor and needy, to rid him out of the hand of the wicked, is at once the duty and the honour of those who are in power (Psal. 82. 3.) And if man will not, God will arise for the oppression of the poor, and the sighing of the needy, to set him at liberty from him that puffeth at him (Psal. 12. 5.)

Thirdly note, Not to hear when the distressed cry out of wrong and oppression, is it self a wrong and oppression.

Job doth not only cry out, because he was in trouble, but because his cry was not heard in trouble: That he was not heard, was more grievous to him then any of his troubles. When they who have power and trust for the help of those that are oppressed, will not hear and help them, their not helping them, is a second, a renewed oppressing of them. Yea, whereas an act of oppression is wrong done at once; the not hearing the oppressed, is the continuing, or (as I may say) the perpetuating of their wrong. The anger of God will burn as hot against the Judge who hath not delivered the oppressed, as against his Adversary, or the Author of his oppression.

Secondly, As these words, I am not heard, refer to God, note,

That, God himself sometimes defers the hearing or relieving of his people when they cry to him.

The Lord sometimes answers before we pray; It shall come to pass that before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking, I will hear (Isa. 65. 24.) As there is a grace of God always preventing our conversion, he turns to us before we turn to him; so there is a grace often preventing our petitions, and our mercies are given in by God, before our desire of mercy is made known to God. Yet mercy doth not always out-run our motions, yea, the Lord lets us move and move again, ask and ask again, before the mercy asked and moved for, is given in. God sees it needful to exercise our patience as well as to supply our needs, and therefore lets us tarry before he hears our requests; as we put him very often, if not always to the exercise of his patience, and let him tarry before we obey his counsels and commands. And he doth this not only in a way of just retaliation, but in a way of trial. Nor is it any wonder that God delayes his servants, seeing he was pleased to delay his Son, who though he saith, Father, I know that thou always heares me; yet in some sence he was not always heard. The Lord deferred Jesus Christ himself, whom we find complaining much after the rate of Job. (Psal. 22. 2.) Where David as a type of Christ, cries out, O my God, I cry in the day time, but thou heares not; and in the night season, and am not silent That is, I cry night and day, or continually, but thou heares not. Christ was not heard, that is, he was not presently relieved in the thing that he prayed for. God seemed even to shut up, and stop his ears against his cry; He cried, and was not heard. Christ was heard, and not heard. He was not heard for the removing of the Cup from him, the Cup did not pass; yet he was heard as to the supply of strength in drinking that bitter Cup (Heb. 5.) He was heard in that he feared, or, for his fear. He was heard as to the support of his spirit, and the carrying him through the suffering; yet he was not heard as to the removing of the suffering. Christ prayed against suffering, though he was not willing to suffer, and God suffered wicked men to have their will over him. The Prophet Habakkuk hath a very parallel complaint to this of Job (Hab. 1. 2.) O Lord, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear? About what did he cry? Even of violence, and thou wilt not save. When the Prophet saith, How long shall I cry? he doth not ask how long he should yet cry; but he affirms that he had already cried very long: and therefore he adds, Why dost thou shew me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance? He means not his own iniquity, but the iniquity of others. As if he had said, Why do I see the unjust dealing, and iniquity of wicked men, by whose violence thy people are wronged and grieved? And as the Prophet bemoans himself, that notwithstanding his cry, he had yet conversed so often and long with these doleful visions; so at vers. 13. he seems to stand admiring how the Lord could bear the beholding of them. Wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously, and holdest thy tongue when the wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous then he, and makest men as the fishes of the Sea? &c. Where the greater swallow up the less. As if he had said, Lord, I have often prayed about, and pressed thee with these things, yet thou givest no answer; Thou seest all these evils, and though much hath been said to thee about them, yet thou art as a man that saith nothing; Thou holdest thy tongue, even when thy people are ground between the teeth of their cruel oppressors. Why dost thou shew me these sad spectacles? Why dost thou not rather hear my cry, save thy people, and work deliverance for them?

If it be enquired, how doth this answer the promise of God to his people, that they should cry, and he not deliver, seeing he hath said, Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver?

I answer, The Lord doth always hear so as to give his people the promised good, though he doth not give them the petitioned good. He defers to hear, he lets them cry out of violence and wrong, and will not help for such reasons as these.

First, That they may be more fit to receive deliverance; many cry out of wrong, who are not yet fit to be righted. Deliverances may be our undoing, if we are not prepared to receive deliverance. As we wait for the Grace and Mercy of God, so God waits to be gracious (Isa. 30. 18.) We wait for mercy, and he waits till we are rightly disposed to receive mercy.

Secondly, The Lord doth not deliver his presently from the wrong and oppression of the wicked, because some wicked men have not yet done wrong or oppressed enough, and are therefore suffered to do more wrong to others, that themselves may be more fit for ruine. They must fill up the measure of their sin; therefore they are not taken off with a high hand in the way of sin. The Lord always puts a a moral impediment in the way of ſin, he declares his mind, and gives the rule againſt it, but he doth not alwayes put a judiciary impediment, he doth not alwayes come forth with power and ſtrength, to ſtop men from going on in the way of ſin. He alwayes ſends his earthly Angels or Meſſengers with a word to ſtay the progreſs of wicked men; but he rarely ſends his heavenly Angels (as he did to Balaam) with a drawn ſword, to ſtop their progreſs in wickedneſs.

Thirdly, Many cry out of wrong, and God doth not hear, becauſe he deſires to hear more of their cries. When the oppreſſed cry in faith, with fervency, and from a holy frame, their very cry is as muſick in the ears of God. Not that he delights in the miſery of their ſtate, but in the holineſs of their heart. The heart is uſually in the beſt frame for prayer, when our worldly ſtate is out of frame. And then our ſpirits are in the ſweeteſt tune towards God, when we meet with nothing but diſcord, nothing but wrong and violence from men. The Kingdom of heaven ſuffers moſt violence from a gracious heart, and he takes it (as it were) by forte, when himſelf ſuffers moſt violence here on earth, or when his earthly portion is taken from him by force. And therefore, Fourthly, God ſometimes (that he may teach his to pray better) ſuffers their outward condition to grow worſe. Prayer is the gift of God, and he can make his people perfect in a moment (if he pleaſe) in this great duty and heavenly Art of prayer; yet much of it comes in by exerciſe. Our proficiency in any holy duty, lies much in the practice of it; we muſt not forbear the practice of it, till we can do it better; for in the practice of it, we learn to do it better. Now becauſe our continuance in ſuffering, provokes us to continue in prayer and ſupplication (the oppreſſed widow, Luke 18. cried night and day, till ſhe got the ear of the Judge, and releaſe from her oppreſſors) therefore the Lord lets the oppreſſion continue upon many of his precious people, that they continually exerciſing themſelves in prayer, may grow more ſpiritual and heavenly in prayer.

Fifthly, The Lord defers to ſend relief, when his people cry out of wrong, that he may make their relief and deliverance from wrong, more ſweet when at laſt he ſends it: It is therefore long a coming, that it may be more welcome when it comes. They who cry out of wrong, and are not heard after many cries, when once they are heard, how do they ſing for joy? We ſay proverbially, He that gives ſpeedily, doubles his gift. And 'tis ſo indeed in the nature of the thing given, and in the deſert of the giver; but 'tis rarely ſo as to the prizings and improvement of the receiver. That which is given ſuddenly, is by moſt receivers ſlightly valued, and little improved; whereas thoſe mercies which we have ſtayed long for, and have coſt us much, ſtick longeſt by us, and turn to greateſt profit, whether we reſpect the honour of God, or the good of our own ſouls.

Sixthly, God lets them cry long without an anſwer, for the exerciſe of ſome ſpecial Graces: The Lord loves to ſee Grace at work, and ſome Graces have no long time to work; for though all Graces are eternal in their nature, yet in their uſe they are not: And ſuch are all ſuffering Graces. When we enjoy all (as in Glory) we can ſuffer nothing. Now when God lets his people cry out of wrong all their dayes (which are not many dayes) 'tis becauſe he would have that ſort of Graces kept in exerciſe (as well as other Graces) the Grace of Faith, of Meekneſs, of ſelf-denial, and of Patience, all which (with ſome others) belong to paſſive obedience; that theſe (I ſay) may be kept in breath, he lets the Saints cry out of wrong, and doth not hear them.

Seaventhly, God ſomtimes doth not mind his when they cry, that they may hereby take occaſion to remember how oft he hath cried, and they have not minded him: doth not the Lord cry out to his people of duty, and they do not hear him? Doth he not complain of this neglect, not only as a diſhonour, but as a grief unto him? (Pſal. 81.11.) O that my people had hearkened to me, and that Iſrael would have heard my voyce. No marvel then, if God let his people cry out of miſery, and doth not hear them. The Lord ſhuts his ear, that he might conſider how we have ſhut our ears; yea, he ſhuts his ear, that he may open ours. We are moved to hear and anſwer the call and command of God, when we find that he doth not hear nor anſwer our call and cry. If the Lord ſhould alwayes be ſwift to hear us, how ſlow ſhould we be in hearing him? and while we have all our deſires, forget moſt of our duties? In heaven we ſhall have all our deſires fulfilled, and yet not fail in any duty; but while there is corruption in the heart, there will be ſloth in the hand, and when we are waxen fat by the ſpeedy ſucceſs of all our petitions, we are more apt to kick with the heel againſt God, then to work with the hand for him.

Laſtly, God hears alwayes, though he doth not alwayes anſwer in our time, or in our way; yea, it is a hearing, and an anſwer of prayer, that we can pray, though unheard and unanſwered.

Secondly obſerve, A godly man is under a great trial, a ſtrong temptation, when he cries out to God, and is not heard.

Gravis eſt luctæ dubitantis carnis & exſpectantis ſpiritus. Merl.

As when Satan tempts us, there is a great conflict between the fleſh and the ſpirit, about the doing of good, and the refuſing of evil; ſo about our receiving of good, and the removing of evil; when we cry to God, and he is pleaſed to tempt us by deferring to hear us. Then the Spirit hopes, and the fleſh doubts; the ſpirit labours to maintain believing thoughts, and the fleſh labours to raiſe deſponding, yea, deſpairing thoughts. David was ſo hard put to it upon this account, that though he made no concluſions againſt the graciouſneſs of God, yet he could not avoid the putting, no nor the doubling, and more then trebling of the queſtion about it (Pſal. 77.7, 8, 9.) Will the Lord caſt off for ever? and will he be favourable no more? is his mercy clean gone for ever? doth his promiſe fail for evermore? hath God forgotten to be gracious? &c. How full of Queries was the ſpirit of David when he could get no anſwers? And though faith lay all this while in the bottom of David's heart, yet that which lay at the bottom of theſe Queries was his infirmity, as himſelf diſcovers, ver. 10. And I ſaid, this is my infirmity. It argues a great degree, and much ſtrength of Grace, when we maintain high thoughts of God, and ſetled reſolves that he is good, when he not only lets us fall low into trouble, but lets us lie unheard in the day of our trouble. Such was the ſtrength of David's faith, or rather of Chriſts, of whoſe ſufferings that Pſalm is a Propheſie; who as ſoon as he had ſaid, O my God, I cry in the day-time, but thou heareſt not, &c. (Pſal. 22. 2.) adds in the next verſe, But thou art holy, O thou that inhabiteſt the praiſes of Iſrael. As if he had ſaid, I will not have an evil, or an uncomly thought of thee, though thou refuſeſt to hear; I know thou art holy, and therefore canſt not but be juſt and good, whatſoever thou art pleaſed to do with me. Every ſoul arrives not at this freedom of faith. The denial of an anſwer to prayer, puts moſt upon complaints and queries; and ſo it doth, eſpecially while they conſider how explicitly and clearly the Lord hath engaged himſelf to anſwer prayer, and to relieve his people when they cry; yea, the Lord hath engaged, not only to hear them when they cry (which notes earneſt ſtrong prayer) but to hear them in their weakeſt ſincere addreſſes in prayer, when they do but whiſper and breath towards him. The promiſe is peremptory (Pſal. 50.15.) Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee. 'Tis ſo alſo (Acts 2.21.) Whoſoever ſhall call on the name of the Lord ſhall be ſaved. The Prophet Joel, from whom thoſe words are borrowed, ſpeaks of a time when there ſhould be ſore troubles in the world, Fire and Blood, and Vapour of ſmoke, all in combuſtion, heaven and earth (to ſenſe) mingled, good and bad, holy and unholy mingled (in appearance) and wrapt up in the ſame common calamity; yet then, Whoſoever ſhall call on the name of the Lord ſhall be ſaved; as if prayer made us ſhot-free, and were a ſure defence in all ſtorms; as if no evil could touch their perſons, or come near their dwellings, who can touch the Lord by faith, when they draw near to him in prayer. And which is more, the Lord promiſeth to prevent prayer, at leaſt (as was toucht before) that his ear ſhall be open as ſoon as our mouths, Iſa. 65.24. It ſhall come to paſs, that before they call I will anſwer, and while they yet ſpeak I will hear: As if the Lord had ſaid, I will ſometimes give you mercy before you ask it; but when you ask it, you ſhall not go without it; even while prayer fills your mouths, mercy shall fill your hearts. While your desires are but in forming and framing, your deliverances shall be formed and framed. You shall have perfect mercies, before you perfect duties. While ye are yet speaking I will hear.

Now when the Lord saith, He will answer before we speak, and yet lets us speak long, and gives no answer; how is the soul puzzled to reconcile the Word of God, and his Works; the Promises of God, and his Providences; this put Job hard to it, and strengthned the temptation upon him; I cry out of wrong, but am not heard.

This tryal riseth by a gradation of four steps.

First, It is a tryal, when the answer is deferred.

Secondly, It is a greater tryal, when we are denyed an answer. As God seldom gives what we ask at our time, so sometimes he will not at all give us what we ask.

Thirdly, It is yet a greater tryal, when God in stead of granting, appears angry with our prayers, or with us when we pray, as the Psalmist suspected (Psal. 80. 4.) O Lord God of Hosts, how long wilt thou be angry (or smoak) against the prayer of thy people? They cryed out of wrong, they were under the rage and anger of men, and God seemed angry with them while they cryed. So saith the Prophet (Lam. 3. 8.) Thou hast shut out my prayer. Which action notes God highly displeased with his prayer. When a man comes to our door, and we do not only deny, or defer him, but shut the door against him, this is proof enough, we are angry with him, or that we count him for an enemy. Yet thus the Lord sometimes deals with his people; in stead of opening when they knock, he seems to lock or shut the door against them.

Fourthly, To cry out of wrong, and not be heard, is then most grievous when the Lord suffers us to be wronged more, and encreases that trouble, the removing of which we pray for, even while we are praying. This is a sore tryal indeed. Thus the Israelites, who were under heavy burthens in Egypt, cryed to the Lord, yet their burthens were made heavier, and their pressures multiplyed. If our disease should gather strength while we are taking medicines to cure it; if our wound wrankle while we are applying Balsams to heal it, we are then ready to conclude, that our case is desperate. How are poor souls brought to the very brink of despair, when their troubles and streights grow more upon them, while (which is the most approved means to be eased of them, or eased in them) they are plying the throne of grace with constant fervent cryes and prayers.

I cry aloud, and there is no judgment.

Exponit eandem rem aliis verbis:

שוע hæc vociferatio est ex proprietate vocis implorandæ alutis & opis causa cum gemitu & ululatu.

This second part of the verse is of the same sence with the former. Only there is some variety in the reading, and expressions. He said there, Behold, I cry out of wrong. Here, I cry aloud. It is but one word in the Hebrew, but we can hardly reach it with two in our language; it signifies more then to cry, yea more then to cry out; it signifies to cry aloud, and not only to cry aloud as a Man, but as Dogs and Wolves, whose crying is howling. So some render it, a howling cry. We put both together in our translation, (Hos. 7. 14.) though the Original words vary from that here used. They have not cryed to me with their hearts, when they howled upon their beds. Take this Note from it, Strong afflictions usually raise strong affections in Prayer.

As trouble and grief rise, so we rise in our sence of them, and complaints about them. The Apostle saith of Christ, (Heb. 5. 7.) That, in the day of his flesh, that is, of his humiliation and weakness, while he was subject to the common (sinless) infirmities of our nature; For as the word flesh is taken in Scripture for our natural impurity, and for our pure nature, so for our natural frailties and infirmities. Jesus Christ never had flesh in the first sence; he still hath flesh in the second (Glory hath not abolished, but exalted the humane nature of Christ) But in the third sence, he once had flesh, but now hath not, he shook off all our infirmities in the day that he arose from the dead, and ascended into heaven; therefore (saith the Apostle) in the dayes of his flesh, while he was continually burdened with temptations and afflictions (In those dayes) he offered prayers and supplications, with strong cryings and tears: Christ was in a strong conflict; the pains of death took hold of him: And as his conflict was strong, so also were his cryes. When Jacob wrestled with the Angel, he did not only pray but cry; He wept and made supplication (Hos. 12. 4.) Weeping is a loud cry; though we speak not, every tear hath a voyce in it: but usually they who have the weeping cry, have the speaking cry too. And in proportion, when God, at any time, urgeth his people with greater and greater troubles, his people urge him with louder and louder cryes; I cry aloud,

Et non est qui judicet Vulg. Veluti quidam Athleta in stadio consistens vociferor, nec tamen meum injustitur judicium. Orig. Proprium erat Athletarum cursorum & pugilum clamor & gemitus qui se in luctâ & certamine confirmarent Pined.

And there is no judgment. Some render it, and there is none to judge. A learned Interpreter tells us, that this is spoken in allusion to the ancient custom of Fencers, Wrestlers, or Runners in a race, who in those exercises were wont to cry out, to cry aloud, to stir up themselves mightily, and shout, and then judgment was given, who had the better, or who had prevailed. According to this interpretation Job is conceived complaining thus; I have endured a great fight of affliction, I have been wrestling with strong temptations, but the matter is not yet determined, no man appears to take up the controversie, and pass sentence for me.

Others refer these words to the day of judgment, I cry aloud, and there is no judgment. As if he had said, the day of the great trial is not come, therefore my crying is but in vain. There will be a revelation, as of the righteous judgment of God, so of the righteousness and innocency of man; but that day must yet longer be waited for. I cry aloud, but it is not yet judgment-time. So, 'tis an argument to school and quiet his spirit into faith and patience; Till the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart, and then shall every man have praise of God (1 Cor. 4. 5.) That is, every man who is praise-worthy shall be approved in judgment.

But I rather take it of the present time, I cry aloud, and there is no judgment; that is, there is none to judge between me and my brethren in this case. There is judgment of two sorts.

First, In relieving, and acquitting the innocent.

Secondly, In condemning, or punishing the guilty.

Job complains of the want of both: he found no Judgment either acquitting himself, or condemning his adversary.

Hence observe, The defect of judgment is a deplorable evil.

We find God himself complaining of this (Isa. 59. 5.) None calleth for justice; many called for justice, by way of entreaty, but none called for justice by way of command; there were many suiters for justice, but there were none to do or award justice. But as it follows (vers. 14.) Judgment is turned backwards, and justice stands afar off; truth is fallen in the street, and equity doth not enter. Here are four words, Judgment, Justice, Truth, Equity, all tending to the same thing, and all denied entertainment among that people: Which is also expressed by an elegant gradation in four words. That which we will not receive, we usually turn back; here the Text saith, Judgment is turned backward; if not so, yet we will not let it come near; so here, Justice stands afar off; if it come near us, yet it shall not be maintained by us, therefore 'tis added, Truth is fallen in the streets; or if it doth not utterly fall, yet it shall not prevail, as the fourth expression tells us, Equity cannot enter; that is, it cannot find entrance and entertainment: upon all which the Prophet concludes (vers. 15.) The Lord saw it, and it displeased him, because there was no Judgment. The Prophet Habakkuk laments this (Chap. 1. vers. 4.) Therefore the Law is slacked, and judgment doth never go forth: for the wicked doth compass about the righteous: therefore wrong judgment proceedeth. Wrong judgment is no judgment; when wrong judgment proceeds, Justice is at a stand, or Judgment doth not proceed; that is, there is none to do any man right according to Justice; it is more sad when judgment is perverted, then when judgment is stayed. When wrong judgment is given, 'tis worse then when no judgment is given. The abuse of a thing is a sorer evil then the absence of it (Amos 6. 12.) They turn judgment into gall (Hos. 10. 4.) Judgment springeth up like hemlock in the furrows of the field: Gall is bitter, and Hemlock is a poysonous weed:

it were better nothing should grow in the furrows of the field then Hemlock, and that we should have nothing to drink, rather then drink Gall. Justice (though the sentence of it be death, which is bitter as gall or wormwood, yet) is sweet. Injustice (though the sentence of it be life, which is sweet as honey or sugar, yet) is bitter as gall or wormwood. But when wrong judgment (which is it self bitter) is also the judgment of death, how bitter is it? God sends a privy search through Jerusalem, to find a man, (Jer. 5. 1.) Run to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now, and know, and seek in the broad places thereof, if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment. That City hath not a man in it, that cannot yield a man to execute judgment, though it have multitudes and throngs of men in it. A people are then at the last cast, when God makes search, and finds not a lover of Justice among them. Nothing layes a people more open to the judgment of God, then the want of a man to execute judgment. When the oppressed cry out, and there is no judgment done by man, both oppressors and their favourers shall cry out because of the judgments of God.

Job proceeds,

Vers. 8. He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, he hath set darkness in my paths.

This verse contains a further amplification of his sorrow, by comparing himself to a distressed traveller; for here we have a way, and a path, and those things which are most offensive to a traveller in his way. Two things are very troublesom to a traveller in his way.

First, If he meet rubs in his way, much more if he meet with great blocks or fences set cross his way: Of this Job complains in the first part of the verse; He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass.

A second evil which troubles a traveller (though his way be plain) is darkness; How can a man go that cannot see before him? A man travels a good way with more fear in the dark, then he doth a bad way in the light. Job complains of this latter annoyance in the latter part of the verse, He hath set darkness in my paths.

I shall speak but little to this verse, because the substance of it was opened (Chap. 3. 23.) Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in.

He hath fenced up my way.] But who was it that fenced up his way? No person is expressed. But as he said before, God hath overthrown me; so here his meaning is, God hath fenced up my way. The Septuagint read not as we, He hath fenced up my way, but, He hath built round about my way. So Jeremy describes the straitned condition of Jerusalem (Lam. 3. 8.) He hath built about me. This similitude is used in Scripture when either a person or a people are brought into great straits, or are at a difficult point, so that they know not which way to turn themselves. The Lord tells the Church of the Jews, (Hos. 2. 6.) I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall, that she shall not find her paths; that is, the paths of her former sinful pleasures, in which she was wont to walk, and take delight. Now as the Lord hedges up the wayes of some, that they cannot do what they resolve; so he hedges up the way of others, that they cannot resolve what to do. In this sence Job complains, He hath fenced up my way.

Hence note, God sometimes brings his people into great straits.

Many cannot tell how they come into trouble, and most know not which way to get out. The way of that good King was fenced up, when he cryed out, Lord, we know not what to do.

Secondly, Job speaks this as a heightning of his troubles, which yields this Note,

It is an aggravation of our trouble, to see no way out of trouble.

The present enduring of any evil, doth not so much grieve us, as when we see our selves concluded and shut up in it. The fence which stops our way before us, afflicts more then the burden which is upon us. Those afflictions which are not only a pain to us, but a prison to us, are the greatest trials of our patience. He hath fenced up my way.

And set darkness in my paths.] As his way was fenced or stopt with many difficulties, so his path was covered with darkness. Job cryed out (Chap. 3. 23.) Wherefore is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? He speaks there, as if being in an evil way, he had desired darkness, that he might not see the evil of it; or as if because there was a hedge in his way, it had been a trouble to him to have any light in his way.

There is a threefold light.

First, The light of Knowledge.

Secondly, The light of Comfort.

Thirdly, The light of Life.

Job's way was so full of the darkness of trouble, that it was a trouble to him that he then enjoyed the light of life; and therefore under that temptation, and darkness of Spirit, he expostulates, Why is light given? That is, why is life given to a man whose way is hid? But as there, that kind of light in his way was a grief to him, so now darkness is his grief. He hath set darkness in my paths. What is this darkness?

Darkness is taken diversly in Scripture.

First, Properly for the privation of the natural light, or Sun-light. Job's path was troubled no more with this sort of darkness, then the paths of other men; without doubt, the Sun in the firmament shone freely enough upon him; therefore Secondly, Darkness is taken improperly, and figuratively, for that which bears the image and likeness of darkness; Such was the darkness set in Job's path.

This figurative darkness is chiefly of two sorts.

First, 'Tis put for affliction, or the uncomfortableness of our condition, and that either external or internal, either of body and estate, or of mind and spirit.

Secondly, 'Tis put for our doubtfulness or unsatisfiedness, for our ignorance or nescience about our condition. Job had all these darknesses in his path; yet I conceive, he in this place principally intends, either the darkness of inward trouble, which accompanied his outward troubles, or the darkness of ignorance and doubtfulness, what to do, which way to go in, or to get out of his troubles.

Hence observe, God sometimes quite withdraws all comfort from his people in affliction.

Light is the portion of Saints, and yet they may walk in darkness, and see no light. Not only are their paths darkned by afflictions, but darkness is in that darkness; Darkness dwells upon their affections, and darkness covers the face of their understandings. They are at once in that darkness which is opposed to comfort, and in that darkness which is opposed to Counsel. They can neither tell how to rejoyce, nor what to advise. The Psalmist affirms (Psal. 112. 4.) Unto the upright there ariseth light in darkness; that is, comfort in affliction. He hath comforted others in affliction, and been light to them in their darkness, as is shewed in the latter end of that fourth, and in the fifth verse, and therefore by way of gracious retaliation, the Lord will comfort him in his affliction, and command the light to rise upon him in his darkness. Many righteous persons have experimented the truth and sweetness of this promise; yet not a few have been denyed it, and in stead of light rising to them in darkness, have had darkness rising in darkness, or darkness upon darkness; inward darkness upon outward darkness; the darkness of an afflicted Spirit, upon the darkness of an afflicted State; a darkness about what becomes them to do, mingled with the darkness of their greatest sufferings; their path is at once a painful one, and an obscure one; they are full of pain when they go, and they are full of uncertainties and doubts, both when and where to go. He hath set darkness in my paths. And,

Vers. 9. He hath stript me of my glory, and taken my Crown from my head.

This verse contains a second comparison, by which Job amplifies his affliction. He amplified it in the former verse by comparing himself to a Traveller, who meets with those two great discommodities in his way, Cross-fences, and darkness: now he amplifies it by comparing himself to a man lately cloathed and furnished with rich and excellent ornamens, but now stript naked and bare. Thus in a literal sence Joseph's brethren dealt with him (Gen. 37.

37. 23.) they ſtript him out of his coat, his coat of many colours (or pieces) that was on him. The ſame word is uſed in both places, Job complains of ſuch hard uſage;

פשט In hiphil eſt ſpoliare altero ſuadente; ex verbo dicas Fecit ſpoliare; ut ſignificet multos in ſuam calamitatem alicujus præcipuè hortatu & ſuaſu conſpiraſſe.

He hath ſtript me of my glory.] The word which we render Stript, being in Hiphil, imports the doing of a thing at the perſwaſion of another; He hath ſtript me of my glory; That is, he hath cauſed, or encouraged others to ſtrip me of my glory.

'Tis the barbariſm of the worſt ſort of thieves and robbers, to ſtrip travellers, or ſuch as fall into their hands, and leave them naked. The word ſignifies alſo a greater cruelty, then ſtripping off the cloaths, even the ſtripping off the skin; ſo we tranſlate it (Micah 3. 3.) where the Prophet thus beſpeaks the oppreſſing Princes of Iſrael; Hear, I pray you, O heads of Jacob, &c. Who alſo eat the fleſh of my people, and flay their skin from off them, and break their bones, and chop them in pieces, as for the pot, and as fleſh within the caldron. We give the ſame ſence here; He hath ſtript me of my glory; that is, he hath taken it off, even as the skin of a beaſt is flain off, he hath left me not only without cloaths, but without a skin. When a man hath all taken from him to his skin, then we may ſay his skin is taken off too. And that's the meaning of the Prophet Micah, when he ſaith, They flay their skin from off them. Not that they did formally exerciſe that act of inhumanity to flay off the skin. He that ſleeps (as we ſay) in a whole skin, may yet in this ſence have his skin flayed off. A man is then ſaid to have his skin flayed off, when he is ſtripped to his skin, and all is taken from him: Cloaths and other outward conveniences, are to a man as the skin is to a beaſt; therefore, they are ſaid to flay a man, or to ſtrip off his skin, who take away ſuch conveniencies. Thus to ſtrip a man to his ſhirt, is to flay off his skin; much more do they flay off the skin, who take ſhirt and all. Job ſeems here to bemoan the loſs, not of mean things, or of pure neceſſaries, without which he could not live, but of great things, the honours and ornaments of his life. He hath ſtript me of

My glory.] The word ſignifies that which is weighty, or ponderous; glory and honour are weighty, and they make the man weighty in the eſteem, or ballance of the world, who hath them. The Apoſtle calls it, A weight of glory, 2 Cor. 4. 16. They that have no glory nor honour, either in them, or upon them, are light perſons, and they are lightly eſteemed.

But what was this glory, of which he was ſtript?

There are three ſorts of glory.

Firſt, There is Spiritual glory.

Secondly, There is Heavenly or Eternal glory.

Thirdly, There is Earthly or Temporal glory.

Firſt, We cannot underſtand it of the former. Spiritual glory, is the grace of the Spirit wrought in us. Grace is ſpiritual glory. Hence the Kings daughter, typifying the Church, is ſaid to be all glorious within, even here in the ſtate of grace (Pſal. 45. 13.) God will not ſtrip his meaneſt ſervant of this glory, and all the powers of earth or hell cannot. Job was cloathed with this glory when he was naked, and cryed out, He hath ſtript me of my glory.

Secondly, Nor can we underſtand it of the ſecond; It was not heavenly, or eternal glory, Job had not yet put on that cloathing, and therefore he could not be ſtripped of it.

Therefore we are to reſtrain it to the third ſort, Earthly glory. And earthly glory may be taken, Firſt, Strictly, for that which we call fame, or renown in the world.

Secondly, We may take glory more generally for that thing, whatſoever it is, which gets us fame or glory in the world; that which gives any man preheminence above other men, that's his glory. Therefore the mercy of God is called his glory (Rom. 3. 23.) becauſe it renders him ſo glorious; And for that reaſon the paſſing over a tranſgreſſion is called the glory of a man (Prov. 19. 11.) Hence alſo the Woman is called the glory of the man (1 Cor. 11. 7.) The man (ſaith the Apoſtle) is the image and glory of God, but the woman is the glory of the man. But is not the woman alſo the image and glory of God? The woman may be conſidered, either firſt, according to her ſpecifical nature, and ſo ſhe was created according to the image of God in righteouſneſs and holineſs, as well as the man; or ſecondly, according to her ſex and perſonal relation to her husband, and in that regard, the woman is not the image of God but the man, becauſe dominion (which is the mans priviledge) is the image of God, and not ſubjection, which is the womans duty (Epheſ. 5. 24.) And in this ſence the woman (though her Glory be inferior to the mans) is the Glory of the man; for if the ſubjection of the irrational creatures unto man, be his glory, or honour; then what an honour, what a glory is it for man to have ſo excellent a creature as the woman, a creature endued with reaſon, as himſelf is, ſubject to him? Hence upon the ſame common ground, Civil power, rule, and authority among men, are called the Glory of a man, and ſo alſo are worldly riches and ſubſtance, becauſe they occaſion mans eſteem, and put a kind of glory upon him in the world. In this language the ſons of Laban complain enviouſly of Jacob (Gen. 31. 1.) And he heard the words of Labans ſons, ſaying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our fathers, and of that which was our fathers hath he gotten all this glory; That is, all this ſubſtance and riches, his flocks and heards of cattel, he hath feathered his neſt well out of our fathers eſtate; this they call his glory. Joſeph gives charge to his brethren (Gen. 45. 13.) to make report to his father how it was with him; Tell him (ſaith he) of all my glory in Egypt; that is, let him know, how much I am enriched and advanced, being made, by the good hand of God with me; A father to Pharaoh, and a ruler over all the land of Egypt. Joſeph would have this told his father, out of affection to comfort him, not out of ambition to exalt himſelf. Joſeph did not vainly ſpread his plumes like Haman, who in a kind of ſelf-admiration, or in an extaſie of pride called for his friends, and Zereſh his wife, as ſoon as he came from Court, and told them of the Glory of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things, wherein the King had promoted him, and how he had advanced him above the Princes and ſervants of the King. Such promotion and advancement is the brighteſt ſhine of earthly glory; and whatſoever makes us ſhine with any brightneſs, is our glory here on earth. Hence likewiſe children are called their fathers glory. So that place is expounded (Hoſ. 9. 11.) As for Ephraim, their glory ſhall flie away like a bird, from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception. The glory of Ephraim conſiſted in their numerous off-ſpring, according to the propheſie of Jacob; His ſeed ſhall become a multitude of Nations (Gen. 48. 19.) The departure or rather flight of this glory is ſignificantly threatned, when he ſaith, Their children ſhall flie like a bird from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception; that is, either their women ſhall be barren and have no conception, or if they conceive, their infants ſhall ſuffer abortion and die in the womb; or if they live to the birth, they ſhall dye as ſoon as they are born; Their glory ſhall flie away.

Theſe external things, as children, riches, power, and places of authority, are called the glory of a man; becauſe they render him honourable, and cloath him (as the oppoſite word ſtript implies) with glory in the eyes of men. Under the Law the High Prieſts ornaments were called garments for glory and beauty (Exod. 28. 2.) And we may call thoſe things which are our glory our garments.

Theſe are as garments,

Firſt, Becauſe they compaſs and cover us as round as a garment.

Secondly, Becauſe they keep us warm, and fence us from the cold of outward ſufferings.

Thirdly, They are as garments, becauſe there is an ornament as well as an uſefulneſs in them. Chriſt implies that Solomon's Glory was his cloathing and array, while he ſaith (comparatively to the Lillyes of the field) Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of theſe (Matth. 6. 29.) Solomon in his Glory, was Solomon at the height of his outward pomp and greatneſs. When Michal ſaw David dauncing before the Lord at the removal of the Ark; How glorious was the King of Iſrael to day, ſaith ſhe? That is, he was not at all glorious; ſhe thought he had laid his honour in the duſt, and ſtript himſelf of all his Kingly Glory, while he dauńced before the Lord with all his might, girded with a linnen Ephod.

Gloriæ dictæ ſunt de te, i. e. quicquid poteſt te gloriosum reddere.

The Church is the City of God; and of that City glorious things are ſpoken (Pſal. 87. 3.) The Hebrew is, Glories are ſpoken of thee, O thou City of God! All the Cities of the world are the Cities of God, by his general Title of Soveraignty: For ſo the whole world is the Lords, and the fulneſs of it (Pſal. 50. 12.) But there is a City which is his by a ſpecial title of propriety: For as the Lord hath a peculiar people, ſo he hath a peculiar City; and indeed, the peculiar City of God is nothing elſe but the peculiar people of God, living in the order of the Goſpel. Now this City of God hath its Glories, that is, many things which make it glorious. The Cities of men have their Glories, and many have ſpoken glorious things of them. Their Glories are, Firſt, A pleaſant Situation. Secondly, Riches. Thirdly, Populouſneſs, or the multitude of Inhabitants. Fourthly, Beautiful Buildings. Fifthly, Strong Walls and Bulwarks. Sixthly, Good Laws. Seventhly, Good Magiſtrates. Theſe are the chief Glories of the Cities of men. But the Glories of the City of God are, Firſt, Truth of Doctrine. Secondly, Purity of Worſhip. Thirdly, The Unity of Profeſſors. Fourthly, and chiefly, The Preſence of God among them; of which the Prophet Ezekiel ſpeaks in the laſt verſe of his Propheſie; The name of that City from that day ſhall be, The Lord is there. Theſe are the Glories of the City of God, and thoſe are the glories of the Cities of men. Now as theſe publick eminencies and advantages are the glory of Cities, both in their civil and ſpiritual capacities; ſo perſonal eminencies and advantages are the glory of a ſingle or particular man: and when he who was rich, is made poor; when he who is ſtrong, becomes weak; when he who had many children, is made childleſs; when he who was exalted in great power and authority, is caſt down and contemned; then he may ſay, as Phineas his wife did when the Ark of God was taken, Ichabod, Where is the glory? Or as Job in the Text; He hath ſtript me of my Glory; and (which carries the ſame ſence and ſcope,)

He hath taken the Crown from off my head.

A Crown and Glory are of ſuch near alliance, that they are often put together as one thing. Solomon exhorts to exalt Wiſdom; and why? She ſhall exalt thee, and a Crown of Glory ſhall ſhe deliver to thee (Prov. 4. 8, 9.) And the Lord promiſeth (Iſa. 28. 5.) That he will be for a Crown of Glory, and for a Diadem of beauty unto the reſidue of his people: Yea, that his people ſhall be a Crown of Glory in his hand (Iſa. 62. 3.) All Crowns are glorious, and Glory is a Crown. Hence the Apoſtle ſaith (Heb. 2. 9.) We ſee Jeſus, who was made a little lower then the Angels for the ſuffering of death, that is, that he might be fitted to ſuffer death (which he had not been, unleſs he had been made a little lower then the Angels in one reſpect, namely, by his taking upon him our humane nature; for Jeſus Chriſt was made lower then the Angels, that he might ſuffer death, as well as by his ſuffering of death; now (ſaith the Apoſtle) we ſee Jeſus who was made thus low) crowned with glory and honour. Thus Glory and the Crown are joyned; and therefore as ſoon as Job had ſaid, He hath ſtript me of my Glory; he ſuitably adds, And,

מור Quod hic vertitur auferre, contrarium eſt verbo אסר quod vincire ſignificat, & veſti poteſt diſſolvit

He hath taken my Crown from my head.] Some render, He hath untied; Crowns being anciently tied to the heads of Princes.

The word Crown may be taken two wayes.

First, Properly, for that Royal Ornament of Kingſhip: Some interpet it ſo here; as if Job had complained that he had loſt his Kingdom, or was diveſted of Kingly dignity. 'Tis undeniable that he was a great man, a chief Magiſtrate, poſſibly a King.

Conqueritur ſe regno ſpoliatum nonnulli ſuſpicantur Jobum regem fuiſſe, i. e. regulum terræ Uz. Dru.

Secondly, The word Crown may be taken improperly, or largely; And then whatſoever a man hath in any eminency, he is ſaid to be crowned with it; or that it is called his Crown. (Pſal. 8. 5.) Thou haſt crowned him with honour and dignity; that is, thou haſt given him abundance of honour and dignity (Pſ. 103. 4.) Thou crowneſt him with thy loving kindneſs and mercy. And when the year is plentifully ſtored with the fruits of the earth, the Lord is ſaid to crown it with his goodneſs (Pſal. 65. 12.) Thus a virtuous woman is a Crown to her husband (Prov. 12. 4.) The husband is the wives head, and a woman of ſtrength (as the Hebrew hath it) that is, a woman of ſtrong and maſculine virtues, is a Crown, that is, an Ornament, or an honour to her head. And thus, Riches are a Crown to the wiſe (Prov. 14. 24.) That is, they give him opportunity to do great things, and make excellent improvements of his wiſdom; he rules in buſineſſes like a King, his counſels are as powerful as commands, and he gives the Law to others; whereas the poor mans wiſdom is deſpiſed, and his words are not heard, Ec. 9. 16.

Again, Some reſtrain Job's Crown to his Children. Thou haſt taken my Crown off my head; that is, my Children. Children (Prov. 17. 6.) are called a Crown: Childrens Children are the Crown of old men, and the glory of children are their Fathers. Children are the Crown of old men in a twofold reſpect.

First, Becauſe it is an honour to have children; and the more children, the more honour.

Secondly, Becauſe they encircle their parents as a Crown (Pſal. 127.) They ſtand as Olive-plants round about the Table; in which ſence, a knot or company of Drunkards are called a Crown (Iſa. 28. 1.) Wo to the Crown of pride, to the Drunkards of Ephraim. Drunkards (as ſome expound) are called a Crown, becauſe they ſit round, or becauſe they drink round, till the houſe goes round with them. Theſe are called the Crown of pride, or a proud company, becauſe as they drink their wits out of their heads, ſo all humility and civility out of their behaviour. This is true of literal Drunkards. Yet that Text may be expounded of Metaphorical Drunkards, whoſe minds are fluſter'd and overcome with the wine of their own preſumption and proud aerie imaginations.

Thirdly, Others refer it to his Acquaintance and ſpecial Friends, who (having been a comfort and an honour to him) he calls his Crown. So the Apoſtle ſalutes the Philippians (chap. 4. 1.) My brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and my crown. He ſpeaks as high of the Theſſalonians (1 Theſ. 2. 19.) What is our hope, our joy, or Crown of rejoycing? Are not even ye in the preſence of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt at his coming? Converſion is the Crown or chief work of the Miniſtry, and converted perſons are the Crown or chiefeſt honour of a Miniſter. What is more deſirable or honourable then to convert, then to win ſouls to Chriſt, and to build them up in Faith? And thus any may call his godly friends and familiars, eſpecially ſuch as he hath been helpful to in their turning to God, his Crown.

Yet I rather take the word Crown here in the general notion of it (as Glory was in the former part of the verſe) for any earthly excellency. In which ſence the whole people of Iſrael cry out (Lam. 5. 16.) The Crown is fallen from our head; or, The Crown of our head is fallen, that is, all our priviledges and dignities are departed, now that we are carried Captives into Babylon.

Hence obſerve, The beſt of earthly excellencies may ſoon be taken from us.

Glory and Crown expreſs the higheſt of worldly attainments or enjoyments; and yet behold Job ſtript of his Glory, and his Crown is taken away. Not only is all fleſh graſs, but all the goodlineſs thereof is as the flower of the field (Iſa. 48. 6.) The fleſh of man is his natural conſtitution; the goodlineſs thereof is all moral and civil perfections: not only is man of a brittle conſtitution in nature, but all the perfections which he hath, on this ſide Grace, are brittle too. All goodlineſs is fading; only goodneſs or godlineſs is not. As the Prophet (by way of oppoſition) intimates, verſ. 8. But the word of the Lord ſhall ſtand for ever. As the Crowns of all men, or their chief delights, ſo the Crowns of Princes (who are the Crown or chief of men) decay and wither. Former ages have given teſtimony to it, and ſo hath ours. If the Scripture were ſilent in this point, yet experience ſpeaks it; and if experience had never ſpoken it to this day, nor given an inſtance of a decaying Crown, yet reaſon ſpeaks it, and tells us from the nature of all earthly things, that it may be ſo, though in the event it had not as yet ever been ſo. But when not only Reaſon and Scripture tell us this, but many and many experiences witneſs it, who can doubt it? Nor ſhall I here add any more to confirm it, having at the twelfth Chapter, as alſo from other paſſages of this Book, taken occaſion to touch this Argument, the changes of Princes and of all earthly things. Only take theſe two admonitions by way of Corollary from it.

First,

First, Set not your affections upon things here below; ſet them not upon earthly Glories, earthly Crowns. 'Tis no wiſdom to hold that faſt in our affections, which we cannot hold in our poſſeſſion; or love to that much, which may ſpeedily be loſt. Solomon reproves that unadviſedneſs with a vehement expoſtulation (Prov. 23. 5.) Wilt thou ſet thine eyes upon that that is not? for riches certainly make themſelves wings, &c. While rich men make locks and bolts, while they make clogs and ſhackles to keep, yea, to impriſon their riches, their riches are as buſie in making themſelves wings to flie away. And becauſe few will believe or credit this report of riches, but judge it a very ſlander, therefore Solomon doubles the word for confirmation, which we render Certainly, riches do it. We are not certain of any thing that riches will do for us, only we may be certain, that they will do as little for us as they can, and a great deal leſs then we expect, when we hear for certain that they are making (not feet) but wings to be gone, yea, to fly from us. Now ſeeing it is ſo, is there not much reaſon in Solomon's reproof, Wilt thou ſet thine eyes? or (as the Hebrew Text hath it with much elegance) Wilt thou cauſe thine eyes to flie upon that which is not? A covetous mans eye is as greedy after riches, as a ravenous Bird after its prey; and therefore he is, with much ſignificancy ſaid to cauſe his eyes to flie upon riches. But ſhall our eyes, much more our hearts (uſually the eye moves after the heart, though occaſionally the heart may move after the eye; but ſhall either our eyes or hearts) flie upon that which is flying, or make much haſte to get that, which makes ſo much haſte from us when we have gotten it?. If our Crown of earthly Glories be not taken from us, yet it will take leave of us, or we muſt leave it.

Secondly, Purſue ſpiritual, and make ſure of heavenly Glory; lay hold upon that which may be held. You ſhall never be ſtript of the glory of the Righteouſneſs of Jeſus Chriſt in Juſtification, nor of the glory of the Graces of Chriſt in Sanctification. Theſe ſpiritual Glories, theſe inward Glories, ſhall not be taken from you. The Soul that is once thus cloathed, ſhall never be found naked. The exerciſe of ſome Graces muſt be left off, becauſe there will be no uſe of them in Glory. But you ſhall never loſe or be ſtript of any Grace. And if we cannot be ſtript of the glory of Grace, then much leſs can we be ſtript of the Grace of Glory, or have the Crown of Glory taken from our heads. And as that Crown cannot be taken violently from our heads, ſo neither will it ever naturally wither or decay upon our heads. The Crown of Righteouſneſs, of which the Apoſtle Paul ſpeaks (2 Tim. 4. 8.) is alſo (as the Apoſtle Peter ſpeaks) a Crown that fadeth not away (1 Pet. 5. 4.) A learned Tranſlator conceives, that the Greek word, which we, with others render, Fadeth not away, is taken from the proper name of a Flower, of which anciently Crowns or Garlands were wont to be made. The flower fadeth (ſaith the Prophet, Iſa. 40. 7.) Yet this flower Amarantus (as Naturaliſts obſerve) fadeth not. Not that it never fadeth, but becauſe it retains its freſhneſs and beauty (though cropt) very long; therefore they call it (beyond the nature of any other flowers) the unfading flower. Whether the Apoſtle (ſome conceive he did not) did allude to this Flower or not in the uſe of this word, or only attended the Radical meaning of it, is not much material to the point; ſeeing this is clear, that his intendment is to advance the glorious ſtate of the Saints after this life, by the everlaſtingneſs of it, having alſo called it at the fourth verſe of the firſt Chapter, An inheritance incorruptible, and that fadeth not away. This Crown, for the beauty and ſweetneſs of it, is like a Crown of Flowers, but in the continuance and laſtingneſs of it, it is like a Crown of Gold, the moſt durable and pureſt Metal. Yea, to ſhew that there is no ſeed or tendency of death or decay in it, it is called a Crown of Life. (Jam. 1. 12.)

Camer. Myroth.

We read of a Crowned Woman (Revel. 12. 1.) Behold, there appeared a great wonder in heaven, a Woman cloathed with the Sun, having the Moon under her feet, and upon her head a Crown of twelve Stars. Every true Believer is cloathed (in his proportion) as this Woman (who is the Repreſentative of all Believers) with the Sun, that is, with Chriſt; and hath the Moon, that is (the Glory, and the Crown) the beſt of earthly things under his feet; as for his head, that's crowned with Stars, celeſtial excellencies, or the truth and purity of that Goſpel-Doctrine which the twelve Apoſtles (thoſe Stars of the firſt or greateſt magnitude) firſt preached from the mouth of Jeſus Chriſt, that bright morning-Star, and hath ſince in all Ages been held forth by all faithful Miniſters, who are Stars in the right hand of Chriſt (Rev. 1. 16, 20.) With this Glory Saints are crowned here, and they ſhall be crowned with the fruit of it for ever hereafter. Job's Complaint ſhall never be heard in Heaven, which hath often been heard on Earth, and may again be quickly heard from their mouths, whoſe crowns in the opinion of the wiſeſt men, ſit faſteſt on their heads; He hath ſtript me of my Glory, and taken the Crown from my head.

VERS. 10, 11, 12.

He hath deſtroyed me on every ſide; and I am gone: and and my hope hath he removed like a tree.
He hath alſo kindled his wrath againſt me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.
His troops come together, and raiſe up their way againſt me, and encamp round about my Tabernacle.

JOB ſtill continues his Complaint; he had done it before in divers alluſions, he takes up three more in this Context, to ſhadow his ſorrowful condition.

The firſt is taken from Buildings in the former part of the tenth verſe.

The ſecond from Trees, in the latter part of the ſame verſe.

The third from War, in the eleventh and twelfth verſes.

Verſe 10. He hath deſtroyed me on every ſide.

The word here rendred to deſtroy, ſignifies any ruining work, yet moſt properly the ruining of a Building; He hath deſtroyed me (ſay we.) He hath pulled me aſunder member by member (ſaith another) as a houſe is demoliſht part by part, or room after room, till, as Chriſt foretels the demolition of the Temple, There ſhall not be left one ſtone upon another. Thus (ſaith Job) He hath deſtroyed me. The Hebrew Text is in the Future; He will deſtroy; as if Job's fear had propheſied utter deſtruction to himſelf; yet moſt tranſlate (as we) in the preterperfect tenſe, He hath deſtroyed me. And though Job ſaith me, yet we are not to confine this deſtruction to his perſon, but muſt extend it to his Family and whole Eſtate; as the next words intimate; He hath deſtroyed me נתץ Confringere demolire, deſtruere; exprimit omnimodam deſtructionē ædificiis propriè convenit. סבב pro סבוך Merc.

Round about.] 'Tis ſad enough to be deſtroyed in any one part; but Job was deſtroyed in every part; therefore he adds, He hath deſtroyed me round about: This heightens the ſence. Job ſhewing the care of God in the Fabrick of his Body, beſpeaks him thus (chap. 10. 8.) Thy hands have made me, and faſhioned me together round about: He that is made and faſhioned, is made and faſhioned round about; yet this addition round about, hath its force, noting the exact and particular care of God in ſetting up the whole of his outward man in every part. Here the work of judgment is as large and exact as the work of mercy once was: He was formerly faſhioned round about, and now he was deſtroyed round about.

Further, This expreſſion, round about, may have either its reference ſtrictly to a Building of defence, a Fort or Caſtle, which when it is beſieged (as he proſecutes it in the latter words) when Forces lie round about it, they batter and aſſault it on every ſide, till at laſt they level and ſlight it on all ſides, not leaving one Tower or pinacle ſtanding. Or it may refer to the alluſion of a Tree, in the next clauſe of this verſe, which, when we would root up, we dig round about it, and then pull it down. Thou haſt deſtroyed me round about. It was the envious and malicious complaint of Satan (chap. 1. 10.) that God had made an hedge or wall (which was as an impregnable fortification) about Job's eſtate and perſon. Haſt thou not made an hedge about him, and about his houſe, and about all that he hath on every ſide? He doth not only ſay, Thou haſt made an hedge about him, ſc. his perſon, and about his houſe, and about all that he hath (which is very particular) but he ſubjoynes on every ſide. Job once had an hedge round about about him on every side, but now his defence was on every side removed. This complaint of Job stands in direct opposition to that of Satan.

Hence observe, That even universal destruction (in regard of outward things) may be the lot of the best and holiest of the servants of God.

Job was not only touched (as Satan desired) but destroyed; not only were the pinnacles of his house pull'd down, or the battlements and beauty of it defaced, but, the pillars of it loosed, and the foundation razed; all that was destroyable was destroyed. The servants of God have somewhat that can never be destroyed; 'tis our comfort, that though all round about us is perishing, yet we have somewhat within us that shall never perish.

Thou hast destroyed me round about: and I am gone.

Excedo è vivis, & jam me excessisse dicas, mortuum, sc. non moribundum.

That is, according to the Arabick Idiom, I am dead; dying is a going away, I am gone; I am a lost man, I am removing from the land of the living.

I am gone.] He was not gone when he spake this, and yet he saith, I am gone.

Pined.

That which we look upon as certainly future, or inevitably to come to pass, is to us as if it were present, or already past.

That good which we are sure to have, is as good as had; and that evil which we either must feel, or have deserved to feel, is as already felt. Abimeleck having deserved present death, the Lord tells him; Thou art but a dead man, because of the woman whom thou hast taken (Gen. 20. 3.) because in strictness of justice, 'twas death to take another mans wife, therefore he is spoken to as a man among the dead. So because believers are sure of eternal life, therefore the Scripture expresseth them in a present possession of life, or as being past from death to life, as if they had not only some beginnings, and foretastes of it by faith and hope, but were in the full fruition and visions of it. Thus here because all outward appearances and probabilities spake Job going out of the world and dying, therefore he concludes himself gone out of the world and dead. I am gone,

And he hath removed my hope as a tree.

Recedere aut abire facit spem.

He hath made my hope to depart, or go away, so in strictness of the letter; as if he had said, I am gone, and my hope is gone; and the reason why he said he was gone, was, because his hope was gone; hope is the most stayed comfort that we have, the last that departs, yea that which can scarce depart; hope cannot be reckoned among our moveables, for it is compared to an Anchor, and to an Anchor that will not drag; We have (saith the Apostle, Heb. 6. 19.) this hope as an Anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast; yet, Job perceived his Anchor moving, yea removed.

He hath removed my hope.] My hope is gone; what hope was this which was so movable? It was his hope about or for worldly things; Our hope about moveables is moveable; the hope we have about the world, is like the fashion of the world, which passeth away. Job's friends had laboured much to encourage and revive his hope, the hope of a restitution to honour and greatness in this life. But, saith he, my hope, this kind of hope is removed, 'tis gone; he had given sufficient proof that he had a hope which was not gone, but was indeed the Anchor of his soul, sure and stedfast, and that it stood fast as Mount Sion, in the midst of all the shakings of this worldly hope, and could not be removed.

He hath removed my hope.] As we are to take it for a worldly hope in general, so some restrain it to his hope of Children; Parents have much and many hopes about their Children: A good child is usually call'd a hopeful child; Children hope to have an inheritance from their Parents, and Parents hope to have comfort in their Children. He that hath no hope of Children, is called a drie tree (Isa. 56. 9.) Here Job bemoans (according to this interpretation) both the loss of the Children which he had, and his hopelessness of having any more Children, under the metaphor of a dry tree. He hath removed my hope as a tree.

But I conceive we are not thus to straiten his sence; for not only (to his apprehension) was his hope of Children removed, but his hope of life, and of any good which concerned this present life. He hath removed my hope

As a tree.] The word signifies both a tree growing, and a tree cut down, or rooted up; here we must restrain it to the latter; he hath removed my hope as a tree which is removed or pulled out of the ground. Job prosecuted this metaphor (Chap. 14. 7.) There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branches thereof will not cease, though the root thereof wax old. There he spake of a hopeful tree, but here he speaks of a tree that hath no hope, or of a tree of which there is no hope; My hope is removed as a tree; that is, as a tree of which there is no hope that ever it should sprout again; for though a tree that is cut down may sprout again, the root being left in the ground; yet when a tree is pulled up by the roots, there is no hope that it should ever grow again. Indeed a tree that is pulled out of one ground by the roots, may yield hopes of growing, if it be planted in another ground; and thus tree's are sometimes removed out of the ground, not to the fire, but to a fitter soyl. And thus (though I do give it for the meaning of the Text) Job's hope was indeed removed as a tree, it was removed from earth to heaven, from things seen and temporal, to things which are not seen, but are eternal. My hope hast thou removed as a tree.

Indifferens est ad lignum viride & aridum aut excisum significandum.

I have (upon other Texts of this Book) spoken of the nature of hope in general, and of hope about worldly things, and therefore I pass it here; only take this Observation,

That worldly hopes are perishing and loosable.

The Apostle ascribes an eternity to spiritual hope (1 Cor. 13. 13.) Now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three: Spiritual graces continue, but spiritual gifts are subject, not only to declining, but to vanishing. Charity never faileth (vers. 8.) But whether there be prophesies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away: but faith, hope, and charity, are lasting graces, there is no corruptibility in them. In heaven we shall be above hope, being taken up to the fruition of that which we hoped for; yet we cannot say, that then our hope shall be removed, but then we shall move in a sphear beyond hope. Hope is not destroyed, but perfected by fruition, as faith is perfected by vision. Saints may have their hopes of earthly things removed, but themselves remove into those heavenly things which they hoped for. The tree of this hope shall stand and flourish for ever; but of their other hope, they may say as Job, He hath removed it as a tree.

Vers. 11. He hath also kindled his wrath against me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.

Job proceedeth to set forth his affliction by a third Allusion. His affliction was very great, in that his hope was removed; but this made his affliction most grievous, that there was an appearance of the wrath of God against him in it, and the kindlings of divine displeasure. God doth sometimes remove the hopes of his faithful people, in regard of worldly things, and yet manifests his love to them, in spiritual things; they feel not the kindlings of an enemy-like wrath, but the warm beams of a friendly, yea of a fatherly kindness in their fiery tryals; but when these two meet, when at once earthly hopes are removed, and a fire from heaven kindled, who can bear it? The Prophet Malachy questions (Chap. 3. 2.) Who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiners fire. If none can abide the coming of Christ with refining fire, then who shall abide it, when he comes with consuming fire? The fire of divine holiness is very terrible, then O how terrible is the fire of divine wrath?

He hath kindled his wrath against me.] In this and the next verse, the comparison is taken from War (as before from trees and buildings) in which God is compared to some great Monarch of the world, who being exceedingly offended, and provoked, his anger kindles against his enemies, and he sends his Troops and Armies, to incamp against againſt them; His wrath is kindled againſt me; and he counteth me as one of his enemies.

War begins at anger and wrath; it ſtirs firſt within, and then it breaks out; Whence come wars (ſaith the Apoſtle James, Chap. 4. 1.) and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your luſts, which fight in your members? Were there not a fight in our ſelves, there would be no fighting with others. There is ſomewhat in the Lord, proportionable to this; Whence are the wars that he hath with the Creature? Their original is deſcribed after the manner of men, from ſome kindlings of jealouſie and wrath in him; not that there is any perturbation in the heart of God, he is infinitely above it; but he is thus deſcribed, after the manner of men, the flame of whoſe wars begins with a fire of wrath; therefore ſaith Job, He hath kindled his wrath.

The word kindled in the Hebrew comes from a root, which ſignifies anger, becauſe anger is the kindling of a fire in our boſoms; and from that Hebrew word it is conceived, that the Latine word ira is derived, it being as near in ſound, as it is in ſence. Wrath is a fire, and is therefore properly expreſſed by a word ſignifying the heat of fire; wrath in it ſelf is hot, and burning, here the fire is made hot, He hath kindled his wrath, theſe put together, note fierce wrath (Pſal. 2. 12.) If his wrath be kindled, yea but a little. The wrath of God is a fire, but ſometimes it is as a fire not kindled; but if his wrath be kindled but a little, it makes a dreadful fire. 'Tis the nature of fire to be hot, but fire is not only hot but fierce when 'tis kindled (Numb. 32.14.) Ye are riſen up in the place of your forefathers to kindle the fierce anger of God; the kindled anger of God, is the extreameſt anger of God.

I ſhall not ſtay upon the deſcription of the wrath of God, having ſpoken of it at large (Chap. 14. 13.) where Job as dreading the appearance of the wrath of God, begs with earneſtneſs, O that thou wouldeſt keep me in ſecret, until thy wrath be paſt. Only note here, that the wrath of God (as was touched before) and the kindlings of it, do not imply any paſſion or change in God, he hath infinite ſerenity and quietneſs in his breaſt for ever: what fires ſoever he kindleth in the Creature, himſelf is alwayes in one mind. The Scripture ſpeaks thus in reference to thoſe effects expreſſed upon man, not in reference to any impreſſion wrought in God. When that is done upon the creature which teſtifies the fierceneſs of anger, then anger is ſaid to kindle in God. One of the Ancients tells us, That the wrath of God againſt ſinners is nothing elſe but the puniſhment of ſin; Or the wrath of God is his holy and moſt bleſſed Will, everlaſtingly burning with hatred againſt ſin, and turning from it in high diſpleaſure; even as man diſcovers his hatred of thoſe things which are againſt his will, and lets out his ſpirit in anger againſt them. Had not ſin broke forth in man, there had never been any appearance of anger in God. As the wrath of God draws out puniſhment, ſo ſin is the occaſion which draws out the wrath of God. Yet the wrath which Job ſpeaks of here, was not kindled upon that account; God himſelf declaring that he was moved to deſtroy him without any ſuch cauſe. That fire was kindled for the tryal and exerciſe of his patience, not for the puniſhment of his wickedneſs. He hath kindled his wrath againſt me.

Ira Dei eſt delinquentium pœna, furor Dei eſt ſupplicium peccatorum. Chryſ.

Hence note, Firſt, The wrath of God is terrible.

A fire kindled to warm is comfortable: Aha (ſaith he in the Prophet Iſa. 44. 16.) I am warm, I have ſeen the fire; but a fire kindled only to conſume is dreadful. The wrath of God is ſometimes as a fire raked up, ſometimes as a fire blown up: The light of Iſrael ſhall be for a fire, and his holy One for a flame, and it ſhall burn and devour his thorns and his bryars (ſuch are all his enemies who ſcratch and tear his people) in one day. The Lord is a conſuming fire to his own (Heb. 12. 29) for the burning out of their corruptions; but he is a conſuming fire to the wicked, and unbeliever, for the burning up of their perſons; he is a conſuming fire to theſe, and yet they ſhall not conſume; he is a fire, whoſe heat is unſufferable, and yet they muſt ſuffer it; the fire of his wrath is unquenchable by any thing but the blood of Chriſt; and the fire of the wrath of Chriſt is altogether unquenchable. If his wrath be kindled, who alone quencheth the wrath of the Father, how ſhall his wrath be quenched, or who ſhall quench it? Pſalm 2. 12. Note, Secondly, A godly man may be under ſome preſent apprehenſions of wrath.

He hath kindled his wrath againſt me. Job was not only ſencible of the abatement of his outward comforts, but he felt ſome ſparklings of the wrath of God, in the abſence of inward comforts. Chriſt hath delivered believers from the wrath to come, yet even they may ſee and feel wrath kindling and coming upon them.

Thirdly, The apprehenſions of wrath are more grievous to a believer, then all his other ſufferings.

It is poſſible to bear all ſorrows with comfort, which are ſeparate from wrath. The Plague of Thunder and Hail upon Egypt was grievous, but that which made it very grievous was to ſee Fire mingled with the Hail (Exod. 9. 24.) 'Tis the minglings of the Fire of divine anger with the ſtorm of Thunder and Hail, the troubles of this life, which renders them ſo grievous to be born. 'Tis wrath which makes Hell ſo terrible: the Fire in Hell would be (comparatively to what it is) but as a warm Sun, did not the breath, that is, the wrath of the Lord like a ſtream of brimſtone kindle it, as it is ſaid of Tophet (Iſa. 30. 33.) As the wrath of God makes Hell ſo hot to the damned for ever, ſo it is ſome appearance of wrath, which makes affliction ſo hot to believers for the preſent. He hath kindled his wrath againſt me.

And counteth me as one of his enemies.

Job ſpake this language before (Chap. 13. 24.) Wherefore hideſt thou thy face, and holdeſt me for thine enemy? there he troubledly expoſtulates the matter with God about it, here he affirms directly; He hath kindled his wrath againſt me, and counteth me as one of his enemies; though the words carry the ſame general ſence, yet we have ſomewhat here worthy our obſervation and diſcuſſion, beſides what was there held forth.

חשב

He hath counted.] That is, He hath reckoned and ſet me down, or caſt me up in the number of his enemies; all thoſe tranſlations the word will bear.

In ſonie eſt ſicut adverſarios ſuos i. e. ſicut unum ex adverſariis ſuis.

Again, He hath counted me as his enemies.] The Text is plural in the Hebrew, not as we render, As one of his enemies, but, as his enemies. That is, as a deadly, not as a common enemy; as if I were ſuch an enemy to him, as had the enmity of all his enemies contracted together in me; he counts me, not as a ſingle enemy, but as an Hoſt of enemies. It is a frequent Hebraiſm in Scripture, to put a word of the plural number, to note ſome ſpecial thing or perſon in the ſingular. Thus 'tis ſaid of Jephtha, that after he had judged Iſrael ſix years, he died, and was buried in the Cities of Gilead (Judg. 12. 7.) that is, in one of the Cities of Gilead. Again, The godly is like a tree planted by the rivers of waters (Pſal. 1. 3.) That is, as a tree planted by ſome eminent river of water; ſo here, He hath counted me as his enemies, that is, as one of his enemies, yet ſuch a one as may ſtand for all the reſt.

Præclarè dicit tanquam, vel quaſi. Neq; enim aut Hoſtili animo aut etiã perturbato Deus ſuppliciа irrogat. Niceta.

Further, Job doth not ſpeak abſolutely, he hath counted me an enemy; as if God had proceeded againſt him (hoſtili animo) with the heart of an enemy, but he expreſſeth himſelf comparatively or with a qualification, by a note of ſimilitude, he hath accounted me as his enemies, or, like an enemy.

Job did not ſuſpect, much leſs conclude that God had written his name in the catalogue of his enemies, no, he knew God was his friend, and his heart told him that he was Gods friend, that he bare no ill will to God; yet (ſaith he, though ſuch be my ſtate, though I know God loves me, and though he knows I love him, yet) he hath counted me (that is) he hath carried himſelf towards me, and dealt with me as with one of his enemies; his heart is with me, but his hand is againſt me.

Hence note, Firſt, God is really a friend to his people, yet he ſometimes deals with them appearingly, as with enemies.

The love of God is everlaſting and unchangeable to his people, but his diſpenſations towards them have many changes. Hypocrites make a ſhew as if they were Gods

Gods friends, and God makes a ſhew againſt the ſincere, as if they were his enemies. Hypocrites are as Gods friends, and God deals with them as with his friends; they give him an outſide profeſſion, and he often gives them outſide comforts, and proſperity, he deals with them as if they were his friends: now (I ſay) as hypocrites declare a formal friendſhip or love to God, ſo God declares a formal enmity againſt many who are ſincere, that is, he gives them the uſage of an enemy, the wounds and ſtroaks of an enemy. As the Lord deſcribes the formal profeſſions and practices of love and ſervice to him (Iſa. 58.2.) They ſeek me daily, and delight to know my wayes, as a Nation that did righteouſneſs, and forſook not the Ordinances of their God; So, we may deſcribe the Lords outward diſpenſations and providences of wrath to his; he ſmites them daily, and afflicts them in all their wayes, as a Nation that doth unrighteouſneſs, and hath utterly forſaken the Ordinances of God. Thus he is ſaid to count them as enemies when he acts towards them as we do towards thoſe whom we indeed count our enemies, as was more at large ſhewed upon that place before-cited, Chap. 13.

Further, take notice of theſe two things.

Firſt, That God hath enemies; ſome are even fighters againſt God himſelf; And theſe are of two ſorts.

Firſt, Natural enemies, or enemies by Nature, and thus every man that is born, is born his enemy (Col. 1.21.) Being enemies in their minds, by reaſon of wicked works. All men are enemies, with all their hearts to God, till he doth overcome and change their hearts (Rom. 5.10.) While we were yet enemies, Chriſt died for us; thus all are enemies.

Secondly, God hath enemies by practiſe, ſuch are all they who live and continue in ſin, theſe upon the matter, proclaim and maintain war againſt God himſelf: Sin is not only a turning from God, but a turning againſt him. Theſe enemies are alſo of two ſorts, either ſecret, or open. Moſt are ſubtle enemies to God, going on cloſely in wayes of ſin, and keeping ſecret correſpondence with the luſts of their own hearts, and the temptations of Satan. Others are profeſſed and open enemies to God, they even ſend defiances to Heaven, and will do what they liſt, let God do or ſay what he pleaſe. Such a one was Pharaoh, and ſuch was Julian, ſuch were they (Luke 19.14.) who ſaid, We will not have this man reign over us: of whom Chriſt ſaith, (verſ. 27.) But thoſe mine enemies that would not have me to reign over them, bring them forth and ſlay them before me.

Again, What he ſaid before, God hath deſtroyed me on every ſide, and kindled his wrath againſt me, is reſolved into, or wrapt up in this, He hath counted me as an enemy; ſo that, to be an enemy, is made the meaſure, or the ſignification of the worſt eſtate imaginable. He that counts a man his enemy (according to the rule of nature) counts the leaſt good too much for him, and the greateſt evil too little for him. As it implies the greateſt manifeſtation of love and tenderneſs, when it is ſaid, God deals with us, as with ſons (Heb. 12.7.) And ſpares us as a Father ſpares his Son that ſerveth him (Mal. 3.17. A Son may expect, by the laws of Nature, the moſt gentle uſage, and kind acceptance from a Father) ſo it implies the hotteſt revelation of wrath and diſpleaſure, when it is ſaid, that God counts us, or deals with us, as with an enemy. God keeps his friends as the apple of his eye, (Pſal. 17.) which notes their ſafeſt keeping; but as for the perſons and lives of his enemies, he caſts them out as out of the midſt of a Sling, which notes their utter periſhing. Hence obſerve,

That it is a moſt dangerous condition to be in a ſtate of enmity againſt God.

Who would live in ſuch a condition as aſſures him of nothing but death? What do enemies expect leſs at our hands? And what can the enemies of God expect leſs at his hand, in whoſe hand the breath of his enemies alwayes is, and all their wayes? God hath given us a rule to love our enemies, If thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirſt give him drink (Rom. 12.20.) And in doing this as we obey God, ſo we imitate him, and declare our ſelves the Children of our Father which is in Heaven; for he maketh his Sun to riſe on the evil and on the good: and ſendeth rain on the juſt and on the unjuſt (Matth. 5.45.) But though God doth this often and long, yet he doth not this alwayes, or ever; nor doth he expect that we ſhould do this alwayes, or to all our enemies. It may be ſin to us not to take vengeance on ſome who are our enemies, even as it would be ſin to avenge our ſelves on any. And if men ſhould quite ſlacken juſtice, and not take vengeance on thoſe who are Gods enemies and theirs, yet God will. But if we be found continuing under a ſtate of enmity againſt God, he will not act towards us according to that law which he enjoyns us, he will not feed ſuch enemies, nor will he give them water to drink; He will not make his Sun to ſhine upon them, but command his fire to conſume them; and he will rain, not fatning and refreſhing ſhowers, but ſnares, fire, and brimſtone, this ſhall be (their drink) the portion of their cup (Pſal. 11.6.) 'Tis true, When we were yet enemies, he ſent his Son to dye for us, there he acted up to the higheſt degree of that law of love; yet they that believe not on his Son, but ſtand out in rebellion againſt him, ſhall ſurely dye. God hath not prepared bread and water, but fire and brimſtone for preſumptuous ſinners and unbelievers. This abuſed love will turn to the hotteſt wrath. And as God hath ſhewed himſelf the beſt friend to his enemies; ſo he will be their worſt enemy. God will appear an eternal enemy to his enemies in the next life, and he will not ſpare them in this. Moſes gives them a dreadful alarm (Deut. 32.40.) I lift up my hands to heaven, and ſay, I live for ever: if I whet my glittering ſword, and my hand take hold of judgment, I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me: I will make mine arrows drunk with blood (and my ſword ſhall devour fleſh) and that with the blood of the ſlain from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy. Rejoyce, O ye Nations, with his people, for he will avenge the blood of his ſervants, and will render vengeance to his adverſaries. As the love of God, in many paſſages of Scriptures, triumphs in lofty and pureſt ſtrains of rhetorick over all the unworthineſs of man, ſo doth his wrath in this over all the oppoſitions of man. The enemies of God ſhall be ſure to ſmart and fall; and therefore 'tis well for thoſe that have to do with enemies, if they can but make it out, that their enemies are Gods enemies; for as God will ſurely bleſs thoſe who bleſs his people, and curſe thoſe who curſe them: ſo when his enemies are curſed by us, he curſeth them too; and while we oppoſe them, he joyns with us; whenſoever we go forth againſt the Lords enemies, we go forth to the help of the Lord (Judg. 5.23.) therefore the Lord will help us to deſtroy them. The Lord will deſtroy them according to his own decree, though we ſhould forbear or withdraw our help; much more will he deſtroy them when we help on the execution of his decree. The Lord (ſaith David, Pſal. 110.1.) ſaid unto my Lord (that is, the Father ſaid to the Son, whom he hath given, as for a Mediator to his people, ſo a Lord over them) ſit thou at my right hand, untill I make thine enemies thy footſtool: that is, till I ſubdue them all under thee, or make them fall before thee. All the enemies of God are under this decree, and this decree (as the Prophet Zephany ſpeaks, Chap. 2.2.) will bring forth. The decree (like a woman with child) will be in travail, till it hath brought forth this judgment againſt all the enemies of Chriſt; yea though they ſit upon thrones, and have the Nations under their feet, yet they muſt be made his footſtool. Job found hard ſtroaks from the hand of God, who did only count him as an enemy; what then ſhall they receive, who are his enemies indeed?

Job proceeds to give us a more particular deſcription of Gods dealing with him, as with one of his enemies, ſtill proſecuting the Allegory of War.

Verſ. 12. His troops come together, and they raiſe up their way againſt me, and encamp round about my Tabernacle.

Here are three things conſiderable.

Firſt, The gathering of the Army; His troops come together.

Secondly, Their march; They raiſe up their way againſt me.

Thirdly, Their Siege; They encamp round about my Tabernacle.

In all which, Job elegantly deſcribes the enemy-like proceedings of God with him.

His

His troops come together.] The Hebrew is Gad, the name of one of the Patriarchs (*Gen.*49. 19.) Gad, A troop shall overcome him, but he shall overcome at the last; Both words are of the same root, Gad signifies a troop, and to overcome.

His troops come together against me.] But what are these troops?

I answer, They are the several afflictions and troubles which God mustered and called together to charge Job with. Many horsemen make a troop, and so do many afflictions; Job had so many as made not only a troop, but an Army; yea, a great Army. He speaks not only of a single troop, but of many troops; He hath brought his troops against me.

Copiæ Dei sunt omnis generis calamitates. Merl.

Some troops in the Letter assaulted Job, troops of Caldeans and of Sabeans; but besides these, his sickness and his sores, his pains and his poverty, the anguish and terrors of his soul; all these were troops, which came upon him as armed men; yea, his very friends who were about his bed, were as troops of enemies to him; at best, they were but miserable comforters to him.

This coming together of his troops may be taken two wayes.

First, They come together; that is, they come all at once, or at one time.

Vox originalis non solum temporis est, sed etiam consensus & [illegible] ejusdem. Συνδρομὴ δὲ πλοῦ τὸ συνεχῶς αὐτῷ ἐπομένους. Sept.

Secondly, They come together, that is, they come with one consent, they have (as it were) made a compact or a confederacy, they are united as one man to afflict my soul. So the word is rendred (Psal. 55. 14.) We took sweet counsel together, that is, we were of one heart, we agreed sweetly in our counsels. Job had many troubles, but they were all of a mind; they came all upon him by orders from one hand, and they came with one heart. The Septuagint express it by the same word, which is used in the Acts of the Apostles (Chap. 2. 46.) to shew the oneness of the pure primitive Church in the worship of God. They continued dayly with one accord (or unanimously) in the Temple, &c.

Thus the Army is levied, and the troops are come to their Rendevouz, we shall see them in their march presently; take only a Note or two from those words, His troops are come together.

First, Afflictions are as Gods Army.

Here are troops of them. The name of God is, Lord of Hosts; and as he raiseth his host to ruine his enemies, so also to chasten his own people.

Secondly observe, The Lord sends many afflictions upon one man at one time.

Here is not a single affliction to a single man, but a single man to many, to a multitude of afflictions. Here was a man and an Army; Job and a whole Host grapling together: Many are the troubles of the righteous (saith the Psalm) And, now ye are in heavinesse through manifold temptations, saith the Apostle (1 Pet. 1. 6.) And why were they in manifold temptations? The next verse answers; 'twas for the trial of their faith. It is a sufficient trial of humane strength and manhood, to combate with one man; he is counted more then a man, a Giant, who contends with two. But for the trial of divine strength and faith, manifold temptations are but sufficient. A little of God in one man raiseth up his spirit to do more then many men; even to combat with many troops of temptation.

Thirdly, From this allusion note, That, Afflictions are all at Gods command.

They are his troops, he is their General; they move according to his orders. As God raiseth these troops, so 'tis he that sends them directions what to do, and whither to go; they come when he bids them, and they go when he bids them; when he saith, Charge, they charge; and when he saith, Retreat, they retreat; according to the sound of the Trumpet which they hear from heaven, they move on earth. We may say to these temptations, as he in the Prophet, to the sword, (*Jer.*47.6.) O thou sword of the Lord, how long wilt thou be ere thou be quiet? put up thy self into the scabbard, rest, and be still: Here was a cry to the sword to be quiet; but the sword answered, or the answer was made in behalf of the sword, How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Askelon, and against the Sea-shore, there hath he appointed it. It is to no purpose to speak to the sword to be quiet, you must speak to the General, to him that commands in chief, and is cloathed with a Commission for the war. What can the sword do? It must proceed till he that drew and called it forth, recals and remands it back into the scabbard. 'Tis thus also in this war or fight of afflictions. The soul having been long pressed and assaulted by them, may perhaps cry out to them, O ye sorrows of the Lord, when will ye depart? O ye pains and sufferings, when will ye cease? But they answer, how can we depart? We are Gods troops, he hath given us a charge to come together against you; and with you we must stay till God call us off?

And seeing afflictions are at the command of God, be not angry, let not your passion rise against the creature, against this or that second cause by which you are afflicted; look up to the Lord of this Host, to the Commander of these troops. He sends them out as he pleaseth, and when he pleaseth, to punish and destroy his enemies, as also to exercise the Graces, and try the holy valour of his own children and servants.

Fourthly, God is able to raise troops of affliction out of any of his Creatures.

He is never at a loss for an Army. When the wrath of man is kindled, O, if he could get an Army, he would do wonders. The Lord can levie an Army with a word speaking; he can have troops, if he do but sound his trumpet, and beat his Drum; if he do but hold out his will, and say it is his pleasure, they are presently at his call. How soon did the Lord raise Armies against Pharaoh, of Flies, and Lice, and Hail? &c. How quickly did the Chaldeans and the Sabeans break in upon Job? How soon did an unkind Wife, Scabs and Sores, and what not, that was grievous to a poor man, either within or without, come in troops against him at the Lords appointment? His troops come together. Thus they are met and mustered, now they are upon their March.

They raise up their way against me.] That is (as some interpret it) they make themselves a large and plain way to come against me; and so 'tis an allusion unto Armies, who when they are marching, send Pioneers before them, to open narrow wayes, to level those that are uneven, and throw down their banks: The ordinary Road is not fit to march in, Armies must have room, therefore they raise up or prepare their way. This word is used (Isa. 57. 14.) To prepare and fit a way, a way which before was wayless and inaccessible; Cast you up, cast you up, prepare the way. The Baptist in a spiritual sence fulfilled that Propheſie, he prepared the way of the Lord, by him the valleyes were exalted, and every mountain and hill was made low, the crooked he made straight, and the rough places plain. 'Tis the the work of the Ministers of the Gospel to take out all the stumbling blocks and rubs that lie in the way of conversion, and hinder souls from turning to the Lord. The troops in the text did not raise up a way for Job, but for themselves, or against him.

Significat fore ut Apostoli monstrent, gentibus atque sternant facilem viam & aditum ad fidem Evangelii, ne hæreant aut deterreantur difficultatibus.

They raise up their way against me.] That is, they prepare a way to come upon me, or against me. The Hebrew word signifies upon, as well as against; they make their way upon me, they go over me, and trample me under their feet, they make me their way. The Prophet speaks this Language (Isa. 51. 23.) implying the extream insultation of the adversary afflicting the people of God: I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee (meaning the dregs of the cup of his fury) which have said to thy soul, (that is, to thee) bow down, that we may go over; and thou hast laid thy body as the ground, and as the street to them that went over; that is, thou hast humbly submitted thy self to their proudest cruelties. Indeed, wicked men (according to the letter of this text) would have the souls of the Saints bow to them, by yielding to, or following their sinful counsels and commands, but the souls of the Saints (in this sence) are stiff and cannot bow; as for their bodies or outward man, they can lay them down and bow, not only to the ground, but as the ground or as the street, for their enemies to go over. So here, these troops (saith Job) have made me as the very ground, or as the street upon which they trod; they have trod upon me. As Joshua gave order to the people of Israel (chap. 10. 24.) when he had overcome those Kings (who were a type of all the enemies of the Church, over whom the people of God ſhall triumph) It came to paſs, that when they brought thoſe Kings unto Joſhua, that he called for all the men of Iſrael, and ſaid unto them, Come near and put your feet upon the necks of theſe Kings; go over them, make them your way, do not ſtand upon it, becauſe they are Kings and great ones, tread upon them and fear not. As to tread upon enemies, and make our way over them, notes the compleateſt victory, and higheſt triumph, ſo to be trodden upon by enemies, and to be made their way, ſpeaks the loweſt ſufferings and contempt.

Fecerunt viam super me. Vulg.

עלי potest super me exponi, ut sit sensus velut viam tritam reddiderunt super me, ut sint illis velut viâ frequenti ambulantium itione trita. Mercs

But I rather follow our own tranſlation; They have made their way againſt me: That is, coming againſt me, they have made or prepared their way. As if he had ſaid, whatſoever lay in the way of my afflictions, they have removed, that ſo they might have a clear mark, and make a full charge againſt me. Hence obſerve,

That, When God ſendeth evils upon a perſon ('tis true alſo when he ſendeth them upon a people) nothing ſhall hinder.

His troops ſhall raiſe up their way againſt the beſt and ſtrongeſt; though it be a barred way, a rough, mountainous way, a craggy way, like the Alpes (which Hannibal paſſed with his Army againſt the Romans) yet the Lords Army will (as he ſaid) find a paſſage, or make one. We have an expreſſion in Pſal. 78. 49. very near this; where the wrath of God againſt Egypt, is thus deſcribed; He caſt upon them the fierceneſs of his anger, wrath, indignation and trouble, by ſending evil Angels amongſt them. Moſt interpret theſe evil Angels of wicked Spirits or Devils that vexed them; others of troubleſome men, who vexed them with evils; ſome expound that Text particularly of Moſes and Aaron, who, though perſonally conſidered, were very good, yea, the beſt of men then living; yet they were evil Angels in regard of the effect of their meſſage unto the Egyptians. A good man may (in this ſence) be an evil Angel, he may be a meſſenger of evil, or a means of executing the wrath of God upon wicked men. Thus Moſes and Aaron may be called evil Angels; for they brought ſad meſſages or ill tidings to the Egyptians, concerning thoſe dreadful plagues wherewith the Lord oppreſſed them for their oppreſſions upon his people: For by the Miniſtry of Moſes and Aaron, the Lord caſt forth the fierceneſs of his anger, wrath and indignation. But Egypt was a ſtrong place, and the Egyptians a mighty people, they would not eaſily yield; wherefore (ſaith the Text) when he did ſo, he made a way to his anger: As if the Pſalmiſt had ſaid, if there were not a way for his anger, that is, for the execution of his anger, he forced his way; though he did not find a way, yet he made one, and fought himſelf through all difficulties which ſeemed to oppoſe the deſtruction of his enemies. We put in the Margin, He weighed a path; he made the path as exact, as if he had put it into a ballance; the way was fitted to the largeneſs of his own anger, and it was fitted to the dimenſions of their wickedneſs. Thus he made a way to his anger, both by ſuiting the way to his anger, and by removing all impediments out of the way of his anger. If God will work to ſave, who ſhall let it? And if God will work to deſtroy, who or what ſhall let it? When God will either try his own people, or puniſh his enemies, nothing can hinder; neither the power nor the politick preparations of evil men, no, nor the prayers of good men (which yet are the ſtrongeſt rubs in the way of his anger) he will make his way through their ſupplications, when he is reſolved to puniſh his people; Though Moſes and Samuel ſtood before me, yet my mind could not be toward this people (Jer. 15. 1.) Now with what weapons did Moſes and Samuel uſe to ſtand before the Lord? Surely with prayers and tears; nothing makes ſo real a defence againſt the anger of God, as the prayers of his people do; yet God will break through theſe: he will make a way for his anger through theſe, they ſhall not ſtop him; much leſs ſhall the preparations or ſtrengths of wicked men ſtop him. As the weakneſs of God is ſtronger then man, ſo the weakneſs of prayer is ſtronger with God, then all the ſtrength of man. If prayer doth not ſtop his wrath, humane power ſhall never be able to give it the leaſt check. All our ſtrong holds and Forts will be but as the firſt ripe figs, which being ſhaken, fall into the mouth of the eater, when once the Lords army makes a Battery againſt us. His troops will not turn till they have fulfilled all his pleaſure; They have raiſed up their way againſt me.

And encamp round about my Tabernacle.] The Lords troops being raiſed, they raiſed up their way, and marched, and now they ſit down, and encamp round about poor diſtreſſed Job: They encamp round about my Tabernacle; that is, about all that I have, or my whole poſſeſſions. Here's a ſtrange ſight, an Army encamping againſt a Tabernacle: Job might ſay, What needs ſuch warlike preparations againſt me? Alas, mine is but a Tabernacle; I am not fortified in a Caſtle, or encompaſſed with impregnable walls and bulwarks; They encamp againſt my Tabernacle: A Tabernacle is but a weak houſe, weaker then our ordinary houſes; a Tabernacle can hardly keep out the rain, or ſtand againſt the wind, how then can it keep out an Army, or ſtand their ſtorm? A Tabernacle is a moveable dwelling, faſtened with cords and ſtakes, without foundation; yet here Job ſpeaks as if God had brought all his Artillery, planted his Batteries and Engines of war to beat it down; He hath encamped round about my Tabernacle.

Hence note, All that man hath in the creature, amounts but to a Tabernacle.

Job was a great man, and he had a great eſtate, an eſtate foundation'd and ſetled upon as much ſtrength as the creature uſually can afford, yet all was but a Tabernacle, whoſe cords are quickly looſened, and whoſe ſtakes are ſoon pulled up, and then down it falls. Man himſelf in regard of his natural life, is periſhing, his body is a Tabernacle; Our earthly houſe of this Tabernacle, as the Apoſtle calls it (2 Cor. 5. 2.) Now as the body of man wherein his natural life dwells, is a Tabernacle; ſo are thoſe things which concern the ſupport and continuance of his natural life. Who would truſt to, or ſhelter himſelf in a Tabernacle, when we have the Name of the Lord, as a ſtrong Tower, into which we may flee with aſſurance of ſafety? He that gets moſt of the world, hath got but a Tabernacle; and he that loſeth all that he hath in the world, hath loſt but a Tabernacle. A little true knowledge of what the world is, mingled, though with but a little true faith about the things of the world to come, will eaſily carry us above all the good and evil of the world.

Again (in purſuance of the Allegory) we know when an Army encampeth about a City, and layeth ſiege to it, no man can get out; Thus it is with many poor ſouls, afflictions hem them in round, they have never a port to get out at; the way is only open to heaven. The Lord is pleaſed to lay very cloſe ſieges to many of his people, they are ſtraightned in their outward enjoyments, they are ſtraightned in their ſpiritual enjoyments, and can find no comfort. As the ſouls of ſome refuſe to be comforted, ſo comfort refuſeth the ſouls of others; or all comforts are (as by a ſtrong hand, yea, as by a ſtrong hoſt) with-holden from their ſouls. David's mighty men broke through the hoſt of the Philiſtims, when he longed for the water of Bethlehem; but Gods hoſt of troubles and afflictions cannot be broken through by the mightieſt among the ſons of men, though there be a well of water beyond them, which their ſouls long for as much as David did for that of Bethlehem.

Laſtly, Take this Note from the alluſion alſo; They encamp againſt me.

Afflictions may continue long upon us or about us.

There is a difference between the fighting of a Battel and encamping; a Battel is but for an hour or a day; but encampings are for continuance: we have heard of encampings and beſiegings, not only for a few dayes, but for many months; yea, for ſome years. The troops of trouble give ſome only a fierce charge, but they ſit down and encamp againſt the Tabernacles of others. Some particular ſouls have endured longer ſieges then ever any City did. Not only do the terrors of God (within and without) ſet themſelves in array againſt them (as Job complained, chap. 6. 4.) but they are afflicted and ready to die from their youth up, ſuffering thoſe terrors, as Heman complains (Pſal. 88. 15.) Therefore let not our hearts faint, though we are beſieged, though ſorrows encamp againſt us. When God ſeems to tell us in the diſpenſations of his providence, that he will batter us down and level us with the ground, yet all this is but to try how we can ſtand our ground in an evil day, how we can maintain our truſt, and hold out a ſiege; ſome give up the ſtrengths under their command at the firſt ſummons, others hold out till the laſt bit of bread; God doth but try his whether they will perſevere to the laſt, to the utmoſt. Let patience have its perfect work, for afflictions will have their perfect work; when they make long work, let patience make long work too. When God encamps againſt us, let us ſpeedily give up the ſtrong holds of ſin, but let us maintain the ſtrong holds of grace, the forts of faith and patience, quitting our ſelves like men, or rather like Chriſtians; let us give proof of holy courage in the hotteſt aſſaults, and in the longeſt ſieges. The Lord doth not intend ruine to our perſons, though he ruine our Tabernacles. Thoſe outward evils ſhall work for our good, which deprive us of all outward good; and if both the Tabernacles which we uſe, and in which we dwell, while we are in the body, as alſo the Tabernacles of our body, be diſſolved and ſhattered to the ground in this war, yet we have a building of God, an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Laſtly obſerve, There is no ſtriving, no contending with afflictions.

God hath whole Troops and Armies of them at his command. As his enemies cannot ſtand before him, ſo neither can his friends, when he appeareth as an enemy. There is no prevailing but by ſubmitting. Who (ſaith the Lord, Iſa. 27. 4.) would ſet the briars and thorns againſt me in battel? I would go through them, I would burn them together. Wicked men are briars and thorns, if they contend with God, they contend with a fire, and are burnt. If godly men ſhould ſet themſelves in battel againſt God, when he ſets himſelf in battel againſt them, how ſoon could he go through them alſo and burn them together? When the Lord of Hoſts ſends his troops to encamp againſt us, he doth not intend we ſhould fight them away, but pray them away; nor is it his meaning, that we ſhould raiſe the ſiege by oppoſing his troops, but by falling down before them. We cannot conquer the leaſt affliction by force, but we ſhall be more then conquerors over the greateſt afflictions, even over all afflictions by faith. When Armies of bloody men invade or encamp againſt the people of God, we cannot (without preſumption) expect victory, unleſs we fight as well as believe; and act courage againſt them, as well as faith in God. But when Armies of affliction encamp againſt us, there is no overcoming, but only by believing in God, and humbling our ſelves. We muſt reſiſt the Devil and his troops of temptations, and he will flee from us. But no affliction ſent by God, did ever depart from him that was found reſiſting it. The Army of ſorrows which encamped againſt Job, was never fully withdrawn, till he ſaid, I abhor my ſelf, and repent in duſt and aſhes (chap. 42. 6.)

Thus we have heard Job bewailing his condition under the Allegory of war, troops of enemies drawing together, and encamping againſt him; in the next place he bewailes his condition, in the withdrawing of his friends: If when evils and enemies come upon us, our friends ſtand cloſe to us, it is a great ſupport; but when many troubles throng about us, and all our friends leave us, this is ſad. Thus Job deſcribes his forlorn eſtate in the next words; He hath put my brethren far from me, &c.

VERS. 13, 14, 15.

He hath put my Brethren far from me, and mine Acquaintance are verily eſtranged from me.
My Kinſfolk have failed, and my familiar friends have forgotten me.
They that dwell in mine houſe, and my maidens count me for a ſtranger.

JOB hath thus far expreſt his (almoſt) unexpreſſible ſorrows and afflictions by many elegant Metaphors and alluſions; he is now as exact and accurate in ſetting forth the effects of thoſe ſorrows, or what followed upon his affliction.

The firſt effect is deſcribed in this context, to the end of verſ. 19. And that is the unkindneſs and contempt, the unfaithfulneſs and unthankfulneſs of his friends and neareſt relations.

Secondly, He ſhews the waſting of his ſtrength, and the general conſumption of his own body, at verſ. 20. My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my fleſh, and I am eſcaped with the skin of my teeth: The burden of all which preſſures enforced him to make a threefold cry.

Firſt, For pity and compaſſion; Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me, verſ. 21.

Secondly, For ſparing and forbearance, in verſ. 22. Why do you perſecute me as God, and are not ſatisfied with my fleſh?

Thirdly, He cries out for attention to his cry, and ſerious conſideration of his ſad complaint, in verſ. 23, 24. O that my words were now written, O that they were printed in a book, that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in a rock for ever.

Theſe words hold forth the firſt effect which followed his ſorrows and afflictions; namely, the withdrawing of his friends, the unkindneſs or contempt of all thoſe that were about him; and he ſeems to caſt or diſtribute thoſe into four ranks, from whom he received ſuch unkindneſſes.

Firſt, His kindred, or thoſe of his blood; He hath put my brethren far from me, in ver. 13. And in v. 14. My kinſfolk have failed.

Secondly, He complains of the unkindneſs of his own family, in verſ. 15, 16, 17. Which he ſets down, Firſt, In general, in the former part of the fifteenth verſe; They that dwell in my houſe. Secondly, He names them diſtinctly. Firſt, His maid-ſervants; in the cloſe of the fifteenth verſe. Secondly, His men-ſervants; in the ſixteenth verſe. Thirdly, His wife, in the ſeventeenth verſe; thus his own houſe and family had deſerted him, and proved undutiful to him.

Thirdly, He was likewiſe grieved by the contempt which he received from children, the children of thoſe who lived about him; in verſ. 18. Young children deſpiſed me, I roſe, and they ſpake againſt me.

Fourthly, He deſcribeth the unkindneſs and unthankfulneſs of his intimate acquaintance and higheſt confidents, to whom he was wont to open his boſom, and with whom he had maintained cloſeſt correſpondence, both by giving and receiving courteſies, in the nineteenth verſe; All my inward friends abhorred me, and they whom I loved are turned againſt me: Theſe are diſtinguiſhed from his kindred, and may be intended alſo in thoſe words of the thirteenth verſe; My acquaintance; and in thoſe of the fourteenth verſe; My familiar friends. Thus we ſee all were turned againſt him, his kindred, his family, his acquaintance and aſſociates. This was an extream aggravation of his affliction; eſpecially if we conſider two things.

Firſt, The univerſality of this deſertion; it was not ſome one or two of his relations; all his relations failed him; kindred, ſervants, acquaintance, and, who is more then all theſe, his wife.

Secondly, Not only did all his common friends, but even they who had made profeſſion, ſerious profeſſion of love to him; there are ſome friends of whom we make no great reckoning, if they fall off from us; but when intimate friends, ſuch as know our hearts, and have been truſted with our ſecrets, ſuch as we love with much entireneſs, and are endeared to us by long familiarity, when theſe apoſtatize from their profeſſed friendſhip, and renounce the Laws of love, how heavy is this croſs? Yet even ſuch was Job's deſertion; as will appear in the opening and proſecution of this context.

Verſe 13. He hath put my Brethren far from me.

In the former verſe we heard of Troops drawing about Job's Tabernacle, and beſieging it: Now in this nick of time, while troops of enemies draw near about him, his Brethren withdrew and departed far from him; He hath put my Brethren far from me. This deſertion of his Brethren is put in equal ballance with the invaſion of his Enemies, and is indeed a heavier burden of affliction, and doth much over-ballance it. Their unkindneſs troubles us moſt, from whom we have leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect unkindneſs.

אח Frater cognationem habet cum אחר unus, quia fratres in uno convenire debent, ac proinde res inanimatæ, quæ in uno conveniunt, fratres dicuntur.

He hath put my brethren.] The word which we translate Brethren, notes not only nearneſs, but oneneſs: Many brethren, yea, all brethren ſhould be one, and agree in one. They who are near in relation, ſhould not be far off in affection. Job calls himſelf a brother to Dragons (chap. 30. 29.) becauſe his preſent ſtate was like that of Dragons, ſolitary and withdrawn from friends. And Solomon tells us (Prov. 18. 9.) He that is ſlothful in his work, is brother to him that is a great waſter, that is, he is very like him, or ſuch another; yea, things without life, which have a likeneſs, are called in Hebrew brethren or ſiſters (Exod. 26. 3.) becauſe brethren and ſiſters have, or are ſuppoſed to have likeneſs in conditions, and oneneſs in affection; My brethren.

But what were his brethren?

There are ſeven ſorts of brethren.

First, Natural brethren, who are of the ſame blood; and theſe are ſo called, ſometimes in a larger, and ſometimes in a ſtricter ſence: They are called brethren in a large ſence who are of the ſame linage, though they be not immediately ſprung from the ſame loins. Abraham calls Lot his brother, who was only his nephew (Gen. 14. 14.) James and Joſes, Simon and Judas, who were the kinſmen of Chriſt, are yet called his brethren, Matth. 13. 55. But ſtrictly they are natural brethren, who are born of the ſame parents.

Secondly, They are called brethren who are of one Countrey or Nation.

Thirdly, They who are of one Neighbourhood, or are near in habitation.

Fourthly, There are brethren by ſtudy, by courſe of life, or profeſſion.

Fifthly, There are brethren in manners and ſuitableneſs of diſpoſition.

Sixthly, Brethren by friendſhip, by covenant and mutual ſtipulation.

Seventhly, Brethren in Religion and Faith of the Goſpel. We may take all theſe ſorts of brethren into the Text; but ſpecially brethren in blood, and nearneſs of alliance; theſe Job ſeems particularly to intend, while he ſaith, He hath put my brethren far from me. But, how far were they put, or at what diſtance did they ſtand? We may underſtand it of a twofold remoteneſs or diſtance.

First, Of remoteneſs in place; as if he had ſaid, My Brethren came not at me, they will not ſo much as be where I am, one houſe will not hold us, I have little of their company.

Secondly, Of remoteneſs in ſpirit, they are far off in affection, their minds are departed or alienated from me; though I enjoy at any time their bodily preſence, I have a little of of their company, but leſs of their hearts.

Again, He doth not ſay, My brethren are gone from me; but, He hath put my brethren far from me. But who was it that put his friends far from him? Job aſcribes this as much as any other part of his affliction unto God; Job was as ſenſible that God had put his brethren and friends far from him, as he was that he had ſent ſo many enemies and ſtrangers (Chaldeans and Sabeans) in upon him. It was from the ſame hand that theſe invaded him, and that they departed from him.

Hence note, First, Brethren may fail in love to their Brethren, and prove not only forgetful, but unfaithful.

Yea, not only may brethren prove forgetful of us, but cruel to us. We have an experience of this in the firſt pair of brethren that ever were in the world: As ſoon as the bond of brotherhood could be broken, it was broken; Cain ſlew his Brother Abel, he was far from him indeed when he thus drew near to him. Chriſt forewarns us that we may quickly meet with ſuch actings againſt the light of nature, while we follow and act up to the light of Grace; The brother ſhall deliver the brother to death, and the father the child, and the child ſhall riſe up againſt his parents, and cauſe them to be put to death (Mat. 10. 21.) To deliver a brother up to death, that is, to deliver him up to others to put him to death, is as bad as if our ſelves had taken away his life. We do that evil which we do not hinder others (according to our place and power) from doing; much more may we be ſaid to do that evil, which we provoke thoſe to do, who have power to do it. To deliver a brother up to death, is to kill our brother. Grace teaches us to lay down our lives for the brethren. Corruption teaches the brother to take away the life of a brother. Our Book of Martyrs gives divers inſtances of brethren ſuffering for Chriſt, by the procurement of brethren. There are no bonds of love, but have often received a crack by luſt, and ſometimes a total breach; and where there ſhould be the greateſt love, there have been the greateſt breaches. The Prophet Obadiah checks thoſe Edomites, who were the Deſcendants of Eſau, and and ſo by Iſaac their common Father, brethren to the Iſraelites; the Prophet, I ſay, checks them for their inſolency againſt their afflicted brethren (v. 12.) Thou ſhouldeſt not have looked on the day of thy Brother. The day of their brother was the day of their brothers calamity, as is plain in the next words, In the day that he became a ſtranger, that is, to his own Land, being carried away into captivity: Thou ſhouldeſt not have looked upon this day of thy brother. But was it a ſin to look upon them in that day? To ſee them was no ſin, and to ſee or look upon them with an eye of compaſſion, was a duty; but they looked upon their brethren with an eye of ſcorn at, or with an eye of delight in their miſery; it pleaſed them to ſee their brethren oppreſſed and carried captives. This kind of ſeeing their brethren, was (within one degree) as ſinful as ſlaying them; ſuch looking upon them when led into captivity, was a leading them into captivity. That which we rejoyce to ſee any ſuffer from the hand of others, they ſuffer alſo from our hand. The Prophet Iſaiah deſcribes this unnatural unkindneſs againſt brethren (ariſing, in ſome, at leaſt, from a pretended or ignorant zeal for God) in the profeſſion of the ſame Religion (chap. 66. 5.) Hear the word of the Lord ye that tremble at his word, your brethren that hated you (he doth not ſay, your enemies that hated you, this a ſtrange conjunction, hating brethren, your brethren that hated you) that caſt you out for my Names ſake (there's the ground of the quarrel, it was religious, or about the things of God) ſaid, let the Lord be glorified, or, appear in glory. Which implies that either they pretended to glorifie God by caſting out their brethren, as Chriſt foretold, John 16. 2. They ſhall put you out of the Synagogues; yea, the time cometh, that whoſoever killeth you, ſhall think that he doth God ſervice. To do God ſervice is to glorifie him. Theſe brethren judg'd their brethren evil doers againſt the Lord, and that therefore it was good to puniſh and caſt them out; hence, they ſaid, let the Lord be glorified; or theſe words, let the Lord be glorified, may be expounded ironically, as if theſe perſecutors of their brethren had derided their brethrens expectation and hope of the glorious appearance of the Lord in judgment, to vindicate their innocency and do them right. And ſo it anſwers that of the ſame Prophet, chap. 5. 19. Let him make ſpeed and haſten his work, that we may ſee it. As alſo that of the Apoſtle, 2 Pet. 3. 3, 4. Where is the Promiſe of his coming? &c. Hence 'tis added, But he (that is, the Lord) ſhall appear to your joy, and they ſhall be aſhamed. They who either think to bring glory to God by troubling their brethren, or who deride their brethrens hope, that the Lord will appear to deliver them from, or to recompenſe them for all their troubles. Theſe troubling brethren (I ſay) ſhall have ſhame to their portion, and the portion of their troubled brethren ſhall be joy at the appearing of the Lord. The ſame Scripture ſhews the extream hatred of brethren againſt their brethren, and the ſore diſpleaſure of the Lord againſt Brethren-haters.

Secondly obſerve, The eſtrangement of brethren from us is very grievous.

Job laid it more to heart that his brethren did not comfort him, then that ſtrangers did afflict him. It is one of the moſt delightful ſpectacles to ſee brethren dwell together in unity (Pſal. 133. 1.) Behold, how good and how pleaſant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! He compares it to the dew of Hermon, and to the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, and that went down to the skirt of his garment. Now, as it is a pleaſure to behold the union and harmony of brethren, ſo 'tis very bitter to ſee brethren broken off and disjoynted from one another. Whether they be brethren by blood, or brethren by profeſſion; but chiefly if they be brethren in the faith and profeſſion of the Goſpel. Abraham ſaid unto Lot, let there be no ſtrife, I pray thee, between me and thee, & between my herdmen & thy herdmen. He would not only have have no ſtriſe between themſelves, but not between their ſervants, and why? For we are brethren (Gen. 13.8.) The diviſions of brethren are both grievous and ſcandalous; grievous to themſelves, and ſcandalous to others. Hence Moſes gives counſel to the two contending Iſraelites (as Stephen reports it, Act. 7.26.) Sirs, why do ye wrong one to another? you are brethren. The name of a brother, or the remembrance that we are brethren, is enough to pacifie our ſpirits, and haſten us to a reconcilement of all our differences. And that ſo many brethren, who alſo are Iſraelites, fall out with, and wrong one another, and will not be reconciled, how ſad is the ſcandal, and how heavy the burden at this day? All gracious hearts have much cauſe to lament this, as all eyes, even the eyes of our common enemies, have too much occaſion to take notice of it.

Thirdly, In that he ſaith, He hath put my brethren far from me; Obſerve,

The changes of affection are from God: or, it is of the Lord that our brethren are at any time eſtranged from us.

As God puts health far away from us, or aboundance far away from us, ſo he puts friends far away from us. This doth not excuſe brethren in their unkind departures and eſtrangements from one another; only it ſhould teach us to depend upon God, as much for the eſtabliſhment and continuance of friends in their affections and reſpects to us, as of our Lands and Cattel in their fruitfulneſs to us, or of our own bodies in their health and ſtrength to us. There is an over-ruling hand of God, and his effectual working, as in all other afflictions and troubles which come upon us, ſo in the withdrawings of friends and brethren from us. As God forms the ſpirit of man within him, in reſpect of being and exiſtence (for he is the God of the ſpirits of all fleſh, or the Father of ſpirits) ſo likewiſe in reſpect of motion and influence (Zech. 12.1.) It is the Lord who makes men to be of this mind, or of that mind, who ſhapes and faſhions their ſpirits, either towards a compliance with, or a diſlike whether of things or perſons. Friends love no longer then God maintains love in them, and they can do us good no longer then God maintains in them a will to do us good; we cannot diſcharge the loweſt natural duty of love unto a brother, unleſs God come in; yea, we quickly grow unnatural, if God leave us. The love or hatred of man is from the Lord.

But ſome may ſay, Is the hatred of man from God? If ſo, how ſhall we acquit God from being the author of ſin?

I anſwer, God is ſaid to put our friends far from us, when he withdraws or withholds that aſſiſtance and influence which inlarges and unites the hearts of friends. We are all by nature (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Tit. 3.3.) Hateful, and hating one another. And while nature, as corrupted, acts alone, it is not more hateful to God, then full of hatred to men, eſpecially to good men. As God doth not, ſo there is no need he ſhould put enmity and hatred into the heart of a brother againſt his brother, there's too much of theſe already in every mans heart; if God do but leave a brother to himſelf, he quickly ſhews himſelf unbrotherly. Now if brethren hate unleſs God over-rule their hearts, then 'tis no wonder if ſtrangers and enemies do it (Pſal. 105.25.) When Moſes deſcribes the cruel uſage which the Egyptians ſhewed to the people of Iſrael, he tells us, God turned their hearts, that they hated his people, and dealt ſubtilly with his ſervants. That is ſomewhat a hard ſpeech when 'tis ſaid, He turned their hearts to hate his people; God did not drop hatred into their hearts; God turns the heart from ſin, not to ſin; but he is therefore ſaid to turn their hearts to hate his people, becauſe he gave them up to the baſeneſs and ſuſpiciouſneſs of their own hearts, which told them a thouſand ſad ſtories, or propheſies rather, what the Iſraelites would do, and how they would burden Egypt, and bring it low, unleſs themſelves were brought low by an impoſition of new burdens. This was enough, and this was all that God did when he turned the hearts of the Egyptians to hate his people, and deal ſubtilly with his ſervants. Unleſs God hold our hearts, and keep them for us, we are not only unſteady in every duty both to God and man, but we act quite beſide, yea contrary to our duty: We love where we ſhould hate, and hate where we ſhould love; we help thoſe whom we ſhould oppoſe, and oppoſe thoſe to whom we ſhould be helpful; we are like brethren to thoſe whoſe enemies we ſhould be, and we are as enemies to our brethren. He hath put my brethren far from me,

And my acquaintance are verily eſtranged from me.

יְדָעַי Noti mei. Vulg. Neceſſarii mei. Tygur. Scientes nomen meum obliti ſunt mei. Sept.

Brethren are our neareſt acquaintance, and all our acquaintance may be called brethren. The Hebrew word ſignifies, to know. Some render it ſo here, they who knew me, or were known to me, are eſtranged. The knowledge we have of men brings us into acquaintance with them; and the more we are acquainted with them, the more we know them. The word implies, intimate and ſpecial knowledge (1 Sam. 3.7.) Samuel did not yet know the Lord; Not know the Lord! why, how was Samuel bred, that he did not know the Lord? He was come to years of knowledge, and had he lived in ignorance? The meaning is not, that he did not know the Lord at all, but he had not yet known the Lord by way of extraordinary revelation, or viſion: Thus Samuel did not know the Lord till that time. God reproves the Jews for their hypocriſie and formality (Iſa. 58.2.) They ſeek me daily, and delight to know my wayes; that is, they pretend to an earneſt deſire of knowing my wayes, they ſeek to me as if they would creep into my mouth, yea and lodge in my heart, to know all my deſire concerning the holineſs of their lives, and the exacteſt conformity of their wayes to my will. Thus they would be thought to know me and acquaint themſelves with me; and ſo much the word uſed by Job (which we render acquaintance) holds forth. Yet becauſe Job ſpeaks at verſ. 19. of his inward friends, therefore I rather take his acquaintance here, for common friends, ſuch as were but generally known to him, or ſuch as knew him but generally; My acquaintance,

Are verily eſtranged from me.] The word ſignifies, ſuch an eſtrangement, or alienation of ſpirit, as ariſeth from nauſeouſneſs, or the offence which the ſtomach takes at ſuch meats as are improper to it. As if he had ſaid, My acquaintance loath me, their ſtomachs turn at me, they are ready to vomit at the ſight or thought of me, and of my afflicted condition. In which ſence, the word is uſed (Ezek. 14.5.) Where the Lord complains of the backſliding of his ancient people to Idolatry; They are all eſtranged from me through their Idols; as if the Lord had ſaid, My people whom I have loved begin to loath me, I am out of date with them, and my wayes are out of requeſt with them ſince they have found new gods, or new wayes of worſhipping God. Old acquaintance are often laid by when we find new. And (which was Job's caſe) when old friends fall into a low condition, ſome will loath them, or eſtrange themſelves from them, though they have no new. My acquaintance are

Verily eſtranged.] The word verily, hath an emphaſis in it, and notes not only the truth of the thing, or that it was ſo, but alſo the degree of the thing, that it was very much ſo. As if he had ſaid, They are altogether eſtranged, or, there is nothing in them but eſtrangement and unfriendlineſs. We have the like uſe of the word, though to another end (Pſal. 23.6.) Surely goodneſs and mercy (or, only goodneſs and mercy, pure goodneſs and mercy) ſhall follow me all the dayes of my life; that is, I ſhall have goodneſs and mercy without any mixture of ſorrow and trouble; ſo here, They are ſurely or verily eſtranged from me; that is, they are ſtrange as ſtrange can be; there is not the leaſt mixture of love, not the leaſt appearance of good will to me among them all.

Verſ. 14. My kinſfolk fail.

Before he ſpake of his brethren and acquaintance, now of his kindred. All our brethren are our kindred, but all our kindred are not brethren. The original word ſignifies one that is near, and in the Verb, to draw near; ſo 'tis uſed (Pſal. 73.28.) It is good for me to draw near to God. We draw near to God in any act of worſhip, or in the exerciſe of any grace, eſpecially in the exerciſe of faith, even as we are ſaid in Scripture, to depart or turn from God, when we neglect his worſhip, or when we act any luſt, eſpecially unbelief, Heb. 3.12. And becauſe the people of God uſe to draw near unto him thus, and 'tis never ſo well with them as when they do ſo; therefore all the people of God, are called Gods nigh ones (Psal. 148. 14.) He also exalteth the horn of his people, the praise of all his Saints, even of the children of Israel; a people near unto him. All the Saints are (as we may say) Gods kindred (it is this word) a people near to him. Our kinsfolk are near to us. How great a priviledge is it to be near God, or of kin to the most High.

My kinsfolk fail.] Friends fail. First, In number when they die, that was not Job's meaning.

Secondly, There is a failing in courtesie; thus his kinsfolk failed, they ceased to perform the office of kindred to him, as Ruth's kinsman did. Job had many of his kindred living, but none in whom kindness lived. He had many kinsfolk, but few friends. My kinsfolk fail.

And my familiar friends have forgotten me.

Familiar friends are expressed in the Hebrew, by the same word which was before translated acquaintance, only with a little difference, this is active, the other passive; as if his acquaintance were rather known by him, then knew him, and his familiar friends knew him more then they were known by him. Familiar friends are such as we daily or very frequently converse with. We say, Out of sight, out of mind. It seems Job's friends cast him out of their mind, while they were in his sight. Forgetfulness is the absence of a thing or person from our minds. Memory is the treasury of the mind; forgetfulness exhausts that treasure. My familiar friends, saith Job,

Have forgotten me.] Possibly some of them forgot that they had such a friend, but all of them forgot him as a friend, they forgot all the courtesies and kindnesses that ever they received from him, as also all the kindnesses and courtesies that ever they professed to him.

Again, To forget, is to neglect, or to slight. Though they had him in their thoughts, though he lived in their natural memory (as memory is taken properly for the keeping or laying up of that which is past) yet they morally forgot him, that is, they slighted and neglected him: And then my familiar friends have forgotten me, is, as if he had said, Those friends to whom I have expressed love, take no care of me, they perform no offices of love to me, nor do they regard what becomes of me, sink or swim 'tis all one with them. So the word is applied (Lam. 2.2.) He hath violently taken away his Tabernacle, as if it were of a garden, he hath destroyed his places of the Assembly; the Lord hath caused the solemn feasts and assemblies to be forgotten in Sion. How forgotten? The Lord did not cause the Jews to forget that there had been solemn feasts, and Sabbaths in Sion; the thing was remembred, and that was an addition to the sorrow of their captivity; but those feasts were disused by all, none came at them, none observed them, and they were sleighted by many; thus they were forgotten. And as the Lord at that time in wrath caused them to forget their solemn feasts in a strange land; so he promised in mercy, that a time should come when they should be forgotten in their own Land (Jer. 3.16.) And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and encreased in the Land, in those dayes saith the Lord, they shall say no more, The Ark of the Covenant of the Lord, neither shall it come to mind, neither shall they remember it, &c. But what are those dayes, wherein the Ark (which is put Synechdochically for all Ceremonial observations) should not be remembred, or should be forgotten? We may understand it, either of the dayes of Christs coming in the flesh, when all shadows should vanish or disappear; or of the times of their restauration, when they should not trust to, nor boast of those external Evidences of Gods presence, as formerly they had done when they cryed, The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord, Jer. 7.4. They who use outward administrations may be said to forget them while they live in the spirit, and have no confidence in a form, though good, useful and necessary.

Oblivio negligens est recordatio vera, diligens & studiosa.

Thus Job complains, My familiar friends have forgotten me; either they do not at all visit me as friends, or they do not use me friendly in their visits. To forget, is either to neglect the doing of a thing, or the doing of it negligently; as to remember a thing, imports, not only the doing of it, but the doing of it diligently. And so those former expressions, They are estranged from me, they have failed, are the same with this, They have forgotten me. All signifying and speaking the unkindness of his friends to him in that low condition.

Hence observe, First, Adversity and affliction are the touch-stone of friendship.

That's the time to try friends, to know what friends are, or who are friends. And as adversity is the demonstration, or touchstone of friends, so 'tis a high commendation to continue friendship in adversity. Christ tells his Disciples (Luke 22.28.) and he puts an accent of honour upon it, Ye are they, who have continued with me in my temptation; as if he had said, All have not done thus, nor could ye have done it, unless it had been given you from above; and when the temptation, that is, the tryal and sufferings of Christ grew very high, they began to fail in doing it, and shrink from their Master: yet Christ took their former constancy to, and continuance with him so well, that he did not only give them the honour of this acknowledgment, Ye are they; but presently tells them of an honourable reward; and I appoint unto you a Kingdom, as my father hath appointed unto me. It is an easie matter to abide with Christ, or with those that are Christs, in times of peace, or in the day of their consolations; but when we are under temptations, afflictions, and troubles, then to abide and keep close to Christ, and those who profess Christ; here's the proof of friendship, and Gospel-love. Many will run to friends to ask shelter, when themselves are in a storm (as we use to betake our selves to the shelter of a spreading tree in a storm of foul weather) who quickly leave them when the storm is blown over, and the weather fair. But how few are there who run to their friends when they are in a storm to offer them shelter? The Apostle complains of his desertion in such a condition (2 Tim. 4.16.) At my first answer no man stood with me: but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge: And he remembers it to the praise of Onesiphorus, for whom also upon that account he prayes (2 Tim. 1.16.) The Lord give mercy to the house of Onesiphorus, he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain. Many friends come about us when we have a crown of comfort or of honour upon our heads, or when we have our garments of praise and joy upon our backs; but when we are in sackcloath, or wear a chain, then to appear with us or for us, argues strength as well as truth of love. True and strong love hath these five things in it.

First, It is not weakned by time, it never waxeth old; true love, the older it grows, the stronger and fresher it grows. We say, Time is a great eater, it consumes all things; but Eternity cannot eat out true love, either to God or man. True love shall be old, but it never waxeth cold, nor vanisheth away.

Secondly, True love is not hindred by remoteness of place, love knows no local distances; a friend in the farthest parts of the world, is as near to real affection, as he that lodgeth under the same roof, and eats bread with us every day. We may soon remove out of the sight, but we cannot remove out of the mind of a friend indeed.

Thirdly, True friendship or love is fruitful; sincere affection will put it self forth, and bud into action, it doth not rest at the tongues end, or confine it self to fine expressions, and complements, but it makes appearance or may be seen at the fingers ends, and is laborious in works and offices of friendship. As faith, so love without works is dead, and as that faith which justifies, so the love of a just person is justified by works. Hence the beloved Disciple mingles or makes up his counsel about this duty with a dehortation and an exhortation (1 Joh. 3.18.) Brethren, let us not love in word or in tongue, but in deed, and in truth; that is, let our deeds speak the truth of our love; it is an easie matter to say, but it is a great matter to do or to deed our love. Much love may be expressed by the tongue, but actions are the compleature of love. There may be abundance of love-labour in lip-labour, but where love labours truly at the lips, it will not withdraw the labour of the hand, or of the whole man for his good whom we love.

Fourthly, Truth of affection is full of compassion, sorrowing the sorrows, and being afflicted in the afflictions of those we love; it is so far from departing from those that are burden'd, that it bears a part of the burden with them; it weeps with those that weep, and causeth us to remember those that are in bonds as bound with them, and them that suffer ſuffer adverſity, as being our ſelves alſo in the body (Heb. 13. 1, 2.) They who are of one heart, make both their loſſes and their enjoyments common, they all ſhare in what befals any one.

Fifthly, True love is as ready to own the perſon of a friend, as to ſympathize with his condition. As hope makes us not aſhamed of our own eſtate, whatſoever it is, ſo love makes us not aſhamed of the eſtate of another (Prov. 17. 17.) A friend loves at all times; he is not aſhamed to profeſs or expreſs his love at any time. He loves his friend in good report and ill report, (if that ill report be not raiſed upon his ill deſert) in honour and in diſhonour (if that diſhonour riſe not from his diſhoneſty); he is neither aſhamed of his friends poverty, nor of his priſon, when (not his own ſin, but) the chaſtning hand of God, or the unjuſt hand of man caſts him into either.

Thus a friend loves at all times, and he that loves not at all times, is no friend at all. We ſhall quickly ſee the end of their love, who love either God or man meerly for ſelf-ends: but where the ends of love to God or man are pure, that love will endure and hold out unto the end. Chriſt forewarns us (Matth. 24. 12.) That in the latter times, becauſe iniquity ſhall abound, the love of many ſhall wax cold: cold no doubt to God, and cold to man. The abounding of iniquity in thoſe dayes will make a ſcarcity of love. When iniquity abounds, trouble waxeth hot. And as then all falſe love waxeth quite cold, ſo the true love of ſome both to God and man will wax colder then it was. The blaſts of trouble, whether among or againſt the brethren, may (poſſibly) blow up and more inkindle the love of ſome, but they will blow out and quench the love of many. Trouble is the ſureſt trial of love; and therefore Chriſt tells us plainly (what Job found in the time of his perſonal trouble) that in times of great publick trouble there ſhall be but little love.

Secondly, In that Job complains of this ſo much and ſo often in his affliction, Obſerve,

The alienation of friends, or their abatements of love, is a very great encreaſe of our ſorrow in times of ſorrow.

The kindneſs of friends is comfortable at all times, much more in ſad times. And as their unkindneſs leſſens our comforts in good times, ſo it adds to our ſorrow in evil times, and that upon a threefold conſideration.

Firſt, Becauſe they are obliged by received courteſies.

Secondly, Becauſe they have obliged themſelves by promiſed kindneſſes. It doth not trouble us much to ſee them uncourteous to us, who never received courteſie from us; or to ſee them unwilling to do us a kindneſs, who never promiſed any. But when we ſee our courteſies loſt upon any man, or him ſitting looſe to us, notwithſtanding all his own promiſes, this goes to the heart, and cuts deep. An unexpected croſs is not ſo grievous to us, as the croſſing our expectation. God himſelf calls Heaven and Earth to witneſs againſt ſuch as fail him in obedience, when he hath fill'd and followed them with benefits, (Iſa. 1. 2.) I have nouriſhed and brought up Children (ſaith the Lord) and they have rebelled againſt me. Though when any man rebelleth againſt God, he croſſeth his will, yet many rebel againſt him of whom (in a ſence) we may ſay, that they do not croſs his expectation; for though he hath deſerved better at the hands of all, yet he looks for no better at the hands of ſome: But when Children, and Children whom he hath tenderly brought up and nouriſhed, rebel againſt him; when they whom he hath even ſtudied to pleaſe, care not to pleaſe him; when they from whom he had reaſon to expect all obedience, and nothing but obedience, pay him with rebellion, he will bear no longer. 'Tis thus in a proportion between man and man, as between God and man. Hence David complains often of the unkind alienation of friends, (Pſal. 31. 11.) I was a reproach among all mine enemies (that was not ſo much, he could expect no better) but ſpecially amongſt my neighbours, and a fear to mine acquaintance; they that did ſee me without fled from me. David ſpeaks here of three ſorts; Firſt, Enemies; Secondly, Neighbours; And thirdly, Acquaintance. That his Enemies reproached him, was a trouble to him, yet the leaſt of his troubles; the thing which troubled him moſt, was, that his Neighbours reproached, and that his Acquaintance were afraid of him; he was a fear to his acquaintance, not that they were afraid he would do them any hurt, but they were afraid to own him, or do him any good. We have David bemoaning himſelf again for this (Pſal. 38. 11.) My lovers and my friends ſtand aloof from my ſore, and my kinſmen ſtand afar off. His friends came near enough to him when he was (as we ſay) in a whole skin, or in a good condition, but when ſores were upon him, he means it not of ſores (in proper ſence) upon his fleſh, but of ſores in a metaphor, troubles in his eſtate; then as if his ſore had been a plague-ſore, they ſtood afar off. Read the ſame holy man once more bewailing the unfaithfulneſs of his friends (Pſal. 69. 8.) I am become a ſtranger to my brethren, and an aliant to my mothers Children. And though Heman's greateſt trouble was a divine Deſertion, yet he was not a little troubled that men deſerted him (Pſal. 88. 8.) Thou haſt put away my acquaintance far from me; thou haſt made me an abomination unto them. Heman had a precious ſpirit, yet God at once poured terror upon him, and ſuffered men to pour contempt upon him; and while the terrors of God diſtracted him, he could not conceal how much the contempt of men diſquieted him.

Thirdly obſerve, The moſt profeſſed and real friends in the world, may prove unſteady and unkind.

We cannot be aſſured of any friend but Chriſt. Where or whom he loves, he loves to the end; but we may quickly ſee the end of mans love. Men are mutable in their condition, but more mutable in their affections. Now they love, anon they hate; now they applaud, anon they calumniate; now they lay us in their hearts, and anon they caſt us out of their houſes; now they cannot tell how to live out of our company, and anon they cannot live in it. There are many rocks upon which love hath ſplit, and friendſhip hath been broken; but uſually 'tis ſome change in our outward condition, which makes the change in our affection. Sometimes the proſperity of friends turns our love into envy: And, which we may (charitably) interpret as an argument of Gods favour to them, checks our friendſhip with them.

It is an ancient obſervation, That proſperity hath many friends, yea, that all men are greedy to call themſelves the kindred of the rich; and like ſwallows to flutter about thoſe who live in the warm ſummer of worldly abundance. Yet the envy of ſome is too hard for their love, and they grow poor and beggarly in their affections to thoſe who outgrow them in riches and poſſeſſions. Some cannot rejoyce in friends any longer then they ſtand upon equal terms and even ground with them. But the ordinary rock upon which friendſhip ſuffers, is poverty and affliction; that which ſhould be the ſpecial ſeaſon for friends to ſhew themſelves in, becomes the occaſion of their falling off (Prov. 17. 17.) A friend loves at all times, and a brother is born for adverſity; as if he had ſaid, there is little or no uſe of a brother, but in a time of adverſity, or that's the ſpecial time in which we have uſe of him, he is born for that very end, to aſſiſt and comfort an afflicted Brother; as Chriſt ſpeaks of witneſs-bearing to the truth (Joh. 18. 37.) To this end was I born, and for this cauſe came I into the world, that I ſhould bear witneſs to the truth: As if Chriſt had thus expreſſed himſelf, I ſhould looſe the very end of my birth, the end why I came into the world, if I ſhould not bear witneſs to the truth; ſo we may conclude, if brethren and friends help not their friends and brethren in adverſity, they looſe the very end why they were born, and the deſign of ſetting up that relation. To give witneſs to an oppreſſed truth, and to give aſſiſtance to a diſtreſſed brother, are a pair of the nobleſt works, which we have to do in this world. Yet we rarely find either zeal enough in men to give witneſs to oppreſſed truths, or love enough in men to give help to their diſtreſſed brethren.

Fourthly obſerve, Holy and good men may be deſerted by friends that are holy and good.

Job was a good man, and there is no queſtion but Job had good men to his friends, and that divers of his kindred feared God, yet how ſhamefully was he diſowned by them all? There is no duty, whether to God or man, but a good man may come ſhort in his anſwer to it; In many things we offend all, and all are apt to offend in this. As the law of faith in God, ſo the law of love to man is not eaſily fulfilled. Where the true habit of love is, there may be a great defect in the exercise of it. As he that hath faith doth not alwayes act faith, sometimes he acts as an unbeliever; and as he that hath the graces of patience and humility doth not alwayes act the patient and the humble man; so he that hath love, and is a friend at his heart, may yet shew himself unfriendly: Not only may carnal and graceless friends, but even spiritual and gracious friends prove very vain and unstable to us. As Alexander the Coppersmith, a temporary Believer, turn'd enemy against Paul, and did him much evil (2 Tim. 4. 14.) So they who were true Believers and found in the faith, were not true to him in their friendship; for they all forsook him, though not through unfaithfulness, yet through fear in an evil day, as he complains at the sixteenth verse of the same Chapter, At my first answer no man stood with me, all forsook me. Paul had not a friend to own him, or shew him any love when he was brought before Nero. How great the sin of this universal desertion was, we may collect from that serious intercession, I pray God it be not laid to their charge. Unless free mercy come in with pardon and discharge, our cowardly withdrawings from Saints in times of danger, as well as our withdrawings from Christ and his Truth, will be charged sadly upon us. When Christ himself was betrayed by Judas, and attached by the Jews, all his Disciples (even John the beloved Disciple, who but a little before leaned on his bosom) forsook him and fled: And as all they fled from him, so Peter who followed him, followed him afar off; and when he was come to Christ in his bodily presence, even unto the high Priests Palace, he then forsook, and fled from Christ more then all his fellow Disciples, he denied him, and forswore him: Our Lord Jesus Christ might say indeed, My familiars and acquaintance are verily estranged from me. Therefore in such forsakings and failings of friends, let us not be scandalized, as if some new thing had happened, or as if this were not a temptation common to man. While we remember that Christ was forsaken, that Paul was forsaken, that Job was forsaken, who are we, that we should not be forsaken? Men may say it, and yet fail; only God hath said it, who cannot fail; I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.

To close this Point, take these four Deductions.

First, There is no friend upon whom we can fully confide, but God himself.

And indeed to confide fully on any friend (were upon the matter) either to suppose or make him our God (Mic. 7. 5.) Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide; keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom: for the son dishonoureth his father, the daughter riseth up against her mother, the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law; a mans enemies are the men of his own house. But may we not trust friend nor brother? May not a husband trust the secrets of his heart with his wife? This seems unnatural to all these relations, and takes that from them which is a principal end why they are. The Prophet in all these cautions against creature-trust, doth not command or teach friends to nourish jealousies concerning each others faithfulness (which is the canker of friendship) nor would he have the husband torment himself with fears of his wives disloyalty to him, if he should communicate his bosom-secrets to her (which were to make marriage a meer bondage.) That which he aims at, is to arm us with patience, if friends fail and prove unfaithful; or to forewarn us that there is no friend but may prove unfaithful; and that therefore, as himself did (v. 7.) we should resolve to look unto the Lord, that is, to be confident of his help alone.

Secondly, It is of God that friends are faithful and true unto us.

When friends are friendly, this is of God; and if our friends are unfriendly, this also is of God. The Lord can make our enemies to be at peace with us. And unless he uphold the hearts of our friends, they will quickly be as enemies to us. The smiles and the frowns, the love and the hatred, the good will and the ill will of man are ordered by a divine hand; riches and honour, with all other accommodations and comforts of this life, are not more the gift of God to us, then the affections of our friends are.

Thirdly, Though friends have given us much proof of their faithfulness, yet they may fail in the offices of friendship.

Not only professed, but experienced friends may prove vain and helpless to us. We cannot conclude that any man will do us good, or stand our friend, because he hath done so; for not only may his hand be shortened, and he cannot do as before; but his mind may change, so that he will not do as before. Experiencrs of what God hath done for us, are strong grounds of confidence in him; the more experience we have, the more hope; but the experience we have of men, is not a sure ground of hope; that they have been a support and comfort to us, is no infallible argument that they will be so again.

What Absalom said to Hushai (when upon a seeming defection from David, he offered him his service and advice) Is this thy kindness to thy friend? Why wentest thou not with thy friend? The same may be said to many, who make real defection from their friends, and apostatize from all their most serious professions of friendship; Is this your kindness to your friends? why go you not with your friends? False friends will alwayes fail us for an advantage to themselves; and true friends may sometimes fail us, when we expect most advantage, and need most assistance from them. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? is Job's denying question in this Book. We may also question with as strong a negative concerning persons; Who can find a certain friend among men, who are all (upon one account or other) uncertain? We have no assurance of men but this, that surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie (Psal. 62. 9.) Men of high degree and men of low degree, comprehend all sorts of men: A lie and vanity comprehend all kinds of uncertainty; and therefore (though such men, whose hearts God establisheth to us, may be sure to us, yet) we may write uncertainty, uncertainty, upon all men.

Fourthly, 'Tis best to use friends as knowing that they may fail us.

We must have them as if we had them not, and love them as if we loved them not. Not that we should be unsound or cold in our love to others (that were not only uncivil, but sinful) but that we should not be confident, or make our selves sure of the love of any. That man who is unsound or cold in his love, is less then a friend; and he that is confident, or makes himself sure of the love of a friend, makes him more then a man. That speech, So love as if thou shouldest shortly hate, may have an ill use; yet there is a good use to be made of it: For though (in regard of the sincerity of our own affections) we should so love, as if we were to love for ever, yet in regard of the instability of mans affections, we should so love, as if occasion might be given us to hate every moment. We must so love God, as knowing that whom he loves, he loves to the end, that is, without any end of loving; yet we must so please God, as if we feared his love might end, or be turned into hatred every hour: but though we should be willing to please and pleasure men in all lawful things, as if their love towards us could never end; yet we must so love them, as knowing that their love might quickly end. We rarely give our friends so much love as we ought; but we often expect more love from them then we should. We can never give God so much love as we ought, nor are we able to hope for so much love from him as we should. 'Tis best for us to give all our love to God, and not to expect much from man: We may hope for most from God, when we expect least from the creature. The fresh springs of the consolation of God flow most fully into us, when the fresh springs of our affection run chiefly unto God. And the Lord is pleased sometimes purposely to stain the beauty of all our comforts in the creature, with their failings and uncertainties, that while we use them, we may enjoy none but himself; and that while we love them, we might live only in and upon his love.

Sic ama tanquam osurus.

VERS.

VERS. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19.

They that dwell in mine house, and my maids count me for a stranger, I am an aliant in their sight.
I called my servant, and he gave me no answer; I entreated him with my mouth.
My breath is strange to my wife, though I entreated for the childrens sake of mine own body.
Yea, young children despised me, I arose, and they spake against me.
All my inward friends abhorred me, and they whom I loved, are turned against me.

Verse 15. They that dwell in mine house.

נור a גרי Variè redditur, Incolæ, inquilini, advenæ. Inquilini domus meæ: Vulg. Γέιτονες οἰκίας. Vicini domus. Sept.

THe word is rendred a Tenant who hires Land to use, or a House to dwell in; and so some understand it here; They that dwell in mine house, that is, they that hire my Houses, or my Lands, and dwell upon them; My Tenants count me a stranger.

Others translate Neighbors, or such as dwelt near him; My Neighbors count me a stranger.

Thirdly, The word signifies a Sojourner, one who hath the conveniencies of Lodging and Diet in the house (Exod. 3. 22.) Every woman shall borrow of her neighbour, and of her that sojourneth in the house, Jewels of silver, and Jewels of Gold.

Fourthly, The word may note any passenger or stranger whom we entertain and admit to stay with us, and abide in our house for a season. The sojourner lives with us at his own charge, he payes for what he receives; but the stranger stayes with us upon our cost, and hath his welcome freely. Be not forgetful (saith the Apostle) to entertain strangers (Heb. 13. 2.) So the word is used (Exod. 2. 22.) Moses called his Sons name Gershom, for he said, I have been a stranger in a strange Land. And Job shewing his nobleness in Hospitality, saith (chap. 31. 32.) The stranger did not lodge in the street; I took him into my house.

Eadem vox Gherim Hebræi vocabant eos quos Graci προσήλυτος vocant, illos, sc. qui non genere, sed quasi adoptione initiati profitebantur Judaismum, & circumcisionem accipiebant. Bold.

Fifthly, This word signifies a Proselyte, who was not originally of the people of Israel, but a Gentile, or a stranger by birth; yet receiving Circumcision, was looked upon as one of them, and admitted to the priviledges of the Jews. The word is used in that sence (Exod. 12. 48.) When a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the Passeover to the Lord, let all his Males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it. Of such Christ speaks (Mat. 23. 15.) Wo unto you Scribes and Pharisees hypocrites; for ye compass Sea and Land to make one Proselyte (that is, to bring one into the Jewish Religion) and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell then your selves; for (to open that difficulty only in passage) though seducers are seven-fold the children of hell more then the seduced, barely so considered, in which regard, the seducing Pharisees were the elder sons of Satan, or more the sons of Satan then the seduced Proselytes; yet because young proselytes who drink in false opinions or superstitions, at the perswasions of others, are usually far more taken with them, and more zealous for them, then their perswaders (we have seen many Novices very violent, and even to out-act their Leaders) hence it is (as I conceive) that Christ saith, that the old Pharisees made the young Proselytes twofold more the children of hell then themselves; seeing by how much any do the more advance the design of hell, by so much the more they are advanced in their portion in hell; Double work shall have double wages. But to return; though some Proselytes were at once converted and perverted, or, turned from what they were, to what they should not be, yet many were indeed converted from what they were, to what they should be: And 'tis supposed, that the Psalmist includes those (Psal. 118. 2, 3, 4.) among all sorts that are invited to praise the Lord, First, The whole body of the Jewish Nation (vers. 2.) Let Israel now say, &c. Secondly, The Priests and Levites (vers. 3.) Let the House of Aaron say, his mercy endureth for ever. Thirdly, The Proselytes (vers. 4.) Let them now that fear the Lord, say, that his mercy endureth for ever. Some who were not either of the house of Aaron, that is, of the Priests or Levites, nor of the house of Israel, that is, native Jews, yet might be of the Jewish Religion, and fear the Lord. All such were called Proselytes, and therefore they also were invited to praise the Lord. Some understand Job speaking of such in this Text; The dwellers in mine house, or proselytes, such as I have been a means to turn to God, even they turn away from me; They count me a stranger, and I am an aliant in their sight.

זר Alienum significat & hostem.

They counted me a stranger. The word signifies not only a stranger, but an enemy. Strangers have devoured the Land (Isa. 1. 7.) that is, enemies. And the reason why the same word signifies both an enemy and a stranger is, because enemies are the worst of strangers: And though sometimes our neighbours and they of our own house are enemies to us, yet most commonly our enemies are strangers to us, and alwayes they who are enemies, are estranged from us. In which sence Solomon often calls the Harlot a strange woman (Prov. 2. 16. & 5. 3. &c.) Not only because she is a stranger, or another, from a lawful wife, but because she is really an enemy, and will destroy his peace who is enticed and overcome by her.

Further, This word which we render Stranger, signifies also a prophane man, who indeed should be a stranger to the Saints, and is a stranger to God, as the Apostle expresseth all such (Eph. 2. 12.) Aliens from the Commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the Covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. So some understand it here.

Sicut prophanum reputaverunt me. Targ.

They count me a stranger. That is, the men of my house, who have seen my way of worship, and have joyned with me in the exercises of Religion, now that I am fallen under these afflictions, account me as a stranger from the Covenant, as a prophane man, as an out-cast from the people of God: As if he had said, They who were strangers and aliens from the true God, now count me a stranger and an alien, as if I had renounced my Religion, and had made a defection from the fear of God.

נכרי Extraneus fui.

And I am an aliant in their sight. An Aliant is a man unknown to us, or if known to us, yet not of the same Nation with us. I am accounted an Aliant; as if I were not the same man, as if I were not Job, but a strange kind of creature, newly come into the world, or come from another world. My friends look upon me as if they had never seen me before, or any like me; they whisper among themselves, or say in their hearts, Is this Job? Surely it is not he, or if it be, he is not the man he was. Hence note,

First, Man is ready to receive, and as ready to forget received courtesies.

Job was not counted a stranger by strangers, but by home-dwellers, by persons obliged, by such as had tasted of his favours, and reaped a plentiful harvest from his bounty; these, these were they who counted him a stranger. How unnatural and inhumane is it to count him a stranger to us, that hath entertained us when we were strangers? Yet such returns man makes to man. And no marvel if such be the carriage of man to man, when man carries it thus to God himself. Every sin we commit against God, is a transgression, not only of the Law of holiness, but of Law of the love and kindness. The Apostle doth most significantly put these two together, unthankful, unholy (2 Tim. 3. 2.) Seeing every act of unholiness hath much unthankfulness in it. We are dwellers in Gods house. The whole world is Gods house; he hath set up this great Fabrick; yet to how many that dwell in this house is God a stranger, and an alien in their sight? They live without God in the world. Yea, there are many that dwell in Gods more special house, the visible Church, who yet count God as a stranger; or at least have little acquaintance with him. Many profess the name of God, who know not what it is to converse with God. And they who know what it is, are yet so slow and seldom in it, that the Lord may justly say, You that dwell in my house count me a stranger. We have all our accommodations in the house of God; he feeds and provides for our bodies in his common house, the world; and in his spiritual house, the Church, he feeds and makes provision for our souls, and yet (in a great measure) we are as strangers to him, and give the Lord cause to be a stranger unto us. Moses having told the people of Israel what God had been to them, and done for them, checks their unthankfulness, Deut. 32. 6. Do ye thus require the Lord, O foolish people?

people and unwise? Why? what had the Lord done for them? He had taken them into his house, he made them his house, he dwelt among them, yet they forgot him and turned aside unto other gods. They made themselves strange gods, and so made God a stranger to them. They who take strange Gods, make the true God a stranger; If God alone be not our God, he is not at all our God. It is said of good Hezekiah (2 Chron. 32. 25.) that when the Lord had healed him, and restored him from the grave, whither he gave himself for gone; that, yet Hezekiah rendred not again according to the benefits done to him; for his heart was lifted up; his heart should have been lifted up in thankfulness, but his heart was lifted up in pride. God dwells with an humble soul, and humble souls dwell with God; but as God beholds the proud afar off, so when any of his own people, who are in a state of nearness to him, are lifted up with pride, they behold God afar off, he is as a stranger to them. While we keep close to God by faith, our hearts are kept low by humility. Hezekiah prayed hard to have his body healed, and no sooner was his body healed of that swelling boil, but his soul sweld. They who are proud, whether towards God or man, can never be thankful. When shall we who are so greedy to receive, say, what shall we return?

Secondly, Consider how Job taxeth those who had dwelt in his house, whom he had entertained when they were strangers, who had received kindnesses from him. O saith he, They that dwell in mine house, count me a stranger.

Hence note, Man cannot but resent it ill to see those forgetful of him that have received kindness from him.

The former point shewed that we are apt to forget the courtesies we receive; this shews how deep an impression this makes upon their hearts from whom we receive them: when they that dwell in our houses count us strangers, when they who have eaten our bread will not own us, what brand is black enough for such unthankfulness? Now, if man cannot bear it to see those forgetful of him, of whom he hath been mindful, and to whom he hath been helpful, surely God will not bear it at the hand of man. This caused the Lord (*Isa.*1.2.) to make his appeal to Heaven and Earth, Hear O ye Heavens, and give ear O Earth: What's the matter? I have nourished and brought up Children, and they have rebelled against me. God resented it deeply when such as himself had nourished, rebelled; when the Children whom he had brought up were disobedient against him. There is an obligation in nature, to bring up Children, to feed and nourish them. Now, if it be so offensive when Children do not answer our care in their breeding and education; much more is this true in reference to strangers. The Lord may tell those who are now his Children, that he nourished, yea and redeemed them, when they were not only strangers, but enemies; how greatly then do we provoke the Lord by our unthankfulness, when we make him a stranger to us, who took us in when we were strangers, and acted such unspeakable love to us when we were enemies.

Further, the Text holds out another antecedent to these words, besides the dwellers or sojourners in Job's house, even his houshold servants.

My maidens count me a stranger, I am an aliant in their sight.

He speaks also of his men-servants in the next verse; I called my servant, and he gave me no answer. We are now come to the third sort whom Job taxeth of unanswerableness in duty to him in his afflictions. First, His kindred were unkind; Secondly, His friends were unfriendly; Thirdly, His servants proved unserviceable.

אמה Ancilla, sic dicta à fidelitate; ancilla libera & ingenua; cui credita sunt praecipua domus ministeria. Bold.

My maidens.] The word which is here used for Maidens, doth not signifie those who are for ordinary service only, but such as have command and trust, such as keep the keyes of the family. The word imports trust: servants are expresst by that word both for the trust committed to them, and for their expected faithfulness in that trust. Abigail gives a distinction of maid-servants in that expression (1 *Sam.*25.41.) some for government, others for common work in the house: that Text saith, She arose and bowed her self on her face to the earth, and said, Behold let thine hand-maid be as a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my Lord.

Let thy hand-maid.] There she expresseth her self by the word of the Text, Let thy hand-maid be as a servant; that word notes a servant of an inferior rank, not a directing, or an over-seeing servant, but a working servant; Let thy hand-maid be as a servant (to do the meanest work) to wash the feet of the servants of my Lord. Job speaks of the best sort of servants, not of drudges; My maidens (who had trust) accounted me as a stranger.

Vers. 16. I called my servant, and he gave me no answer.

'Tis the duty of servants to be at a call, or to come when they are called. The word implies calling by name, which is a free and a familiar way of calling. It carries some respect and favour in it to speak to a servant by name; I called my servant, and he gave me no answer: Silence is sometime a sign of consent, but silence is here taken for a sign of contempt; not to answer when we are called is incivility in most, and it is undutifulness in some; if a servant answer not when he is called, he forgets what his calling is. The Apostle forbids servants some kind of answering (Tit. 2.9.) Exhort servants to be obedient to their own Masters, and to please them well in all things, not answering again; yet here Job reproves and complains of it as a fault in his servant, that he did not answer; how then saith the Apostle, Not answering again?

There is a twofold answering; First, By way of contradiction; Secondly, By way of submission; or there is an answer of reluctance, and an answer of obedience: when the Apostle saith to servants, Be obedient to your Masters, not answering again, he means, not answering by way of contradiction, or reluctance, as servants are very apt to do. When Masters give lawful commands, servants must give answer by submitting, not by questioning, much less by opposing: hence we put in the margent, Not gain-saying. A servant must give an answer when he is asked a question, but he must not gain-say when he is enjoyned a duty. Some servants are both lowd and lazy, quick of tongue and slow of hand. Job's servant was one if not both these; I called my servant, and he gave me no answer.
